THE LAW DICTIONARY.

KEE

KAIA. A key or wharf. Spelm.

KAIAGIUM. Keyage; which see.

KAIN, Poultry payable by a tenant to his landlord. Scotch Dict.

KALENDÆ. Rural chapters or conventions of the rural deans and parochial clergy; so called because formerly held on the Kalends, or first day of every month. Paroch. Antiq. 640.

KALENDAR and KALENDS. See Calendar and Calends.

KANTREF. See Cantred.

KARITE. See Caritas.

KARLE, Sax.] A man; and with any addition a servant or clown; as the Saxons called a domestic servant, a huskarle; from whence comes the modern word churl. Domesday.

KARRATA FENI. A cart-load of hay. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 548. See Carecta.

KAY. See Key.

KEBBARS, or Cullers.] The refuse of sheep drawn out of a flock; ovæ rejiculæ. Cooper's Thesaur.

KEELAGE, killagium.] A privilege to demand money for the bottom of ships resting in a port or harbour. Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. 1.

KEELMEN. Are mentioned among mariners, seamen, &c. in various statutes. See title Coals.

KEELS. This word is applied to vessels used in the rivers of the north of England for the carriage of coals, &c. See Keyles.

KEEP. A strong tower or hold in the middle of any castle or fortification, wherein the besieged made their last efforts of defence, was formerly in England called a Keep; and the inner pile within the castle of Dover, erected by King Henry II. about the year 1153, was termed the King's Keep: so at Windsor, &c. It seems to be something in the nature of that which is called abroad a Citadel.

KEEPER OF THE FOREST, Custos Forestæ.] Or chief warden of the forest, hath the principal government over all officers within the forest: and formerly warned them to appear at the court of justice-seat, on a general summons from the lord chief justice in eyre. Manwood, part 1. p. 156. See title Forest.

KEEPER OF THE GREAT SEAL, Custos magni sigilli.] Is a lord by his office, styled Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and is of the King's Privy Council: through his hands pass all charters, commissions, and grants of the king under the great seal; without which seal many of those grants and commissions are of no force in law; for the king is by interpretation of law a corporation, and passeth nothing but by the great seal, which is as the public faith of the kingdom, in the high esteem and reputation justly attributed thereto.

VOL. II.

KER

The great seal consists of two impressions, one being the very seal itself with the effigies of the king stamped on it; the other has an impression of the king's arms in the figure of a target, for matters of a smaller moment, as certificates, &c. that are usually pleaded sub pede sigilli. And anciently when the king travelled into France or other foreign kingdoms, there were two great seals; one went with the king, and another was left with the Custos Regni, or the Chancellor, &c.

If the great seal be altered, the same is notified in the Court of Chancery, and public proclamations made thereof by the sheriffs, &c. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 171, 4.

The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, by statute 5 Eliz. c. 18, hath the same place, authority, pre-eminence, jurisdiction, and execution of laws, as the Lord Chancellor of England hath; and he is constituted by the delivery of the great seal, and by taking his oath. 4 Inst. 87. See Lamb. Archæion. 65; 1 Rot. Abr. 385, and this Dictionary, titles Chancellor; Great Seal of England.

KEEPER OF THE PRIVY SEAL, Custos privati sigilli.] That officer, through whose hands all charters, pardons, &c. pass, signed by the king, before they come to the great seal: and some things which do not pass the seal at all: he is also of the Privy Council; but was anciently called only Clerk of the Privy Seal; after which he was named Guardian del Privy Seal; and lastly, Lord Priy Seal, and made one of the great officers of the kingdom. See stat. 12 R. 2. c. 11; Rot. Parl. 11 H. 4.; and 34 H. 8. c. 4.

The Lord Privy Seal is to put the seal to no grant without good warrant; nor with warrant, if it be against law, or inconvenient, but that he first acquaint the King therewith. 4 Inst. 55. As to the fees of the clerks under the Lord Privy Seal, for warrants, &c. see stat. 27 H. 8. c. 11. See further this Dictionary, titles Grants of the King; Privy Seal.

KEEPER OF THE TOUCH, mentioned in the ancient statute 12 H. 6. c. 14, seems to be that officer in the King's mint at this day called the Master of the Assay. See Mint.

KEEPERS OF THE LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND. By authority of Parliament. See Custodes Libertatis.

KERHERE. A custom to have a cart-way; or a commutation for the customary duty for carriage of the lord's goods. Cowell.

KERNELLARE DOMUM, from Lat. Crena, a notch.] To build a house formerly with a wall or tower, kernelled with crannies or notches, for the better convenience of shooting arrows, and making other defence. Du Fresnoe derives this word from quarnellus or quadrancellus, a four-square hole or notch; ubicunque patent quarnelli sive fenestree; and this form of walls and battlements for military uses might possibly have its name from quadrillus, a four-square dart. It was a common favour granted by our Kings in ancient times, after castles were demolished for prevention of rebellion, to give their chief subjects leave to fortify their mansion-houses with kernalled walls. Paroch. Antiq. 533.

KERNELATUS. Fortified or embattled according to the old fashion. Plac. 31 Ed. 3.

KERNES. Idle persons; vagabonds. Ordin. Hibern. 31 Ed. 3. m. 11, 12.

KEVERE. A cover or vessel used in a dairy-house for milk or whey. Paroch. Antiq. 386.

KEY, Kaia and caya, Sax. Leg. Teut. Key, now generally spelled Quay, from the French quai.] A wharf to land or ship goods or wares at. The verb caiare, in old writers, signifies (according to Sealiſiger) to keep in, or restrain: and so is the earth or ground, where keys are made, with planks and posts. Cowell.

The lawful keys and wharfs for lading or landing goods belonging to the port of London, were Chester's Key, Brewer's Key, Galley Key, Wool Dock, Custom-house Key, Bear Key, Porter's Key, Sab's Key, Wiggin's Key, Young's Key, Ralph's Key, Dice's Key, Smart's Key, Somer's Key, Hammond's Key, Lyon's Key, Botolph Wharf, Grant's Key, Cock's Key, and Fresh Wharf; besides Billingsgate, for landing of fish and fruit; and Bridgehouse, in Southwark, for corn and other provision, &c. but for no other goods or merchandise. Deal boards, masts, and timber, may be landed at any place between Limehouse and Westminster, the owner first paying or compounding for the customs, and declaring at what place he will land them. Lex Mercat. 132, 133; stat. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 11. § 14; Rot. Scac. 19 Car. 2. These quays were some years ago purchased out of money advanced by government, with a view to the improvement of the port of London. See the acts 43 G. 3. c. cxxiv; 46 G. 3. c. 118.

There is now a lawful wharf at Hungerford Market, for the landing of goods or merchandise, and passengers for steam-boats, &c. See 11 G. 4. c. 70.

By the 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 29. s. 17. persons stealing goods or merchandize from any dock, wharf, or quay adjacent to any port of entry or discharge, navigable river, or canal, or to any creek, &c. may, on conviction, be transported for life, or not less than seven years, or imprisoned for not exceeding four years, and if males, whipped.

KEYAGE, Kaiagium.] The money or toll paid for lading or unlading wares at a key or wharf. Rot. Pat. 1 Edw. 3. m. 10; 20 Edw. 3. m. 1.

KEYLES or KEELS, Ciuli or Ciules.] A kind of long-boats of great antiquity, mentioned in stat. 23 H. 8. c. 18. Spelm.

KEYING. Five fells, or pelts, or sheeps-skins with their wool on them. Cowell.

KEYUS, KEYS. A guardian, warden, or keeper. Mon. Ang. tom. 2. p. 71. In the Isle of Man, the twenty-four chief commoners, who are, as it were, conservators of the liberties of the people, are called keys of the island. See tit. Man, Isle of.

KICHELL. A cake: it was an old custom for godfathers and godmothers, every time their godchildren asked them blessing, to give them a cake, which was called a God's Kichell. Cowell.

KIDDER. Signified one that badges or carries corn, dead victual, or other merchandize, up and down to sell. 5 Eliz. c. 12. They are also called Kiddiers in 13 Eliz. c. 25.

KIDDLE, KIDLE, or KEDEL, Kidellus.] A dam or open wear in a river with a loop or narrow cut in it, accommodated for the laying of wheels or other engines to catch fish. 2 Inst. fol. 38. The word is ancient, for we meet with it in Magna Charta, c. 24, and in a charter made by King John to the city of London. By stat. 1 H. 4. c. 12. it was accorded, inter alia, that a survey should be made of the wears, mills, stanks, stakes, and kidels, in the great rivers of England. They are now called Kettles, or Kettle-nets, and are much used on the sea-coasts of Kent and Wales. Cowell.

KIDNAPPING. The forcible abduction and conveying away of a man, woman, or child from their own country, and sending them to another; it is an offence at common law. Raym. 474.

This is unquestionably a very heinous crime, as it robs the King of his subjects, banishes a man from his country, and may, in its consequences, be productive of the most cruel and disagreeable hardships; and therefore the common law of England has punished it with fine, imprisonment, and pillory. 2 Show. 221; Skin. 47; Comb. 10; 4 Comm. 219.

The 11 & 12 H. 3. c. 7. though principally intended against pirates, had a clause to prevent the leaving abroad, by masters of vessels, of persons who had been kidnapped or spirited away: that clause was repealed by the 9 G. 4. c. 31. which by s. 30. enacts, that if any master of a merchant vessel shall (during his being abroad) force any man on shore, or wilfully leave him behind, or refuse to bring home all such men as he carried out, if they are in a condition to return, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for such time as the court shall award, and such offences may be prosecuted by indictment or by information at the suit of the attorney-general in K. B., and may be alleged to be committed at Westminster; and that court may issue commissions to examine witnesses abroad. As to the stealing of children, see tit. Child.

KILDERKIN. A vessel of ale, &c. containing eighteen gallons.

KILKETH. An ancient servile payment made by tenants in husbandry. Cowell.

KILLAGIUM. Keelage. Cowell.

KILLING CATTLE maliciously. 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 29. s. 25. 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 30. s. 16. See tit. Cattle.

KILLYTHSTALLION. A custom by which lords of manors were bound to provide a stallion for the use of their tenants' mares. Spelm. Gloss.

KILTH. Ac omnes annuales redditus de quadam consuetudine in, &c. vocat. Kilth. Pat. 7 Eliz.

KINDRED. Are a certain body of persons of kin or related to each other. There are three degrees of kindred in our law; one in the right line descending, another in the right line ascending, and the third in the collateral line.

The right line descending, wherein the kindred of the male line are called Agnati, and of the female line Cognati, is from the father to the son, and so on to his children in the male and female line; and if no son, then to the daughter, and to her children in the male and female line; if neither son nor daughter, or any of their children, to the nephew and his children, and if none of them, to the niece and her children; if neither nephew nor niece, nor any of their children, then to the grandson or grand-daughter of the nephew: and if neither of them, to the grandson or grand-daughter of the niece; and if none of them, then to the great grandson or great grand-daughter of the nephew and of the niece, &c. et sic ad infinitum.

The right line ascending is directly upwards; as from the son to the father or mother; and if neither father nor mother, to the grandfather or grandmother; if no grandfather or grandmother, to the great grandfather or great grandmother; if neither great grandfather or great grandmother, to the father of the great grandfather, or the mother of the great grandmother; and if neither of them, then to the great grandfather's grandfather, or to the great grandmother's grandmother; and if none of them, to the great grandfather's great grandfather, or great grandmother's great grandmother, et sic ad infinitum.

The collateral line is either descending by the brother and his children downwards, or by the uncle upwards: it is between brothers and sisters, and to uncles and aunts, and the rest of the kindred, upwards and downwards, across and amongst themselves. 2 Nels. Abr. 1077, 1078.

There are several rules to know the degrees of kindred; in the ascending line, take the son and add the father, and it is one degree ascending, then add the grandfather, and it is a second degree, a person added to a person in the line of consanguinity making a degree; and if there are many persons, take away one, and you have the number of degrees; as if there are four persons, it is the third degree, if five, the fourth, &c. so that the father, son, and grandchild, in the descending line, though three persons, make but two degrees: To know in what degree of kindred the sons of two brothers stand, begin from the grandfather and descend to one brother, the father of one of the sons, which is one degree, then descend to his son the ancestor's grandson, which is a second degree; and then descend again from the grandfather to the other brother, father of the other of the sons, which is one degree, and descend to his son, &c. and it is a second degree; thus reckoning the person from whom the computation is made, it appears there are two degrees, and that the sons of two brothers are distant from each other two degrees: for in what degree either of them is distant from the common stock, the person from whom the computation is made, they are distant between themselves in the same degree; and in every line the person must be reckoned from whom the computation is made. If the kindred are not equally distant from the common stock; then in what degree the most remote is distant, in the same degree they are distant between themselves, and so the kin of the most remote maketh the degree; by which rule, I, and the grandchild of my uncle, are distant in the third degree, such grandchild being distant three degrees from my grandfather, the nearest common stock. The common law agrees in its computation with the civil and canon law, as to the right line; and only with the canon law as to the collateral line. Wood's Inst. 48, 49. See further at length, 2 Comm. c. 14: and this Dict. titles Descent; Executor, III.; V. 8.

KING.

REX; from Lat. Rego to rule: Sax. Cyning or Coring.] A monarch or potentate, who rules singly and sovereignly over a people: or he that has the highest power and rule in the land. The King is the head of the state. See Bract. lib. 1. c. 8.

THE SUPREME EXECUTIVE POWER of these kingdoms is vested by the English laws in a single person, the King or Queen; for it matters not to which sex the crown descends; but the person entitled to it, whether male or female, is immediately invested with all the ensigns, rights, and prerogatives of sovereign power: as is declared by stat. 1 Mary, stat. 3. c. 1.

- I. Of the Title and Succession to the Throne.
- II. Of the Royal Family.—As to the Queen, see this Dict. under that title.
- III. Briefly and incidentally of the King's Councils,
- IV. Of the King's Duties; and his Coronation Oath.
- V. Of the King's Prerogative.
 1. Generally.
 2. As relates to his Royal Character; wherein of his Sovereignty, Perfection, and Perpetuity.
 3. With respect to his Authority, Foreign and Domestic; in sending Ambassadors; making Treaties, War and Peace: As one of the Estates of the Realm; Commander of our Armies and Navies; the Fountain of Justice and of Honour; Arbitrer of Domestic Commerce; Supreme Head of the Church.
 4. As regards his Revenues, ordinary and extraordinary; and, in the latter, of his Civil List.

VI. Of the King's Prerogative in relation to his Debts; and see this Dict. titles Execution; Extent; Judgment, &c.

VII. The former and present state of the Prerogative in general.

I. The executive power of the English nation being vested in a single person, by the general consent of the people, the evidence of which general consent is long and immemorial usage, it became necessary to the freedom and peace of the state, that a rule should be laid down uniform, universal, and permanent, in order to mark out with precision who is that single person, to whom are committed (in subservience to the law of the land) the care and protection of the community; and to whom, in return, the duty and allegiance of every individual are due.

When the succession to the crown was formerly interrupted by the state of society and the constitution, which had not then arrived to the state of perfection it attained in later ages, and even more recently since the Revolution, distinctions have been frequently made between a King de facto and de jure. Though it is to be hoped that no contest of this nature is likely again to rise in these kingdoms, what is just shortly hinted on this subject will doubtless be agreeable to the student: see further on this subject, title Treason.

If there be a King regnant in possession of the crown, although he be but Rex de facto, and not de jure, yet he is Seignior le Roy: and another that bath right, if he be out of possession, he is not within the meaning of the stat. 11 H. 7. c. 1. for the subjects to serve and defend him in his wars, &c. And a pardon, &c. granted by a King de jure, that is not likewise de facto, is void. 3 Inst. 7. If a King that usurps the crown, grants licences of alienation or escheats, they will be good against the rightful King; so of pardons, and any thing that doth not concern the King's ancient patrimony, or the government of the people: judicial acts in the time of such a one, bind the right King and all who submitted to his judicature. The crown was tost between the two families of York and Lancaster many years; and yet the acts of royalty done in the reign of the several competitors were confirmed by the Parliament: and those resolutions were made because the common people cannot judge of the King's title, and to avoid anarchy and confusion. Jenk. Cent. 180, 1.

All judicial acts done by Henry VI. while he was King, and also all pardons of felony, and charters of denization granted by him, were deemed valid; but a pardon made by Edward IV. before he was actually King, was declared void even after he came to the crown. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17: and stat. 1 Edw. 4. c. 1.

Hale says the right heir of the crown, during such time as the usurper is in plenary possession of it, and no possession thereof in the heir, is not a King within this act; as was the case of the House of York during the plenary possession of the crown in Henry IV., Henry V., Henry VI. But if the right heir had once the possession of the crown as King, though an usurper had got the possession thereof, yet the other continues his style, title, and claim thereto, and afterwards re-obtains the full possession thereof; a compassing the death of the rightful heir during that interval, is compassing of the King's death within this act, for he continued a King still, quasi in possession of his kingdom; which was the case of Edward IV. in that small interval wherein Henry VI. re-obtained the crown; and the case of Edward V. notwithstanding the usurpation of his uncle Richard III. 1 Hal. Hist. P. C. 104.

The grand fundamental maxim upon which the Jus Coronæ, or right of succession to the throne of these kingdoms depends, seems to be this: "That the crown is by common law and constitutional custom hereditary; and this in a manner peculiar to itself; but that the right of inheritance may from time to time be changed or limited by Parliament; under which limitations the crown still continues hereditary."

First, it is in general hereditary, or descendible to the next heir, on the death or demise of the last proprietor. All regal governments must be either hereditary or elective; and as no instance can be found wherein the crown of England has ever been asserted to be elective, by any authority but that of the regicides at the trial of King Charles I. it must of consequence be hereditary. Yet an hereditary by no means intends a jure-divino right to the throne, save only so far as kingdoms, like other human fabrics, are subject to the general and ordinary dispensations of Providence. Nor, indeed, have a jure-divino and an hereditary right any necessary connection with each other, as some have very weakly imagined. The hereditary right which the laws of England acknowledge, owes its origin to the founders of our Constitution, and to them only. The founders of our English monarchy might perhaps, if they had thought proper, have made it elective; but they rather chose, and upon good reason, to establish originally a succession by inheritance. This has been acquiesced in by general consent, and ripened by degrees into common law; the very same title that every private man has to his own estate. Lands are not naturally descendible any more than thrones; but the law has thought proper, for the benefit and peace of the public, to establish hereditary succession in the one as well as the other.

Secondly, as to the particular mode of inheritance, it in general corresponds with feudal path of descents, chalked out by the common law in the succession to landed estates, yet with one or two material exceptions. Like estates, the crown will descend lineally to the issue of the reigning monarch, as it did from King John to Richard II. through a regular degree of six lineal generations. As in common descents, the preference of males to females, and the right of primogeniture among the males, are strictly adhered to. But among the females the crown descends by right of primogeniture to the eldest daughter and her issue, and, not as in common inheritances, to all the daughters at once; the evident necessity of a sole succession to the throne having occasioned the royal law of descents to depart from the common law in this respect. The doctrine of representation also prevails in the descent of the crown, as it does in other inheritances, whereby the lineal descendants of any person deceased stand in the same place as their ancestor, if living, would have done. Lastly, on failure of lineal descendants, the crown goes to the next collateral relations of the late King, provided they are lineally descended from the blood-royal; that is, from that royal stock which originally acquired the crown. But herein there is no objection (as in the case of common descents previous to the recent statute) to the succession of a brother, an uncle, or other collateral relation of the half blood; provided only, that the one ancestor, from whom both are descended, be that from whose veins the blood-royal is communicated to each. The reason of which diversity between royal and common descents may be understood by recurring to the general rules of descent at common law. See title Descent.

Thirdly, the doctrine of hereditary right does by no means imply an indefeasible right to the throne. No man will surely assert this who has considered our laws, constitution and history without prejudice, and with any degree of attention. It is unquestionably in the breast of the supreme legislative authority of this kingdom, the King and both Houses of Parliament, to defeat this hereditary right, and by particular entails, limitations, and provisions, to exclude the immediate heir, and vest the inheritance in any one else. This is strictly consonant to our laws and constitution, as may be gathered from the expression so frequently used in our statute-book of "the King's Majesty, his heirs and successors." In which we may observe, that as the word heirs necessarily implies an inheritance or hereditary right generally subsisting in the royal person; so the word successors, distinctly taken, must imply that this inheritance may sometimes be broken through, or that there may be a successor without being the heir of the King.

Fourthly, however the crown may be limited or transferred, it still retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the wearer of it. And hence, in our law, the King is said never to die in his political capacity; because immediately upon the natural death of Henry, William, or Edward, the King survives in his successor. For the right of the crown vests eo instanti upon his heir; either the hæres natus, if the course of descent remains unimpeached, or the hæres factus, if the inheritance be under any particular settlement. So that there can be no interregnum; but, as Hale observes, the right of sovereignty is fully invested in the successor by the very descent of the crown. 1 Hist. P. C. 61. Hence the statutes passed in the first year after the restoration of Charles II. are always called the acts in the 12th year of his reign; and all the other legal proceedings of that reign are reckoned from the year 1648, and not from 1660.

On this principle, that the King commences his reign from the day of the death of his ancestor, it hath been held that compassing his death before coronation, or even before proclamation, is compassing of the King's death within the statute of 25 Edw. 3. stat. 5. c. 2; he being King presently, and the proclamation and coronation only honourable ceremonies for the further notification thereof. 3 Inst. 7; 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 101. See title Treason.

However acquired, therefore, the crown becomes in the successor absolutely hereditary; unless by the rules of the limitation it should be otherwise ordered and determined.

In these four points consists the constitutional notion of hereditary right to the throne; which is further elucidated by the learned commentator, from whom much of the foregoing and following abstract is taken, in a short historical view which he gives of the succession to the crown of England, from Egbert to the present time; of the doctrines of our ancient lawyers, and of the several statutes that have from time to time been made to create, to declare, to confirm, to limit, or to bar, the hereditary title to the throne. In the pursuit of this inquiry, he states, that from the days of Egbert, the first sole monarch of this kingdom, to the present, the four cardinal maxims above mentioned have ever been held the constitutional canons of succession to the crown. It is true this succession, through fraud or force, or sometimes through necessity, when in hostile times the crown descended on a minor, or the like, has been very frequently suspended; but has generally at last returned back into the old hereditary channel, though sometimes a very considerable period has intervened. And even in those instances where the succession has been violated, the crown has ever been looked upon as hereditary in the wearer of it. Of which the usurpers themselves were so sensible, that they for the most part endeavoured to vamp up some feeble show of a title by descent, in order to amuse the people, while they gained the possession of the kingdom. And when possession was once gained, they considered it as the purchase or acquisition of a new estate of inheritance, and transmitted, or endeavoured to transmit, it to their own posterity, by a kind of hereditary right of usurpation. See 1 Comm. c. 3. p. 190—7.

It is not very easy to say whether Mary and Elizabeth took the crown by inheritance or special parliamentary limitation. When the act 35 H. 8. c. 1. passed, they had both by a preceding act (28 H. 8. c. 7.) been declared illegitimate, and not capable of inheriting the crown. The act 35 H. 8. without repealing the former, limited the succession to them and the heirs of their bodies respectively, under certain circumstances, and upon certain conditions. On the accession of Mary the clauses of 28 H. 8. c. 7. by which her illegitimacy had been declared, were repealed (1 M. st. 2. c. 1.) and in 1 M. st. 3. c. 1. she is called the "inheritrix to the imperial crown," but the act 35 H. 8. c. 1. was not formally repealed. Elizabeth did not formally repeal the clauses of 28 H. 8. c. 7. which affected her legitimacy; but by 1 Eliz. c. 3. she was recognized as being lineally and lawfully descended of the blood royal of the realm; at the same time, however, the limitation of the crown by 35 H. 8. c. 1. was expressly confirmed. The inference from the whole seems to be, that though neither of them chose to rely on the parliamentary limitation alone, neither thought it right entirely to forego the security which it afforded. Coleridge's Note, 1 Comm. 195.

It may be worth while in this place to advert to the statement of an acute modern writer as to the succession of King James I. to the crown of England. See Hallam's Constitutional History of England, from Henry VII. to George II. vol. 1. cap. 6.

"The popular voice in favour of James was undoubtedly raised in consequence of a natural opinion that he was the lawful heir to the throne. But this was only according to vulgar notions of right which respect hereditary succession as something indefeasible. In point of fact, neither James nor any of his posterity were legitimate sovereigns according to the senses which that word ought properly to bear. The House of Stuart no more came in by a lawful title than the House of Brunswick; by such a title, I mean, as the constitution and established laws of this kingdom had recognised. No private man could have recovered an acre of land without proving a better right than they could make out to the crown of England. What then had James to rest upon? What renders it absurd to call him or his children usurpers? He had that which the flatterers of his family most affect to disdain, the will of the people; not certainly expressed in regular suffrage or declared election, but unanimously and voluntarily ratifying that which could in itself give no right,—the determination of the council to proclaim his accession to the throne. It is probable (adds the writer) that what has been just said may appear paradoxical to those who have not considered this part of our history, yet it is capable of satisfactory proof. This proof consists of four propositions: 1. That a lawful King of England, with the advice and consent of Parliament, may make statutes to limit the inheritance of the crown as shall seem fit. 2. That a statute passed in the 35th of H. 8. (c. 1.) enabled that prince to dispose of the succession by his last will signed by his own hand. 3. That Henry did execute such will, by which in default of issue from his children the crown was entailed upon the descendants of his younger sister, Mary Duchess of Suffolk, before those of Margaret Queen of Scots. [Blackstone, however, affirms that this power of making a will was never carried into execution.] 4. That such descendants of Mary were living at the decease of Elizabeth." The writer then proceeds to prove the four preceding propositions, and concludes thereon against the legal title of King James I. to the throne, and in favour of such right being vested in the descendants of the House of Suffolk. See also Luder's Essay on the Right of Succession to the Crown in the Reign of Elizabeth, who also supports the position as to the want of legal title in the House of Stuart.

Hallam concludes the subject by the following statement: "There is much reason to believe that the consciousness of this defect in his parliamentary title put James on magnifying, still more than from his natural temper he was prone to do, the internal rights of primogenitary succession as something indefeasible by the legislature; a doctrine which, however it might suit the schools of divinity, was in diametrical opposition to our statutes." [Bolingbroke, (the author adds, in a note,) was of this opinion, considering the act of recognition of James as the era of hereditary right, and of all those exalted notions concerning the power of prerogative of kings and the sacredness of their persons.] "Through the servile spirit of those times, however, it made a rapid progress, and, interwoven by cunning and bigotry with religion, became a distinguishing tenet of the party who encouraged the Stuarts to subvert the liberties of the kingdom. In James's proclamation on ascending the throne he set forth his hereditary right in pompous and, perhaps, unconstitutional phrases. It was the first measure of Parliament to pass an act of recognition, acknowledging that on the decease of Elizabeth the imperial crown of the realm of England did by inherent birthright, and lawful and undoubted succession, descend and come to his most excellent Majesty, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully next and sole heir of the blood royal of this realm. Stat. 1 Jac. 1. c. 1. The will of Henry VIII. it was tacitly agreed by all parties to consign to oblivion! and this most wisely, not on the principles which seem rather too much insinuated in this act of recognition, but on such substantial motives of public expediency, as it would have shown an equal want of patriotism and of good sense, for the descendants of the House of Suffolk to have withstood.

If the throne be at any time vacant, (which may happen by other means besides that of abdication, as if all the blood-royal should fail, without any successor appointed by parliament,) the right of disposing of this vacancy seems naturally to result to the Houses of Lords and Commons, the trustees and representatives of the nation. For there are no other hands in which it can so properly be entrusted; and there is a necessity of its being entrusted somewhere, else the whole frame of government must be dissolved and perish.

The preamble to the Bill of Rights expressly declares, that "the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster, lawfully, fully, and freely represent all the estates of the people of this realm." The Lords are not less the trustees and guardians of their country than the members of the House of Commons. It was justly said, when the royal prerogatives were suspended by the indisposition of the King (George III.) in 1788, that the two Houses of Parliament were the organs by which the people expressed their will. And in the House of Commons, on the 16th of December in that year, two declaratory resolutions were accordingly passed, importing: 1. The interruption of the royal authority; 2. That it was the duty of the two Houses of Parliament to provide the means of supplying that defect. On the 23d of the same month a third resolution was passed, empowering the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain to affix the great seal to such Bill of Limitations as might be necessary to restrict the power of the future Regent to be named by parliament: this bill was accordingly brought forward, but happily arrested in its progress by the providential recovery of the King in March, 1789. It is observable, however, that no bill was ever afterwards introduced to guard against a future emergency of a similar nature: on the grounds, undoubtedly, of delicacy to the monarch, in the hope of the improbability that such a circumstance should recur in future; and in the confidence of the omnipotence of parliament if necessarily called upon again. See the Journals of the Lords and Commons, sub an. 1788-9.

Towards the end of King William's reign, the King and Parliament thought it necessary to exert their power of limiting and appointing the succession, in order to prevent the vacancy of the throne; which must have ensued upon their deaths, as no farther provision was made at the Revolution than for the issue of Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King William. It had been previously, by the stat. 1 W. & M. stat. 2. c. 2. enacted, that every person who should be reconciled to, or hold communion with, the See of Rome, who should profess the Popish religion, or who should marry a Papist, should be excluded, and for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the crown; and that in such case the people should be absolved from their allegiance [to such person], and the crown should descend to such persons, being Protestants, as would have inherited the same in case the person so reconciled, holding communion, professing, or marrying, were naturally dead. To act, therefore, consistently with themselves, and at the same time pay as much regard to the old hereditary line as their former resolutions would admit, they turned their eyes on the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover. For upon the impending extinction of the Protestant posterity of Charles I. the old law of regal descent directed them to recur to the descendants of James I.; and the Princess Sophia being the youngest daughter of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, who was the daughter of James I. was the nearest of the ancient blood-royal, who was not incapacitated by professing the Popish religion. On her, therefore, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, the remainder of the crown, expectant on the death of King William and Queen Anne, without issue, was settled by stat. 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 2. See also 4 & 5 Ann. c. 4. by which the Princess Sophia and her future issue were naturalized.

This is the last limitation of the crown that has been made by parliament, and all the several actual limitations from the time of Henry IV. to the present, (stated at large in 1 Comm. c. 3.) do clearly prove the power of the King and Parliament to new model or alter the succession. And, indeed, it is now again made highly penal to dispute it; for by stat. 6 Ann. c. 7. it is enacted, that if any person maliciously, advisedly, and directly, shall maintain by writing, or printing, that the Kings of this realm, with the authority of Parliament, are not able to make laws to bind the crown, and the descent thereof, he shall be guilty of high treason; or if he maintains the same only by preaching, teaching, or advised speaking, he shall incur the penalties of a præmunire.

The Princess Sophia dying before Queen Anne, the inheritance thus limited descended on her son King George I., and having taken effect in his person, from him it descended to King George II., from him to his grandson and heir, King George III., from him to his son King George IV., and on the death of the latter to our present sovereign William IV.

The title to the crown therefore, though at present hereditary, is not quite so absolutely hereditary as formerly; and the common stock or ancestor, from whom the descent must be derived, is also different. Formerly the common stock was King Egbert, then William the Conqueror; afterwards, in James I.'s time, the two common stocks united, and so continued till the vacancy of the throne, occasioned by the abdication of James II. in 1688: now it is the Princess Sophia, in whom the inheritance was vested by the King and parliament. Formerly the descent was absolute, and the crown went to the next heir without any restriction; but now, upon the new settlement, the inheritance is conditional; being limited to such heirs only of the body of the Princess Sophia, as are Protestant members of the Church of England, and are married to none but Protestants.

In these heirs of the Princess Sophia, (to use, with some modification, the expressions of a modern historian, already quoted in the course of this article,) the right to the crown is as truly hereditary as it ever was in the Plantagenets and the Tudors. But they derive it not from those ancient families. The blood, indeed, of Cerdic, and of the Conqueror, flows in the veins of his present Majesty. Our Edwards and Henrys illustrate the almost unrivalled splendour and antiquity of the House of Brunswick. But they have transmitted no more right to the allegiance of England than Boniface of Este, or Henry the Lion. That right rests wholly on the Act of Settlement, and resolves itself into the sovereignty of the legislature. We have, therefore, an abundant security that no prince of the House of Brunswick will ever countenance the silly theories of imprescriptible hereditary right, which flattery and superstition seem still to render current in other countries. He would brand his own brow with the names of upstart and usurper. For the history of the Revolution, and that change in the succession which ensued upon it, will, for ages to come, be as fresh and familiar as the recollections of yesterday. And if the people's claim be, as surely it is, the primary foundation of magistracy, it is perhaps more honourable to be nearer the source, than to deduce a title through a series not free from some whose vices or deficiencies may have sullied the splendour of their descent.

The Bill of Rights was reckoned hasty and defective, some matters of great importance had been omitted, and in the period which elapsed from the passing of that statute to the Act of Settlement, new abuses had called for new remedies. It was, therefore, determined to accompany that settlement with additional securities for the subject's liberty, and eight articles were inserted in the act, to take effect only from the commencement of the new limitation to the House of Hanover. Some of them appeared to spring from a natural jealousy of the unknown and foreign line; some should not strictly have been postponed so long, but it is necessary to be content with what it is practicable to maintain. These articles were: 1. That whoever should hereafter come to the possession of the crown should join in communion with the Church of England as by law established. 2. That in case the crown should come to any person not being a native of the kingdom, the nation should not be obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories, which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament. 3. That no person who should hereafter come to the possession of the crown should go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of parliament. [This article was repealed by stat. 1 Geo. 1. c. 51.] 4. That all matters relating to government cognizable by the Privy Council should be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereon should be signed by the privy councillors advising and consenting to the same. [This provision was repealed by stat. 4 Ann. c. 8. and see 6 Ann. c. 7. and tit. Privy Council.] 5. That no person born out of the kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, (although he be naturalized or made a denizen,) except such as are born of English parents, shall be capable of being of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands or tenements from the crown to himself, or any others in trust for him. [By 1 Geo. 1. stat. 2. c. 4. it is enacted, that no bill of naturalization shall be received without a clause disqualifying the party to sit in Parliament.] 6. That no person having an office or place of trust or profit under the king, or receiving a provision from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons. [This has been repealed and otherwise provided for. See tit. Parliament.] 7. That judges' commissions be made quam diu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it shall be lawful to remove them. [See tit. Judges.] 8. That no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. [See tit. Impeachment.]

As to offences in denying the King's title, see this Dict. tit. Misprision; in oppugning it, tit. Treason.

II. The first and most considerable branch of the King's royal family, regarded by the laws of England, is the Queen; as to whom see this Dict. tit. Queen.

The Prince of Wales, or heir-apparent to the crown, and also his royal consort; and the Princess Royal, or eldest daughter of the King, are likewise peculiarly regarded by the laws. For, by stat. 25 Edw. 3. to compass or conspire the death of the former, or to violate the chastity of the latter, is as much high treason as to conspire the death of the King, or violate the chastity of the Queen. See this Dictionary, tit. Treason. The heir-apparent to the crown is usually made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, by special creation and investiture; but being the King's eldest son, he is by inheri-ance Duke of Cornwall, without any new creation. 3 Rep. 1; Seld. tit. Lon. 2, 5.

The observations in Coke's reports, however, as well as the words of the statute, it has been remarked, limit the dukedom of Cornwall to the first begotten son of a King of England, and to him only. But although from this it is manifest that a Duke of Cornwall must be the first begotten son of a King, yet it is not necessary that he should be born after his father's accession to the throne.

This is, on the whole, a strange species of inheritance, and perhaps is the only mode of descent which depends upon the authority of a statute. In the Prince's Case, reported by Lord Coke, the question was, whether the original grant to Edward the Black Prince, who was created in the 11th of Edw. 3. Duke of Cornwall, and who was the first duke in England after the Duke of Normandy, had the authority of parliament; or was an honour conferred by the King's charter alone? If the latter, the limitation would have been void, as nothing less than the power of Parliament can alter the established rules of descent. But notwithstanding it is in the form of a charter, it was held to be an act of the legislature. It concludes, per ipsum regem et totum concilium in parlamento. — Christian's Note on 1 Comm. c. 4. (See printed Parliament Rolls, 5 H. 4. nu. 22. and 38 H. 6. nu. 29. for full information on this subject. See also this Dictionary, tit. Prince.)

The rest of the royal family may be considered in two different lights, according to the different senses in which the term royal family is used. The larger sense includes all those, who are by any possibility inheritable to the crown. Such, before the Revolution, were all the descendants of William the Conqueror, who had branched into an amazing extent by intermarriages with the ancient nobility. Since the Revolution and Act of Settlement, it means the Protestant issue of the Princess Sophia, now comparatively few in number, but which in process of time may possibly be as largely diffused. The more confined sense includes only those who are within a certain degree of propinquity to the reigning prince, and to whom, therefore, the laws pay an extraordinary regard and respect.

At the time of passing the Regency Act, stat. 5 G. 3. c. 27. (see post, V. 2.) the bill, which was framed on the plan of the Regency Act in the preceding reign, empowered his Majesty to appoint either the Queen, or any other person of his royal family usually resident in Great Britain, to be Regent until the successor to the crown should attain eighteen years of age. A doubt arising on the question who were the royal family, it was explained by the law lords to be the descendants of King George II. It was, therefore, found necessary expressly to insert in the act the name of her Royal Highness the Princess Dowager of Wales, widow of the King's eldest son deceased, and mother of King George III. as she was not held to be comprehended under the general description of the royal family. See Belsham's Memoirs of King George III.

The younger sons and daughters of the King, and other branches of the royal family, who are not in the immediate line of succession, were, therefore, little farther regarded by the ancient law than to give them a certain degree of precedence before all persons and public officers, as well ecclesiastical as temporal. This is done by stat. 31 Hen. 8. c. 10. which enacts, that no person, except the King's children, shall presume to sit or have place at the side of the cloth of estate in the parliament chamber; and that certain great officers therein named shall have precedence above all dukes, except only such as shall happen to be the King's son, brother, uncle, nephew, (which latter Sir E. Coke, 4 Inst. 362, explains to signify grandson or nepos;) or brother's or sister's son.

Indeed, under the description of the King's children, his grandsons are held to be included, without having recourse to Sir E. Coke's interpretation of nephew; and, therefore, when his late Majesty King George II. created his grandson Edward (the second son of Frederick Prince of Wales, deceased,) Duke of York, and referred it to the House of Lords to settle his place and precedence, they certified that he ought to have place next to the late Duke of Cumberland, the then King's youngest son; and that he might have a seat on the left hand of the cloth of estate. Lds'. Journ. Ap. 24, 1760. But when, on the accession of King George III. those royal personages ceased to take place as the children, and ranked only as the brother and uncle of the King, they also left their seats on the side of the cloth of estate; so that when the Duke of Gloucester, his Majesty's second brother, took his seat in the House of Peers, he was placed on the upper end of the earl's bench, (on which the dukes usually sit,) next to his Royal Highness the Duke of York. Lds'. Journ. 10 Jan. 1765. And in 1718, upon a question referred to all the judges by King George I. it was resolved by ten against the other two, that the education and care of all the King's grand-children, while minors, did belong of right to his Majesty as King of this realm, even during their father's life. Fortesc. Ab. 401—440. And they all agreed, that the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belonged to the King, their grandfather. And the judges have more recently concurred in opinion, that this care and approbation extend also to the presumptive heir of the crown; though to what other branches of the royal family the same did extend, they did not find precisely determined. Lds'. Journ. 28th Feb. 1772; 11 St. Tr. 290. The most frequent instances of the crown's interposition go no farther than nephews and nieces, but examples are not wanting of its reaching to distant collaterals. Therefore, by stat. 28 H. 8. c. 18. (repealed among other statutes of treason by 1 Ed. 6. c. 12.) it was made high treason for any man to contract marriage with the King's children, or reputed children, his sisters or aunts, ex parte paterna, or the children of his brethren or sister; being exactly the same degrees to which precedence is allowed by the stat. 31 H. 8. before mentioned. And now by stat. 12 G. 3. c. 11. no descendant of the body of King George II. (other than the issue of princesses married into foreign countries,) is capable of contracting matrimony, without the previous consent of the King signified under the great seal; and any marriage contracted without such consent is void: but it is provided by the act, that such of the said descendants as are above the age of twenty-five, may, after a twelvemonth's notice given to the King's Privy Council, contract and solemnize marriage without the consent of the crown; unless both Houses of Parliament shall, before the expiration of the said year, expressly declare their disapprobation of such intended marriage. All persons solemnizing, assisting, or being present at any such prohibited marriage shall incur the penalties of præmunire.

In 1793 a marriage was solemnized at Rome, according to the forms, and by a minister, of the church of England, between his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex and Lady Augusta Murray, daughter of the Earl of Dunmore, who, on their return to England, were re-married at St. George's, Hanover Square. The second marriage attracted the notice of George III., and at his instigation a suit was commenced in the Court of Arches, and a decree pronounced in 1794 declaring both marriages void. A bill for perpetuating the evidence of the first marriage has lately been filed in the Court of Chancery by Sir Augustus d'Este and his sister, the children of his Royal Highness by the above lady. For further particulars concerning the claim of Sir Augustus d'Este, see Law Mag. vol. vii. 176.

III. In order to assist the King in the discharge of his duties, the maintenance of his dignity, and the exertion of his prerogative, the law hath assigned him a diversity of councils to advise with. These are, his Parliament, his Peers, and his Privy Council. See this Dictionary under those titles.

For law matters the judges of the courts of law are held to be the King's council, as appears frequently in our statutes, particularly the 14 Edw. 3. c. 5. and in other books of law. So that when the King's council is mentioned generally, it must be defined, particularized, and understood, secundum subjectam materiam; and if the subject be of a legal nature, then by the King's council is understood his council for matters of law, namely, his judges. Therefore, when by the 16 R. 2. c. 5. it was made a high offence to import into this kingdom any Papal bulls, or other processes from Rome; and it was enacted, that the offenders should be attached by their bodies, and brought before the King and his council to answer for such their offence; here, by the expression of the King's council were understood the King's judges of his courts of justice, the subject matter being legal; thus being the general way of interpreting the word council, 3 Inst. 125. See further title Judges.

Upon the same principle, in cases where fine and ransom is imposed for any offence at the King's pleasure, this does not signify any extra-judicial will of the sovereign, but such as is declared by his representatives, the judges in his courts of justice, voluntas regis in curia, non in camera. 1 Hab. P. C. 375.

IV. It is in consideration of the duties incumbent on the King by our constitution that his dignity and prerogative are established by the laws of the land; it being a maxim in the law, that protection and subjection are reciprocal. 7 Rep. 5. And these reciprocal duties are most probably what was meant by the Convention Parliament in 1688, when they declared that King James II. had broken the original contract between king and people. But, however, as the terms of that original contract were in some measure disputed, being alleged to exist principally in theory, and to be only deducible by reason and the rules of natural law, in which deduction different understandings might very considerably differ; it was, after the Revolution, judged proper to declare these duties expressly, and to reduce that contract to a plain certainty. So that whatever doubts might be formerly raised about the existence of such an original contract, they must now entirely cease; especially with regard to every prince who hath reigned since the year 1688.

The principal duty of the King is to govern his people according to law. And this is not only consonant to the principles of nature, reason, liberty, and society, but has always been esteemed an express part of the common law of England, even when prerogative was at the highest. See our ancient authors, Bract. l. 1. c. 8; l. 2. c. 16. § 3; Fortesc. cc. 2, 34. But to obviate all doubts and difficulties concerning this matter, it is expressly declared by stat. 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 2. "That the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof; and all the Kings and Queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm ought to administer the government of the same according to the said laws; and all their officers and ministers ought to serve them respectively according to the same; and therefore all the laws and statutes of this realm for securing the established religion, and the rights and liberties of the people thereof, and all other laws and statutes of the same now in force, are ratified and confirmed accordingly." See further tit. Liberties.

As to the terms of the original contract between King and people, these it seems are now couched in the Coronation Oath, which by stat. 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 6. is to be administered to every King and Queen who shall succeed to the imperial crown of these realms, by one of the archbishops or bishops in the presence of all the people; who, on their parts, do reciprocally take the oath of allegiance to the crown.

This Coronation Oath is conceived in the following terms:

"The Archbishop or Bishop shall say, Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this [kingdom of England,—see now stat. 5 Ann. c. 8. § 1. as to the union of Scotland, and 39 & 40 G. 3. c. 67. as to the union of Ireland, and which together is called 'the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,'] and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on; and the laws and customs of the same? The King or Queen shall say, I solemnly promise so to do.—Abp. or Bp. Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments? K. or Q. I will.—Abp. or Bp. Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by the law; and will you preserve unto the bishops and the clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them or any of them? K. or Q. All this I promise to do.—After this the King or Queen, laying his or her hand upon the Holy Gospels, shall say: The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep; so help me God. And then shall kiss the book."

It is also required, both by the Bill of Rights, 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. and the Act of Settlement, 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 2. that every King and Queen of the age of twelve years, either at their coronation or on the first day of the first parliament upon the throne in the House of Peers (which shall first happen), shall repeat and subscribe the declaration against Popery, according to the 30 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 1.

The foregoing is the form of the Coronation Oath, as it is now prescribed by our laws; the principal articles of which appear to be at least as ancient as the Mirror of Justices (c. 1. § 2.) and even as the time of Bracton. See l. 3. tr. 1. c. 9. But the wording of it was changed at the Revolution, because (as the statute alleges) the oath itself had been framed in doubtful words and expressions with relation to ancient laws and constitutions at this time unknown. For these old coronation oaths, see 1 Comm. c. 6. p. 235, in n.; and Rot. Claus. 1 Edw. 2. In a roll of 5 Edw. 2. preserved in Canterbury cathedral, marked K. 11. is the form of the Coronation Oath si Rex fuerit literatus in Latin, and si Rex non fuerit literatus in French, as required to be administered by the Archbishop of Canterbury, "ad quem de jure & consuetudine Ecclesie Cant' antiqua & approbata pertinet Regis Anglie inungere & coronare."

However, in what form soever this oath be conceived, it is most indisputably a fundamental and express original contract; though doubtless the duty of protection is impliedly as much incumbent on the sovereign before coronation as after; in the same manner as allegiance to the King becomes the duty of the subject immediately on the descent of the crown, before he has taken the oath of allegiance, or whether he ever takes it at all. In the King's part of this original contract are expressed all the duties that a monarch can owe to his people, viz. to govern according to law; to execute judgment in mercy; and to maintain the established religion. And with respect to the latter of these three branches, the Act of Union, 5 Ann. c. 8. recites and confirms two preceding statutes; the one of the Parliament of Scotland, the other of the Parliament of England; which enact, the former, that every King, at his accession, shall take and subscribe an oath to preserve the Protestant religion, and Presbyterian church government in Scotland; the latter, that at his coronation he shall take and subscribe a similar oath to preserve the settlement of the church of England within England, Ireland, Wales and Berwick, and the territories thereto belonging. The 39 & 40 G. 3. c. 67. for the union of Great Britain and Ireland, recognizes and confirms this part of the act for the Union with Scotland. See article V. of the Union with Ireland, and this Dict. title Ireland. See also the act of the Irish Parliament, 33 H. 8. c. 1. by which it is enacted that the Kings of England shall always be Kings of Ireland.

V. 1. It has been observed, that one of the principal bulwarks of civil liberty, or, in other words, of the British constitution, is the limitation of the King's prerogative, by bounds so certain and notorious, that it is impossible he should ever exceed them, without either the consent of the people, or a violation of that contract which we have seen expressly subsists between the prince and the subject. When we more particularly consider this prerogative minutely, in order to mark out, in the most important instances, its particular extent and restrictions, one conclusion will evidently follow; that the powers which are vested in the crown by the laws of England are necessary for the support of society, and do not intrench any farther on our natural, than is expedient for the maintenance of our civil liberties.

There cannot be a stronger proof of that genuine freedom, which is the boast of this age and country, than the power of discussing and examining with decency and respect the limits of the King's prerogative. This was formerly considered as a high contempt in a subject, and the glorious Queen Elizabeth herself directed her parliament to abstain from judging of or meddling with her prerogative. It is no wonder, therefore, that her successor James I. should consider such a presumption as little less than blasphemy and impiety. But whatever might be the sentiments of some of our princes, this was never the language of our ancient constitution and laws. The sentiments of Bracton and Fortescue, at the distance of two centuries from each other, may be seen by a reference to the place cited in the preceding division IV. And Sir Hen. Finch, under Charles I., after the lapse of two centuries more, though he lays down the law of prerogative in very strong and emphatical terms, yet qualifies it with a general restriction in regard to the liberties of the people. The King, says he, has a prerogative in all things that are not injurious to the subject; for in them all it must be remembered, that the King's prerogative stretcheth not to the doing of any wrong. Finch, l. 84, 85. Nihil enim aliud potest Rex, nisi id solum quod de jure potest. Bract. l. 3. tr. 1. c. 9.

The nature of our constitution is that of a limited monarchy, in which the legislative power is lodged in the King, Lords, and Commons; but the King is intrusted with the executive part, and from him all justice is said to flow; hence he is styled the head of the Commonwealth, supreme governor, parens patriæ, &c.; but still he is to make the law of the land the rule of his government, that being the measure as well of his power as of the subjects' obedience: for as the law asserts, maintains, and provides for the safety of the King's royal person, crown, and dignity, and all his just rights, revenues, powers, and prerogatives, so it likewise declares and asserts the rights and liberties of the subject. 1 And. 153; Co. Lit. 19, 75; 4 Co. 124.

Hence it hath been established as a rule, that all prerogatives must be for the advantage of the people, otherwise they ought not to be allowed by law. Moor, 672; Shon. P. C. 75.

Although the King is the fountain of justice, and intrusted with the whole executive power of the law, yet he hath no power to alter the laws which have been established, and are the birthright of every subject, for by those very laws he is to govern; and as they prescribe the extent and bounds of his prerogative, in like manner they declare and ascertain the rights and liberties of the people, therefore admit of no innovation or change but by act of parliament. 4 Inst. 164; 2 Inst. 54, 478; 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 131, 282; Vaugh. 418; 2 Salk. 510.

The rights and prerogatives of the crown are in most things as ancient as the law itself; for though the statute 17 Edm. 2. c. 1. commonly called the statute De prærogativa Regis, seems to be introductive of something new, yet for the most part it is but a collection of certain prerogatives that were known law long before. Bendl. 117; 2 Inst. 263, 496; 10 Co. 64. And this statute does not contain the King's whole prerogative, but only so much thereof as concerns the profits of his coffers. Plowd. 314.

The nature of the government of our King, says Fortescue, is not only regal, but political; if it were merely the former, regal, he would have power to make what alterations he pleased in our law, and impose taxes and other hardships upon the subject, whether they would or no; but his government being political, he cannot change the laws of the realm without the people consent thereto, nor burthen them against their wills. It is also said by the same writer, that the king is appointed to protect his subjects in their lives, properties, and laws; for which end and purpose he has the delegation of power from the people; likewise our King is such by the fundamental law of our land; by which law the meanest subject enjoys the liberty of his person and property in his estate; and it is every man's concern to defend these, as well as the King in his lawful rights. Fortescue, de Laud. leg. Angl. 17, &c.

If a King hath a kingdom by title of descent, where the laws have taken good effect and rooting, or if a King conquers a Christian kingdom, after the people have laws given them for the government of the country, to which they submit, no succeeding King can alter the same without the parliament. 7 Rep. 17. It has nevertheless been held, that conquered countries may be governed by what laws the King thinks fit, and that the laws of England do not take place in such countries until declared so by the conqueror, or his successor; here, in case of infidels, their laws do not cease, but only such as are against the law of God; and where the laws are rejected or silent, they shall be governed according to the rule of natural equity. 2 Salk. 411, 412, 666.

If the King makes a new conquest of any country, the persons there born are his subjects; for by saving the lives of the people conquered he gains a right and property in such people, and may impose on them what laws he pleases. Dyer, 224; Vaugh. 281.

But until such laws given by the conquering prince, the laws of the conquered country hold place; (unless where these are contrary to our religion, or enact any thing that is malum in se, or are silent;) for in all such cases the laws of the conquering country prevail. 2 P. Wms. 75, 76.

If there be a new and uninhabited country found out by English subjects, as the law is the birthright of every subject, so wherever they go carry their laws with them, therefore such new found country is to be governed by the laws of England; though after such country is inhabited by the English, acts of parliament made in England, without naming the foreign plantations, will not bind them. 2 P. Wms. 75; 2 Salk. 411. And see Campbell v. Hall, Corp. 204; Spragge v. Stone, cited Dougl. 35, 37, 38.

Questions of this nature are not at present likely often to arise, since (as in the instance of annexing the crown of Corsica to the British crown in 1794) all such transactions are now regulated by express stipulations; which neither leave to the prerogative of the conquering monarch, nor the laws of his kingdom, any power to interfere.

By the word prerogative is usually understood that special pre-eminence which the King hath over and above all other persons, and out of the ordinary course of the common law, in right of his regal dignity. It signifies, in its etymology from præ and rego, something that is required or demanded before, or in preference to all others. And hence it follows, that it must be in its nature singular and eccentric; that it can only be applied to those rights and capacities which the King enjoys alone in contradistinction to others; and not to those which he enjoys in common with any of his subjects; for if once any prerogative of the crown could be held in common with the subject, it would cease to be prerogative any longer, Finch, therefore, lays it down as a maxim, that the prerogative is that law in case of the King, which is law in no case of the subject. Finch, L. 85.

Prerogatives are either direct or incidental. The direct are such positive substantial parts of the royal character and authority as are rooted in, and spring from, the King's political person, and of which we are about to state the law at some length. But such prerogatives as are incidental bear always a relation to something else, distinct from the King's person, and are indeed only exceptions in favour of the crown, to the general rules established for the rest of the community; such as that no costs shall be recovered against the King; that he can never be a joint-tenant; and that his debt shall be preferred before that of a subject. These, and an infinite number of other instances, will better be understood by referring to the subjects themselves, to which these incidental prerogatives are exceptions. As to his prerogative relating to his debts, however, here reckoned among those considered as incidental, see post, VI. at some length; and this Dictionary, titles Execution, Extent, Judgment, &c. Other incidental prerogatives are, that where the title of the King and a common person concur, the King's title shall be preferred. 1 Inst. 30. No distress can be made upon the King's possession, but he may distrain out of his fee in other lands, &c. and may take distresses in the highway. 2 Inst. 131. An heir shall pay the King's debt, though he is not named in the bond; and the King's debt shall be satisfied before that of a subject, from which there is a prerogative writ. 1 Inst. 180, 386. But this is where the debt is in equal degree with that of the subject. See 93 Hen. 8. c. 39. at large; post, VI.; and Cro. Car. 283; Hardr. 23. Goods and chattels may go in succession to the King, though they may not to any other sole corporation. 1 Inst. 90. In the hands of whomsoever the goods of the King came, their lands are chargeable, and may be seized for the same; and the King is not bound by sale of his goods in open market. 2 Inst. 713. No entry will bar the King, and no judgment is final against him, but with a salvo jure regis. Litt. 178; Finch, 46; but see post, 2, as to the nullum tempus act, 9 G. 3. c. 9. &c. The King may plead several matters without being guilty of double pleading, and the party shall answer them all. Rev. De q. p. 57. In his pleading he need not plead an Act of Parliament as a subject is bound to do. 4 Rep. 75. He is not bound to join in demurrer on evidence, and the court may direct the jury to find the matter specially. Finch, 82; 5 Rep. 104. The King's own testimony of any thing done in his presence is of as high a nature and credit as any record; whence, in all original writs or precepts, he useth no other witness than himself, as teste meipso. 1 Inst. 41, 57.

It may not be unapt here to mention one of the prerogatives of the crown with respect to the descent of lands, that wherever either a general or special custom of descents would operate so as to sever lands, before held by the King jure coronæ, from the person of his successor, there that custom cannot prevail, "for the crown and the lands whereof the King is seised jure coronæ are concomitantia." Thus, if the King dies, leaving two sons by different wives, and the elder having succeeded, and having been seised of lands in fee, dies without issue, the younger will on succeeding to the crown inherit these lands, though of the half-blood only to the person last seised. So, if a King die, leaving two daughters, the eldest alone will, with the crown, take all the lands whereof he was seised jure coronæ, and not as coparcener with her sister. These two are instances where the general custom as regards subjects will not prevail against the jure coronæ. So, if the King purchase lands of the nature of gavelkind, where by the custom all the sons inherit equally, yet upon the King's demise his eldest son shall succeed to those lands alone in exclusion of any other sons. See 1 Inst. 15.

It is also held, that the King is by his prerogative universal proprietor, as all property is presumed to have been originally in the crown; and that he partitioned it out in large districts to the great men who deserved well of him in the wars, and were able to advise him in time of peace. Hence the King hath the direct dominion; and all lands are holden mediately or immediately from the crown. Co. Lit. 1; Dyer, 184; 1 Bend. 237; Seld. Mare Claus.

If the sea leaves any shore by the water suddenly falling off, such derelict lands belong to the King; but if a man's lands lying to the sea are increased by insensible degrees, they belong to the soil adjoining. Dyer, 326; 2 Rol. Abr. 170. This distinction was fully established in Rex v. Lord Yarborough, 3 Barn. & C. 91; 5 Bing. 163; and see 4 Barn. & C. 495.

So, if a river, so far as there is a flux of the sea, leaves its channel, it belongs to the King; for the English sea and channels belong to the King; and, having never distributed them out to the subjects, he hath a property in the soil. 2 Rol. Abr. 170.

But if a river, in which there is no tide, should leave its bed, it belongs to the owners on both sides; for they have in that case the property of the soil; this being no original part or appendix to the sea, but distributed out as other lands. 2 Rol. Abr. 170.

If land be drowned, and so continue for years; if it be after regained, every owner shall have his interest again, if it can be known by the boundaries. 8 Co. Sir Francis Barrington's case.

It is said, that there is a custom in Lincolnshire, that the lord of the manor shall have derelict lands; and that as such it is a reasonable custom; for if the sea wash away the lands of the subject, he can have no recompence, unless he should be entitled to what he regains from the sea. — Dicit.

The King hath the sovereign dominion in all seas and great rivers, which is plain from Selden's account of the ancient Saxons, who dwelt very successfully in all naval affairs; therefore the territories of the English seas and rivers always resided in the King. Seld. Mar. Cl. 251, &c.; 1 Rol. Abr. 168, 169; 1 Co. 141; 5 Co. 100.

And as the King hath a prerogative in the seas, so hath he likewise a right to the fishery and to the soil; so that if a river as far as there is a flux of the sea leaves its channel, it belongs to the King. Dyer, 326; 2 Rol. Abr. 170.

Hence the Admiralty Court, which is a court for all maritime causes or matters arising on the high seas, is deemed the King's court, and its jurisdiction derived from him who protects his subjects from pirates, and provides for the security of trade and navigation. 4 Inst. 142; Molloy, 66.

From the King's dominion over the sea it was holden, that the King, as protector and guardian of the seas, might, before any statute made for commissions of sewers, provide against inundations by lands, banks, &c. and that he had a prerogative herein as well as in defending his subjects from pirates, &c. 10 Co. 141.

But notwithstanding the King's prerogative in seas and navigable rivers, yet it hath been always held, that a subject may fish in the sea: which being a matter of common right, and the means of livelihood, and for the good of the commonwealth, cannot be restrained by grant or prescription. 8 Edw. 4. 18, 19; Bro. Custom, 46; Fitz. Bar. 1 Mod. 105; 2 Salk. 637.

Prima facie any subject has a right to take fish found on the sea shore between high and low water mark; but such general right may be abridged by the existence of an exclusive right in some individual. And the public have not any common law right of bathing in the sea; and, as incident to it, of crossing the sea shore on foot, or with bathing machines for that purpose. Bagott v. Orr, 2 Bos. & P. 472; Blundell v. Catteral, 5 Barn. & A. 268.

Also it is held, that every subject of common right may fish with lawful nets, &c. in a navigable river as well as in the sea; and the King's grant cannot bar them thereof; but the crown only has a right to royal fish, and that the King only may grant. 6 Mod. 73; Salk. 357, S. C. & S. P. See title Fish, &c.

It is also said, that the King, as a perpetual sign and acknowledgment of his dominion of the seas, hath several creatures reserved to him under the denomination of royal creatures, as swans, sturgeons, and whales, all which are natives of seas and rivers. 7 Co. 16. See post, 4.

2. The law ascribes to the King the attributes of sovereignty or pre-eminence. See Bract. l. 1. c. 8. He is said to have imperial dignity, and in charters before the Conquest is frequently styled Basileus and Imperator; the titles respectively assumed by the emperors of the East and West. His realm is declared to be an empire, and his crown imperial, by many Acts of Parliament, particularly 24 Hen. 8. c. 12; 25 Hen. 8. c. 28; which at the same time declare the King to be the supreme head of the realm in matters both civil and ecclesiastical; and, of consequence, inferior to no man upon earth, dependent on no man, accountable to no man. See also 24 G. 2. c. 24; 5 G. 3. c. 27.

No King of England used any seal of arms till the reign of Richard I. Before that time, the seal was the King sitting in a chair of state on one side of the seal, and on horseback on the other side; but this King sealed with a seal of two lions; and King John was the first that bore three lions; and afterwards Edward III. quartered the arms of France, which was continued until the Union between Great Britain and Ireland. King Henry VIII. was the first to whom Majesty was attributed; before which, our Kings were called Highness, &c. Lex Constitut. 47, 48.

The meaning of the legislature when it uses these terms of empire and imperial, and applies them to the realm and crown of England, is only to assert that our King is equally sovereign and independent within these his dominions, as any emperor is in his empire, and owes no kind of subjection to any other potentate upon earth.

Hence it is, that no suit or action can be brought against the King, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him. All jurisdiction implies superiority of power; authority to try would be van and idle without authority to redress; and the sentence of a court would be contemptible unless that court had power to command the execution of it; but who, says Finch, shall command the King? Finch, l. 83. Hence it is likewise, that by law the person of the King is sacred, even though the measures pursued in his reign be completely tyrannical and arbitrary; for no jurisdiction upon earth has power to try him in a criminal way, much less to condemn him to punishment. If any foreign jurisdiction had this power, as was formerly claimed by the Pope, the independence of the kingdom would be no more; and if such a power were vested in any domestic tribunal, there would soon be an end to the constitution, by destroying the free agency of one of the constituent parts of the sovereign legislative power.

Are then, it may be asked, the subjects of England totally destitute of remedy in case the crown should invade their rights, either by private injuries or public oppressions? To this we may answer, that the law has provided a remedy in both cases.

As to private injuries, if any person has, in point of property, a just demand upon the King, he must petition him in his Court of Chancery, where his chancellor will administer right as a matter of grace, though not upon compulsion. Finch, l. 255. See this Dictionary, title Chancery; and post, as to the perfection ascribed to the King.

As to cases of ordinary public oppression, where the vitals of the constitution are not attacked, the law has also assigned a remedy. For as a King cannot misuse his powers without the advice of evil counsellors, and the assistance of wicked ministers, these men may be examined and punished. The constitution has therefore provided, by means of indictments and parliamentary impeachments, that no man shall dare to assist the crown in contradiction to the law of the land. But at the same time it is a maxim in those laws, that the King himself can do no wrong; since it would be a great weakness and absurdity in any system of positive law, to define any possible wrong, without any possible redress.

As to such public oppressions as tend to dissolve the constitution, and subvert the fundamentals of government, these are cases which the law will not, out of decency, suppose; being incapable of distrusting those whom it has invested with any part of the supreme power; since such distrust would render the exercise of that power precarious and impracticable. For, wherever the law expresses its distrust or abuse of power, it always vests a superior coercive authority in some other hand to correct it; the very notion of which destroys the very idea of sovereignty. If therefore (for example) the two Houses of Parliament, or either of them, had avowedly a right to animadvert on the King, or each other, or if the King had a right to animadvert on either of the Houses, that branch of the legislature, so subject to animadversion, would instantly cease to be part of the supreme power; the balance of the constitution would be overturned; and that branch or branches, in which this jurisdiction resided, would be completely sovereign. The supposition of law therefore is, that neither the King, nor either House of Parliament (collectively taken) is capable of doing any wrong; since in such cases the law feels itself incapable of furnishing any adequate remedy. For which reason all oppressions, which may happen to spring from any branch of the sovereign power, must necessarily be out of the reach of any stated rule or express legal provision; but if ever they unfortunately happen, the prudence of the times must provide new remedies upon new emergencies.

Indeed, it is found by experience, that whenever the unconstitutional oppressions, even of the sovereign power, advance with gigantic strides, and threaten desolation to a state, mankind will not be reasoned out of the feelings of humanity, nor will sacrifice their liberty by a scrupulous adherence to those political maxims which were originally established to preserve it. And, therefore, though the positive laws are silent, experience furnishes us with a very remarkable case, wherein nature and reason prevailed. When King James II. invaded the fundamental constitution of the realm, the Convention Parliament declared an abdication, whereby the throne was considered vacant, which induced a new settlement of the crown. And so far as this precedent leads, and no further, we may now be allowed to lay down the law of redress against public oppression. If, therefore, any future prince should endeavour to subvert the constitution by breaking the original contract between King and people, should violate the fundamental laws, and should withdraw himself out of the kingdom, we are now authorized to declare that this conjunction of circumstances would amount to an abdication, and the throne would be thereby vacant. In these, therefore, or other circumstances, which a fertile imagination may furnish, since both law and history are silent, it becomes us to be silent too; leaving to future generations, whenever necessity and the safety of the whole shall require it, the exertion of those inherent (though latent) powers of society, which no climate, no time, no constitution, no contract, can ever destroy or diminish.

It may not be amiss to conclude this part of the subject with observing, that all persons born in any part of the King's dominions, and within his protection, are his subjects; thus are those born in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, the King's plantations, or on the English seas; who by their birth owe such an inseparable allegiance to the King, that they cannot by any act of theirs renounce or transfer their subjection to any foreign prince. 7 Co. 1, &c.; Calvin's case; Molloy, 370;

Co. Lit. 129; Dyer, 500. See titles Aliens, Allegiance, Treason.

Besides the attribute of sovereignty, the law also ascribes to the King, in his political capacity, absolute perfection. The King can do no wrong. Which ancient and fundamental maxim is not to be understood, as if every thing transacted by the government was of course just and lawful, but means only two things. First, that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the King, nor is he answerable for it personally to his people. And, secondly, it means that the prerogative of the crown extends not to do any injury; it is created for the benefit of the people, and therefore cannot be exerted to their prejudice. Plowd. 487.

Or perhaps it means that, although the King is subject to the passions and infirmities of other men, the constitution has prescribed no mode by which he can be made personally amenable for any wrong that he may actually commit. The law will therefore presume no wrong where it has provided no remedy. The inviolability of the King is essentially necessary to the free exercise of those high prerogatives which are vested in him, not for his own private splendor and gratification, as the vulgar and ignorant are too apt to imagine, but for the security and preservation of the real happiness and liberty of his subjects.

The King moreover is not only incapable of doing wrong, but even of thinking wrong; he can never mean to do an improper thing; in him is no folly or weakness. If, therefore, the crown should be induced to grant any franchise or privilege to a subject, contrary to reason, or any way prejudicial to the commonwealth, or a private person, the law will not suppose the King to have meant either an unwise or an injurious action; but declares that the King was deceived in his grant; and, therefore, such grant is rendered void, merely upon the foundation of fraud and deception, either by or upon those agents whom the crown has thought proper to employ. See title Grants of the King. But a latitude of supposing a possibility of some failure of this personal perfection is allowed in the case of inquiries frequently instituted by Parliament, even as to those acts of royalty which are most properly and personally the King's own; but which are to be conducted in those assemblies with the decency and respect due to the kingly character. See further Parliament.

The following is a concise statement of the remedies for the various injuries which may proceed from, and also for those which may affect, the rights of the crown.

The distance between the sovereign and his subjects is such, that it can rarely happen that any personal injury can immediately and directly proceed from the prince to any private man; and as it can so seldom happen, the law in decency supposes that it never can or will happen at all. But injuries to the rights of property can scarcely be committed by the crown, without the intervention of its officers, against whom the law furnishes various methods of detecting their errors or misconduct.

The common law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the crown of either real or personal property are, by petition of right, (already alluded to above,) or monstrans de droit, manifestation or plea of right; as to both which see title Monstrans de Droit.

The methods of redressing such injuries as the crown may receive from a subject are, either by such usual common-law actions as are consistent with the royal prerogative and dignity; or by such prerogative modes of process as are peculiarly confined to the crown. As the King, by reason of his legal ubiquity, cannot be disseised or dispossessed of any real property which is once vested in him, he can maintain no action which supposes a dispossession of the plaintiff, such as an assise or ejectment. Bro. Ab. 1; Prerogative, 89. But he may bring a quare impedit, which always supposes the plaintiff to be seised or possessed of the advowson; and he may prosecute this writ like every other by him brought, as well in the Court of King's Bench as of Common Pleas, or in whatever court he pleases. F. N. B. 32; 3 Comm. c. 17. So too he may bring an action of trespass for taking away his goods; but such actions (of trespass) are not usual, though in strictness maintainable for breaking his close or other injury done upon his soil and possession. Bro. Ab. 1; Prerogative, 130; F. N. B. 90; Y. B. 4 H. 4, 4.

Much easier and more effectual remedies are, however, usually obtained by prerogative modes of process. Such is that of inquisition or inquest of office, as to which see title Inquest. Where the crown hath unadvisedly granted any thing by letters patent which ought not to be granted, or where the patentee hath done any act that amounts to a forfeiture of the grant, the remedy to repeal the patent is by writ of scire facias in Chancery. See Dyer, 198; 3 Lev. 220; 4 Inst. 88. So also, if upon office untruly found for the King, he grants the land over to another, he who is grieved thereby, and traverses the office itself, is entitled before issue joined, to a scire facias against the patentee in order to avoid the grant. Bro. Ab. 1; Scire Facias, 69, 185. See title Scire Facias. An information on behalf of the crown is a method of suit for recovering money, or obtaining damages for any personal wrong to the lands or possessions of the crown; as to which see title Information. A writ of quo warranto is in the nature of a writ of right for the King against any person claiming or usurping any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right. Finch, l. 322; 2 Inst. 282. See title Quo Warranto. And something of the same nature is the writ of mandamus, as to which see titles Corporation, Mandamus.

The law also determines that in the King can be no negligence or laches, and therefore no delay will bar his right. Nullum tempus occurrit Regi has been the standing maxim upon all occasions; for the law intends that the King is always busied for the public good, and therefore has not leisure to assert his right within the times limited to his subjects. Finch, l. 82; Co. Litt. 90. This maxim applies also to criminal prosecutions which are brought in the name of the King; and therefore by the common law there is no limitation in treasons, felonies, or misdemeanors. By stat. 7 W. 3. c. 7. an indictment for treason, except for an attempt to assassinate the King, must be found within three years after the commission of the treasonable act. See title Treason. But where the legislature has affixed no limit, nullum tempus occurrit Regi holds true; thus a man may be convicted of murder at any distance of time within his life after the commission of the crime. This maxim obtains still in full force in Ireland. 1 Ld. Mountm. 365.

In civil actions relating to landed property, by stat. 9 G. 3. c. 16. commonly called the Nullum Tempus Act, the King, like a subject, is limited (in respect to claims in Great Britain) to sixty years. For the occasion of passing this act, see Belsham's Memoirs of George III. sub. an. 1768. See also the stats. 21 Jac. 1. c. 23; 11 G. 3. c. 4. The provisions of the 9 G. 3. c. 16. were extended to Ireland by the 19 G. 3. c. 47.

The King is also expressly bound by two of the recent statutes of limitations, viz. the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 100. for shortening the time in claims of modus decimandi; and the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. for shortening the time of prescription in certain cases. See further Modus, Tithes, and the various titles relative to incorporeal hereditaments.

In the King also can be no stain or corruption of blood; for if the heir to the crown were attainted of treason or felony, and afterwards the crown should descend to him, this would purge the attainer ipso facto. Finch, l. 82; Rot. Parl. 1 R. 3.

Neither can the King, in judgment of law, as King, ever be a minor or under age; and therefore his royal grants and assents to acts of parliament are good, though he has not in his natural capacity attained the age of twenty-one. Co. Litt. 43; 2 Inst. Præm. 9. Indeed by stat. 28 H. 8. c. 17. power was given to future Kings to rescind and revoke all acts of parliament that should be made while they were under the age of twenty-four; but this was repealed by stat. 1 Edw. 6. c. 11. so far as related to that prince; and both statutes are declared by stat. 24 G. 2. c. 24. to be determined. It hath also been usually thought prudent, when the heir-apparent has been very young, to appoint a protector, GUARDIAN, or REGENT for a limited time; but the very necessity of such extraordinary provision is sufficient to demonstrate the truth of that maxim of the common law, that in the King is no minority, and therefore he hath no legal guardian.

The methods of appointing a GUARDIAN or REGENT, in case of an infant-heir to the crown, have been so various, and the duration of his power so uncertain, that from hence alone it may be collected that his office is unknown to the common law; and therefore the surest way is to have him made by authority of the great council in parliament. 4 Inst. 58. The stats. 24 H. 3. c. 12; 28 H. 8. c. 7. [q. 177] provided, that the successor, if a male, and under eighteen, or a female, and under sixteen, should be till such age in the government of his or her natural mother, (if approved by the King,) and such other counsellors as his majesty should by will or otherwise appoint; and he accordingly appointed his sixteen executors to have the government of his son Edward VI. and the kingdom, which executors elected the Earl of Hertford protector. The stat. 24 G. 2. c. 24. in case the crown should descend to any of the children of Frederic, then late Prince of Wales, under the age of eighteen, appointed the princess dowager; and the stat. 5 G. 3. c. 27. in case of a like descent to any of the children of King George III. empowered the King to name either the queen, the princess dowager, or any descendant of King George II. residing in this kingdom, to be guardian and regent, till the successor attained such age, assisted by a council of regency, the powers of them all being expressly defined and set down in the several acts. See ante, II.

By the statute 1 W. 4. c. 2. "to provide for the administration of the government in case the crown should descend to the Princess Alexandrina Victoria when under the age of eighteen," her mother, the Duchess of Kent, (widow of the deceased Duke of Kent, the fourth son of King George III.) was appointed her guardian, with authority, in the name of the princess and in her stead, under the style and title of regent, to exercise the royal power during such minority, in case the King, William IV. should die without issue; with a proviso, that if any child of his should be born after his decease, all the powers of the act should cease and determine, § 1. If on the demise of the crown there should not be any child living born of his queen, the privy council are directed to cause the princess to be proclaimed as sovereign, but subject to and saving the rights of any issue of King William IV. which might be afterwards born; and such reservation was also to be added to the oath of allegiance till parliament should otherwise order, § 2. If at the death of King William IV. no child of his should be living, but a child should be afterwards born, his Queen is to be guardian of the child, and regent until the child shall be eighteen, § 3. Such child shall be proclaimed King or Queen, § 4. In case of the birth of such posthumous child, parliament shall meet forthwith, and the laws regarding parliament and all offices, &c. shall apply as on a demise of the crown, § 5. All acts of royal power exercised during the regency otherwise than according to the direction of this act declared void, § 6. Oath of regent to be administered by and taken before the privy council, § 7. The regent on taking the oath "shall make, subscribe, and audibly repeat," the declaration against Popery required by the 30 Car. 2. st. 2. and produce a certificate of having taken the sacrament, § 8. The King or Queen under age prohibited from marrying without the consent of the regent, § 9. Regent disabled from giving royal assent to any bill for changing the order of succession to the crown contrary to act, 1 W. 3. c. 2; or for altering the English act, 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4; or the Scotch act, 1702, c. 3. for securing the Protestant religion, § 10. If the Duchess of Kent shall during his Majesty's lifetime, without his consent, or after his death if any such regent shall marry a Roman Catholic, or a foreigner, without consent of parliament, or shall cease to reside in the United Kingdom, she shall cease to be regent, § 11. In case of the decease of the Queen of William IV. and his subsequent marriage, the act shall determine, § 12.

As to the mode of proceeding in appointing a custos or guardian of the realm, and executing the sovereign authority in case of a demise of the crown, while the successor is in foreign parts, see Macpherson's Original Papers, containing the secret history of Great Britain, from the Restoration to the accession of the House of Hanover, 4to. 1776, vol. ii. p. 475, &c.; a paper from the minister of the Elector of Hanover, asking the opinion of his friends in England concerning the measures to be taken in the event of Queen Anne's death; and p. 481, &c. a letter from the Earl of Sunderland to the Elector's minister at the Hague, inclosing an answer to the minister's inquiries, and the powers of commissioners necessary on such an occasion.

Upon King George III.'s illness in 1811, the act 51 G. 3. c. 1. was passed to provide for the administration of the royal authority, and the care of his Majesty's person during the continuance of such illness. By this act the Prince of Wales was appointed "REGENT of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," under certain restrictions, many of which were afterwards removed. The other acts passed for regulating the regency were 52 G. 3. c. 6, 7; 53 G. 3. c. 14; and 55 G. 3. c. 16.

From the maxim that the King, as King, cannot be a minor, grants, leases, &c. made by him, though under age, bind presently, and cannot be avoided by him either during his minority, or when he comes of age: for it is a maxim of politics, that he who is to govern the kingdom should never be considered as incapable, from minority, of governing his own affairs. Dy. 209. pl. 22; Plond. 289; Co. Lit. 43; 5 Co. 27; Raym. 90.

The law ascribes to the King's Majesty, in his political capacity, an absolute immortality. The King never dies. Henry, Edward, or George may die, but the King survives them all: for immediately upon the decease of the reigning prince, in his natural capacity, his kingship or imperial dignity, by act of law, without any interregnum or interval, is vested at once in his heir, who is eo instanti King to all intents and purposes: and so tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of his death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his demise, demissus regis vel coronæ, an expression signifying merely a transfer of property. By the term demise of the crown, therefore, is understood, that in consequence of the disunion of the King's natural body from the body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor, and so the royal dignity remains perpetual. Plond. 177, 234. Thus, too, when Edward IV. in the 10th year of his reign, was driven from his throne for a few months by the house of Lancaster, this temporary transfer of his dignity was denominated his demise; and all process was held to be discontinued, as it then was upon the natural death of the King. M. 49 H. 6. pl. 1—8.

King Henry II. took his son into a kind of subordinate regality with him, so that there were Reg. Pater and Rex Filius: but he did not divest himself of his sovereignty, but reserved to himself the homage of his subjects. And notwithstanding this King, by consent of parliament, created his son John King of Ireland; and King Richard II. made Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland; and Edward III. made his eldest son Lord of Ireland, with royal dominion; yet it has been expressly held, that the King cannot regularly make a King within his own kingdom. 4 Inst. 357, 360. Henry de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, was by King Henry VI. crowned King of Wight Island; but it was resolved that this could not be done without consent of parliament; and even then our greatest men have been of opinion that the King could not by law create a King in his own kingdom, because there cannot be two kings of the same place: and afterwards the same King Henry made the same Earl of Warwick Primus Comes totius Angliæ. Hal. Hist. Coron.

A King cannot resign or dismiss himself of his office of King without consent of parliament; nor could Henry II. without such consent divide the sovereignty: there is a sacred bond between the King and his kingdom that cannot be dissolved without the free and mutual consent of both in Parliament; and though in foreign kingdoms there have been instances of voluntary cessions and resignations, which possibly may be warranted by their several constitutions, yet by the laws of England, the King cannot resign his sovereignty without his Parliament. Hale's H. Cor.

3. In the exercise of those branches of the royal prerogative which invest this our sovereign lord, thus all-perfect and immortal in his kingly capacity, with a number of authorities and powers, consists the executive part of the government. This is wisely placed in a single hand by the British Constitution, for the sake of unanimity, strength, and dispatch. The King of England is therefore not only the chief, but properly the sole magistrate of the nation; all others acting by commission from and in due subordination to him.

In the exertion of lawful prerogative, the King is and ought to be absolute, that is, so far absolute that there is no legal authority that can either delay or resist him. He may reject what bills, may make what treaties, may coin what money, may create what peers, may pardon what offences he pleases, unless where the constitution hath expressly, or by evident consequence, laid down some exception or boundary, declaring that thus far the prerogative shall go, and no farther. For otherwise the power of the crown would indeed be but a name and a shadow, insufficient for the ends of government, if, where its jurisdiction is clearly established and allowed, any man, or body of men, were permitted to disobey it in the ordinary course of law. It is not now meant to speak of those extraordinary resources to first principles which are necessary when the contracts of society are in danger of dissolution, and the law proves too weak a defence against the violence of fraud or oppression: and yet the want of attending to this obvious distinction has occasioned these doctrines of absolute power in the prince, and of national resistance by the people, to be much misunderstood and perverted by the advocates for slavery on the one hand, and the demagogues of faction on the other. Civil liberty, rightly understood, consists in protecting the rights of individuals by the united force of society. Society cannot be maintained, and of course can exert no protection, without obedience to some sovereign power: and obedience is an empty name, if every individual has a right to decide how far he himself shall obey.

In the exertion, therefore, of these prerogatives, which the law has given him, the King is irresistible and absolute, according to the forms of the constitution; and yet, if the consequence of that exertion be manifestly to the grievance or dishonour of the kingdom, the parliament will call his advisers to a just and severe account. Thus the King may make a treaty with a foreign state, which shall irrevocably bind the nation; and yet, when such treaties have been judged pernicious, impeachments have pursued those ministers by whose agency or advice they were concluded.

With regard to foreign concerns, the King is the delegate or representative of his people. It is impossible that the individuals of a state, in their collective capacity, can transact the affairs of that state with any other community equally numerous as themselves. Unanimity must be wanting to their measures, and strength to the execution of their counsels. In the King, therefore, as in a centre, all the rays of his people are united, and form by that union a consistency, splendor, and power, that make him feared and respected by foreign potentates, who would scruple to enter into any engagement that must afterwards be revised and ratified by a popular assembly. What is done by the royal authority, with regard to foreign powers, is the act of the whole nation: what is done without the King's concurrence is the act only of private men: and so far is this point carried by our law, that it hath been held, that should all the subjects of England make war with a King in league with the King of England, without the royal assent, such war is no breach of the league. 4 Inst. 152. And by the 2 H. 5. c. 6. any subject committing acts of hostility upon any nation in league with the King, was declared to be guilty of high treason; and though that act was repealed by the 20 H. 6. c. 11. so far as relates to making this offence high treason, yet still it remains a very great offence against the law of nations, and punishable by our laws, either capitally or otherwise, according to the circumstances of the case.

The King, therefore, considered as the representative of his people, has the sole power of sending ambassadors to foreign states, and receiving ambassadors at home. How far the municipal laws of England intermeddle with or protect the right of these messengers from one potentate to another, may be seen in this Dict. tit. Ambassadors, and more fully, 1 Comm. c. 7.

It is also the King's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign states and princes: for it is by the law of nations essential to the goodness of a league, that it be made by the sovereign power; and then it is binding upon the whole community: and in England the sovereign power, quoad hoc, is vested in the person of the King. Whatever contracts, therefore, he engages in, no power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul. Although, lest this plenitude of authority should be abused to the detriment of the public, the constitution (as has been already hinted) hath here interposed a check, by the means of parliamentary impeachment, for the punishment of such ministers as from criminal motives, advise or conclude any treaty which shall afterwards be judged to derogate from the honour and interest of the nation.

Upon the same principle, the King has also the sole prerogative of making war and peace. For it is held by all the writers on the law of nature and nations, that the right of making war, which by nature subsisted in every individual, is given up by all private persons that enter into society, and is vested in the sovereign power. Puff. b. 8. c. 9. § 6. This right is given up, not only by individuals, but even by the entire body of people, that are under the dominion of a sovereign. It would indeed be extremely improper, that any number of subjects should have the power of binding the supreme magistrate, and putting him, against his will, in a state of war. Whatever hostilities, therefore, may be committed by private citizens, the state ought not to be affected thereby, unless that should justify their proceeding, and thereby become partner in the guilt. Such unauthorized volunteers in violence are not ranked among open enemies, but are treated like pirates and robbers. In order to make a war completely effectual, it is necessary with us in England that it be publicly [actually or virtually] declared and duly proclaimed by the King's authority; and then all parts of both contending nations, from the highest to the lowest are bound by it. And wherever the right resides of beginning a national war, there also must reside the right of ending it, or the power of making peace. And the same check of parliamentary impeachment, for improper or inglorious conduct, in beginning, conducting, or concluding a national war, is in general sufficient to restrain the ministers of the crown from a wanton or injurious exertion of this great prerogative.

The power of making war or peace is enumerated by Lord Hale inter jura summi imperii, and in England is lodged singly in the King; though, says he, it ever succeeds best when done by parliamentary advice. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 159; 7 Co. 25.

A general war, according to the same writer, is of two kinds, 1. Bellum solemniter denunciatum. 2. Bellum non solemniter denunciatum. The first is, When war is solemnly declared or proclaimed by our King against another prince or state, which is the most formal solemnity of a war now in use. 2dly, When a nation slips suddenly into a war without any solemnity, which happens by granting letters of marque, by a foreign prince invading our coasts, or setting on the King's navy at sea; and hereupon a real, though not a solemn, war may arise and hath formerly arisen; therefore to prove a nation to be at enmity with England, or to prove a person to be an alien enemy, there is no necessity of showing any war proclaimed; but it may be averred, and so put upon the trial of the country, whether there was a war or not. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 163. See further also as connected with this subject, titles Letters of Marque; Safe Conduct.

In all these prerogatives of the King respecting this nation's intercourse with foreign nations, he is considered as the delegate or representative of his people: but in domestic affairs, he is considered in a great variety of characters, and from thence there arises an abundant number of other prerogatives.

First, He is a constituent part of the supreme legislative power, and as such has the prerogative of rejecting such provisions in parliament, as he judges improper to be passed. The expediency of which constitution is evinced at large under tit. Parliament. It may here be added, that the King is not bound by any act of parliament, unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised (any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, &c.) affect not him in the least, if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests. 11 Rep. 74. Yet where an act of parliament is expressly made for the preservation of public rights, and suppression of public wrongs, and does not interfere with the established rights of the crown, it is said to be binding as well upon the King as the subject. 11 Rep. 71. The King may likewise take the benefit of any particular act, though he be not especially named. 7 Rep. 32.

The King is considered, in the next place, as the generalissimo, or the first in military command, within the kingdom.

In this capacity of General of the Kingdom, the King has the sole power of raising and regulating fleets and armies. Of the manner in which they are raised and regulated, more is said in other places. We are now only to consider the prerogative of enlisting and governing them, which indeed was disputed and claimed, contrary to all reason and precedent, by the Long Parliament of King Charles I.; but, upon the restoration of his son, was solemnly declared by the 13 Car. 2. c. 6. to be in the King alone; for that the sole supreme government and command of the militia within all his Majesty's realms and dominions, and of all forces by sea and land, and of all forts and places of strength, ever was and is the undoubted right of his Majesty, and his royal predecessors, Kings and Queens of England; and that both or either house of parliament cannot nor ought to pretend to the same. See title Militia.

This statute, it is obvious to observe, extends not only to fleets and armies, but also to forts and other places of strength within the realm, the sole prerogative as well of erecting, as manning and governing of which belongs to the King in his capacity of general of the kingdom. 2 Inst. 30.

And all lands were formerly subject to a tax for building of castles wherever the King thought proper. This was one of the three things, from contributing to the performance of which no lands were exempted; and therefore called by our Saxon ancestors the trinoda necessitas, viz. pontis reparatio, arvis constructio, and expeditio contra hostem. Conell's Inter. tit. Castellorum operatio. Seld. Jun. Angl. 1, 42. See title Castles, Forts, &c.

It is partly upon the same, and partly upon a fiscal foundation, to secure his marine revenue, that the King has the prerogative of appointing ports and havens, or such places only, for persons and merchandize to pass into and out of the realm, as he in his wisdom sees proper. See title Harbours and Havens; and to this head may be referred also the prerogative as to the erection of beacons and lighthouses; as to which see 4 Inst. 148; 12 Co. 13; Carter, 90; 2 Keb. 114; 3 Inst. 204; and title Beacons.

To this branch of the prerogative may also be referred the power which has been vested in the King, from time to time, by various acts, and by the recent statute 8 & 4 W. 4. c. 52, of allowing or prohibiting the importation or exportation of arms, gunpowder, military stores, &c.; and likewise the right which the King has, wherever he sees proper, of confining his subjects to stay within the realm, or of recalling them when beyond the seas.

By the common law, every subject may go out of the kingdom for merchandize or travel, or other cause, as he pleases, without any licence for that purpose; this appears from the statute 5 R. 2. c. 2. made to restrain persons passing out of the realm, but excepts lords, great men, and notable merchants; as also by the statute 26 H. 8. c. 10. which gave power to the King, during his life, to restrain persons from trading to certain countries; which acts had been vain and idle if the King, by his prerogative, might have done it. F. N. B. 85; Dyer, 165, 296; 2 Rol. Rep. 12; 3 Mod. 131; Stil. 442.

But notwithstanding this general liberty allowed by the common law, it appears plainly that the King by his prerogative, and without any help of an act of parliament, may prohibit his subjects from going out of the realm; but this must be by some express prohibition; as by laying on embargos, which can be only done in time of danger, or by writ of ne exeat regno, which, from the words quamplurima nobis & coronæ nostræ præjudicialia ibidem prosequi intendis, appears to be a state writ, though it is never granted universally, but to restrain a particular person, on oath made, that he intends to go out of the realm; indeed, Fitzherbert says, that the King may restrain his subjects by proclamations, and assigns as a reason for it, that the King may not know where to find his subject, so as to direct a writ to him. 12 Co. 33; 11 Co. 92; Fitz. N. B. 89; 2 Inst. 54. See title Embargo, Ne exeat Regno.

As the King may restrain any of his subjects from going abroad, in like manner he may command them to return home; and disobeying a privy seal for this purpose is the highest contempt. 1st, It is a disobedience to the command of the King himself, directed to the party. 2dly, The command is, that he shall return upon his faith and allegiance, which is the strongest compulsion that can be used. 3dly, The thing required by the King is the principal duty of a subject, viz. to be at the service of his King and country. Dyer, 128 b; Lane, 44; Moor, 109; 3 Inst. 179.

The punishment for this offence is seizing the party's estate till he return; and of this there are many instances in our books; and when he does return he shall be fined. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 22. § 4.

William de Brittain, in the 19th of Edm. 2. refusing to return on the King's writ, his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, were seized into the King's hands; so in the case of Edward of Woodstock, Earl of Kent, in the same reign. Dyer, 128 b.

So in the case of one Bartue, who married the Duchess of Suffolk, they obtained a licence from Queen Mary to go out of the realm, under pretence of recovering debts as executors to the duke; when in reality it was on account of the religion established by Queen Mary, and living with other fugitives under the protection of the Palsgrave of the Rhine, in Germany, who was an eminent Calvinist, were sent to by privy seal, but the messenger, in endeavouring to serve them with his letters, being obstructed and abused by their attendants, a certificate was made of this, and their lands and tenements seized. Dyer, 176; Jenk. Cent. 220.

So in the case of Sir Francis Englefield, who departed the kingdom on a licence obtained for three years, but not returning at the expiration of the three years, a privy seal was sent to him by Queen Elizabeth, which he not obeying, and this matter being certified into Chancery by the queen, under her sign manual, his lands and tenements were seized in the fifth year of her reign, by virtue of a commission under the great seal. 1 Leon. 9; Moor, 109; 1 And. 95, S. C. See also 7 Co. 18; Poph. 18; 4 Leon. 135.

So in the case of Sir Robert Dudley, who intending to travel, obtained a licence from James the First to go to Venice; but before his departure, he, by indenture inrolled, for valuable consideration, as was expressed in the deed, (but none paid, conveyed the manor of Killingworth, with other lands, to the Earl of Nottingham and others, in fee, with a proviso, that on tender of an angel of gold, all should be void; and with a covenant on the part of the bargainees, that they should make all such estates as the said Sir Robert should appoint; the bargainees were not parties to the deed, nor had they notice of it till some time after; but afterwards they made a lease to Sir Robert Lee, to the intent that Lady Dudley should take the profits of part of the premises for ten years, if their estate continued so long unrevoked. The King hearing that Sir Robert had been guilty of some bad practices beyond sea, in the fifth year of his reign, sent his privy seal to him, which he not obeying, the great question in this case was, whether those lands thus conveyed were forfeited; and adjudged that they were, the conveyance being fraudulent as to the King. Lane, 42, &c.

In these cases it hath been held, that the King hath only an interest in the offender's lands till he return; and that his restoring them is not a matter of grace but of right. Lanc. 48.

The King is also considered as the fountain of justice, and general conservator of the peace of the kingdom. All jurisdiction exercised in these kingdoms, that are in obedience to our King, is derived from the crown; and the laws, whether of a temporal, ecclesiastical, or military nature, are called his laws; and it is his prerogative to take care of the due execution of them. Hence it is that all judges derive their authority from the crown, by some commission warranted by law. Fleta, c. 17; Co. Lit. 99 a, 144; see title Judges.

From the inherent right inseparable from the King to distribute justice among his subjects, it hath been held that an appeal from the Isle of Man lies to the King in council, without any reservation in the grant of the Isle of Man of any such right; and though there had been exclusive words, yet the grant must have been construed to be void on the King's being deceived, rather than the subject should be deprived of a right inseparable to him as a subject, of applying to the crown for justice. 1 P. Wms. 329.

A consequence of this prerogative is the legal ubiquity of the King; his Majesty, in the eye of the law, is always present in all his courts, though he cannot personally distribute justice. Fortesc. c. 8; 2 Inst. 186. His judges are a mirror by which the King's image is reflected. It is the regal office, and not the royal person, that is always present in court, always ready to undertake prosecutions or pronounce judgment for the benefit and protection of the subject; and from this ubiquity it follows, that the King can never be nonsuit; for a nonsuit is the desertion of the suit or action by the non-appearance of the plaintiff in court; but the attorney-general may enter a non vult prosequi, which has the effect of a nonsuit. Co. Lit. 199. For the same reason, also, in the forms of legal proceedings, the King is not said to appear by his attorney, as other men do; for in contemplation of law he is always present in court. Finch, L. 81.

From the same original, of the King's being the fountain of justice, may also be deduced the prerogative of issuing proclamations, which is vested in the King alone. These proclamations have then a binding force, when they are grounded upon and enforce the laws of the realm. 3 Inst. 162. For though the making of laws is entirely the work of a distinct part, the legislative branch of the sovereign power; yet the manner, time, and circumstances of putting these laws in execution, must frequently be left to the discretion of the executive magistrate; and therefore his constitutions or edicts concerning these points, which we call proclamations, are binding upon the subject where they do not either contradict the old laws, or tend to establish new ones, but only enforce the execution of such laws as are already in being, in such manner as the King shall judge necessary. Thus the established law is, that the King may prohibit any of his subjects from leaving the realm: a proclamation, therefore, forbidding this, in general, for three weeks, by laying an embargo upon all shipping in time of war, will be equally binding as an act of parliament, because founded upon a prior law. 4 Mod. 177, 179.

But a proclamation to lay an embargo in time of peace upon all vessels laden with wheat (though in time of a public scarcity,) being contrary to law, and particularly to a statute then in force (22 C. 2. c. 13.) the advisers of such a proclamation, and all persons acting under it, always found it necessary to be indemnified by special acts of parliament. See stats. 7 G. 3. c. 7; 30 G. 3. c. 1; and title Embargo.

By the stat. 31 H. 8. c. 8. it was enacted that the King's proclamations should have the force of acts of parliament; a statute, which was calculated to introduce the most despotic tyranny, and which must have proved fatal to the liberties of this kingdom, had it not been luckily repealed in the minority of his successor, about five years after, by stat. 1 Edm. 6. c. 12. It was anciently held, though that is not now law, that the King might suspend, dispense with, or alter any particular law that he deemed hurtful to the public; and it has been said, that he may dispense with a penal statute wherein his subjects have not any interest. 4 Inst. 7; 4 Rep. 36; but by stat. 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. it is declared and enacted, "that no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute, or any part thereof, be allowed, but that the same shall be held void and of none effect, except a dispensation be allowed in such statute." It is plain, however, that the King, by his prerogative, may in certain cases and on special occasions, issue proclamations for prevention of offences, to ratify and confirm an ancient law, or, as some books express it, quod terrorem populi, to admonish them that they keep the laws on pain of his displeasure; and such proclamations being grounded on the laws of the realm, are of great force. Fortesc. de Laud. c. 9; 11 Co. 87; 12 Co. 74, 75; Dal. 20, pl. 10; 2 Rol. Abr. 209; 3 Inst. 162.

It is likewise clear, that the subject is obliged, on pain of fine and imprisonment, to obey every proclamation legally made, and though the thing prohibited were an offence before, that yet the proclamation is a circumstance which highly aggravates it, and on which alone the party disobeying may be punished. 12 Co. 74; Hob. 251. It is clearly agreed, that no private person can make any proclamation of a public nature, except by custom, as is usual in some cities and boroughs; this being a prerogative act, with which alone the King is intrusted. Bro. Procl. pl. 1; 12 Co. 75; Crom. Juris. 41.

But, according to the principles already laid down, the King, by his proclamation, cannot change any part of the common law, statutes, or customs of this realm; nor can he by his proclamation create any offence which was not an offence before. 11 Co. 87 b; 12 Co. 75.

On this foundation it hath been held that the King's proclamation prohibiting the importation of wines from France, on pain of forfeiture, was against law, and void; there being at that time no war subsisting between the nations. 2 Inst. 63.

So where an act was made by which foreigners were licensed to merchandize within London; and Henry IV. by proclamation, prohibited the execution of it, and ordered it should be in suspense usque ad proximum parlamentum; and this was held to be against law. 12 Co. 75.

On a conference between some lords of the privy council, and the two chief justices (of which Lord Coke was one,) and chief baron and baron Altham, the question was, 1st, Whether the King by proclamation might prohibit new buildings in and about London?

2d, If the King might prohibit the making starch of wheat?

And the judges were of opinion that the subject could not be restrained in these particulars by the King's proclamation. 12 Co. 74.

The King, by proclamation, may call or dissolve parliament, and declare war or peace; for these are prerogative acts with which he is intrusted, as the executive part of the law; but if there be an actual war, it is not necessary in pleading to shew that such war was proclaimed. 3 Inst. 162; 1 Hal. H. P. C. 163; Owen, 45; Rast. Ent. 605; see ante.

The King, by proclamation, may legitimate foreign coin, and make it current money of this kingdom, according to the value imposed by such proclamation; he may legitimate base coin, or mixed below the standard of sterling; he may enhance coin to a higher denomination or value, and may devalue money that is current in use and payment; and in all these cases a proclamation, with a proclamation writ under the great seal, is necessary. Co. Lit. 207 b; 5 Co. 114 b; Dar. 21; 1 Hal. H. P. C. 192, 197; see title Coin.

The King, by proclamation, may appoint fasts and days of thanksgiving and humiliation, and issue proclamations for preventing and punishing immorality and profaneness, and enjoin reading the same in churches and chapels. Comp. Incumb. 354.

A proclamation must be under the great seal, and if denied, is to be tried by the record thereof; but if a man pleads he was prevented doing a thing by proclamation, it seems the better opinion that he need not aver that such proclamation was under the great seal; for alleging that such proclamation was made, it shall be intended to have been duly made. Cro. Car. 180; see 1 Rol. Rep. 172; vide Cro. Car. 190.

The King is likewise the fountain of honour, of office, and of privilege; and this in a different sense from that wherein he is styled the fountain of justice; for here he is really the parent of them. It is impossible that government can be maintained without a due subordination of rank, that the people may know and distinguish such as are set over them, in order to yield them that due respect and obedience; and also that the officers themselves being encouraged by emulation, and the hopes of superiority, may the better discharge their functions; and the law supposes that no one can be so good a judge of their several merits and services, as the King himself who employs them. It has, therefore, intrusted with him the sole power of conferring dignities and honours, in confidence that he will bestow them upon none but such as deserve them. And, therefore, all degrees of nobility, of knighthood, and other titles, are received by immediate grant from the crown, either expressed in writing by writs or letters-patent, as in the creation of peers and baronets; or by corporal investiture, as in the creation of a simple knight. See titles Precedency, Peer.

VOL. II.

From the same principle also arises the prerogative of erecting and disposing of offices; for honours and offices are in their nature convertible and synonymous. All officers under the crown carry in the eye of the law an honour along with them; because they imply a superiority of parts and abilities, being supposed to be always filled with those that are most able to execute them. And, on the other hand, all honours in their original had duties or offices annexed to them; an earl, comes, was the conservator or governor of a county; and knight, miles, was bound to attend the King in his wars. For the same reason, therefore, that honours are in the disposal of the King, offices ought to be so likewise; and as the King may create new titles, so may he create new offices; but with this restriction, that he cannot create new offices with new fees annexed to them, nor annex new fees to old offices, for this would be a tax upon the subject, which cannot be imposed but by act of parliament. 2 Inst. 533. Wherefore, in H. 4. a new office being created by the King's letters-patent for measuring cloths, with a new fee for the same, the letters-patent were, on account of the new fee, revoked and declared void in parliament.

On this subject it hath been further said, that the King, as the fountain of justice, hath an undoubted prerogative in creating officers, and all officers are said to derive their authority mediately or immediately from him; those who derive their authority from him are called the officers of the crown, and are created by letters-patent; such as the great officers of state, judges, &c.; and there needs no stronger evidence of a right in the crown herein, than that the King hath created all such officers time immemorial. Dyer, 176; 2 Rol. Abr. 152; 4 Co. 32; 2 Inst. 425, 540; 12 Co. 116; 1 Rol. Rep. 206; Show. Par. Ca. 111; 1 Lev. 219.

But though all such officers derive their authority from the crown, and from whence the King is termed the universal officer and disposer of justice; yet it hath been held, that he hath not the office in him to execute it himself, but is only to grant or nominate; nor can the King grant any new powers to such officers, but they must execute their offices according to the rules prescribed by law. Co. Lit. 3, 114; 2 Vent. 270; 4 Inst. 125; 6 Co. 11, 12.

Neither can the King create any new office inconsistent with our constitution or prejudicial to the subject. 2 Inst. 540; 2 Sid. 141; Moor, 808; 4 Inst. 200.

And on this foundation an office created by letters-patent for the sole making of all bills, informations and letters-missive in the council of York was unreasonable and void. 1 Jon. 231. See further title Office.

Upon the same, or a like reason, the King has also the prerogative of conferring privileges upon private persons, such as granting place or precedence to any of his subjects as shall seem good to his royal wisdom. 4 Inst. 361. See title Precedence. Or such as converting aliens, or persons born out of the King's dominions, into denizens, whereby some very considerable privileges of natural-born subjects are conferred upon them. See title Aliens. Such also is the prerogative of erecting corporations; which is grounded upon this foundation, that the King, having the sole administration of the government in his hands, is the best and the only judge in what capacities, with what privileges, and under what distinctions, his people are the best qualified to serve and act under him.

Another light in which the laws of England consider the King, with regard to domestic concerns, is as the arbiter of domestic commerce, by the establishment of markets, the regulating of weights and measures, and of the coin. See this Dictionary under those titles.

The King is, lastly, considered by the laws of England as the head and supreme governor of the national church.

To enter into the reasons upon which this prerogative is founded, is matter rather of divinity than law. [It shall only, therefore, be observed, that by stat. 26 H. 8. c. 1. (reciting that the King's Majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the supreme head of the church of England, and so had been recognized by the clergy of this kingdom in their convocation,) it is enacted, that the King shall be reputed the only supreme head in earth of the church of England, and shall have annexed to the imperial crown of this realm, as well the title and style thereof, as all jurisdictions, authorities, and commodities, to the said dignity of supreme head of the church appertaining. And another statute to the same purport was made, 1 Eliz. c. 1. See titles Oaths, Supremacy.

In virtue of this authority the King convenes, prorogues, restrains, regulates, and dissolves, all ecclesiastical synods or convocations. This was an inherent prerogative of the crown long before the time of Henry VIII. as appears by the stat. 8 H. 6. c. 1. and the many authors, both lawyers and historians, vouched by Sir E. Coke. 3 Inst. 322, 323; 5 Rep. 9. So that the stat. 25 H. 8. c. 19. which restrains the convocation from making or putting in execution any canons repugnant to the King's prerogative, or the laws, customs, and statutes of the realm, was merely declaratory of the old common laws, 12 Rep. 72; that part of it only being new which made the King's royal assent actually necessary to the validity of every canon. See further titles Bishop, Convocation. As head of the church, the King is likewise the dernier resort in all ecclesiastical causes; an appeal lying ultimately to him in Chancery from the sentence of every ecclesiastical judge; which right was restored to the crown by stat. 25 H. 8. c. 19. See title Courts Ecclesiastical.

The Kings of England not having the whole legislative power, if the King and clergy make a canon, though it bind the clergy in re ecclesiastica, it does not bind laymen; for they are not represented in the convocation, but in Parliament. In the primitive church, the laity were present at all synods; and when the empire became Christian, no canon was made without the emperor's consent, and indeed the emperor's consent included that of the people, he having in himself the whole legislative power; but the kings of this kingdom have it not. 2 Salk. 412, 678. See title Canon Law.

4. The King's fiscal prerogatives, or those which regard his revenue, are such as the British constitution hath vested in the royal person, in order to support his dignity and maintain his power; being a portion which each subject contributes of his property, in order to secure the remainder.

This revenue is either ordinary or extraordinary. The King's ordinary revenue is such as has either subsisted time out of mind in the crown, or else has been granted by parliament, by way of purchase or exchange, for such of the King's inherent hereditary revenues as were found inconvenient to the subject.

It is not, however, to be understood, that the King is at present in the actual possession of the whole of this revenue. Much (nay, the greatest part,) of it is at this day in the hands of subjects; to whom it has been granted out from time to time by the Kings of England, which has rendered the crown, in some measure, dependent on the people for its ordinary support and subsistence. So that among the royal revenues are now reckoned, what lords of manors and other subjects frequently look upon to be their own absolute inherent rights, because they are, and have been, vested in them and their ancestors for ages, though in reality originally derived from the grants of our ancient princes. See 1 Comm. c. 8.

The King's ordinary revenues are stated by the learned commentator to arise from 1. The custody of the temporalities of bishops. 2. A corody from each bishopric. 3. The tithe in extra-parochial places. 4. First-fruits and tithes of all spiritual preferments. 5. The demesne lands of the crown. (See stats. 26 G. 3. c. 37; 30 G. 3. c. 50.) 6. Military tenures, purveyance, and pre-emption. 7. Hinc licences. 8. Forest courts. 9. Fines and fees in courts of justice. 10. Royal fish. 11. Shipwrecks. 12. Mines. 13. Treasure-trove. 14. Waifs. 15. Estrays. 16. Forfeitures of lands and goods for offences; in which are included deodands. 17. Escheats of lands. 18. The custody of idiots. As to all which, see this Dictionary, under title Taxes, and the several other appropriate titles.

The ordinary revenue, or proper patrimony of the crown, was very large formerly, and capable of being increased to a magnitude truly formidable: for there are very few estates in the kingdom that have not, at some period of time or other since the Norman conquest, been vested in the hands of the King, by forfeiture, escheat, or otherwise. But fortunately for the liberty of the subject, this hereditary landed revenue, by a series of improvident management, is sunk almost to nothing; and the casual profits arising from the other branches of the census regalis, are likewise almost all of them alienated from the crown. In order to supply the deficiencies of which, we are now obliged to have recourse to new methods of raising money, unknown to our early ancestors; which methods constitute the King's extraordinary revenue. For the public patrimony being got into the hands of private subjects, it is but reasonable that private contributions should supply the public service. And, perhaps, if every gentleman in the kingdom was to be stripped of such of his lands as were formerly the property of the crown, was to be again subject to the inconveniences of purveyance and pre-emption, the oppression of forest laws, and the slavery of feudal tenures, and was to resign into the King's hands all his royal franchises of waifs, wrecks, estrays, treasure-trove, mines, deodands, forfeitures, and the like; he would find himself a greater loser than by paying his quota to such taxes as are necessary to the support of government. The thing, therefore, to be wished and aimed at in a land of liberty is by no means the total abolition of taxes, which would draw after it very pernicious consequences, and the very supposition of which is the height of political absurdity; but wisdom and moderation, not only in granting, but also in the method of raising, the necessary supplies; by contriving to do both in such a manner as may be most conducive to the national welfare, and at the same time most consistent with economy and the liberty of the subject; who, when properly taxed, contributes only some part of his property, in order to enjoy the rest. See further titles Taxes, National Debt, Excise, Customs, &c.

By these taxes a vast sum of money is annually raised; but the civil list is properly the whole of the King's revenue in his own distinct capacity; the rest being rather the revenue of the public, or its creditors, though collected and distributed again in the name and by the officers of the crown; it now standing in the same place as the hereditary income did formerly; and as that has gradually diminished, the parliamentary appointments have increased.

Formerly the expenses defrayed by the civil list were those that in any shape related to civil government; as the expenses of the royal household; the revenues allotted to the judges; all salaries to officers of state, and every of the King's servants; the appointments to foreign ambassadors; the maintenance of the Queen and royal family; the King's private expenses, or privy purse; and other very numerous outgoings, as secret-service money, pensions, and other bounties, which sometimes so far exceeded the revenues appointed for that purpose, that application was made to parliament to discharge the debts contracted on the civil list.

The whole revenue of Queen Elizabeth did not amount to more than 600,000*l.* a year; that of King Charles I. was 800,000*l.*; and the revenue voted for King Charles II. was 1,200,000*l.* though complaints were made (in the first years at least) that it did not amount to so much. The revenue of the Commonwealth between the time of Charles I. and Charles II. was upwards of 1,500,000*l.* A striking instance (says Mr. Christian in his note on this passage in the Commentaries) to prove that the burthens of the people are not necessarily lightened by a change in the government.

Under the revenue of the civil lists above mentioned were included all manner of public expenses; among which Lord Clarendon, in his speech to the parliament, computed that the charge of the navy and land forces amounted annually to 800,000*l.* which was ten times more than before the former troubles. The same revenue, subject to the same charges, was settled on King James II. by stat. 1 Jac. 2. c. 1; but by the increase of trade and more frugal management, it amounted on an average to a million and a half per annum; besides other additional customs granted by parliaments, stat. 1 Jac. 2. c. 3, 4, which produced an annual revenue of 400,000*l.* out of which his fleet and army were maintained at the yearly expense of 1,100,000*l.* After the Revolution, when parliament took into its hands the annual support of the forces, both maritime and military, a civil list revenue was settled on the new King and Queen, amounting, with the hereditary duties, to 700,000*l. per annum*: and the same was continued to Queen Anne and King George I. That of King George II. was augmented to 800,000*l.* by stat. 1 G. 2. c. 2; and that of King George III. was from time to time settled and increased by several statutes; viz. 1 G. 3. c. 1. 800,000*l.*; 17 G. 3. c. 21. 100,000*l.*; and 44 G. 3. c. 80. 60,000*l.* more; and by 52 G. 3. c. 6. (amended by 55 G. 3. c. 15.) 70,000*l.* more during the King's indisposition. By the latter acts it was provided that an account of any accumulation of arrears should from time to time be laid before parliament. The civil list of King George IV. was settled by 1 G. 4. c. 1. at 850,000*l.* for England, and 207,000*l.* for Ireland.

His present Majesty having upon his accession placed his interest in the hereditary revenues of the crown, as well as in the funds, derivable from any droits of the crown or admiralty, from the West India duties, or from any casual revenue, either in his Majesty's foreign possessions or in the united kingdom, at the disposal of parliament, (which in former settlements of the civil list had been reserved to the crown,) by the 1 W. 4. sess. 2. c. 25. the clear yearly sum of 510,000*l.* is granted to his Majesty out of the consolidated fund, commencing from the death of George IV. and to be paid to his Majesty for life. By § 9, the annuities of 15,000*l.*, 6,000*l.*, and 2,500*l.*, granted to his Majesty in the reigns of George III. and George IV. are to cease and determine, as well as the annuity of 6,000*l.* granted to the Queen when Duchess of Clarence. By § 13, whenever the total charge on the civil list in any year shall exceed the 510,000*l.*, an account, stating the particulars of the exceedings, shall be submitted to parliament within thirty days after the same shall have been ascertained. The charges on the civil list are divided into five classes, which are estimated in the schedule to the act thus: First class, for their Majesty's privy purse, 110,000*l.*; second class, salaries of his Majesty's household, 130,000*l.*; third class, expenses of his Majesty's household, 171,500*l.*; fourth class, special and secret service, 23,200*l.*; fifth class, pensions, 75,000*l.* The lords of the treasury may appropriate out of the quarterly payments any sum not exceeding one-fourth of the whole amount of the class for defraying any charge on that particular class before it is applied to any other class. By § 8, no other payments than those specified in the above schedule are to be charged upon the civil list thereby granted.

By stat. 47 G. 3. st. 2. c. 24. the King is empowered to direct the execution of any trusts to which lands vested in him by escheat, &c. or in right of the crown on the duchy of Lancaster, might have been liable, and to bestow such lands, or reward discoverers. See also stat. 52 G. 3. c. 148. respecting the King's privy purse.

Upon the whole, it is doubtless much better for the crown, and also for the people, to have the revenue settled upon the modern footing, rather than the ancient; for the crown, because it is more certain, and collected with greater ease; for the people, because they are now delivered from the feudal hardships, and other odious branches of the prerogative. And though complaints have sometimes been made of the increase of the civil list, yet, if we consider the sums that have been formerly granted, the limited extent under which it is now established, the expenses defrayed by it, the revenues and prerogatives given up in lieu of it by the crown, the numerous branches of the present royal family, and, above all, the diminution of the value of money compared with what it was worth in the last century, we must acknowledge these complaints to be void of any rational foundation; and that it is impossible to support that dignity, which a King of Great Britain should maintain, with an income in any degree less than what is now established by parliament.

As to the land revenue of the crown, see stat. 10 G. 4. c. 50. repealing former acts, and consolidating and amending their provisions.

VI. By Magna Charta, 9 H. 3. c. 8. "the King nor his bailiffs shall levy any debts upon lands or rents so long as the debtor hath goods and chattels to satisfy, neither shall the pledges be distrained so long as the principal is sufficient; but if he fail, then shall the pledges answer the debt; howbeit they shall have the debtor's lands and rents until they be satisfied, unless he can acquit himself against the pledges."

Goods and chattels.] By order of the common law, the King for his debt has execution of the body, lands, and goods of his debtor; this is an act of grace, and restrains the power the King had before. 2 Inst. 19.

Pledges be distrained.] This act does not extend, nor was ever taken to extend, to sureties in a bond or recognizance, if they may be so called, being bound themselves equally with the principal, as sureties to perform covenants and agreements are in like manner; but to pledges and manufacturers only, who by express words are not responsible, unless their principals become insolvent, and so are conditional debtors only. And so the act has always been construed, and the words themselves imply as much. Hurd. 378.

By Magna Charta, c. 18, "the King's debtor dying, the King shall be served before the executor."

By this statute, the King by his prerogative shall be preferred in satisfaction of his debt by the executors before any other; and if the executors have sufficient to pay the King's debt, the heir, nor any purchaser of his lands, shall not be charged. 2 Inst. 32.

Stat. West. 1; 3 Edw. 1. c. 19. enacts, "that the sheriff having received the King's debt, upon his next account shall discharge the debtor thereof, in pain to forfeit three times so much to the debtor, and to make fine at the King's will. And the sheriff and his heirs shall answer all monies that they whom he employed receive; and if any other that is answerable to the Exchequer by his own hands do so, he shall render thrice so much to the plaintiff, and make fine as before. And on payment of the King's debt, the sheriff shall give a talley to the debtor, and the process for levying the same shall be showed him on demand without fee, on pain to be grievously punished."

The King's debt.] Under this word, debt, all things due to the King are comprehended, and not only debt in the proper sense, but duties on things due, as rents, fines, issues, amercements, and other duties to the King received or levied by the sheriff; for debt in its large sense signifies whatever a man doth owe; and debere dicitur quia deest habere; debitori enim deest quod habet, cum sit creditoris, maxime in casu domini Regis. 2 Inst. 198.

The sheriff and his heirs shall answer.] This is to be understood quoad restitutionem, but not quoad penam; that is, for the civil, but not for the criminal part; for this is a maxim in law. 2 Inst. 198.

of this statute. And the case in question seemed a hard case to the court, because the party himself was the cause why there was no appearance, by beating the party so heinously the very day before they ought to have appeared, that they were disabled thereby to appear. Hard. 334.

W. put 100*l.* out at interest to defendant, and took bond in the name of one J. who became felo de se, and the plaintiff was relieved against the King on this trust, in equity upon this statute. Sed quære, whether this statute extends to any equity against the King, otherwise than in case of pleas by way of discharge? But it was likewise decreed in this cause that the plaintiff should be saved harmless from all others. Hard. 176.

And the matter so showed be sufficiently proved.] Scire facias issued against T. the father, and T. the son, to show cause wherefore they did not pay the King 1000*l.* for the mesne profits of certain lands holden by them from his Majesty, for which land judgment was given for him in the Exchequer, and the mesne rates were found by inquisition, which returned that the said mesne profits came to 1000*l.* upon which inquisition this scire facias issued; whereupon the sheriff returned that T. the father was dead, and T. the son appeared, and pleaded that he took the profits but as a servant to his father, and by his command, and rendered an account to his father for the profits, and also that judgment for the lands was given against his father and him for default of sufficient pleading, and not for the truth of the fact; and he showed this statute, which he pretended aided him for his equity; whereupon the King demurred. Tanfield, chief baron, said, that the matter in equity ought to be sufficiently proved, and here is nothing but the allegation of the party, and the demurrer for the King; and, if the demurrer be in law an admittance of the allegation, and so a sufficient proof within the statute, is to be advised on; and for that point the case is but this: A scire facias issues to have execution of a recognizance, which within this act ought, by pretence and allegation of the defendant, to be discharged for matter in equity, and the defendant pleads his matter in equity, and the King, supposing this not to be in equity within this statute, demurs in law, whether that demurrer be an insufficient proof of the allegation within the statute or not? Adjournatur. Lane, 51.

By § 33 of the said stat. 33 H. 8. c. 39. it is provided, that the said act shall not take away any liberties belonging to the duchy and county palatine of Lancaster.

Process and executions for debts in the Court of Exchequer shall be made in the Exchequer by such officer as hath been used, as by this act is limited, § 34.

The stat. 34 & 35 H. 8. c. 2. directs how the King's receivers and collectors shall be charged; and the stat. 7 Edm. 6. c. 1. makes further regulations on that subject, and requires all officers to find sureties for duly accounting. See title Accounts, Public.

The stat. 13 Eliz. c. 4. enacts, "that all the lands, &c. which any accountant of the Queen, her heirs and successors, hath while he remains accountable, shall for the payment of the debts of the Queen, her heirs and successors, be liable, and put in execution in like manner, as if such accountant had stood bound by writ obligatory (having the effect of the statute staple) to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, for payment of the same, § 1.

The Queen, by her letters-patent, granted catalla usagatorum et felonum de se, within such a precinct; one who was indebted to the Queen is felo de se within the precinct. It was ruled, that notwithstanding the grant by the letters-patent, the Queen shall have the goods for satisfying her debt. 3 Leo. 113; Mo. 126, 127, S. C. between the Queen of the first part, the Bishop of Sarum of the second part, and Oliver Coxhead of the third part; and there, per Manwood, chief baron, the patent does not extend to have the goods of felo de se against the Queen for her debt, because it wanted the words (licet tangat nos); but he agreed, that if the lands of the felon be liable to [sufficient to answer] all the debt of the Queen, the court may in discretion take all the lands in extent, and leave the goods to the patentee. And as to a petition of Coxhead praying a discharge of the lands, &c. by him purchased of the officer debtor to the Queen, it was answered, that the land was subject to the Queen's extent for all arrears of receipts by his office, received before the conveyance thereof, though the receipt be after the conveyance, and that by reason of the statute; but as to another office accepted after the conveyance of the land, the arrears of that shall not charge the land so conveyed.

B. L. having purchased a long term for years in houses, afterwards purchased the inheritance; afterwards he became receiver of North Wales, and having occasion for 500*l.* assigned over the term by way of mortgage to J. S. Afterwards on the marriage of E. L. his son, he settled the houses in St. Clement's (inter alia) on himself for life, remainder to E. L. his son, and the heirs of his body. There was issue of the marriage, a daughter, the wife of P.; after this B. L. mortgages these houses to N. for 1800*l.* The King extends these houses for the debt of B. L.; N. gets an assignment of the extent, and a privy seal for the debt. Resolved, first, that by the statute of Elizabeth, the land and the real estate of B. L. was bound and stood liable to answer the King's debt, although he was not actually a debtor to the King, nor any extent against him in several years after. Secondly, that where a term is attendant on the inheritance, he shall have a right to the term: but if it be a term in gross, and assigned before any actual extent, the assignment will stand good, and the term not liable to the King's debt. 2 Vern. 389, 390.

If either of the Queen's officers, on rendering of his account, shall be found in arrear, and such arrears shall not be paid within six months after the account past, the Queen, &c. may sell so much of his estate as will answer the debt, and the overplus of the sale is to be rendered to the accountant, or his heirs, by the officer that receives the purchase-money, without further warrant. Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 4. § 2, 3.

Upon this statute many questions were moved; first, if the debtor died, whether the land might be sold? Secondly, when the account is determined after his death? Thirdly, When the accountant, after becoming debtor, and in arrear, makes feoffment, or other estate over, or charges or incumbers the land, either to his issue or others of his blood, to prevent the Queen's selling, or on other consideration, whether she may sell the land, the words of the act being make sale, &c. of so much of the lands, &c. of every such accountant or debtor so found in arrear, &c. and that the sale shall be good and available in law against the party accountant, and his heirs claiming as heirs. Fourthly, if the accountant was seised of land in tail, whether this land may be sold to be good against the issue; for the ousting of which doubts the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 3. was made; but this gives remedy only, that the land shall be sold after the death of the debtor, and when the account is made after his death; therefore to remedy the other mischiefs, the statute 29 Eliz. c. 7. was made (but the same, being only a temporary act, is expired.) Mo. 646, &c. pl. 895, (where part of the last-mentioned act is set forth and explained.)

If such accountant or debtor purchase lands in others' names in trust for their use, that being found by office or inquisition, those lands also shall be liable to satisfy the debt in such a manner as before is expressed. Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 4. § 5.

Lands purchased by accountants since the beginning of the Queen's reign, either in their own names, or in the names of others in trust for their use, shall be also liable to be sold for the discharge of their debts as aforesaid, rendering the overplus to the accountant, § 6.

Provided, that bishops' lands shall be only chargeable for subsidies or tenths, as they were before making this act, and not otherwise, § 9.

Neither shall this act extend to charge any accountant whose yearly receipt exceeds not 300*l.* otherwise than as he was lawfully chargeable before this act, § 10.

Neither shall this act extend to such accountants, as by order of their offices, and charge, immediately after their accounts past, are to lay out money again; such as are treasurers of war, garrisons, navy, provision of victuals, or for fortifications or buildings, and the master of the wardrobe; unless the Queen, &c. command present pay, § 11, 12.

Neither does this act extend to sheriffs, escheators, or bailiffs of liberties, concerning whose accounts the course remains the same as before, § 13.

Lands bought of an accountant bonâ fide, and without notice of any fraudulent intent in the accountant, shall be discharged; and if they be bound by office, yet shall they, on traverse, be discharged without livery, ouster le main, or other suit, § 14.

If a man is receiver to the King, and not indebted, but is clear and sells his land, and ceases to be receiver, and afterwards is appointed receiver again, and then a debt is contracted with the King, the former sale is good. 2 Mod. 247.

The Queen, &c. being satisfied by sale of lands, the sureties shall be discharged for so much, and if any yet remain unpaid, the sureties shall pay the residue rateably according to their abilities. Stat. 13 Edw. c. 4. § 15.

By stat. 20 Car. 2. c. 2. all receivers of monies or duties for the King's use, are to pay damages of twelve per cent. per annum from the expiration of two months after the receipt by them, till they pay the same into the Exchequer.

By stat. 25 Geo. 3. c. 35. for the more easy and effectual sale of lands of the crown debtors, the Court of Exchequer, on application of the attorney-general in a summary way, may order the estate of any debtor to the King to be sold; and compel the production of title-deeds, &c. and apply the same in liquidation of the King's demand, under a writ of extent, or diem clausit extremum. (See title Execution.) The surplus, after satisfaction of the debt and costs, to be paid to the party entitled to the estate.

By the stat. 41 G. 3. c. 90. § 1. when upon any account declared, &c. in the Court of Exchequer in England, or on judgment of that court, any debt is due to his Majesty, a copy of such account shall be exemplified, and transmitted to and enrolled in the Exchequer in Ireland, and process be issued against the debtor's body and effects in Ireland. By § 2, money levied in Ireland shall be paid into the Irish Exchequer, and transmitted to the English Exchequer. By § 3, 4, so vice versa, on accounts declared in the Exchequer of Ireland. By 48 G. 3. c. 47. the King shall not sue in Ireland any person in respect of any estate, unless where the right has accrued, or shall first accrue, within sixty years before the commencement of such suit; persons having enjoyed sixty years' possession quieted. In what cases rents, &c. of estates shall be deemed in charge, § 2. Estates, the reversion of which is in the crown, shall be sued for within sixty years after determination of the particular estate, § 3. Lands shall be holden of the crown upon the usual tenures, services, and duties, § 4. Rents paid to the King shall remain payable, § 5. Incumbents of benefices shall not be liable to arrears of crown rents accrued before their incumbency, § 6. By stat. 4 G. 4. c. 18. all the powers of the 39 & 40 G. 3. c. 88. relating to the disposition of the King's private estates are extended to lands in possession of any King at the time of his accession. The statute 11 G. 4. c. 23. enabled the late King (George IV.) to appoint certain persons to affix his royal signature to instruments requiring such signature. (This statute, however, is now expired.)

VII. In King John's Magna Charta of Liberties, there was a clause making it lawful for the barons of the realm to choose twenty-five barons to see the charter observed by the King, with power, on any justice or other minister of the King's failing to do right, and acting contrary thereto, for four of the said barons to address the King, and pray that the same might be remedied; and if the same were not amended in forty days, upon the report of the four barons to the rest of the twenty-five, those twenty-five barons, with the commonalty of the whole land, were at liberty to distress the King, take his castles, lands, &c. until the evils complained of should be remedied, according to their judgment; saving the person of the King, Queen, and their children; and when the evils were redressed, the people were to obey the King as before. King John's Magna Charta, c. 73. But this clause was admitted in King Henry III.'s Magna Charta, though in a statute made at Oxford, anno 42 Henry III. to reform misgovernment, it was enacted, that twenty-four great men should be named, twelve by the King, and twelve by the parliament, to appoint justices, chancellors, and other officers, to see Magna Charta observed. These regulations seem (like the constitution, framed by an assembly in a neighbouring nation, before they had directly discarded a monarchical form of government) too laboured and unnatural to succeed in practice; the checks now formed by the law, on the power of the crown, are of a nature in reality more forcible, though in appearance more loyal, than a measure which placed the sovereign in subjection to a dangerous aristocracy.

The barons' wars seem to have proceeded in some measure from a like power granted to them, as by the charter of King John; and probably the parliament's wars in the time of King Charles I. from their examples.

But whatever attempts might have been previously made, it cannot but be observed, that most of the laws for ascertaining, limiting, and restraining, the prerogative of the crown, have been made within the compass of little more than a century past, from the Petition of Right in 3 Car. 1. to the present time, so that the powers of the crown are now to all appearance greatly curtailed and diminished since the reign of King James I. particularly by the abolition of the Star Chamber and High Commission Courts, in the reign of Charles I.; and by the disclaiming of martial law, and the power of levying taxes on the subject by the same prince; by the disuse of forest laws for a century past; and by the many excellent provisions enacted under Charles II. especially by the abolition of military tenures, purveyance, and pre-emption, the Habeas Corpus Act, and the act to prevent the discontinuance of parliaments for above three years; and since the Revolution, by the strong and emphatical words in which our liberties are asserted in the Bill of Rights and Act of Settlement, by the act for triennial, since turned into septennial, elections; by the exclusion of certain officers from the House of Commons; by rendering the seats of the judges permanent, and their salaries liberal and independent; and by restraining the King's pardon from obstructing parliamentary impeachments: besides all this, if we consider how the crown is impoverished and stripped of all its ancient revenues, so that it must greatly rely on the liberality of parliament for its necessary support and maintenance, we may, perhaps, be led to think that the balance is inclined, pretty strongly, to the popular scale, and that the executive magistrate has neither independence nor power enough left, to form that check upon the Lords and Commons, which the founders of our constitution intended.

On the other hand, however, it is to be considered that every prince in the first parliament after his accession, has by long usage a truly royal addition to his hereditary revenue settled upon him for his life, and has never any occasion to apply to parliament for supplies, but upon some public necessity of the whole realm. This restores to him that constitutional independence which at his first accession seems, it must be owned, to be wanting; and then, with regard to power, we may find, perhaps, that the hands of government are at least sufficiently strengthened, and that an English monarch is now in no danger of being overborne either by the nobility or the people. The instruments of power are not, perhaps, so open and avowed, as they formerly were, and therefore are the less liable to jealous and invidious reflections; but they are not the weaker upon that account. In short, our national debt and taxes have, in their natural consequences, thrown such a weight of power into the executive scale of government, as we cannot think was intended by our patriot ancestors, who gloriously struggled for the abolition of the then formidable parts of the prerogative, and by an unaccountable want of foresight, established this system in their stead. The entire collection and management of so vast a revenue being placed in the hands of the crown, have given rise to such a multitude of new officers, created by and removable at the royal pleasure, that they have extended the influence of government to every corner of the nation. To this may be added the frequent opportunities of conferring particular obligations, by preference in loans, subscriptions, tickets, remittances, and other money transactions, which will greatly increase this influence, and that over those persons whose attachment, on account of their wealth, is frequently the most desirable; and the same may be said with regard to the officers in our numerous army, and the places which the army has created; all which put together, give the executive power so persuasive an energy with respect to the persons themselves, and so prevailing an interest with their friends and families, as will amply make amends for the loss of external prerogative.

Upon the whole, therefore, it seems clear, that whatever may have become of the nominal, the real power of the crown has not been too far weakened by any transactions in the last century: much is, indeed, given up, but much is also acquired. The stern commands of prerogative have yielded to the milder voice of influence; the slavish and exploded doctrine of non-resistance has given way to a military establishment by law; and to the disuse of parliaments has succeeded a parliamentary trust of an immense perpetual revenue. When, indeed, by the free operation of the sinking fund, our national debts shall be lessened, when the posture of foreign affairs, and the universal introduction of a well-planned and national militia, will suffer our formidable army to be thinned and regulated, and when, in consequence of all, our taxes shall be gradually reduced, this adventitious power of the crown will slowly and imperceptibly diminish, as it slowly and imperceptibly rose; but till that shall happen, it will be our special duty, as good subjects and good Englishmen, to reverence the crown, and yet guard against corrupt and servile influence from those who are entrusted with its authority: to be LOYAL, yet FREE; OBEDIENT, and yet INDEPENDENT; and, above every thing, to hope that we may long, very long, continue to be governed by a sovereign, who in all those public acts that have personally proceeded from himself, hath manifested the highest veneration for the free constitution of Britain, hath already, in more than one instance, remarkably strengthened its outworks, and therefore will never harbour a thought, or adopt a persuasion, in any the remotest degree, detrimental to public liberty. 1 Com. c. 8.

KING or HERALDS, or King at Arms, Rex Heraldum. A principal officer at arms, that hath the pre-eminence of the society. Among the Romans he was called pater patratus. See titles Herald, Garrier.

KING of the MINSTRELS, at Tutbury in com. Staff. His power and privilege appear by a charter of Richard II. confirmed by Henry VI. in the 21st year of his reign. Cowell.

KING'S ADVOCATE, in Scotland, His office is similar, but in some respects superior, to that of the King's attorney-general in England. It is his province to prosecute all criiminal actions, and bring the criminals to punishment, without the intervention of any grand jury, and at the expense of the public. Scotch Dict.

A question lately arose on an appeal before the House of Lords, between the lord advocate and the attorney-general, as to which was entitled to precedence; the point was ultimately decided in favor of the latter.

KING'S BENCH.

BANCUS REGIUS, from the Saxon Banca, a Bench or Form.] The Supreme Court of Common Law in the Kingdom. 4 Inst. 73.

- I. Of the Court itself generally.
- II. Of its Criminal Jurisdiction.
- III. Of its Civil Jurisdiction, &c.
- IV. Of the Officers of the Court, and the mode of proceeding therein.

I. The Court of King's Bench is so called because the King used formerly to sit in court in person, the style of the court still being coram ipso rege. During the reign of a Queen it is called the Queen's Bench; and under the usurpation in Cromwell's time it was styled the Upper Bench.

This court consists of a chief justice and four puisne judges, who are by their office the sovereign conservators of the peace, and supreme coroners of the land; yet though the king used himself to sit in this court, and still is supposed so to do, he did not, neither by law is he empowered, to determine any cause or motion, but by the mouth of his judges, to whom he has committed his whole judicial authority. 4 Inst. 71. See 4 Burr. 851; 2 Inst. 46.

As to the varying number of the judges of this court formerly, see tit. Judges.

It has been said that King Henry III. sat in person with the justices in Banco Regis several times, being seated on a high bench, and the judges on a lower one at his feet: this, however, is a doubtful point. King Edward IV. sat three days in the second year of his reign, wholly to see, as he was young, the form of administering justice. King James I. it is also said, sat there for a similar reason. See 3 Com. c. 4. in n. It is said that in Westminster Hall, under the modern erections for the Courts of King's Bench and Chancery, there still remain a stone bench or table, and a stone chair, used by some of our ancient kings when they sat in parliament, or for the administration of justice. See Antiquities of Westminster, quarto, 1807.

This court, which is the remnant of the ancient Aula Regia, is not, nor can it be, from the nature and constitution of it, fixed to any certain place, but may follow the king's person wherever he goes. See stat. 28 Eliz. 1. stat. 3. c. 5. For which reason all process issuing out of this court in the king's name is returnable, "ubicunque fuerimus in Anglia, wheresoever we shall then be in England." See titles Courts, Common Pleas. It hath, indeed, for some centuries past, usually sat at Westminster, being an ancient palace of the crown, but might remove with the king to York or Exeter, if he thought proper to command it. And we find that after Edward I. had conquered Scotland, it actually sat at Roxburgh. M. 20, 21 E. 1; Hale, H. C. L. 200. And this moveable quality, as well as its dignity and power, are fully expressed by Bracton, when he says that the justices of this court are "capitales, generales, prepositi, et majores, à latere regis residentes: qui omnium aliorum corrigere tenentur injurias et errores." Bract. l. 3. c. 10. And it is moreover especially provided in the Articula super cartas, 28 E. 1. c. 5. that the king's chancellor and the justices of his bench, shall follow him, so that he may have at all times near unto him some that be learned in the laws.

After the division of the courts, and the establishment of the Court of Common Pleas for the express purpose of determining civil suits, the Court of King's Bench was accustomed, in ancient times, to be especially exercised in all criiminal matters and pleas of the crown, leaving the judging of private contracts and civil actions to the Common Pleas and other courts. Glanvil. lib. 1. c. 2, 3, 4; lib. 10. c. 18; Smith de Rep. Ang. lib. 2. c. 11; 4 Inst. fol. 70.

Toward the latter end of the Norman period, the Aula Regis, which was before one great court where the justiciar presided, was divided into four distinct courts, i. e. the Court of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. Madox, c. 19; Bracton, lib. 3. c. 7. fol. 105; see titles Courts, Common Pleas, &c.

The Court of King's Bench retained the greater similitude with the ancient Curia or Aula Regis, and was always ambulatory, and removed with the King wherever he went. It hath always retained a supreme original jurisdiction in all criminal matters; for in these the process both issued from and was returnable into this court; but in trespass it might be made returnable into either the King's Bench or Common Pleas, because the plea was criminal as well as civil. 2 Inst. 24; 4 Inst. 70; Co. Lit. 71; Dyer, 187; Crompt. of Courts, 78; 1 Rol. Ab. 71.

II. The jurisdiction of this court is very high and transcendent. It keeps all inferior jurisdictions within the bounds of their authority, and may either remove their proceedings to be determined in it, or prohibit their progress below. It superintends all civil corporations in the kingdom. It commands magistrates and others to do what their duty requires, in every case where there is no other superior remedy. It protects the liberty of the subject by speedy and summary interposition. It takes cognizance both of criminal and civil causes; the former in what is called the crown side or crown office, the latter in the plea side of the court. 3 Comm. c. 4.

On the crown side, that is, in the crown office, this court takes cognizance of all criminal causes, from high treason down to the most trivial misdemeanor or breach of the peace. Into this court also, indictments from all inferior courts may be removed by writ of certiorari, and tried either at bar or at nisi prius, by a jury of the county out of which the indictment is brought. But informations in the King's Bench can be filed for misdemeanors only, as no man can be put upon his trial for a capital offence, or for misprision of treason, without the accusation against him being found sufficient by twelve of his countrymen. See tit. Information. And it possesses the power, in all cases where an impartial trial cannot be had in the county out of which the indictment is brought, to direct the trial to take place in some other county. And by the 38 G. 3. c. 52, in all indictments removed into the King's Bench by certiorari, and in all informations filed there, if the venue be laid in any city or town corporate, the court, at the instance of the prosecutor or defendant, may order the issue to be tried by a jury of the next adjoining county. London, Westminster, Southwark, Bristol, and Chester, are entirely exempted from the operation of the act; and Exeter, except in cases of indictments removed by certiorari.

Into this Court of King's Bench hath reverted all that was good and salutary of the jurisdiction of the Court of Star Chamber (Camera Stellata), which was a court of very ancient original, finally abolished, on account of the abuse of its jurisdiction, by 16 C. 1. c. 10. See title Star Chamber.

To state its powers more particularly, this court is termed the Custos Morum of all the realm, and by the plenitude of its power, wherever it meets with an offence contrary to the first principles of justice, and of dangerous consequence if not restrained, adapts a proper punishment to it. 1 Sid. 168; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 4.

The judges of this court are the supreme coroners of the kingdom. And the court itself is the principal court of criminal jurisdiction known to the laws of England; for which reason, by the coming of the Court of King's Bench into any county (as it was removed to Oxford on account of the sickness in 1665) all former commissions of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery, are at once absorbed and determined ipso facto.

But according to Lord Hale, the King's Bench, by coming into any county, does not determine any other commission, but suspends its session during the term, and in vacation time the commissioners may proceed again upon their former commission. A special commission, he adds, may sit in term time in the county where the King's Bench sits; but then the King's Bench must adjourn during its session. 2 Hale's P. C. 4; see also 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 3. post.

The justices of B. R. are the sovereign justices of oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, and of eyre, and coroners of the land; and their jurisdiction is general all over England: by their presence the power of all other justices in the county, during the time of this court's sitting in it, is suspended, as has already been noticed; for in præsentia majoris cessat potestas minoris; but such justices may proceed by virtue of a special commission, &c. H. P. C. 156; 4 Inst. 73; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3.

If an indictment in a foreign county be removed before commissioners of oyer and terminer into the county where the King's Bench sits, they may proceed; for the King's Bench not having the indictment before them, cannot proceed for this offence; but if an indictment is found in the vacation time in the same county in which the King's Bench sits, and in term time the King's Bench is adjourned, there may be a special commission to hear it. 4 Inst. 73.

By the 25 G. 3. c. 18, when any session of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery of the gaol of Newgate, for the county of Middlesex, shall have been begun to be holden before the essoign day of any term, the same sessions shall be continued to be holden, and the business thereof finally concluded, notwithstanding the happening of such essoign day of any term, or the sitting of his majesty's Court of King's Bench at Westminster, or elsewhere in the county of Middlesex; and all trials, &c. had at such session so continued to be holden, shall be good and effectual to all intents and purposes. The 32 G. 3. c. 48, made a similar provision for the sessions of the peace and of oyer and terminer, before the justices of the peace for the same county.

By the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 36, his majesty is empowered to establish a new court, to be called the "Central Criminal Court," for the trial of offences committed in London and Middlesex, and certain parts of Essex, Kent, and Surrey. See further tit. London.

Justices of this court have a sovereign jurisdiction over all matters of a criminal and public nature, judiciously brought before them, to give remedy either by the common law or statute; and their power is original and ordinary; when the king hath appointed them, they have their jurisdiction from the law. 4 Inst. 74.

This court has a particular jurisdiction, not only over all capital offences, but also over all other misdemeanors of a public nature, tending either to a breach of the peace or to oppression or faction, or any manner of misgovernment; and it is not material whether such offences, being manifestly against the public good, directly injure any particular person or not. 4 Inst. 71; 11 Co. 98; 2 H. P. C. c. 3. § 3.

And for the better restraining such offences, it has a discretionary power of inflicting exemplary punishment on offenders, either by fine, imprisonment, or other infamous punishment, as the nature of the crime, considered in all its circumstances, shall require; and it may make use of any prison which shall seem most proper; and it is said that no other court can remove or bail persons condemned to imprisonment by this court. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 5. Newgate is as much the prison of this court as the King's Bench prison is: every prison in the kingdom is the prison of this court. 1 Burr. 541.

This court hath so sovereign a jurisdiction in all criminal matters, that an act of parliament appointing that all crimes of a certain denomination shall be tried before certain judges, doth not exclude the jurisdiction of this court, without express negative words; and therefore it hath been resolved, that stat. 33 H. 8. c. 12. which enacts, that all treasons, &c. within the king's house, shall be determined before the lord steward of the king's house, &c. doth not restrain this court from proceeding against such offences. 2 Inst. 549; 2 Jones, 53.

But where a statute creates a new offence which was not taken notice of by the common law, and erects a new jurisdiction for the punishment of it, and prescribes a certain method of proceeding, it seems questionable how far this court has an implied jurisdiction in such a case. 1 Sid. 296; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 6.

This court, by the plenitude of its power, may as well proceed on indictments removed by certiorari out of inferior courts, as on those originally commenced here, whether the court below be determined, or still in esse, and whether the proceedings be grounded on the common law, or on a statute making a new law concerning an old offence. Dals. 25; 44 E. 3. 31 b; Crompt. Juris. 131.

But the Court of King's Bench will not give judgment on a conviction in the inferior court, where the proceedings are removed by certiorari, but will allow the party to waive the issue below, and to plead de novo, and to go to trial upon an issue joined in B. R. Carth. 6.

Nor can a record, removed into the King's Bench from an inferior court, regularly be remanded after the term in which it came in; yet if the court perceives any practice in endeavouring to remove such record, or that it is intended for delay, they may, in discretion, refuse to receive it, and remand it back before it is filed. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 7. and several authorities there cited.

Also by the construction of the statutes, which give a trial by nihi prius, the King's Bench may grant such a trial in cases of treason or felony, as well as in common cases, because for such trial, not the record, but only a transcript, is sent down. 4 Inst. 74; Raym. 364; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 7.

And by stat. 6 H. 8. c. 6. it is enacted, "That the King's Bench have full authority, by discretion, to remand as well the bodies of all felons removed thither, as their indictments, into the counties where the felonies were done; and to command the justices of gaol delivery, justices of the peace, and all other justices, to proceed thereon after the course of the common law, as the said justices might have done if the said indictments and prisoners had not been brought into the said King's Bench." This act extends not to high treason. Raym. 367; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 8, 9.

As the judges of this court are the sovereign justices of oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, conservators of the peace, &c. as also the sovereign coroners, therefore, where the sheriff and coroners may receive appeals by bill, a fortiori the judges may; also this court may admit persons to bail in all cases, according to their discretion. 4 Inst. 79; 9 Co. 118 b; 4 Inst. 74; Vaugh. 157.

In the county where the King's Bench sits, there is every term a grand inquest, who are to present all criminal matters arising within that county, and then the same court proceeds upon indictments so taken; or if, in vacation, there be any indictment of felony before the justices of peace of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery there sitting, it may be removed by certiorari into B. R. and there they proceed de die in diem, &c. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 3.

It may award execution against persons attainted in parliament, or any other court, when the record of their attainder, or a transcript, is removed, and their persons brought thither by habeas corpus. Cro. Car. 176; Cro. Jac. 495. Pardons of persons condemned by former justices of gaol delivery, ought to be allowed in B. R., the record and prisoner being removed thither by certiorari and habeas corpus. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 6. § 19.

Into the court of B. R. indictments from all inferior courts and orders of sessions, &c. may be removed by certiorari; and inquisitions of murder are certified of course into this court, as it is the supreme court of criminal jurisdiction; hence also issue attachments for disobeying rules or orders, &c. 4 Inst. 71, 72.

III. On the first division of the courts it was intended to confine the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench to matters merely criminal, and accordingly soon afterwards it was enacted by Magna Charta, c. 11. that common pleas should not follow the king's court, but be held in a certain place; hence it was, that the Court of King's Bench could not determine a mere real action. 17 Edw. 3. 50; 1 Rol. Abr. 536, 537.

But notwithstanding common pleas could not be immediately holden in Banco Regis, yet where there was a defect in the court where by law they were holden originally, they might be holden in B. R.; as if a record came out of the Common Pleas by writ of error, there they might hold pleas to the end; so where the plea in a writ of right was removed out of the county by a pone in B. R. on a writ of mesne replevin, &c. 2 Inst. 23; 4 Inst. 72, 113; and see Saund. 256; Show. P. C. 57.

On the plea side or civil branch, this court has an original jurisdiction and cognizance of all actions of trespass or other injury alleged to be committed vi et armis; of actions for forgery of deeds, maintenance, conspiracy, deceit, and actions on the case which allege any falsity or fraud; all of which savour of a criminal nature, although the action is brought for a civil remedy, and make the defendant liable in strictness to pay a fine to the king, as well as damages to the injured party.

So any action vi et armis, where the king is to have fine, as ejectment, trespass, forcible entry, &c. being of a mixed nature, may be commenced in B. R. 2 Inst. 23.

The same doctrine was afterwards extended to all actions on the case whatsoever. F. N. B. 86, 92; 1 Lil. Prac. Reg. 503. But no action of debt or detinue, or other mere civil action, could by the common law be prosecuted by any subject in this court, by original writ out of Chancery. 4 Inst. 76; Tyre's Just. Filizar, 110. Though an action of debt, given by statute, may be brought in the King's Bench as well as in the Common Pleas. Carth. 234. And yet this court might always have held plea of any civil action (other than actions real) provided the defendant was an officer of the court, or in the custody of the marshal or prison keeper of this court, for a breach of the peace or any other offence. 4 Inst. 71. And in process of time, it began, by a fiction, to hold plea of all personal actions whatsoever, and continued to do so for ages; it being surmised that the defendant was arrested for a supposed trespass, which he never had in reality committed; and being thus in the custody of the marshal of this court, the plaintiff was at liberty to proceed against him for any other personal injury; which surmise of being in the marshal's custody, the defendant was not at liberty to dispute. See 4 Inst. 72.

Also any officer or minister of the court entitled to the privilege thereof, might be there sued by bill in debt, covenant, or other personal action. 2 Inst. 23; 4 Inst. 71; 2 Bulst. 123.

From hence, as we hinted before, the notion arose that if a man was taken up as a trespasser in the King's Bench, and there in custody, they might declare against him in debt, covenant, or account; for this likewise was a case of privilege, since the Common Pleas could not procure the prisoners of the King's Bench to appear in their court, and therefore it was an exception out of Magna Charta. 4 Inst. 71; Cro. Car. 330.

This court is likewise a court of appeal, into which may be removed, by writ of error, the determinations of all inferior courts of record in England (excepting the courts of London, of the Cinque Ports, and of a few other places,) and to which a writ of error also lay from the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, previous to the stat. 23 G. 3. c. 28. See title Ireland.

Formerly a writ of error lay from the Common Pleas into the Court of King's Bench, but this was altered by the 1 W. 4. c. 70. See further title Error.

The Court of King's Bench, as it is the highest court of common law, hath not only power to reverse erroneous judgments for such errors as appear the defect of the understanding, but also to punish all inferior magistrates and all officers of justice, for wilful and corrupt abuses of their authority against the obvious principles of natural justice; the instances of which are so numerous, and so various in their kinds, that it seems needless to attempt to insert them. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 10; Vaugh. 157; 1 Salk. 201.

This court grants writs of habeas corpus to relieve persons wrongfully imprisoned, and may bail any person whatsoever. See titles Bail, Habeas Corpus. Writs of mandamus are granted by this court, to restore officers in corporations, colleges, &c. unjustly turned out, and freemen wrongfully disfranchised, also writs of inhibition in the name of quo warranto against persons or corporations usurping franchises and liberties against the king, and on misuser of privileges to seize the liberties, &c. In this court also the king's letters-patent may be repealed by scire facias, &c. Prohibitions are likewise issued from this court to keep inferior courts within their proper jurisdiction. See these several titles.

IV. The officers on the crown side are, the king's coroner and attorney, commonly called the clerk of the crown or master of the crown office; the secondary; the clerk of the rules; the examiner; calendar-keeper; and clerks in court.

The officers on the plea side are, the chief clerks; secondary or master; their deputy; marshal; clerk of the rules; clerk of the papers; clerk of the day-rules; clerk of the dockets; clerk of the declarations; clerk of the bails, postens, and escheats; signer of writs; signer of the bills of Middlesex; custos brevium; clerk of the upper treasury; clerk of the outer treasury; flacer; exigenter, and clerk of the outlawries; clerk of the errors; deputy marshal; marshal and associate to the chief justice; train-bearer; clerk of the Nisi Prius in London and Middlesex; clerks of the Nisi Prius to the different counties appointed by the custos brevium; crier at Nisi Prius in London and Middlesex; receiver-general of the seal office; criers; ushers; tipstaffs.

In this court there were formerly two ways of proceeding, viz by original writ or by bill. Now by the Uniformity of Process Act (2 W. 4. c. 34.) personal actions can no longer be commenced in this or any of the superior courts of Westminster, by original writ, but must be brought upon the writs given by that act. See title Process.

KINGELD (rather King-geld.) Escuage or royal aid. As in a charter of King Henry II. to the abbot and monks of Mireval. Mon. Ang. i. 380.

KING'S BENCH PRISON for providing relief for the poor prisoners confined in the King's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons. See 53 G. 3. c. 123. For the limits of the rules of the prison, see Reg. Gen. 3 T. R. 584; 7 T. R. 82; and 6 East, 2.

KING'S HOUSEHOLD or Civil List. See title King V.

KING'S PALACE. The limits of the king's palace at Westminster extend from Charing Cross to Westminster Hall, and shall have such privileges as the ancient palaces. Stat. 28 H. 8. c. 12. The stat. 33 H. 8. c. 12. whereby any person striking another in the king's palace, should have his right hand cut off, be imprisoned during life, and also be fined, was repealed by the 9 G. 4. c. 31. § 1. See tit. Striking.

KING'S PREROGATIVE. See title King, V., &c.

KING'S SILVER, the money which was paid to the king, in the Court of Common Pleas, for a licence granted to a man to levy a fine of lands, tenements, or hereditaments to another person; and this must have been compounded according to the value of the land, in the alienation office, before the fine would pass. 2 Inst. 511; 6 Rep. 30, 13. See title Fine of Lands.

KING'S STORES. See tit. Public Stores.

KING'S SWAN-HERD. See Swan-herd.

KINTAL. See Quintal.

KINTLIDGE, a term used among merchants and seafaring persons for a ship's ballast. Merch. Dict.

KIPE, [from Sax. Cypa.] A basket or engine made of osiers, broad at one end, and narrower by degree, used in Oxfordshire and other parts of England, for the taking of fish; and fishing with those engines is called kiping. This manner of fishing with baskets of the same kind and shape, is practised by the barbarous inhabitants of Ceylon, in the East Indies, as appears in the relation and figure of it given by Mr. Knox, in his Travels, p. 28.

KIPPER-TIME. No salmon shall be taken between Gravesend and Henley-upon-Thames in kipper-time, viz. between the Invention of the Cross (May 3) and the Epiphany. Rot. Parl. 50 Edw. 3; Cowell. See title Fish.

KIRBY'S QUEST. An ancient record remaining with the remembrancer of the Exchequer; so called from its being the inquest of John de Kirby, treasurer to King Edward I.

KIRK-MOTE. See Chirchgremot.

KNAVE. An old Saxon word, which had at first a sense of simplicity and innocence, for it signified a boy; Sax. cnapa; whence a knave-child, i. e. a boy, as distinguished from a girl in several old writers: "a knave-child between them two they gate." Gower's Poems, p. 52, 106; and Wicliffe, in his old translation; Exod. i. 16; if it be a knave-child, i. e. a son or male child. After, it was taken for a servant boy, and at length for any servant man; also it was applied to a minister or officer that bore the weapon or shield of his superior, as schild-knape, whom the Latins call armiger, and the French escuyer. See the old statute 14 Edw. 3. c. 3. And it was sometimes, of old, made use of as a titular addition; as Johannes C. filius Willielmus C. de Derby, knave, &c. 22 H. 7. 36. In the vision of Piers Plowman, "cokes and her knaves even cokes pyes hate," cokes and their boys, or skillions. Cowell. The present use of the word to denote a false, dishonest, or deceitful fellow, has arisen by long perversion.

KNAVESHIP. A portion of grain, given to the servant at the mill where it is ground, from tenants of lands bound to grind there. Scotch Dict. See Thrillage.

KNIGHT, [Saxon, cniht; Latin, miles;] and equus auratus. From the gilt spurs he usually wore, and thence called anciently knights of the spur. The Italians term them cavallieri; the French chevaliers; the Germans, rytters; the Spaniards, cavalleros, &c.

Blackstone remarks, that it is observable that almost all nations call their knights by some appellation derived from a horse. 1 Comm. 404. Christian in his note on this place adds, that it does not appear the English word knight has any reference to a horse; for knight, or cniht, in the Saxon signified puer servus, an attendant. See Spelm. in vv. Knight, Miles. There is now only one instance where it is taken in that sense, and that is knight of a shire, who properly serves in parliament for such a county; but in all other instances it signifies one who bears arms, who, for his virtue and martial prowess, is by the king, or one having his authority, exalted above the rank of a gentleman, to a higher degree of dignity. The manner of making them, Camden, in his Britannia, thus shortly expresseth: Nostris vero temporibus, qui equestrem dignitatem suscipiunt, floris genibus lecti in humero percutitur, princeps his verbis Gallicè affatur; sus vel sois Chevalier au nom de Dieu, i. e. Surge aut sis eques in nomine Dei. This is meant of knights bachelors, which is the lowest, but most ancient degree of knighthood with us. As to the privilege belonging to a knight, see in Fern's Glory of Generosity, p. 116.

Of knights there are two sorts, one spiritual, so called by divines in regard of their spiritual warfare, the other temporal. Cassaneus de Gloria Mundi, par 9. considerat. 2. See Selden's Titles of Honour, fol. 770.

Chief justice Popham affirmed, he had seen a commission granted to a bishop, to knight all the persons in his diocese. Godb. 398.

Of the several orders, both of spiritual and temporal knights, see Mr. Ashmole's Inst. of the Knights of the Garter.

He who served the king in any civil or military office or dignity, was formerly called miles; it is often mentioned in the old charters of the Anglo-Saxons, which are subscribed by several of the nobility, viz. after bishops, dukes, and earls, per A. B. militem, where miles signifies some officer of the courts, as minister was an officer to men of quality. Thus we read in Ingulphus, De dono F. quondam Militis Kenulfi Regis, fol. 860.

Afterwards the word was restrained to him who served only upon some military expedition; or rather to him who by reason of his tenure was bound to serve in the wars; and in this sense the word miles was taken pro vassallo. Thus in the laws of William the Conqueror: Manibus ei sese dedit, cuncta sua ab eo miles à Domino recepit. And he who by his office or tenure was bound to perform any military service, was furnished by the chief lord with arms, and so adoptabatur in militem, which the French call adoubet, and we to dub such a person a knight. But before they went into the service, it was usual to go into a bath and wash themselves, and afterwards they were girt with a girdle; which custom of bathing was constantly observed, especially at the inauguration of our kings, when those knights were made, who for that reason were called knights of the bath. Cowell.

They were, says Blackstone, called milites, because they formed a part of the royal army, in virtue of their feudal tenures, (see title Tenures, III. 2;) one condition of which was, that every one who held a knight's fee immediately under the crown, (which in Edward II.'s time amounted to 20*l.* per annum, stat. de milit. 1 Edw. 2.) was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or fine for his non-compliance. The exertion of this prerogative, as an expedient to raise money in the reign of Charles I. gave great offence, though then warranted by law, and the recent example of Queen Elizabeth. It was, therefore, abolished by stat. 16 Car. 1. c. 20. Considerable fees used to accrue to the king on the performance of the ceremony. Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth appointed commissioners to compound with the persons who had lands to the amount of 40*l.* a year, and who declined the honour and expense of knighthood. See 1 Comm. 404; and also 2 Comm. 62, 69; 1 Inst. 69, b; 2 Inst. 593, and the notes on 1 Inst.

KNIGHTS BACHELORS, [from Bas Chevalier, an inferior knight. 1 Comm. 404, in n.] The most ancient, though the lowest order of knighthood amongst us; for we have an instance of King Alfred's conferring this order on his son Athelstan. Wil. Malms. lib. 2; 1 Comm. 404. See Knights of the Chamber.

KNIGHTS BANERET, [Milites Vexillarii.] Knights made only in the time of war; and though knighthood is commonly given for some personal merit, which, therefore, dies with the person, yet John Coupland, for his valiant service performed against the Scots, had the honour of baneret conferred on him and his heirs for ever, by patent; 29 Edw. 8. See title Baneret. These knights rank in general next after knights of the garter. By stats. 5 R. 2. st. 2. c. 4; 14 R. 2. c. 11, they are ranked next after barons; and their precedence before the younger sons of viscounts was confirmed by order of King James I. in the tenth year of his reign. But in order to be entitled to this rank, they must be created by the king in person in the field, under the royal banners in time of open war, else they rank after baronets. 1 Comm. 403.

KNIGHTS OF THE BATH, [Milites Balnei.] Have their name from their bathing the night before their creation. See Knight. The most honourable Military Order of the Bath was introduced by King Henry IV. in 1399, and revived by King George I. in the year 1725, who erected the same into a regular military order for ever; to consist of thirty-seven knights, besides the sovereign. See the antiquity and ceremony of their creation in Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire, 531, 532. They have each three honorary esquires; and they now wear a red ribbon across their shoulders; have a prelate of the order, (the Bishop of Rochester,) several heralds, and other officers, &c. See 1 Comm. 404.

By statute, 2d January, 1815, it was ordained, that the order should be composed of three classes, viz.:

First class, to consist of knights grand crosses, not to exceed seventy-two, exclusive of the sovereign and princes of the blood royal; one-sixth of which may be appointed for civil and diplomatic purposes. The remainder must have attained the rank of major-general, or rear-admiral in the navy, and must have been previously appointed to the second class.

Second class, not to exceed upon the first institution 180, exclusive of foreign officers holding British commissions, of whom not exceeding ten may be admitted as honorary knights commanders; in the event of actions of signal distinction, or of future wars, this class may be increased. To be entitled to the distinctive appellation of knighthood; to have the same rights and privileges as knights bachelors; but to take precedence of them.

Third class, companions of the order; they are to take precedence of esquires, but not entitled to the appellation, style, &c. of knights bachelors.

No officer can be nominated unless he shall have received a medal or other badge of honour, or shall have been especially mentioned in despatches in the London Gazette, as having distinguished himself in action.

KNIGHTS OF THE CHAMBER, [Milites Cameræ.] Seem to be such knights bachelors as are made in time of peace, because knighthood in the king's chamber, and not in the field; they are mentioned in Rot. Parl. 28 Edw. 3; 29 Edw. 3. p. 1. m. 39; 2 Inst. 466.

KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER, [Equites garterii; vel periscelidis, otherwise called Knights of the Order of St. George.] The most noble Order of the Garter was founded by King Edward III. A. D. 1344, who, after he had obtained many notable victories, for furnishing this honourable order, made choice in his own realm and all Europe of twenty-five the most excellent and renowned persons for virtue and honour, and ordained himself and his successors, kings of England, to be the sovereign thereof, and the rest to be fellows and brethren, bestowing this dignity on them, and giving them a blue garter, decked with gold, pearl, and precious stones, and a buckle of gold, to wear daily upon the left leg only; a kirtle, crown, cloak, chaperon, a collar, and other magnificent apparel, both of stuff and fashion, exquisite and heroic, to wear at high feasts, as to so high and princely an order was meet. Smith's Repub. Angl. lib. 1. c. 20. And, according to Camden and others, this order was instituted upon King Edward III. having great success in a battle, wherein the king's garter was used for a token. See Selden's Tit. of Hon. 2, 5, 41.

But Polydore Virgil gives it another original, and says, that the king in the height of his glory, the kings of France and Scotland being both prisoners in the tower of London at one time, first erected this order, A.D. 1350, (see infra.) from the Countess of Salisbury's dropping her garter, in a dance before his majesty, which the king taking up, and seeing some of his nobles smile, he said, Honi soit qui mal y pense, interpreted, "Evil (or shame) be to him that evil thinketh;" which has ever since been the motto of the garter; declaring such veneration should be done to that silken tie, that the best of them should be proud of enjoying their honours that way.

Camden in his Britannia saith, that this order of knights received great ornament from King Edward IV. And King Charles I. as an addition to their splendour, ordered all the knights companions to wear on their upper garment, the cross encircled with the garter and motto. The honourable society of this order is a college or corporation, having a great seal, &c.

The site of the college is the royal castle of Windsor, with the chapel of St. George, and the chapter-house in the castle, for their solemnity on St. George's day, and at their feasts and installations.

At a chapter held 3d June, 1788, the number of knights was fixed at twenty-five, exclusive of the sovereign and the sons of his majesty and his successors, who had been or should be elected.

Besides the above number, and one extra knight, (Earl Grey,) most of the sovereigns of Europe belong to this order, which holds the highest rank among the British orders of knighthood, and is second to none in the world in dignity.

Attached to the order are a dean and canons, &c. and twenty-six poor knights, that have no other subsistence but the allowance of this house, which is given them in respect of their daily prayer to the honour of God and St. George, and these are vulgarly called Poor Knights of Windsor.

There are also certain officers belonging to the order, as prelate of the garter, which office is inherent to the Bishop of Winchester for the time being, the chancellor of the garter, the Bishop of Sarum, registrar, chivalry Dean of Windsor, the principal knight at arms, knight porter to mail, and four pursuivants, the usher of the garter, being likewise usher of the black rod.

A knight of the garter wears daily abroad, a blue garter, decked with gold, pearl, and precious stones, on the left leg; and in all places of assembly, upon his coat on the left side of his breast, a star of silver embroidery; and the picture of St. George enamelled upon gold, and beset with diamonds, at the end of a blue ribbon that crosses the body from the left shoulder; and when dressed in his robes, a mantle, &c. &c. &c.

KNIGHTS OF THE ORDER OF ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM, [Milites Sancti Johannis Hierosolymitani.] Were an order of knighthood, that began about A.D. 1120, Honorius being pope. They had their denomination from John the charitable patriarch of Alexandria, though vowed to St. John the Baptist, their patron; Fern's Glory of Generosity, p. 127. They had their primary abode in Jerusalem, and then in the Isle of Rhodes, until they were expelled thence by the Turks, A.D. 1523. Their chief seat subsequently was in the Isle of Malta, where they performed great exploits against the Infidels, especially in the year 1595. They continued to hold the latter island until 1798, when they surrendered it to Buonaparte, then on his way to Egypt, from whom it was afterwards taken by this country. They lived after the order of Friars, under the rule of St. Augustine, of whom mention is made in the stats. 25 H. 8. c. 2; 26 H. 8. c. 2. They had in England one general prior that had the government of the whole order within England and Scotland; Reg. Orig. fol. 20; and was the first prior in England, and sat in the House of Lords. But towards the end of Henry VIII.'s days they in England and Ireland, being found to adhere to the pope too much against the king, were suppressed, and their lands and goods given to the king, by stat. 32 H. 8. c. 24. For the occasion and propagation of this order more especially described, see the treatise entitled The Book of Honour and Arms, lib. 5. c. 18. See also titles Hospitallers, Templars, and the succeeding articles.

KNIGHTS OF MALTA. These knights took their name and original from the time of their expulsion from Rhodes, A.D. 1523. The island of Malta was then given them by the Emperor Charles V. whence they were therefore called Knights of Malta. See the preceding article.

KNIGHT MARSHALL, [Marescallus Hospitii Regis.] An officer of the king's house, having jurisdiction and cognizance of transgressions within the king's house, and verge of it; as also of contracts made within the same house, whereto one of the house is a party. Reg. of Writs, fol. 185 a, and 191 b, and Spelm. Gloss. in voce Marescallus. See Constable, Marshal.

KNIGHTS OF RHODES. The knights of St. John of Jerusalem, after they removed to Rhode island. See stat. 32 H. 8. c. 24. and ante, title Knights of the Order of St. John.

KNIGHTS OF THE SHIRE, [Milites Comitatus.] Otherwise called knights of parliament; two knights or gentlemen of worth, chosen on the king's writ, in pleno comitatu, by the freeholders of every county that can dispense 40s. a year; and these, when every man that had a knight's fee was customarily constrained to be a knight, were obliged to be militēs gladio cincti, for so runs the writ at this day; but now notabiles armigeri may be chosen. Their expenses were formerly borne by the county, during their sitting in parliament, under stat. 35 H. 8. c. 11. They are to have 600*l.* per annum freehold estate, &c. See stat. 9 Ann. c. 5. By the Reform Act (2 W. 4. c. 45.) many counties have been divided into two districts for the return of knights of the shire, others have had an additional member given to them, and the constituencies of all have been greatly increased, and are no longer confined to freeholders, but are extended to copyholders and leaseholders. See further title Parliament.

KNIGHTS TEMPLARS. See Templars, Hospitallers, and ante, Knights of St. John, &c.

KNIGHTS OF THE THISTLE. The most ancient Order of the Thistle was instituted by King Aethelwulf, revived by King James II. in 1679, and was re-established by Queen Anne, 31st December, 1703. It is limited to the sovereign and eleven knights, but there is at present five extra knights. Its officers are a dean, Lord Lyon, king of arms, secretary, and gentleman usher of the green rod. The knights wear a green ribbon over their shoulders, and were otherwise honourably distinguished.

KNIGHTS OF ST. PATRICK. The most illustrious Order of St. Patrick was instituted by King George III. February, 1763. It consists of the sovereign, a grand master, (who is the lord lieutenant of Ireland for the time being,) and fourteen knights; besides which, there are at present six extra knights.

The officers of this order are a prelate, (the Archbishop of Armagh,) a chancellor, (the Archbishop of Dublin,) a registrar, (the Dean of St. Patrick,) with a secretary, genealogist, usher of the black rod, and Ulster king of arms attending the order.

These two last orders obtain no rank in England. See title Precedency.

KNIGHTS OF ST. MICHAEL AND ST. GEORGE. This order was instituted 27th April, 1818, for the United States of the Ionian Islands, and for the ancient sovereignty of Malta and its dependencies, under the name and title of the most distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George. It consists of the sovereign, a grand master, (the Duke of Cambridge,) eight knights grand crosses, twelve knights commanders, and twenty-four knights, exclusive of British subjects, holding high and confidential employment in the service of the said United States, and in the government of Malta and its dependencies. The officers are a prelate for the Ionian islands, a prelate for Malta, a king at arms, registrar, and secretary.

KNIGHTEN-GYLD. Was a gyld in London, consisting of nineteen knights, which King Edgar founded, giving them a portion of void ground lying without the walls of the city, now called Portsoken Ward. Stow's Annals, p. 151. This in Mon. Angl. par. 2, fol. 82, a, is written enmitene-geld.

KNIGHTS COURT. A court baron, or honour court, held twice a year under the Bishop of Hereford, at his palace there; wherein those who are lords of manors, and their tenants, holding by knights service of the honour of that bishopric, are suitors; which court is mentioned in Butterfield's Surv. fol. 244. If the suitor appear not at it, he pays 2s. suit-silver for respite of homage. Cowell.

KNIGHTHOOD. See Knight.

KNIGHT SERVICE. See title Tenure, III, 2.

KNIGHTS FEE, [Feodum militare.] Is so much inheritance, as is sufficient yearly to maintain a knight with convenient revenue; which in Henry III.'s days was 15*l*. Camd. Brit. p. 111. In the time of Edward II. 20*l*. See ante, title Knight. Sir Thomas Smith (in his Repub. Ang. lib. 1. c. 18.) rates it at 40*l*. Stow, in his Annals, p. 285, says, there were found in England, at the time of the Conqueror, 60,211 knights fees, according to others 80,215; whereof the religious houses before their suppression were possessed of 28,015—Octo carucata terra' faciunt fiod in unius militis. Mon. Ang. p. 2, fol. 285 a. Of this see more in Selden's Titles of Honour, fol. 691; and Bracton, lib. 5, tract. 1, c. 2; also 1 Inst. 69 a. A knight's fee contained twelve plow-lands, 2 Inst. fol. 596; or 480 acres. Thus Virgata terræ continet 24 acres, 4 virgatae terræ make a hide, and five hides make a knight's fee, whose relief is five pounds. Cowell. Selden insists that a knight's fee was estimable neither by the value nor the quantity of the land, but by the services or numbers of the knights reserved. Tit. Hon. part 2, c. 5, § 26.

KNOPA. A knob, nob, bosse, or knot.

KNOW-MEN. The Lollards in England, called Here-tics, for opposing the church of Rome before the Reformation, went commonly under the name of Knowmen, and just-fast-men; which titles were first given them in the diocese of Lincoln, by Bishop Smith, anno 1500.

KYDDIERS. Mentioned in stat. 13 Eliz. c. 35. See Kidder.

KYLYW. Signifies some liquid thing, and in the north it is used for a kind of liquid victuals. It is mentioned as an exaction of foresters, &c. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 722.

KYSTE, [Sax.] A coffin or chest for burial of the dead. Ex. Reg. Episc. Lincoln. MS.

KYTH. Kin or kindred. Cognatus.

LAB

L AAS, [jacques, à laz, i. e. Frons.] A net, gin, or snare, Lit. Dict.

LABEL, [appendix lemniscus.] Is a narrow slip of paper or parchment, affixed to a deed, writing, or writ, hanging at or out of the same; and an appending seal is called a label. See Deed.

LABINA. Watery land: in qua facile labitur. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 372.

LABORARIIS. Is an ancient writ against persons refusing to serve and do labour, and who have no means of living; or against such as, having served in the winter, refuse to serve in the summer. Reg. Orig. 189.

LABOUR. Is the foundation of property. Bodily labour, bestowed upon any subject which before lay in common to all men, is universally allowed to give the fairest and most reasonable title to an exclusive property therein. 2 Comm. 5.

LABOURERS. Justices of peace and stewards of leets, &c. have power to hear and determine complaints relating to non-payment of labourers' wages. 4 Edw. 4. c. 1. Labourers taking work by the great, and leaving the same unfinished, unless for non-payment of wages, or where they are employed in the King's service, &c. are to suffer one month's imprisonment, and forfeit 5l. The wages of labourers are to be yearly assessed for every county by the sheriff, and justices of leets, in the Easter sessions, and in corporation by the head officers, under penalties. 5 Eliz. c. 4. And the sheriff is to cause the rates and assessments of wages to be proclaimed. 1 Jac. 1. c. 6.

All persons fit for labour, shall be compelled to serve by the day in the time of hay or corn harvest; and labourers in the harvest time may go to other counties, having testimonials. From the middle of March to the middle of September, labourers are to work from five o'clock in the morning till seven or eight at night, being allowed two hours for breakfast and dinner, and half an hour for sleeping the three hot months; and all the rest of the year from twilight to twilight, except an hour and an half for breakfast and dinner, on pain of forfeiting 1d. for every hour absent. See 5 Eliz. c. 4.

So much of this stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. and 1 Jac. 1. c. 6. as authorized magistrates to fix the price of wages, was repealed by 58 Geo. 3. c. 40; as was also a clause in the former, relating to assaults by servants on their masters, by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31.

Justices of peace may hear and determine disputes concerning the wages of servants and labourers, not exceeding 10l. 20 Geo. 2. c. 19.—Extended to the tanners in the stanaries, by 27 Geo. 2. c. 6.—Justices may punish servants on complaint of the masters, 20 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 2.—The 20 Geo. 2. c. 19. shall extend to all servants employed in husbandry, though hired for less than a year, 31 Geo. 2. c. 11. § 3.

The 20 Geo. 2. c. 19. extends to labourers of all descriptions, and not merely those in the particular trades or business there enumerated, and therefore includes wages earned by a labourer who contracted to dig and stean a well, to be paid for by the foot, and who employed another to assist him in the work, who is paid by the labourer originally contracted with. 8 East, 118.

The powers of 20 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 4. enabling magistrates to hear complaints of masters against their apprentices, and adjust the same, extends to a complaint in writing preferred by the master and certified by the oath of another person. 12 East, 248.—If under this stat. a magistrate sentence an offender for misconduct to be committed, he must also sentence him to be corrected and held to hard labour. 14 East, 605.

By 6 Geo. 3. c. 25. artificers, labourers, and other persons, absenting themselves from the service of their employers, before the expiration of the term contracted for, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one month, nor more than three. The court granted a mandamus to the justices of Kent, to hear an application of the journeymen millers, under 10 Geo. 1. c. 1. § 2. praying the justices to make a rate of wages. 14 East, 395.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 129. the statutes relating to combinations by workmen were repealed. It contains, however, a variety of provisions to protect persons from being compelled to leave their employment by violence or intimidation. See further Apprentices, Combinations, Manufacturers, Servants.

LACE. Mills used solely for the manufacture of lace, are not within the factory act (3 & 4 W. 4. c. 103.) As to gold and silver lace, see Gold; and further Frames, Manufacturers.

LACERTA. A fathom. Domesday.

LACHES, [from the Fr. lascher, i. e. laxare; or lasche, ignavus.] Slackness or negligence; as it appears in Littleton, where laches of entry means a neglect in the heir to enter. And probably it may be an old English word; for when we say there is laches of entry, it is all one as if it were said, there is a lack of entry; and in this signification it is used. Lit. 136. See Infant, Heir, &c.

LACTA. A defect in the weight of money: whence is derived the word Lach. Du Fresne.

LADA. Hath divers significations; 1st, from the Saxon lathian, to convene or assemble, it is taken for a lath, or inferior court of justice. See Luthe, Truthing-reve. 2dly, It is used for purgation by trial, from ladain; and hence the lada simplex, and lada triplex or lada plena, among the Saxons, mentioned in the laws of King Ethelred and King Henry I. 3dly, Lada is applied to a lade or course of water; Camden uses water-lade or water-course: and Spelman says that lada is a canal to carry water from a wet ground; sometimes lada signifies a broad way. Spelm. Gloss. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 854.

LADE. Lode, i. e. The mouth of a river; from Sax. ludian, purgare, because the water is there clearer; from hence Crucklade, Lechlade, &c.

LADIES. For the order of trial of duchesses, countesses, and baronesses, for treason, when indicted thereof, see the ancient stat. 2 Hen. 4. c. 14. and tit. Peers, Treason.

LÆDORIUM. Reproach. Girald. Camb. c. 14.

LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS, CRIMEN. The crime of high treason. So denominated by Glanvil, l. 1. c. 2. See Treason.

LÆSIONE FIDEI. Suits pro. The clergy, so early as the reign of King Stephen, attempted to turn their ecclesiastical courts into courts of equity, by entertaining suits pro læsione fidei, as a spiritual offence against conscience, in case of non-payment of debts, or any breach of civil contracts. But they were checked by the constitutions of Clarendon, 10 Hen. 2. c. 15. See Courts Ecclesiastical.

LÆTARE JERUSALEM. See Quadragesimalia.

LAFORDSWICK, [Sax. hlaford, i. e. dominus, and swic, proditiō, infidelitas erga dominum.] A betraying one's lord or master. This word is found in King Canute's laws, c. 61. And in the laws of King Hen. 1. Leg. 1. c. 13.

LAGA, (lex). The law, Magna Charta. Hence we deduce Saxon-lage, Mercen-lage, Dane-lage, &c.

LAGAN. Goods sunk in the sea, [from Saxon liggan cubare.] When mariners in danger of shipwreck cast goods out of the ship, and because they know they are heavy and sink, fasten a buoy or cork to them, that they may find and have them again, if the ship be lost, these goods are called lagan; and so long as they continue upon the sea, belong to the lord admiral; but if they are cast away upon the land, they are then a wreck, and belong to the lord entitled to the same. 5 Co. Rep. 108. Lagan is used in old authorities to denote that right which the chief lord of the fee had to take goods cast on shore by the violence of the sea, &c. Bract. lib. 3. cap. 2. See Flotsam, Wreck.

LAGEDAYUM, Laghdlay. A law-day, or time of open court. Conell, edit. 1727.

LAGEMAN. [Legamannus; Legamannus, Spelm. Homo habens legem; homo legalis seu legitimus; such as we call now good men of the jury.] The word is frequently used in Domesday, and the laws of Edward the Confessor, c. 38. Sir Edw. Coke says, a Lageman was he who had socum et sacam super homines suos, i. e. a jurisdiction over their persons and estates; of which opinion were Somner and Lambard, and that it signifies the Thanes, called afterwards Barons, who sat as judges to determine rights in courts of justice. In senatus consult' de Monticulis Wallie, c. 3. it is said, let twelve laghmen, which Lambard renders men of law, viz. six English and six Welsh, do right and justice, &c. Blount.

LAGEN, [lagena, Fleta, lib. 2. c. 8, 9.] In ancient times it was a measure of six sextarii. Hence perhaps our flagon. The lieutenant of the Tower has the privilege to take unam lagenam vini, a de canonicis et ceteris, of all wine saps that come up to the Thames. Sir Peter Leycester, in his Antiquities of Cheshire, interprets lagena vini, a bottle of wine.

LAGHDAY, or Lahday. See Lagedayum, Law-day; Lagham, see Lageman.

LAGHSLITE, LAGSLITE, LASHLITE. [Sax. lag, lex, et slite, raptio.] A breaking or transgressing of the law; and sometimes the punishment inflicted for so doing. Leg. H. 1. c. 13.—Spelman, and tit. Overherness.

LAGON. See Lagan.

LAIA. A broad way in a wood; the same with lada, which see, Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 483.

LAIRWHITE, LECHERWHITE, LEGERGELDUM. [From Sax. legan, concumbere, and wite, multa.] Pœna vel multa offendentium in adulterio et fornicatione; and the privilege of punishing adultery and fornication did anciently belong to the lords of some manors, in reference to their tenants. Fleta, lib. 1. c. 47; 4 Inst. 206.

LAMMAS-DAY. The first of August, so called quasi lamb-mass; on which day the tenants that held land of the cathedral church of York (which is dedicated to St. Peter ad Vincula) were bound by their tenure to bring a live lamb into the church at high mass. It is otherwise said to come from the Sax. hlaffmœsse, viz. loaf-mass, as on that day the English made an offering of bread made with new wheat.

LAMPRAYS. See Fish.

LAMPS. None but British oil to be used for lamps in private houses, under penalty of 40s. 8 Ann. c. 9. § 18. See Candles. By 11 Geo. 3. c. 29. for paying and lighting London, the wilfully breaking or extinguishing any lamp incurs the penalty of 20s. for each lamp or light destroyed or extinguished. See London.

LANCASTER. Was erected into a county palatine, anno 50 Edm. III. and granted by the king to his son John for life, that he should have jura regalia, and a king-like power to pardon treasons, outlawries, &c. and make justices of peace and justices of assize within the said county, and all processes and indictments to be in his name. See Counties Palatine.

There is a seal for the county palatine and another for the duchy, i. e. such lands as lie out of the county palatine, and yet are part of the duchy: for such there are, and the dukes of Lancaster hold them, but not as counties palatine, for they had not jura regalia over those lands. 2 Lutm. 1236; 3 Salk. 110, 111. See Chancellor of the Duchy. The stat. 37 Hen. 8. c. 16. annexed lands to the duchy of Lancaster, for the enlargement of it. Process against an outlawed person in the county palatine of Lancaster, is to be directed to the chancellor of the duchy, who shall thereupon issue like writs to sheriff, &c. 5 & 6 Edw. 6. c. 26. The 17 Car. 2. concerning causes of replevin shall be of force in the Court of Common Pleas for the county palatine of Lancaster, 19 Car. 2. c. 5. By 17 Geo. 2. c. 7. the chancellor or vice-chancellor may by commission empower persons to take affidavits in any cause, &c. depending in the Chancery or Courts of Sessions, in any plea whatsoever, civil or criminal.—A quay to be made at Lancaster, 23 Geo. 2. c. 12. See 19 Geo. 3. c. 45; 27 Geo. 3. c. 34. enabling the chancellor and council of the duchy to sell fee-farm rents. By 34 Geo. 3. c. 46. the chancellor or vice-chancellor of the duchy and county may authorize persons to take special bail in actions depending in the Court of Common Pleas of the said county. The justices of the said court to make rules as to justifying bail, &c. By 34 Geo. 3. c. 58. to prevent the removal of suits from the inferior courts of the county into the said Court of Common Pleas, security is to be given by the defendants removing such suits for payment of the sum demanded, if recovered in the Court of Common Pleas.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 62. the practice of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster has been greatly improved, and the process for the commencement and prosecution of personal actions assimilated to that recently adopted in the superior courts.

By § 16. power is given to the parties in any action to state a special case without proceeding to trial.

§ 17. The judges of the said court may make rules for altering and regulating the mode of pleading and transcribing records, and touching the admission of documents in evidence.

§ 18. Writs of Inquiry under the 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 11. are to be executed before the sheriff, unless otherwise ordered.

§ 19. Every other writ of inquiry shall be made returnable on any day certain, to be named in the writ.

§ 20. In any action in which the sum sought to be recovered shall not exceed 20*l.*, the said court may direct the issue joined to be tried before the sheriff, or any judge of any court of record, for the recovery of debt in the county.

§ 23. The defendant in all personal actions, except for assault and battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious arrest or prosecution, criminal conversation, or debauching of plaintiff's daughter or servant, may pay money into court.

§ 24. The king, in right of his duchy and county palatine of Lancaster, may appoint all or any of the judges of the courts at Westminster, judges of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster.

§ 25. empowers the judges of the courts at Westminster to regulate the fees to be taken in the C. P. at Lancaster.

By § 26 rules for new trials may be moved for before any of the courts at Westminster; but by § 27. judgment and execution are not to be stayed, unless the party moving enters into recognizances with sureties. And by § 28. nothing therein contained shall prevent the Court of C. P. at Lancaster from granting any new trial, &c.

§ 29. Service of subpoenas on witnesses in any part of England and Wales shall be valid, to compel their appearance; but, § 30. they shall not be proceeded against for making default, unless their expenses were tendered at the time of serving the subpoenas.

§ 31. Where final judgment shall be obtained in the C. P. at Lancaster, and the person or effects cannot be found within the jurisdiction, any of the courts at Westminster may issue execution, &c.

And by § 32. if the rules of the Court of C. P. at Lancaster cannot be enforced, they may be made rules of one of the courts at Westminster.

§ 34. Rules made for the courts of Westminster may be adopted by the judges of the C. P. at Lancaster.

§ 35. The same costs for preparing pleadings in the C. P. at Lancaster are to be allowed as in the courts at Westminster.

The king has the same privileges and immunities in respect of property held by him as duke of Lancaster as in respect of crown property. An immediate grant under the duchy seal, of property then under lease, the lease not being recited in the grant, was held void. Held also, that, as it appeared that the property had been in the crown temp. Car. I., a user from that time could not establish a prescription. Atcock v. Cooke, 5 Bingham, 340.

See further, Counties Palatine, Durham.

LANCETI. Agricolæ quidam, sed ignotæ originis. A sort of servile tenants under the ancient feudal system. See Spelm. in v. Larcels.

LAND[terra.] Signifies generally not only arable ground, meadow, pasture, woods, moors, waters, &c. but also messuages and houses; for in conveying the land, the buildings pass with it. Co. Lit. 4, 19. In a more restrained sense it is arable ground; and the land of every man is said in the law to be inclosed from that of others, though it lie in the open field; so that for any trespass therein he shall have the writ quare clausum fregit, &c. Doch. & Stud. 8. In a grant land may extend to meadow, or pasture, &c. But in writs and pleadings it signifies arable only. 1 Vent. 260.

Coke on Lit. lib. 1. cap. 2. sect. 14. says, Terra est nomen generalissimum & comprehendit omnes species terræ, but properly terra dicitur à terrendo, quia vomere teritur; and anciently it was written with a single r, and in that sense includes whatever may be ploughed. The earth hath in law a great extent upwards, for cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum. Co. 9 Rep. Alured's case. See 2 Comm. cc. 1, 2: and Herediments.

LANDA. A lawn or open field without wood. Cowell.

LANDBOC [from the Saxon Land and Boc, Liber.] Was a charter or deed whereby land was held. Spelm. Gloss.

LANDCHEAP [Saxon, Land-Ceap, from Ceapan, to buy and sell.] An ancient customary fine, paid at every alienation of land lying within some manor, or liberty of a borough. At Malden in Essex, there is to this day a custom called by the same name, that for certain houses and lands sold within that place, thirteen pence in every mark of the purchase-money shall be paid to the town; and this custom of landcheap they claim (inter alia) by a grant from the Bishop of London, made anno 5 Hen. 4.

LANDEA. A ditch in marshy lands to carry water into the sea. Du-Cange.

LANDEFRICUS [Lanfricus.] The lord of the soil, or the landlord: from Saxon land, and riga rector. Leg. Ethelred, c. 6.

LANDEGANDMAN. One of the inferior tenants of a manor. See Spelman.

VOL. II.

LAND-GABLE. A tax or rent issuing out of land, according to Domesday. Spelman says a penny for every house; the Welsh used pridgavel or landgavel.

This Landgavel or Landgabel, in the register of Domesday, was a quit-rent for the site of a house, or the land whereon it stood, the same with what we now call ground-rent. Domesday; in Lincoln.

LANDIMERS, Agrimensores. Measurers of land, so called of old; from the Sax. Gemæra, i. e. Terminus; and hence we say Meers.

LANDIRECTA. In the Saxon times the duties which were laid upon all that held land were termed Trinoda necessitas, viz. expedition, burghote and brigbote: which duties the Saxons did not call servitia, because they were not feudal, arising from the condition of the owners, but landirecta, rights that charged the very land, whoever did possess it. Spelm. of Feuds. See Trinoda Necessitas.

LANDLORD. He of whom lands or tenements are holden; and a landlord may distrain on the lands of common right, for rent services, &c. Co. Lit. 57, 205. In London, if a tenant commit felony, &c. whereby his goods and chattels become forfeit; the landlord shall be paid his rent for two years, before all other debts, except to the King, out of the goods found in the house. Priv. Lond. 75. See London.

LANDLORD and TENANT. For the law relating to, see Distress, Ejectment, Lease, Rent, Replevin, &c.

LAND-MAN, Terricola. The terre-tenant.

LAND-TAX. A tax imposed in Great Britain on lands and tenements (and on personal property,) by acts formerly passed annually for that purpose.

The assessment or valuation of estates hereafter mentioned, made in the year 1692, though by no means a perfect one, had this effect, that a supply of half a million sterling was equal to 1s. in the pound of the value of the estates given in. And according to this valuation, from the year 1693 to 1708, the land-tax continued an annual charge upon the subject, above half the time at 4s. in the pound; sometimes at 3s.; sometimes at 2s.; twice at 1s. (A. D. 1732 and 3;) but without any total intermission.

By statute 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. this tax, as imposed by the last annual act, 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. on lands and tenements in Great Britain, is made perpetual; being fixed under that act at 4s. in the pound.—A duty of 4s. in the pound on pensions, offices, and personal estates, in England and Wales, has since that time been annually granted.

By the act 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. the land-tax, so by that act made perpetual, is also made subject to redemption or purchase, either by the owner of the land liable to the tax, or on failure of redemption by him within certain periods, then by any other person inclined to purchase: the sums paid for such redemption or purchase are made applicable to the decrease of the national debt: the purchase-money being in all cases so regulated by the price of the funds as to produce an interest one eleventh part more than the amount of the land-tax redeemed or purchased.—Two modes of sale are allowed, the one by which the land is actually exonerated from the tax, and the other by which the tax remains chargeable on the land, but becomes payable to the person purchasing: the first of these is therefore properly redemption: the latter purchase.

The act 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. was amended by several subsequent acts; and by 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. (and acts still subsequent, viz. 45 Geo. 3. c. 77; 46 Geo. 3. c. 133; 49 Geo. 3. c. 67; 50 Geo. 3. c. 58; 51 Geo. 3. c. 99; 52 Geo. 3. c. 80; 54 Geo. 3. c. 173; 57 Geo. 3. c. 100,) more effectual provisions are made for carrying the measure into effect. By all these several acts powers are given to corporations, tenants in tail, &c. to sell part of their estate for the purpose of exonerating the remainder from the land tax.—By 46 Geo. 3. c. 133, small livings and the lands of charitable institutions may be exonerated gratis.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 75; 9 Geo. 4. c. 38; 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 127; 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 95; and 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 60., various additional commissioners have been appointed, and a number of new regulations made, for carrying the acts relating to the land-tax into execution.

By the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 11., continuing the duties on offices and pensions, those on personal estates having been taken off by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 121., the sums paid into the Exchequer in contracts for the redemption of the land-tax, under the directions of the 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. are hereafter to be placed to the account of the consolidated fund.

The ancient method of taxation was by escuage, which was on land held by knight service; and by tallage on the cities and boroughs; and it was made in this manner: when the king wanted money for his wars, those tenants that did not attend him in person paid him an aid, and the aid was assessed before the justices itinerant. It was generally a gift of all the inhabitants as a body corporate; if they did not give according to the wants of the crown, the justiciar inquired into their behaviour, and if there were any forfeitures of their charters, quo warrantos came out, to seize their liberties into the king's hands. But Edward I. found this way of taxing by escuage and tallage to be very incomplete, because wars were drawn out into great length and expense; and therefore he formed into distinct bodies the tenants in capite that held great baronies, and these were called the barones majores, (the now Peers of Parliament,) and the representatives of the barones minores and of several corporations, viz. the citizens and burgesses, of whom he made one body; which now composes the House of Commons. Gilb. Treat. of the Excheq. 192.

King Edward I. confirmed to the people Magna Charta, which they had long contended for, and also the charter of the forests; and for Magna Charta they granted the king a fifteenth, by the name of quindecimam partem omnium bonorum; so that instead of particular assessments in cities and boroughs, there was one universal assessment of the fifteenth of all their substance: this fifteenth seems to have been at first made out of the ecclesiastical tenth; for the popes claimed the tenths of all benefices; it was therefore easy to know, by the pope's collections of his tenths, what was the value of every ecclesiastical benefice, for the pope's tenth was reckoned at 2s. per pound, and therefore the fifteenth must be 1s. 4d. The benefice consisted of the glebe and the tenth part of the township; therefore by the value of the benefice, deducting the glebe, they knew the true value of the township, and how to set a fifteenth upon it: so that the fifteenth of the townships were certain sums, set by the king's taxors and collectors under the act of parliament; and commissions were granted to the taxors and collectors of them under the great seal; but in collecting of the fifteenths the sums only appeared in the books below. And the collectors of every township either returned their collection into the Exchequer, or else there were head collectors for the whole county, who returned it thither; there were likewise commissioners appointed, to supervise such taxation and collections. But about the time of Edward III. there were certain established sums set upon every township; and so as the king's wants increased, they gave one, two, or three fifteenths. See Gilb. 193, 194.

We find in the times of Henry VIII., Queen Elizabeth, and King James I., that they raised both subsidies and fifteenths; this was, because the value of things increased, and therefore the old fifteenths were not according to the then true value of townships. And therefore they contrived that the subsidy should be raised by a pound-rate upon lands, and likewise a pound-rate upon goods; and we find in the subsidy 4 Charles I. (which is said to be the greatest subsidy that ever was given, and which passed upon the petition of right,) there was 4s. in the pound laid upon land, and 2s. 8d. upon goods. Now 4s. upon land amounts to three fifteenths, and 2s. 8d. which was upon goods, to two fifteenths; but in this they had no regard to the old rates made in the tax-book of the several townships, otherwise than to discover the value of the lands; but a method is chalked out by the act of parliament to appoint commissioners, assessors, and collectors, in order to rate and get in the said subsidy. Ibid.

This was found very inconvenient, because the commissioners used to be favourable to their own county, therefore it was found necessary to revive so far the ancient method as to appoint a certain sum; and in the time of the civil war the Long Parliament would not settle any persons to appoint commissioners, but the appointment of commissioners was made in the act itself: and in this new manner of taxing, they appointed the sum to be levied on each particular county, in the act itself, as well as the commissioners' names, and where to levy it; and the six associated counties, viz. London, Middlesex, Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Hertford, being not spoiled and pillaged in the civil wars, and more hearty to the parliament interest, were taxed higher than any other counties in England. Gilb. 194, 195, 196.

After the Revolution, to support King William in his wars with France, it was necessary to come into a land-tax; and from 1684 to 1693 the tax was made by a pound-rate, like the former subsidies; but when the people found that the war was likely to hold, about 1693, the tax was mightily lessened, every body being willing to ease his neighbour; and then they came to lay a rate upon every county, and the associating counties, being very zealous for the government in the Revolution, and having taxed themselves higher than their neighbours in 1693, it was argued that those counties were better able to bear the tax, and therefore in 1693 they laid the disproportioned sums which became the standard of the land-tax. Ibid.

LAND-TENANT. He that possesses land let, or hath it in his manual occupation. 14 Edw. 3. stat. 1. c. 3. See Tertenant.

LANGEMANNI. Lords of manors; the word is thus interpreted by Sir Edward Coke. 1 Inst. 5. They are mentioned in Domesday.

LANGIOLUM. An under garment made of wool, formerly worn by the monks, which reached down to their knees; so called because lanæa fit. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 419.

LANGUAGE of Law Records, Pleadings, &c. See Pleading, I. 3.

LANIS DE CRESCENTIA WALLIÆ TRADUCENDIS ABSQUE CUSTUMA, &c. An ancient writ that lay to the customer of a port, to permit one to pass wool without paying custom, he having paid it before in Wales. Reg. Orig. 279.

LANTERIUM. The lantern, cupola, or top of a steeple. Cowell. edit. 1727. Angl. Sacr. p. 1. pag. 775.

LANO NIGER. A sort of base coin, formerly current in this kingdom. Mém. in Scac. Mich. 22 Edw. 1.

LAPIS CALAMINARIS. Stealing, or removing with such intent, from any mine, bed, or vein, is felony by stat. 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 37. and punishable as simple larceny.

LAPIS MARMORIUS. A marble stone about twelve feet long and three feet broad, placed at the upper end of Westminster-hall, where was likewise a marble chair erected on the middle thereof, in which our kings anciently sat at their coronation dinner, and at other times the Lord Chancellor. Over this marble table are now erected the Courts of Chancery and King's Bench. Orig. Juridical.

LAPIS PACIS. The same with Osculum pacis. Du Fresne.
LAPSE [Lapsus.] A slip or omission of a patron to present to a church, within six months after it becomes void. See Admonson, II.

LAPSED LEGACY. See Legacy.

LARCINNY [l. Larrecin; Lat. Latrocinium] A theft of felony of another's goods.

Blackstone, with more immediate reference to its derivation, Latrocinium, always spells the name thus, LARCINNY; and distinguishes the offence into two sorts, simple Larcinny, or plain theft unaccompanied with any other atrocious circumstance, and mixed or compound larceny; which also includes in it the aggravation of a taking from the house, or person. 4 Comm. c. 17. As to that species of the latter which consists in an open and violent taking from the person, see Robbery.

Formerly this offence was designated, either grand or petit larceny, according to the value of the thing stolen: the former being the technical description if the value exceeded twelve pence; the latter, if not amounting to that sum. But now, by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. §. 2. the distinction between grand and petit larceny is abolished, and every larceny, whatever be the value of the property stolen, shall be subject to the same incidents in all respects as grand larceny; and every Court whose power was before limited to the trial of petty larceny, shall have power to try every larceny, the punishment of which cannot exceed the punishment mentioned in the act for simple larceny, and also to try all accessaries to such larceny.

The offence of larceny or larciny, then (for either mode of spelling may be adopted) shall be considered according to the following arrangement:

- I. 1. Of Simple Larceny.
2. Of its Punishment.
- II. Of mixed or compound Larceny.
1. In a Dwelling House, &c.
2. From the Person.

I. 1. Simple Larceny is, "the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another."

First, it must be a taking. This implies the consent of the owner to be wanting. Therefore no delivery of the goods from the owner to the offender, upon trust, can ground a larceny. As if A. lends B. a horse, and he rides away with him; or if one sends goods by a carrier, and he carries them away, these are no larcenies, 1 Hal. P. C. 504. But if the carrier opens a bale or pack of goods, or pierces a vessel of wine, and takes away part thereof, or if he carries it to the place appointed, and afterwards takes away the whole, these are larcenies; for here the animus furandi is manifest, since in the first case he had otherwise no inducement to open the goods, and in the second the trust was determined, the delivery having taken its effect. 3 Inst. 107. But bare non-delivery shall not of course be intended to arise from a felonious design; since that may happen from a variety of other accidents. Neither by the common law was it larceny in any servant to run away with the goods committed to him to keep, but only a breach of civil trust. But if he had not the possession but only the care and oversight of the goods, as the butler of plate, and the shepherd of sheep, and the like, the embezzling of them is felony and larceny at common law. 1 Hal. P. C. 506, 3 Inst. 108. So if a guest rob his inn or tavern of a piece of plate, it is larceny, for he hath not the possession delivered to him but only the use. 1 Hawk. P. C. 3, §. 6.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. §. 45. (repealing 3 & 4 Will. & Mary. c. 9. the former stat. relating to this subject,) it is declared, to be felony if a tenant or lodger steal any chattel or fixture let to be used by him in or with any house or lodging, and the indictment may be in the common form for larceny.

It was decided upon the former statute, that a wife could not be guilty with her husband, for she was under his coercion. O. B. 1783, No. 30. Nor without her husband, if it appeared the lodgings were let to him. O. B. 1761, No. 17. Nor even if it appeared that the lodgings were let jointly to both the husband and wife, for that was construed to be the act of the husband only. O. B. 1758, No. 105. But now, by the recent statute, the wife may be found guilty without her husband, although the lodgings were taken by him. Under the former act it was held that the offender must be a lodger at the time the larceny is committed, O. B.

1785, No. 74; and the property stolen must be such as may reasonably be construed the furniture of the sort of lodging taken. Leach's Hawk. P. C. 1. c. 33. §. 19, in n.

If the clerk of a banker or merchant has the care of money, or if he has access to it, for special and particular purposes, and is sent to the bag or drawer for money, for the purpose of paying a bill, or if he is sent for the purpose of bringing money generally out of the bag or drawer, and, at the time he brings that money, he clandestinely and secretly takes out other money for his own use, he is as much guilty of a felony as if he had no permission or access to it whatever. So if a servant be sent to a library for one particular book, and he takes another, or being sent for a hat and sword, and he steals a cane; in all these cases it has been said the offenders are guilty of felony, for though the property is delivered, the possession of it remains in the true owners. O. B. 1784, p. 1295, 1304. So also where a person being left in an apartment pawns the furniture or other property under his care, with a felonious design to steal it, it is felony. O. B. 1785, p. 717; O. B. 1786; Leach's Hawk. P. C. 1. c. 33. §. 6, in n.

Where by a delivery of goods not only the possession but the right of property passes, it is clear no subsequent conversion can be construed into larceny, whatever the intent of the party may be. Thus, where the defendant bought a horse at a fair, of the prosecutor, to whom he was known, and, having mounted the horse, said to the prosecutor, that he would return immediately and pay him, to which the prosecutor answered "very well;" the defendant rode the horse away, and never returned: this was holden to be no larceny, because the property as well as the possession was parted with. R. v. Herry, 1 Leach 47. 2 East, P. C. 679. So where the defendant bought goods and desired them to be sent to him, with a bill and receipt; and the shopman who brought them left them, upon being paid for them by two bills, which, however, afterwards turned out to be mere fabrications; the judges held that this was not larceny, because the prosecutor had parted with the property as well as the possession, upon receiving what was deemed at the time, by his servant, to be payment. R. v. Parkes, 2 Leach, 614. 2 East, P. C. 671. Where the servant of a pawnbroker, who had a general authority from his master to act in his business, delivered up a pledge to the pawnbroker upon receiving a parcel, which he supposed to contain diamonds, and under that belief parted with the pledge entirely, but the parcel contained stones of no value, this was holden to be no larceny. R. v. Jackson, R. & M. 119. So, where the defendant sent to a hatter, in the name of one of his customers, for a hat, and it was accordingly delivered to the messenger, upon the credit of the customer; the judges held, that this was not larceny, the owner having parted with his property in the hat. R. v. Adams, R. & R. 223.

Under some circumstances a man may be guilty of felony in taking his own goods; as if he steals them from a pawnbroker, or any one to whom he hath delivered and entrusted them, with intent to charge such bailee with the value; or if he robs his own messenger on the road, with intent to charge the hundred with the loss according to the statute of Winchester (now repealed.) Fost. 123, 4.

So where the owner delivers goods to a carrier, and afterwards secretly steals them from him with an intent to charge him with them, &c. because the carrier had a special property, and the possession for a time. 3 Inst. 110; Dalt. 373; Pult. 126.

In further explanation of this part of the subject the following is deserving of attention:

To make the crime of larceny there must be a felonious taking; or an intent of stealing the thing, when it comes first to the hands of the offender, at the very time of receiving. 3 Inst. 107; Dalt. 367. And if one intending to steal goods, gets possession of them by ejectment, replevin, or other process at law unduly obtained, by false oath, &c. it is a felonious taking. 3 Inst. 64; Kel. Rep. 43, 44. If a man hath possession of goods once lawfully, though he afterwards carry them away with an ill intention, it is no larceny; where a tailor embezzles cloth delivered to him to make a suit of clothes, &c. it is not felony. H. P. C. 61; 5 Rep. 31. And if I lend a person my horse to go to a certain place, and he goes there, and then rides away with him, it is not larceny; but remedy is to be had by action for the damage; though if one comes on pretence to buy a horse, and the owner gives the stranger leave to ride him, if he rides away with the horse, it is felony; for here an intention is implied. Wood's Inst. 364, 365. In the above cases, there is a lawful possession by delivery, to extenuate the offence; but persons having the possession of goods by delivery, may in some instances be guilty of felony, by taking away part thereof; as if a carrier open a pack, and take out a part of the goods; a miller, who has corn to grind, takes out a part of the same, with an intent to steal it, &c. in which cases the possession of part, distinct from the whole, was gained by wrong, and not delivered by the owner, &c. H. P. C. 62; S. P. C. 25; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33, § 5.

To constitute larceny the property must also be taken from the possession of the owner; therefore, to state a case more at large which has already been repeatedly alluded to, where A. intending to go a distant journey, hires a horse fairly and bona fide for that purpose, and evidences the truth of such intention by actually proceeding on his way, and afterwards rides off with the horse, it is no theft; because the felonious design was hatched subsequent to the delivery; and the delivery having been obtained without fraud or design, the owner parted with his possession as well as his property. O. B. 1784, p. 1294; and thereby gave to A. dominion over the horse; upon trust that he would return him when the journey was performed. O. B. 1786, p. 333, 4. But if the delivery of property be obtained with a preconcerted design to steal the thing delivered, although the owner, in this case, parts with the thing itself, he still retains in law the constructive possession of it; therefore, where a man, having feloniously obtained the delivery of a bill of exchange under the fraudulent and delusive pretence of discounting it, converted it to his own use, and it appearing upon the evidence that the owner never meant to part with possession, it was held to be felony. O. B. 1784, p. 294. So also where a horse was obtained with the same design, upon pretence of trying its paces. O. B. 1779, p. 363; O. B. 1784, p. 293. So also to obtain the delivery of money, with design feloniously to take it away, under the false pretence of having found a diamond ring of great value, has been determined by nine judges to be a taking from the possession of the owner, and consequently felony. O. B. 1785, p. 160. So also to obtain the delivery of goods under the pretence of purchasing them, and then to run away with them. Raym. 276. And in general where the delivery of the property is made for a certain, special, and particular purpose, the possession is still supposed to reside, unparted with, in the first proprietor. Therefore, where a master delivers goods to his servant to carry to a customer, but instead of so doing he converts them on his way to his own use, it is a felonious taking; for the master had a right to countermand the delivery of them, and therefore the possession remained in him at the time of the conversion. O. B. 1782, No. 375; O. B. 1783, No. 28. So also if a watchmaker steals a watch, delivered to him to clean. O. B. 1779, No. 83. Or if one steal clothes delivered for the purpose of being washed. O. B. 1758, No. 18. Or goods in a chest delivered with the key for safe custody. O. B. 1770, No. 83. Or guineas delivered for the purpose of being changed into half guineas. O. B. 1778, No. 52. Or a watch delivered for the purpose of being pawned. O. B. 1784, No. 613. In all these instances the goods taken have been thought to remain in the possession of the proprietor, and the taking of them away held to be felony. Leach's Hawk. P. C. c. 33, § 5. in n. So where a person employed to drive cattle, sells them, it is larceny, for he has the custody merely, and not the right to the possession. Moody's C. C. 368. Also where a carter went and disposed of his master's cart, it was adjudged to be felony. 2 East, P. C. 565.

If one servant delivers goods to another servant, this is a delivery by the master; yet if the master or another servant delivers a bond, or cattle to sell, and the servant goes away with the bond, and receives the money thereon due, or receives the money for the cattle sold, and goes away with the same, this was held to be no felony or larceny within the stat. 21 Hen. 8. c. 7. (which is now repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27.) Dalt. 388; H. P. C. 62; 3 Inst. 105. So if a servant receives his master's rents; for the master did not deliver the money to the servant, and it must be of things delivered to keep; and if things delivered to the servant to keep, are under 40s. value, and he goes away with them, this is only a breach of trust, by reason of the delivery; but if the goods were not delivered to him, it is felony and larceny to go away with or embezzle them, though under the value of 40s. &c. Dalt. 369. Where, however, goods, of which the master has never been in possession, are delivered to the servant for the master's use, and the servant, instead of delivering them to his master, by depositing them in his house or the like, converts them to his own use, this is no larceny at common law. 2 East, P. C. 568. Therefore, if a shopman receive money from a customer of his master, and instead of putting it into the till secrete it; 2 Leach, 841; or if a banker's clerk receive money at the counter, and instead of putting it into the proper drawer, purloins it, 2 Leach, 835; or receive a bond for the purpose of being deposited in the bank, and convert it to his own use, 1 Leach, 28; 2 East, P. C. 570; in these cases, it has been held that the clerk or shopman is not guilty of larceny.

Now, by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29, § 47. a clerk or servant receiving any chattel, money, or valuable security, for or on account of their master, and fraudulently embezzling the same, is to be deemed to have stolen such chattel, &c.; but the offence is still treated as an embezzlement, and ranked under that head.—See Embezzlement.

Secondly, There must not only be taking, but a carrying away; cepit et asportavit, was the old law Latin. A bare removal from the place in which he found the goods, though the thief does not quite make off with them, is a sufficient asportation or carrying away. As if a man be leading another's horse out of a close, and be apprehended in the fact, or if a guest, stealing goods out of an inn, has removed them from his chamber down stairs, these have been adjudged sufficient carryings away to constitute a larceny. 3 Inst. 108, 109. Or if a thief, intending to steal plate, takes it out of a chest in which it was, and lays it down upon the floor, but is surprised before he can make his escape with it, this is larceny. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33, § 18.

A man was detected in taking the contents of a bale of goods in a waggon. It appeared that the bale laid horizontally, and that he had set it on its end; but as it had not been removed from the place, this was held, upon a case reserved, not to be a sufficient carrying away. But where a man with a felonious intention had removed goods from the head to the tail of a waggon, it was held a sufficient removal to constitute a carrying away. O. B. 1784, p. 734. So a diamond ear-ring snatched from a lady's ear, but lodging in the curls of her hair, and not taken by the thief, was held to be a sufficient asportation. O. B. 1784, No. 537; Leach's Hawk. P. C. c. 33, § 18. in n. And where the prisoner drew a book from the inside pocket of the prosecutor's coat, about an inch above the top of the pocket, but whilst the book was still about the person of the prosecutor, the latter suddenly raised his hand, whereupon the prisoner let the book drop, and it fell again into the pocket: this was considered a sufficient asportation to constitute larceny. R. & M. 78.

Thirdly, This taking and carrying away must also be felonious; that is, done animo furandi. This requisite, besides excusing those who labour under incapacities of mind or will, indemnifies also mere trespassers, and other petty offenders. As if a servant takes his master's horse, without his knowledge, and brings him home again; if a neighbour takes another's plough that is left in the field, and uses it upon his own land, and then returns it; if, under colour of arrear of rent, where none is due, one distrein another's cattle or seize them; all these are misdemeanors and trespasses, but no felonies. 1 Hal. P. C. 509. The ordinary discovery of a felonious intent, is where the party doth it clandestinely; or, being charged with the fact, denies it; but this is by no means the only criterion of criminality, for in cases that may amount to larceny, the variety of circumstances is so great, and the complications thereof so mingled, that it is impossible to recount all those which may evidence a felonious intent, or animum furandi; wherefore they must be left to the due and attentive consideration of the Court and Jury.

Fourthly, This felonious taking and carrying away must be of the personal goods of another; for if they are things real, or savour of the realty, larceny at the common law cannot be committed of them. Lands, tenements, and hereditaments (either corporeal or incorporeal) cannot, in their nature, be taken and carried away. And of things likewise that adhere to the freehold, as corn, grass, trees, and the like, or lead upon a house, no larceny could be committed by the rules of the common law; but the severance of them was, and in many things is still, merely a trespass; which depended on a subtilty in the legal notions of our ancestors. These things were parcel of the real estate; and therefore, while they continued so, could not by any possibility be the subject of theft, being absolutely fixed and immovable. And if they were severed by violence so as to be changed into moveables, and at the same time by one and the same continued act, carried off by the person who severed them, they could never be said to be taken from the proprietor in this their newly acquired state of mobility (which is essential to the nature of larceny,) being never, as such, in the actual or constructive possession of any one but of him who committed the trespass. He could not, in strictness, be said to have taken what at that time were the personal goods of another, since the very act of taking was what turned them into personal goods. But if the thief sever them at one time, whereby the trespass is completed, and they are converted into personal chattels, in the constructive possession of him on whose soil they are left or laid; and come again at another time, when they are so turned into personalty, and takes them away, it is larceny; and so it is if the owner, or any one else, has severed them. 3 Inst. 109; 1 Hal. P. C. 510. See 8 Rep. 33; Dalt. 372. This question is now, however, very much put at rest by the statute law. (7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29.) See several of its provisions under tits. Fences, Fixtures, Gardens.

By § 37 of the same statute, to steal or sever with such intent any metal, lapis calaminaris, manganese, mundick, wad, black cauke, black lead, or coal, from any mine, bed, or vein, is felony, punishable as simple larceny; and by § 23, to steal any paper or parchment, written or printed, being evidence to the title or any part of the title to any real estate, is made a misdemeanor punishable by transportation for seven years, fine or imprisonment. By § 21, stealing, or fraudulently taking from the place of its deposit, or obliterating, &c. any record, writ, process, interrogatory, affidavit, &c. or original document, is a misdemeanor, punishable in like manner. By § 22, stealing, or for any fraudulent purpose destroying, or concealing, any will, codicil, or testamentary instrument, is likewise made a misdemeanor, punishable by transportation, imprisonment, &c.

In indictments for stealing any of the things mentioned in the three last sections of the above act, it is not necessary to allege that they are the property of any person, or are of any value.

Bonds, Bills, and Notes, being mere choses in action, were held also at the common law not to be such goods whereof larceny might be committed; being of no intrinsic value, and not importing any property in possession of the person from whom they are taken. 8 Rep. 33. But by 2 Geo. 2. c. 25. they were put upon the same footing with respect to larcenies as the money they were meant to secure. This statute was repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27., but by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 5., if any person shall steal any tally, order, or other security whatsoever, entitling or evidencing the title of any person or body corporate to any share or interest in any public stock or fund, whether of this kingdom, or of Great Britain or of Ireland, or of any foreign state, or in any fund of any body corporate, company, or society, or to any deposits in any savings bank, or shall steal any debenture, deed, bond, bill, note, warrant, order, or other security whatsoever, for money, or for payment of money, whether of this kingdom, or of any foreign state, or shall steal any warrant or order for the delivery or transfer of any goods or valuable thing, every such offender shall be deemed guilty of felony, of the same nature, and in the same degree, and punishable in the same manner, as if he had stolen any chattel of the like value, with the share, interest, or deposit to which the security so stolen may relate, or with the money due on the security so stolen or secured thereby, and remaining unsatisfied, or with the value of the goods or valuable thing mentioned in the warrant or order.

Larceny also cannot at common law be committed of treasure-trove, or wrecks, waifs, estrays, &c. till seized by the king, or him who hath the franchise: for till such seizure no one hath a determinate property therein. See Dalt. 370; 3 Inst. 208; H. P. C. 67.—By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 18. plundering or stealing from any ship in distress, or wrecked, &c., or any goods, &c. belonging thereto, is a felony, punishable with death; but where there are no circumstances of cruelty, or the goods are of small value, the offender may be prosecuted and punished as for simple larceny.

Larceny cannot also be committed of such animals in which there is no property either absolute or qualified, as of beasts that are feræ naturæ, and unreclaimed, such as deer, hares, and conies, in a forest, chace, or warren; fish in an open river or pond; or wild fowls at their natural liberty. 1 Hal. P. C. 511; Fost. 366. But if they are reclaimed and confined, and may serve for food, it is otherwise, even at common law: for of deer so inclosed in a park that they may be taken at pleasure, fish in a trunk, and pheasants or partridges in a mew, larceny may be committed. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33. § 26; 1 Hal. P. C. 511. See Deer Stealers, Fish. It is said that if swans be lawfully marked, it is felony to steal them, though at large in a public river; and that it is likewise felony to steal them, though unmarked, if in any private river or pond: otherwise it is only a trespass. Dalt. Jus. c. 156. But, of all valuable domestic animals, as horses and other beasts of draught, and of all animals domitæ naturæ, which serve for food, as neat or other cattle, swine, poultry, and the like, and of their fruit or produce, taken from them while living, as milk or wool, larceny may be committed. Dalt. 21; Crompt. 36; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33. § 28; 1 Hal. P. C. 507; the King v. Martin, by all the judges, P. 17 Geo. 3. And also of the flesh of such as are either domitæ or feræ naturæ when killed. 1 Hal. P. C. 511. As to those animals which do not serve for food, and which, therefore, the law holds to have no intrinsic value, as dogs of all sorts, and other creatures kept for whim and pleasure, though a man may have a base property therein, and maintain a civil action for the loss of them, yet they are not of such estimation as that the crime of stealing them amounts to larceny. 1 Hal. P. C. 512. For the punishment now inflicted by statute for stealing dogs or other animals, not the subject of larceny at common law, see tit. Dogs.

As to stealing oysters, see that title.

Notwithstanding, however, that no larceny can be committed unless there be some property in the thing taken, and an owner, yet, if the owner be unknown, provided there be a property, it is larceny to steal it; and an indictment will lie for the larceny of the goods of a person unknown. 1 Hal. P. C. 512. This is the case of stealing a shroud out of a grave, which is the property of those, whoever they were, that buried the deceased; but stealing the corpse itself, which has no owner (though a matter of great indecency,) was no felony, unless some of the grave-clothes were stolen with it. It was, however, punishable by indictment as a misdemeanor, even though the body were taken for the improvement of the science of anatomy; it being a practice contrary to common decency, and shocking to the general sentiments and feelings of mankind. See 2 Term Rep. 733.

Where a person finds the goods of another that are lost, and converts them to his own use, it is no larceny; H. P. C. 61; even should he deny the finding of them, or secrete them. 1 Hale, 506. But it seems that in some extraordinary cases the law will rather feign a property, where in strictness there is none, than suffer an offender to escape justice. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33. § 29.

And the above doctrine does not apply if he knows the owner; and, therefore, where a bureau was given to a carpenter to repair, and he found money secreted in it which he converted to his own use, it was held to be a felony. 8 Ves. 405; 2 Leach, 952. So if a hackney-coachman convert to his own use a parcel left by a passenger in his coach, by mistake, it is a felony if he know the owner; or if he took him up or set him down at any particular place where he might have inquired for him. 2 East P. C. 664; 1 Leach, 413, 415, n. And in all cases where there are marks on the property by which the owner may be traced, a conversion of it by the finder will be a larceny. 2 Russ. 102.

It must be proved on the trial that the goods stolen are the absolute or special property of the person named in the indictment. If he be described as a certain person to the jurors unknown, and it appears in evidence that his name is known, the prisoner will be acquitted. See 3 Camp. 261; 1 Holt, 595; 2 East, P. C. 651.

Where goods are stolen from a bailee, they may be described either as the property of the bailor or bailee, 2 Hale, 181, although they were never in the real owner's possession, but in that of the bailee merely. R. & R. 136. The property must not, however, be laid in one who has neither the actual nor constructive possession of the goods. R. & R. 225. Thus if it appear the person named is merely servant to the owner, the prisoner must be acquitted, for the possession of the servant is the possession of the master. R. & R. 412.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 44. (before noticed) in case of the larceny of any fixtures in any square, street, or other like place, it is not requisite to allege the same to be the property of any person. See further, Indictment, VI.

2. Many learned and scrupulous men have questioned the propriety, if not lawfulness, of inflicting capital punishment for simple theft. The natural punishment for injuries to property seems to be the loss of the offender's own property; and might be universally the case were all men's fortunes equal. But as those who have no property themselves are generally the most ready to attack the property of others, it has been found necessary, instead of a pecuniary, to substitute a corporal punishment.

Our ancient Saxon laws nominally punished theft with death, if above the value of twelvpence; but the criminal was permitted to redeem his life by a pecuniary ransom; but in the ninth year of Henry I. this power of redemption was taken away, and all persons guilty of larceny above the value of 12d. were directed to be hanged. 1 Hal. P. C. 12; 3 Inst. 53. And grand larceny, or the stealing above the value of 12d. continued liable to be visited with death at common law until the passing of the late statute, already mentioned, by which the distinction of grand and petit larceny was abolished. The value of the goods stolen is now immaterial, and every theft, whatever be the amount of property taken, is punishable under the third section of the same act, which provides that every person convicted of simple larceny, or of any felony by that act made punishable like simple larceny, shall (except as otherwise provided in the act, be liable to be transported for seven years, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, and if a male to be once, twice, or thrice publicly whipped in addition to such imprisonment; and by § 4 such offenders (and persons convicted of any misdemeanor punishable under the act) may be sentenced to be imprisoned, or imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction, and may also be kept in solitary confinement for the whole or any portion of such imprisonment, or such imprisonment with hard labour.

By 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 7. no person convicted of felony shall suffer death unless for some felony, which was excluded from the benefit of clergy before or on the first day of the then session of parliament, or which is made punishable with death by some statute passed after that day.

An acquittal of larceny in one county may be pleaded in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same stealing in another county: and an averment that the offences in both indictments are the same, may be made out by witnesses, or inquest of office, without putting it to trial by jury; though that of later years hath been the usual method. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 35. § 4. But it is no plea in appeal of larceny, that the defendant hath been found not guilty in an action of trespass brought against him by the same plaintiff for the same goods; for larceny and trespass are entirely different; and a bar in an action of an inferior nature will not bar another of a superior. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 35. § 5. If a person be indicted for felony or larceny generally, and upon the evidence it appears that the fact is but a bare trespass, he cannot be found guilty, and have judgment on the trespass, but ought to be indicted anew; though it may be otherwise where the jury find a special verdict, or when the fact is specially laid, &c. In trespass, where the taking is felonious, no verdict ought to be given unless the defendant hath before been tried for the felony. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 47. § 6. All felony includes trespass, so that if the party be guilty of no trespass in taking the goods, he cannot be guilty of felony or larceny in carrying them away; and in every indictment of larceny there must be the words felonice cepit & asportavit, &c. H. P. C. 61; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33. § 2.

II. 1. Larceny in the dwelling-house, though it seems to have a higher degree of guilt than simple larceny, yet is not at all distinguished from the other at common law; unless where it is accompanied with the circumstance of breaking the house by night, and then it falls under another description, viz. that of Burglary.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 11 & 12. breaking and entering any dwelling-house, and stealing to any amount; stealing in a dwelling-house, any person being put in fear; or stealing therein to the value of 5*l.*, were made capital felonies. But by the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 62. the punishment of death for stealing to the value of 5*l.* in a dwelling-house was abolished, and transportation for life substituted. And the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 44. takes away the capital punishment for breaking and entering any dwelling-house and stealing to any amount, and in lieu thereof subjects the offender to transportation for life, or for not less than seven years, or previously to transportation to imprisonment for not exceeding four years or less than one year, with or without hard labour. See further as to stealing in dwelling-houses, &c. Buildings, Burglary, &c.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 14. offenders breaking and entering any building within the same curtilage as the house, but not being considered as part thereof, for the purposes mentioned in § 12 of the statute, and stealing therein any chattel, may be transported for life, &c. See Buildings, House. And by § 15. persons breaking and entering any shop, warehouse, or counting-house, and stealing therein any chattel, &c. are liable to the same punishment.

2. The offence of privately stealing from a man's person, as by picking his pocket, or the like, privily without his knowledge, was debarred the benefit of clergy, so early as 8 Eliz. c. 4. which was repealed by 48 Geo. 3. c. 129. But then it must have been such a larceny as stood in need of benefit of clergy, viz. of above the value of 12d. else the offender would not have judgment of death, for the statute created no new offence; but only prevented the prisoner from praying the benefit of clergy, and left him to the regular judgment of the ancient law. This severity seemed to be owing to the ease with which such offences are committed, the difficulty of guarding against them, and the boldness with which they were practised (even in the queen's court and presence) at the time when the former statute was made; besides that it was an infringement of property in the manual occupation or corporal possession of the owner, which was an offence even in a state of nature. 4 Comm. c. 17.

Now by the stat. 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 6. to steal any chattel, &c. from the person of another renders the offender liable to transportation for life &c., or not less than seven years imprisonment and whipping. See further on the subject of larceny, False Pretences, Felony, Indictment, &c.

LARDERARIUS REGIS. The king's larderer, or clerk of the kitchen. Concill.

LARDING-MONEY. In the manor of Bradford, in the county of Wilts, the tenants pay to their lord a small yearly rent by this name, which is said to be for liberty to feed their hogs with the masts of the lord's woods, the fat of a hog being called lard; or it may be a commutation for some customary service of carrying salt or meat to the lord's larder. This was called lardarium in old charters; et decimam lardarii de hoga. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. p. 321.

LARONS [Fr.] Thieves; mentioned in the 18 Edm. 2. for view of frankpledge.

LASCARS. By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 54. (for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation, § 18, ships trading eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, within the limits of the East India Company's charter, may be navigated by Lascars, or other natives of countries within those limits.

LASTATINUS. Often occurs in Walsingham, and signifies an assassin or murderer. Anno 1271.

LAST [Sax. hlastan, i. e. onus, Fr. last.] Denotes a burden in general, and particularly a certain weight or measure of fish, corn, wool, leather, pitch, &c. As a last of white herrings is twelve barrels; of red herrings, twenty cades or a thousand; and of pilchards, ten thousand; of corn, ten quarters, and in some parts of England twenty-one quarters; of wool, twelve sacks; of leather, twenty dickers, or ten score; of hides or skins, twelve dozen; of pitch, tar, or ashes, fourteen barrels; of gunpowder, twenty-four firkins, weighing a hundred pounds each, &c. See 32 Hen. 8. c. 11. (repealed); 1 Jac. 1. c. 33; 15 Car. 1. c. 7; and tit. Weights and Measures.

LAST-COURT. In the marshes of Kent, is a court held by the twenty-four jurats, and summoned by the bailiffs; wherein orders are made to lay and levy taxes, impose penalties, &c. for the preservation of the said marshes. Hist. of Imbanking and Draining, 54.

LASTAGE [lastagum.] A custom exacted in some fairs and markets to carry things bought where one will by the interpretation of rastal; but it is more accurately taken for the ballast or lading of a ship. Lastage is also defined to be that custom which is paid for wares sold by the last; as herrings, pitch, &c.

LASTAGE AND BALLASTAGE. See Ballast.

LAST HEIR [Ultimus hæres.] He to whom land comes by escheat for want of lawful heirs; that is, in some cases the lord of whom they held, but in others the king. Bract. lib. 7. c. 17. See Descent, Escheat, Heir, Tenure.

LATERA. Sides-men, companions, assistants. Concill.

LATERARE. To lie side-ways in opposition to lying end-ways, used in the description of lands. Chart. Antiq.

LATHE, LETHE, LEID, or LETHIEN [Læstum, Leda, Sax. læthe.] A great part of a county, containing three or four hundreds or wapentakes, as it is used in Kent and Sussex, in the latter of which is called a rape. 1 Comm. 116; Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 35; Pat. 1 Hen. 4. par. 8. m. 8. See Trithing.

LATHREVE, LEDGREVE, or TRITHINGREVE. The officer under the Saxon government who had authority over that division called a lathe. See Trithingreve.

LATIMER. Is used by Sir Edward Coke for an interpreter. 2 Inst. 515. It seems that the word is mistaken, and should be latiner, because heretofore he that understood Latin, which in the time of the Romans was the prevailing language, might be a good interpreter. Camden agrees, that it signifies a Frenchman or interpreter, and says the word is used in an old inquisition. Britan. fol. 598. It may be derived or corrupted from the Fr. latinier, q. d. latiner. Concill.

LATIN. There are three sorts of Latin. 1. Good Latin, allowed by grammarians and lawyers. 2. False or incongruous Latin, which in times past would abate original writs, though not make void any judgment writ, declaration, or plea, &c. And, 3. Words of art, known only to the sages of the law, and not to grammarians, called Lawyers' Latin. 1 Lil. Abr. 146, 147. See 38 Edm. 3. c. 15. which directed all pleas, &c. to be debated in English, and recorded in Latin; but now, by 4 Geo. 2. c. 26; 6 Geo. 2. c. 14. the records and proceedings are to be in English. Formerly the use of a word not Latin at all, or not so in the sense in which used, might in many cases be helped by an Anglice, though where there was a proper Latin word for the thing intended to be expressed, nothing could help an improper one. And when there was no Latin for a thing, words made which had some countenance of Latin were allowed good, as velvetum, Anglice velvet, &c. 10 Rep. 133. See Pleading, l. 3, Process.

LATINARIUS. An interpreter of Latin, or Latiner, from the Fr. latinier. 2 Inst. 515. See Latimer.

LATITAT. A writ whereby all men are originally called to answer in personal actions in the King's Bench; having its name upon a supposition that the defendant doth lurk and lie hid, and cannot be found in the county of Middlesex to be taken by bill, but is gone into some other county, to the sheriff of which this writ is directed, to apprehend him there. F. N. B. 78. Terms de Ley.

The origin of it is this: In ancient time, while the King's Bench was moveable, when any man was sued, a writ was sent forth to the sheriff of Middlesex, or any other county where the court was resident, called a bill of Middlesex, to take him; and if the sheriff returned non est inventus, then a second writ was sued out, reciting that it was testified that the defendant lurked and lay hid in another county, and thereby the sheriff of that county was commanded to attach the party in any other place where he might be found; and when the tribunal of the King's Bench came to be settled at Westminster, the same course was observed for a long time; but afterwards, by the contrivance of clerks, it was devised to put both these writs into one, and so attach the defendant upon a fiction that he was not in the county of Middlesex, but lurking elsewhere; and that therefore he was to be apprehended by the sheriff of the county where he was suspected to be, and lie hid.

As this writ is in effect abolished by the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. by which a writ of summons is made the only process for commencing non-bailable actions, and a writ of capias the process for commencing those where the defendant is arrested, it is unnecessary further to expound the law relating to laicitas, which will be found at large in Mr. Tidd's Book of Practice, 9th ed.

For other matters connected with and explanatory of the subject of this title, see Ac-etiam, Capias, Common Pleas, King's Bench, Practice, Process, &c.

LATRO [Latrocinium.] He who had the sole jurisdiction de latrone in a particular place; it is mentioned in Leg. Wm. 1. See Infangthef.

LAVATORIUM. A laundry, or place to wash in. Applied to such a place in the porch or entrance of cathedral churches, where the priest and other officiating members were obliged to wash their hands, before they proceeded to Divine service. See Liber Statut. Eccl. Paul. London. MS. f. 59.

LAVERBREAD. In the county of Glamorgan, and some other parts of Wales, they make a sort of food of a sea-plant, which seems to be the oyster-green, or sea liverwort; and this they call laverbread.

LAVINA. See Labina.

LAUDARE. To advise or persuade. Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 39; Hoveden, 729. Laudare signifies also to arbitrate; and laudator, an arbitrator. Knight, 25, 26.

LAUDUM. An arbitrament or award. Walsingham, 60.

LAUNCEGAYS. A kind of offensive weapons now disused, and prohibited by the 7 Rich. 2. c. 13.

LAUND or LAUND [landa.] An open field without wood. Boun.

LAURELS. Pieces of gold coined in the year 1619, with the king's head laureated, which gave them the name of laurels; the twenty-shilling pieces whereof were marked with XX., the ten shillings X., and the five shilling piece with V. Camd. Annal. Jac. 1. MS.

LAW [Sax. lag; Lat. lex, from lego, or legendo, choosing; or rather à ligando, from binding.] The rule and bond of men's actions; or it is a rule for the well-governing of civil society, to give to every man that which doth belong to him.

Law, in its most general and comprehensive sense, is thus defined by Blackstone, in the Commentaries: A rule of action; and is applied indiscriminately to all kinds of action, whether animate or inanimate, rational or irrational. And it is that rule of action which is prescribed by some superior, and which the inferior is bound to obey. 1 Comm. Introd. § 2.

Laws in their more confined sense, and in which it is the business of works of this nature to consider them, denote the rule, not of action in general, but of human action or conduct. And this perhaps (it has been acutely observed) is the only sense in which the word law can be strictly used; for in all cases where it is not applied to human conduct, it may be considered as a metaphor, and in every instance a more appropriate term (as quality or property) may be found. When law is applied to any other object than man, it ceases to contain two of its essential ingredients, disobedience and punishment. 1 Comm. Introd. § 2, and Mr. Christian's notes there.

Municipal law is by the same great commentator defined to be—"A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." The latter clause of this sentence seems to Mr. Christian to be either superfluous or defective. If we attend to the learned judge's exposition, perhaps we may be inclined to use the words "establishing and ascertaining what is right or wrong;" and all cavil or difficulty will vanish. See 1 Comm. 43—53.

Every law may be said to consist of several parts: Declaratory, whereby the rights to be observed, and the wrongs to be eschewed, are clearly defined and laid down: Directory, whereby the subject of a state is instructed and enjoined to observe those rights, and to abstain from the commission of those wrongs: Remedial, whereby a method is pointed out to recover a man's private rights or redress his private wrongs: Vindictory, which imposes the sanction whereby it is signified what evil or penalty shall be incurred by such as commit any public wrongs, and transgress or neglect their duty. See 1 Comm. 53.

According to Bracton, Lex est sanctio justa, jubens honesta et prohibens contraria: And the schoolman says, Lex humana est quoddam dictamen rationis, quo diriguntur humani actus. This law is rectum, as it discovers that which is crooked or wrong: And justa requires five properties; possibilis, necessaria, conveniens, manifesta, nullo privato commodo. 2 Inst. 56, 587.

Laws are arbitrary or positive, and natural; the last of which are essentially just and good, and bind every where and in all places where they are observed: Arbitrary laws are either concerning such matter as is in itself morally indifferent, in which case both the law and the matter, and subject of it, is likewise indifferent, or concerning the natural law itself, and the regulating thereof; and all arbitrary laws are founded in convenience, and depend upon the authority of the legislative power which appoints and makes them, and are for maintaining public order. Those which are natural laws are from God; but those which are arbitrary, are properly human and positive institutions. Selden on Fortescue, c. 17.

The laws of any country began, when there first began to be a state in the land: and we may consider the world as one universal society, and then that law by which nations were governed, is called jus gentium: if we consider the world as made up of particular nations, the law which regulates the public order and right of them, is termed jus publicum and that law which determines the private rights of men, is called jus civile. Selden, ubi supra.

No law can oblige a people without their consent; this consent is either verbis or factis, i. e. it is expressed by writing, or implied by deeds and actions; and where a law is grounded on an implied assent, rebus et factis, it is either common law or custom; if it is universal, it is common law, and if particular to this or that place, then it is custom. 3 Salk. 112.

The law in this land hath been variable; the Roman laws were in use anciently in Britain, when the Romans had several colonies here, each of which was governed by the Roman laws: afterwards we had the laws called Merchetlage, West Saxonlage, and Danelage; all reduced into a body, and made one by King Edw. Confess. Magna Charta, c. 1. § 14; Camd. Britan. 94.

At present the laws of England are divided into three parts: 1. The common law, which is the most ancient and general law of the realm, and common to the whole kingdom, being appropriate thereto, and having no dependence upon any foreign law whatsoever. See Common Law.

2. Statutes or acts of parliament, made and passed by the king, lords, and commons in parliament; being a reserve for the government to provide against new mischiefs arising through the corruption of the times: and by this the common law is amended where defective, for the suppression of public evils; though where the common law and statute law concur or interfere, the common law shall be preferred. See Statutes.

3. Particular customs; but they must be particular, for a general custom is part of the common law of the land. Co. Lit. 15, 115. See Custom.

Blackstone divides the municipal law of England into two kinds, lex non scripta, the unwritten or common law; and the lex scripta, the written, that is, the statute law.

The lex non scripta, or unwritten law, includes not only general customs, or the common law, properly so called; but also the particular customs of certain parts of the kingdom; and likewise those particular laws, that are by custom observed only in certain courts and jurisdictions. 1 Comm. Introd. § 3.

There is another division of our laws more large and particular; as into the prerogative or crown law; the law and custom of parliament; the common law; the statute law; reasonable customs; the law of arms, war, and chivalry; ecclesiastical or canon law; civil law, in certain courts and cases; forest law; the law of marque and reprisal; the law of merchants; the law and privilege of the stannaries, &c. But this large division may be reduced to the common division: and all is founded on the law of nature and reason, and the revealed law of God, as all other laws ought to be. 1 Inst. 11.

The law of nature is that which God at man's creation infused into him, for his preservation and direction; and this is lex æterna, and may not be changed: and no laws shall be made or kept, that are expressly against the law of God, written in his scripture; as to forbid what he commandeth, &c. 2 Shep. Abr. 356.

All laws derive their force à lege naturæ; and those which do not, are accounted as no laws. Portescue: No law will make a construction to do wrong; and there are some things which the law favours, and some it dislikes; it favoureth those things that come from the order of nature, 1 Inst. 189, 197. Also our law hath much more respect to life, liberty, freehold inheritance, matters of record, and of substance, than to chattels, things in the personality, matters not of record, or circumstances. Ibid. 187; 4 Rep. 124.

As to the mode of interpreting laws, see 1 Comm. § 2.—Of the general foundation of the laws of England, Id. § 3.—And of the countries subject to the laws of England, Id. § 4.—See also Ireland, Scotland, Plantations, Statutes, Common Law, Canon Law, Civil Law, &c. &c.

Law hath also a special signification, wherein it is taken for that which is lawful with us, and not elsewhere; as tenant by the curtesy of England, is called tenant by the law of England.

LAW OF ARMS, [Lex armorum.] Is that law which gives precepts how to proclaim war, make and observe leagues and treaties, to assault and encounter an enemy, and punish offenders in the camp, &c. The law and judgment of arms are necessary between two strange princes of equal power, who have no other method of determining their controversies, because they have no superior or ordinary judge, but are supreme and public persons; and by the law of arms, kings obtain their rights, rebels are reduced to obedience, and peace is established: but when the laws of arms and war do rule, the civil laws are of little or no force. Treat. Laws, 57.

It is a kind of law among all nations, that in case of a solemn war, the prince that conquers gains a right of dominion, as well as property, over the things and persons he has subdued; and it is for this reason, because both parties have appealed to the highest tribunal that can be, viz. the trial by arms and war; wherein the great judge and sovereign of the world, in a more especial manner, seems to decide the controversy. Hale's Hist. L. 73, 74.

Common things concerning arms and war, are under the cognizance of the constable and marshal of England, 13 R. 2. st. 1. c. 2. See Constable, Court of Chivalry.

LAW-BOOKS. All books written in the law are either historical, as the Year-Books; explanatory, such as Staundford's Treatise of the Royal Prerogative; miscellaneous, as the abridgments of the law; monological, being on one certain subject, such as Lambard's Justice of Peace, &c.—Fulbeck's Parallel, c. 3. The books of reports have such great weight with the judges, that many of them are as highly valued as the Responsa Prudentum among the Romans, which were authoritative. Wood's Inst. 10.

The decisions of courts (says Blackstone) are held in the highest regard, and are not only preserved as authentic records in the treasuries of the several courts, but are handed out to public view in the numerous volumes of reports which furnish the lawyer's library. These reports are histories of the several cases, with a short summary of the proceedings, which are preserved at large in the record; the arguments on both sides, and the reasons the court gave for its judgment, taken down in short notes by persons present at the determinations. And these serve as indexes to, and also to explain the records, which always, in matters of consequence and nicety, the judges direct to be searched.

These reports are extant in a regular series, from the reign of King Edward II. inclusive; and from this time to that of King Henry VIII. were taken by the prothonotaries or chief scribes of the court at the expense of the crown, and published annually; whence they are known under the denomination of the Year-Books. Blackstone proceeds to express his wish that this beneficial custom had been continued. He laments the deficiency and inaccuracy of the many reports from that time to the period in which he wrote; and the neglect of the appointment which King James I., at the instance of Lord Bacon, made of two reporters, with a stipend for that purpose. 1 Comm. Introd. § 3.

This evil has however been since, in a great measure, remedied, by several periodical publications of reports of the cases determined in the courts of law and equity, soon after the end of the terms in which they are decided. The public encouragement given to these works is perhaps a more adequate mode of reward than royal munificence could devise, even in a reign distinguished for the patronage of learning and genius.

Some of the most valuable of the ancient reports are those published by Lord Chief Justice Coke; and these are generally cited, by way of excellence, as The Reports; thus, 1 Rep.; 2 Rep. &c., while other reports are cited by the name of the reporter, 1 Ventr.; 1 Salk. &c.

Besides the reporters, there are also other authorities to whom great veneration and respect are paid by the students of the common law. Such are Glanvil, Bracton, Britton, Fleta, Hengham, Littleton, Statham, Brooke, Fitzherbert, Staundforde, and others of ancient date.—(Hale, Hawkins, Foster, and others of more modern times, among whom the author of the Commentaries holds an honourable rank.) Their treatises are cited as authority, and are evidences that cases have formerly happened in which such and such points were determined, which are now become settled and first principles. One of the last of these methodical writers (according to Blackstone) in point of time, whose works are of any intrinsic authority in the courts of justice, is Sir Edward Coke; commonly called Lord Coke, from his having been, as was already mentioned, lord chief justice.—He left four volumes of institutes; the first being a very extensive comment upon a little excellent treatise of Tenures compiled by Judge Littleton, in the reign of Edward IV. This is generally called Coke-Littleton, (meaning Coke upon Littleton) and is so cited by lawyers, or still more usually as First Institute. This has been since enlarged by the very learned and laborious notes of Mr. Hargrave and Mr. Butler, and, taken altogether, is a book of the greatest value and highest authority in the law.

There have also appeared a vast variety of abridgments of general law; and systems of particular branches of it; the most valuable of which are Sir John Cockyns' Digest, and Bacon's Abridgment, the latter founded chiefly on MS. treatises of Chief Baron Gilbert, and lately edited by Sir H. Gwillim and C. E. Dodd, Esq. These with the statutes at large, and other publications, swell lawyers' libraries to a size which they perhaps, as well as their clients, would be glad to see lessened. But the delay imputed to, rather than suffered in, courts of justice, and the multiplication of cases and determinations, are a price which every free and opulent commercial nation must pay for the innumerable blessings it enjoys, under such a government as that long established in this country. See Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, lib. vi. c. 2.

LAW-DAY, [Lagedayum.] Called also View of Frankpledge or court-leet; was any day of open court, and commonly used for the courts of a county or hundred.

LAWING OF DOGS. The cutting off several claws of the fore-feet of dogs, in the forest. See Forest.

LAWLESS-COURT. A Court held on King's Hill, at Rochford in Essex, on Wednesday morning next after Michaelmas-Day yearly, at cock-crowing; at which court they whisper and have no candle, nor any pen and ink, but a coal; and he that owes suit or service there, and appears not, forfeits double his rent. This court is mentioned by Camden, who says, that this servile attendance was imposed on the tenants, for conspiring at the like unseasonable time to raise a commotion. Camd. Britan. It belongs to the honour of Raleigh, and is called Lawless, because held at an unlawful hour, or quia dicta sine lege. The title of it is in rhyme, and in the court rolls runs thus:—

Rochford. } ss. Curia de Domino Rege,
Dicta sine lege,
Tenta est ibidem
Per ejusdem consuetudinem,
Ante ortum solis
Luceat niri polus,
Senescallus solus
Nisi scribit niri colis
Tuties voluerit
Gallus ut cantaverit,
Per cujus soli sonitus
Curia est summonitus;
Clamat clam pro rege
In curia sine lege,
Et nisi citd venerint
Citius permutuerint,
Et nisi clam accedant
Curia non attendat.
Qui venerit cum lumine erat in regimine
Et dum sunt sine lumine, capti sunt in crimine, Curia sine cura.
Jurata de injuria.

Tenta ibidem die Mercurii (ante diem) proximi post festum Sancti Michaelis, anno regni regis, &c.

LAWLESS MAN. [Exlex.] An outlaw. Bract. lib. 3. c. 11.

LAW OF MARQUE, [from the Germ. march, i. e. limes.] Is where they that are driven to it do take the shipping and goods of that people of whom they have received wrong, and cannot get ordinary justice in another territory, when they can take them within their own bounds and precincts. 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 17. See Letter of Marque.

LAW MARTIAL. See Courts Martial.

LAW MERCHANT, [lex mercatoria.] A special law differing from the common law of England, proper to merchants, and part of the law of the realm. And the charta mercatoria, 13 Edw. 1. st. 3. grants this perpetual privilege to merchants coming into this kingdom. See also 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 2. (repealed) 13. 17. 19. 20.; Co. Lit. 182; and tit. Custom of Merchants.

LAW PROCEEDINGS. Of all kinds, as writs, processes, pleadings, &c. are to be in the English language, by 4 Geo. 2. c. 26; 5 Geo. 2. c. 27. Except known abbreviations and technical terms, 6 Geo. 2. c. 14. See Pleadings, i. 3.

LAW SPIRITUAL, [lex spiritualis.] The ecclesiastical law, allowed by our laws where it is not against the common law, nor the statutes and customs of the kingdom; and regularly according to such ecclesiastical or spiritual laws, the bishops and other ecclesiastical judges proceed in causes within their cognizance. Co. Lit. 342. It was also called Law Christian, and, in opposition to it, the common law was often called Lex Terrena, &c. See Canon Law, Courts Ecclesiastical.

LAW OF THE STAPLE, [mentioned in 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 22.] Is the same with Law Merchant. See 4 Inst. 237, 238, and tit. Staple.

LAWYER [Legista, Legispiritus, Jurisconsultus. By the Saxons called lahman.] A counsellor, or one learned in the law. See Attorney, Barrister.

LAY-CORPORATIONS. Are of two sorts, civil and eleemosynary. The civil are such as are erected for a variety of temporal purposes. The eleemosynary sort are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms or bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he hath directed. See Corporation.

LAY INVESTITURE of BISHOPS. Election was, in very early times, the usual mode of elevation to the episcopal chair throughout all Christendom; and this was promiscuously performed by the laity as well as the clergy, till at length, it becoming tumultuous, the emperors and other sovereigns of the respective kingdoms of Europe took the appointment in some degree into their own hands; by reserving to themselves the right of confirming these elections, and of granting investiture of the temporalities, which now began almost universally to be annexed to this spiritual dignity; without which confirmation and investiture the elected bishops could neither be consecrated nor receive any secular profits. This right was acknowledged in the Emperor Charlemagne, A. D. 773, by Pope Hadrian I. and the council of Lateran, and universally exercised by other Christian princes; but the policy of the Court of Rome at the same time began by degrees to exclude the laity from any share in these elections, and to confine them wholly to the clergy, which at length was completely effected; the mere form of election appearing to the people to be a thing of little consequence, while the crown was in possession of an absolute negative, which was almost equivalent to a direct right of nomination. Hence the right of appointing to bishoprics is said to have been in the crown of England (as well as other kingdoms in Europe) even in the Saxon times: because the rights of confirmation and investiture were in effect (though not in form) a right of complete donation. But when, by length of time, the custom of making elections by the clergy only was fully established, the popes began to except to the usual method of granting those investitures, which was per annulum et baculum, by the prince's delivering to the prelate a ring, and pastoral staff or crosier; pretending that this was an encroachment on the church's authority, and an attempt by these symbols to confer a spiritual jurisdiction: and Pope Gregory VII., towards the close of the eleventh century, published a bull of excommunication against all princes who should dare to confer investitures, and all prelates who should venture to receive them. This was a bold step towards effecting the plan then adopted by the Roman see, of rendering the clergy entirely independent of the civil authority; and long and eager were the contests occasioned by this papal claim. But at length, when the Emperor Henry V. agreed to remove all suspicion of encroachment on the spiritual character, by conferring investitures for the future per sceptrum, and not per annulum et baculum; and when the kings of England and France consented also to alter the form in their kingdoms, and receive only homage from the bishops for their temporalities, instead of investing them by the ring and crosier, the Court of Rome found it prudent to suspend for a while its other pretensions.

This concession was obtained from King Henry I. in England, by means of that obstinate and arrogant prelate Archbishop Anselm: but King John (about a century afterwards) in order to obtain the protection of the pope against his discontented barons, was also prevailed upon to give up by a charter, to all the monasteries and cathedrals in the kingdom, the free right of electing their prelates, whether abbots or bishops, reserving only to the crown the custody of the temporalities during the vacancy; the form of granting a licence to elect (which is the original of our congé d'elire), on refusal whereof the electors might proceed without it; and the right of approbation afterwards, which was not to be denied without a reasonable and lawful cause. This grant was expressly recognized and confirmed in King John's Magna Charta, and was again established by statute 25 Edw. 3. st. 6. § 3.

But by 25 Hen. 8. c. 20, the ancient right of nomination was in effect restored to the crown. See 1 Comm. 377; and Bishop.

LAY-FEE [feodum laicum.] Lands held in fee of a laylord, by the common services to which military tenure was subject; as distinguished from the ecclesiastical holding in frankalmoin, discharged from those burdens. Kennel's Gloss. See Tenures.

LAYMAN. One that is not of the clergy; the Latin word laicus signifying as much as populus, that which is common to the people, or belongs to the laity. Lit. Dict.

LAYSTALL [Sax.]. A place to lay dung or soil in.

LAZARETS. Places where quarantine is to be performed by persons coming from infected countries. Escaping from them felony. See 1 Jac. 1. c. 31; 26 Geo. 2. c. 6; 29 Geo. 2. c. 8; and Plagues.

LAZZI. The Saxons divided the people of the land into three ranks: the first they called Edilingi, which were such as are now nobility; the second were termed Fritlingi, from fritling, signifying that he was born a freeman, or of parents not subject to any servitude, which are the present gentry: and the third and last were called Lazzi, as born to labour, and being of a more servile state than our servants, because they could not depart from their service without the leave of the lord, but were fixed to the land where born, and in the nature of slaves; hence the word lazzi, or lazy, signifies those of a servile condition. Nithardus de Saxonibus, lib. 24.—It is remarkable that the lower class of people at Naples are called Lazarani.

LEA OF YARN. A quantity of yarn so called; and at Kidderminster it is to contain 200 threads on a reel four yards about. See 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 8.

LEAD. By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 44, stealing, ripping, cutting, or breaking with intent to steal, any lead, iron, brass, or other metal, or any utensil or fixture, fixed in or to any building, or any thing made of metal, fixed in any land, being private property, or for a fence to any dwelling-house, garden, or area, or in any square, street, &c. is felony, and the offender punishable as in the case of simple larceny.

LEAGUE. An agreement between princes, &c. Also a measure of way by sea, or an extent of land, containing most usually three miles. Breakers of leagues and truces, how punished for offences done upon the seas. See 4 H. 5. c. 7; 31 H. 6. c. 4. See Conservator of the Truce; Truce.

LEAK, or LECHE [from Sax. Leccian, to let out water.] In the bishoprick of Durham is used for a gutter; so in Yorkshire any slough or watery hole upon the road is called by this name; and hence the water-tub to put ashes in to make a lee for washing of clothes, is in some parts of England termed a leche. Cowell.

LEAKAGE. An allowance to merchants importing wine out of the customs for the waste and damage it is supposed to receive by being kept. See 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 57. § 19, and tit. Warehousing of Goods.

LEAP. A net, engine, or wheel, made of twigs, to catch fish in. 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 28. See Lepa.

LEAP-YEAR. See Bissextile Year.

LEASE [from locatio, letting; otherwise called a demise, dimissio, from dimittere, to depart with.] A letting of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to another for term of life, years, or at will, for a rent reserved. Co. Lit. 48.

A LEASE is properly a conveyance of any lands or tenements, usually in consideration of rent, or other annual recompence, made for life, for years, or at will; but always for a less time than the lessor hath in the premises; for if it be for the whole interest it is more properly an assignment than a lease. He that letteth is called the lessor, and he to whom the lands, &c. are let is called the lessee. Shep. Touchst. c. 14; 2 Comm. c. 20.

A lease for years is also thus defined: a contract between lessor and lessee for the possession and profit of lands, &c. on the one side, and a recompence for rent or other income on the other. Bac. Abr. Leases.

This word is also sometimes, though improperly, applied to the estate, i. e. the title, time, or interest the lessee hath in the thing demised; and then it is rather referred to the thing taken or had, and the interest of the taker therein; but it is more accurately applied rather to the manner or means of attaining or coming to the thing letten. See Shep. Touchst. c. 14.

The usual words of operation in a lease are "demise, grant, and to farm let,—dimitti, concessi, & ad firmam tradidi." Farm or firm is an old Saxon word signifying provisions. Spebm. Gloss. 229. And it came to be used instead of rent or render, because anciently the greater part of rents were reserved in provisions; in corn, in poultry, and the like, till the use of money became more frequent; so that a farmer, firmarius, was one who held his lands upon payment of a rent or foarme: though at present, by a gradual departure from the original sense, the word farm is brought to signify the very estate or lands so held upon farm or rent. By this conveyance an estate for life, for years, or at will, may be created either in corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments; though delivery of seisin is indeed incident and necessary to one species of leases, viz. leases for life of corporeal hereditaments, but to no other.

Whatever restriction, by the severity of the feudal law, might, in times of very high antiquity, be observed with regard to leases (see Tenures), yet by the common law, as it has stood for many centuries, all persons seised of any estate might let leases to endure so long as their own interest lasted, but no longer. Therefore tenant in fee-simple might let leases of any duration, for he hath the whole interest; but tenant in tail, or tenant for life, could make no leases which should bind the issue in tail or reversioner: nor could a husband, seised jure uxoris, make a firm or valid lease for any longer term than the joint-lives of himself and his wife, for then his interest expired. Yet some tenants for life, where the fee-simple was in abeyance, might (with the concurrence of such as have the guardianship of the fee) make leases of equal duration with those granted by tenants in fee simple; such as parsons and vicars, with consent of the patron and ordinary. Co. Lit. 44. So also bishops and deans, and such other sole ecclesiastical corporations as are seised of the fee-simple of land in their corporate right, might, with the concurrence and confirmation of such persons as the law requires, have made leases for years or for life, estates in tail or in fee, without any limitation or control. And corporations aggregate might have made what estates they pleased, without the confirmation of any other person whatsoever. Whereas now by several statutes, this power, where it was unreasonable, and might be made an ill use of, is restrained; and where in the other cases the restraint by the common law seemed too hard, it is in some measure removed. The former statutes are called the restraining, the latter the enabling, statute. 2 Comm. c. 20. See post. II.

For other matters relative to leases, see Bac. Abr. "Leases and Terms for Years," recommended by Blackstone to particular notice; Shep. Touchst. c. 14; and Decd. Rent, Surrender, and the other titles above referred to. See also 4 Geo. 2. c. 28; 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. (amended by 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 22.) under tit. Rent.

I. Generally, to the making of a good lease several things necessarily concur; there must be a lessor not restrained from making a lease; a lessee not disabled to receive; a thing demised which is demisable, and a sufficient description of the thing demised, &c. If it be for years, it must have a certain commencement and determination; it is to have all the usual ceremonies, as sealing, delivery, &c. and there must be an acceptance of the thing demised. Lit. § 56; 1 Inst. 46; Plomd. 273, 523. Whether any rent be reserved upon a lease for life, years, or at will, or not, is not material, except only in the cases of leases made by tenant in tail, husband and wife, and ecclesiastical persons under 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. (See post, II.) Shep. Touchst. c. 14.

A lessor who hath the fee cannot reserve rent to any other but himself, his heirs, &c. And if he reserves a rent to his executors, the rent shall be to the heir, as incident to the reversion of the land. 1 Inst. 47.

Neither can a power of re-entry upon breach of covenant in a lease be reserved to a stranger to the estate. 4 Taunt. 23.

The lessor may take a distress on the tenements let for the rent; or may have action of debt for the arrears, &c. Also land leased shall be subject to those lawful remedies which the lessor provides for the recovery of his rent, possession, &c. into whose hands soever the land comes. Cro. Jac. 300.

Leases for lives or at will, or for years, may be made of any thing corporeal or incorporeal that lieth in livery or grant. Shep. Touch. 268. Consequently land, advowsons, tithes, commons, franchises, estovers, annuities, rent charges, or corodies, may be leased for years.

Some incorporeal hereditaments, however, form an exception to the above rule. Dignities which are only grantable by the crown cannot be granted for years. Co. Lit. 16 b; 9 Rep. 97 b. Neither can offices of public trust, particularly those relating to the administration of justice. 9 Rep. 97 b; Cro. Car. 587. S. P. But as the inconvenience and danger of their passing to unskilful executors, &c. are avoided by leasing them for years during the life of the grantee, such form of demise has been held good. 6 Mod. 57. S. C. Ld. Ray. 1005.

But offices requiring mere common diligence, and which may be executed by deputy without affecting the public, may be leased for years, as the offices of postmaster-general; Hard. 352; king's printer, ibid. 352; warden of ports and havens, ib. 354; and such as are ministerial in courts of justice, as surveyor of the green-wax, sealer of writs and sub-pœnas, &c. Bro. Abr. Leases, 40.

Goods and chattels may also be leased for years. Thus, cattle and other live and dead stock may be demised by themselves, and the lessee shall have the use and profit of them during the term; and if they die, they become his absolute property. Bro. Abr. Leases (A.) So their young shall belong to the lessee, wherein they differ from dead stock; for the lessor shall, at the end of the lease, have any addition made to it as part of the original thing demised. Ibid.

No tenant shall take leases of above two farms, in any town, village, &c. nor hold two unless he dwell in the parish under penalties and forfeitures, by 25 Hen. 8. c. 18. § 14. See also 21 Hen. 8. c. 18. to which statutes there is not any regard now paid.

1. A lease may be made either in writing or by word of mouth: it is sometimes made and done by record, as fine, recovery (now abolished,) &c. and sometimes and most frequently by writing, called a lease by indenture; albeit, it may be also made by deed-poll; and sometimes also it is (as it may be of land or any such like thing grantable without deed for life, or never so many years,) by word of mouth, without any writing; and then it is called a lease-parol. Sheph. Touchst. c. 14.—But by the statute of frauds, 29 Geo. 2. c. 3. leases of lands must be in writing, and signed by the parties themselves, or their agents duly authorized, otherwise they will operate only as leases at will; except leases not exceeding three years.

A parol agreement to lease lands for four years creates only a tenancy at will. 4 Term Rep. 680.—But see 8 Term Rep. 3. that a lease by parol enures as a tenancy from year to year; the meaning of the statute of frauds being that such an agreement should not operate as a term.

A lease may be made by all the ways above mentioned, either for life, for years, or at will.—For life; as for life of the lessee, or another, or both.—For years, i. e. for a certain number of years, as 10, 100, 1000, or 10,000 years, months, weeks, or days, as the lessor and lessee do agree. And then the estate is properly called a term for years; for this word term doth not only signify the limits and limitation of time, but also the estate and interest that doth pass for that time. These leases for years do some of them commence in præ-senti, and some in futuro at a day to come; and the lease that is to begin in futuro is called an interesse termini, or future interest.—At will; i. e. when a lease is made of land to be held at the will and pleasure of the lessor and lessee together; and such a lease may be made by word of mouth, as well as the former. Sheph. Touchst. c. 14.

If the lease be but for half a year, or a quarter, or any less time, this lessee is respected as a tenant for years, and is stiled so in some legal proceedings; a year being the shortest term which the law in this case takes notice of. Lit. § 58.

These estates for years were originally granted to mere farmers or husbandmen, who every year rendered some equivalent in money, provisions, or other rent, to the lessors or landlords; but in order to encourage them to manure and cultivate the ground, they had a permanent interest granted them, not determinable at the will of the lord; and yet their possession was esteemed of so little consequence, that they were rather considered as the bailiffs or servants of the lord, who were to receive and account for the profits at a settled price, than as having any property of their own; and, therefore, they were not allowed to have a freehold estate; but their interest (such as it was) vested after their deaths in their executors, who were to make up the accounts of their testator with the lord and his other creditors, and were entitled to the stock upon the farm. The lessee's estate might also, by the ancient law, be at any time defeated by a common recovery, suffered by the tenant of the freehold, which annihilated all leases for years then subsisting, unless afterwards renewed by the recoverer, whose title was supposed superior to his by whom those leases were granted. Co. Lit. 46.

While estates for years were thus precarious, it is no wonder that they were usually very short, like the modern leases upon rack-rent; and, indeed, we are told, that by the ancient law no leases for more than forty years were allowable; because any longer possession (especially when given without any livery, declaring the nature and duration of the estate,) might tend to defeat the inheritance. Mirr. c. 2. § 27; Co. Lit. 45, 46. Yet this law, if ever it existed, was soon antiquated; for we may observe, in Madox's collection of ancient instruments, some leases for years of a pretty early date, which considerably exceed that period; and long terms for three hundred or one thousand years were certainly in use in the time of Edward III. and probably of Edward I. But certainly when by 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5. the termor (that is, he who is entitled to the term of years) was protected against these fictitious recoveries, and his interest rendered secure and permanent, long terms began to be more frequent than before, and were afterwards extensively introduced, being found extremely convenient for family settlements and mortgages; continuing subject, however, to the same rules of succession, and with the same inferiority to freeholds, as when they were little better than tenancies at the will of the landlord. 2 Comm. c. 9.

Every estate which must expire at a period certain and prefixed, by whatever words created, is an estate for years, and therefore this estate is frequently called a term, terminus, because its duration or continuance is bounded, limited, and determined; for every such estate must have a certain beginning and certain end. Co. Lit. 45.

A demise having no certain commencement is void; for every contract sufficient to make a lease ought to have certainty in commencement, in the continuance, and in the end. Vaugh. 85; 6 Rep. 53.

But id certum est, quod certum reddi potest: therefore if a man make a lease to another, for so many years as J. S. shall name, it is a good lease for years; for though it is at present uncertain, yet when J. S. hath named the years, it is then reduced to a certainty. 6 Rep. 35. If no day of commencement is named in the creation of this estate, it begins from the making or delivery of the lease. Co. Lit. 46. A lease for so many years as J. S. shall live is void from the beginning; for it is neither certain, nor can ever be reduced to a certainty, during the continuance of the lease. Co. Lit. 45. And the same doctrine holds if a parson make a lease of his glebe for so many years as he shall continue parson of Dale, for this is still more uncertain. But a lease for twenty or more years, if J. S. shall so long live, or if he should so long continue parson, is good; for there is a certain period fixed beyond which it cannot last, though it may determine sooner on the death of J. S. or his ceasing to be parson there. Co. Lit. 45.

The law reckons an estate for years inferior in interest, as compared to an estate for life, or an inheritance; an estate for life, even if it be pur autre vie, is a freehold; but an estate for a thousand years is only a chattel, and reckoned part of the personal estate. Co. Lit. 45. Hence it follows, that a lease for years may be made to commence in futuro, though a lease for life cannot. As if one grants lands to another to hold from Michaelmas next for twenty years, this is good; but to hold from Michaelmas next for the term of his natural life, is void. For no estate of freehold can commence in futuro, because it cannot be created at common law without livery of seisin, or corporal possession of the land; and corporal possession cannot be given of an estate now, which is not to commence now, but hereafter. 5 Rep. 94. And because no livery of seisin is necessary to a lease for years, such lessee is not said to be seised, or to have true legal seisin of the lands. Nor indeed does the bare lease vest any estate in the lessee; but only gives him a right of entry on the tenement, which right is called, as has been already remarked, his interest in the term, or interesse termini; but when he has actually so entered, and thereby accepted the grant, the estate is then and not before vested in him, and he is possessed, not properly of the land, but of the term of years; the possession or seisin of the land remaining still in him who hath the freehold. Co. Lit. 46. Thus the word term does not merely signify the time specified in the lease, but the estate also and interest that passes by that lease; and therefore the term may expire, during the continuance of the time, as by surrender, forfeiture, and the like. For which reason if one grant a lease to A. for the term of three years, and after the expiration of the said term, to B. for six years, and A. surrenders or forfeits his lease at the end of one year, B.'s interest shall immediately take effect; but if the remainder had been to B. from and after the expiration of the said three years, or from or after the expiration of the said time, in this case B.'s interest will not commence till the time is fully elapsed, whatever may become of A.'s term. Co. Lit. 45.

A freehold lease for three lives differs from a chattel lease only in this, viz. that the habendum is to the lessee, his heirs and assigns, for and during the natural lives of him the said C. D., E. his wife, and T. D. his son, and during the natural life of every and either of them longest living. And in every covenant, the lessee covenants for himself, his heirs and assigns; and the covenants are the same as in a chattel lease, with the addition of a letter of attorney at the end, to deliver possession and seisin, as in a deed of feoffment. Diet.

Though a lease for life cannot be made to commence in futuro, by the common law, because livery cannot be made to a future estate, yet where a lease is made for life, habendum at a day to come, and after the day the lessor makes livery, there it shall be good; and a lease in reversion may be made for life, which commences at a day that is future. 5 Rep. 94; Hob. 814; 1 Inst. 5. A lease for years may begin from a day past, or to come, at Michaelmas last, Christmas next, three or four years after, or after the death of the lessor, &c. though a term cannot commence upon a contingency which depends on another contingency. 1 Inst. 5; 1 Rep. 156. If one make a lease for years, after the death of A. B. if he die within ten years, this is a good lease, in case he dies within that time, otherwise not. Plowd. 70. And where a man has a lease of lands for eighty years, and he grants it to another to hold for thirty years, to begin after his death, it will be good for the whole thirty years, provided there be so many of the eighty to come at the time of the death of the lessor. Bro. Grant. 54; 1 Rep. 155. A lease made from the lessor's death, until a certain year, (i. e. A. D. 1800,) is good; and if a lease be during the minority of J. S. or until he shall come to the age of twenty-one years, these are good leases; and if he dies before his full age, the lease is ended. Hob. 155. A person grants a rent of 20*l.* a year till one hundred pounds be paid, it is a lease of the rent for five years. Co. Lit. 42. If a man makes a lease of land to another, until he shall levy out of the profits one hundred pounds, or he is paid that sum, &c. this will be a lease for life, determinable on the payment of the hundred pounds, if livery and seisin be made; but if there is no livery, it will not be good for years, but void for uncertainty. 21 Assis. 18; Plowd. 27; 6 Rep. 35. See Livery of Seisin.

A lease for years to such person as A. B. shall name, is not good; though it may be for so many years as he shall name, not as shall be named by his executors, &c. for it must be in the lifetime of the parties. Hob. 173; Moor. 911.

If one makes a lease for a year, and so from year to year, it is a lease for two years; and afterwards it is but an estate at will. 1 Mod. 4; 1 Lutm. 213. And if from three years to three years, it is a good lease for six years; also if a man make a lease for years without saying for how many, it may be good for two years, to answer the plural number. Wood's Instit. 265.

If a parson makes a lease of his glebe for three years, and so from three years to three years, so long as he shall be parson, it is a good lease for six years, if he continue parson so long. 6 Rep. 35; 3 Cro. 511.

Lease for one year, and so for two or three years, or any further term of years, as lessor and lessee shall think fit and agree, after the expiration of the said term of one year; this is a good lease for two years; and after every subsequent year begun, is not determinable till that be ended. 1 Wils. part 1, p. 262. But if the original contract were only for a year, or if it were at so much per annum rent, without mentioning any time certain, it would be a tenancy at will after the expiration of the year; unless there were some evidence by a regular payment of rent, annually or half-yearly, that the intent of the parties was that he should be tenant for a year. Bull. N. P. 84 (2d ed.)

In case of a tenancy from year to year, as long as both parties please, if the tenant die intestate, his administrator has the same interest in the land which the intestate had. 3 T. R. 18.

A lessee hath a term for a year by parol, and so from year to year, so long as both parties please; if the lessee enters on a second year, he is bound for that year, and so on; and if there is a lease by deed for a year, and so from year to year as long as both parties agree, this is binding but for one year; though if the lessee enters upon the second year, he is for that year bound: if it is for a year, and so from year to year, so long as both parties agree, till six years expire, this is a lease for six years, but determinable every year at the will of either party; but if it is for a year, and so from year to year till six years determine, this is a certain lease for six years. Mod. Ca. 215. If A. make a lease of land to B. for ten years, and it is agreed between them that he shall pay fifty pounds at the end of the said term, and if he do so, and pay fifty pounds at the end of every ten years, then the said B. shall have a perpetual demise and grant of the lands, from ten years to ten years continually following, extra memoriam hominum, &c. Though this be a good lease for the first ten years, as for all the rest it is uncertain and void; by covenant a further lease may be made for the like term of years. Plowd. 192; 2 Shep. Abr. 376.

A. and B. covenant in a lease for sixty-one years, "that at any time within one year after the expiration of twenty years of the said term of sixty-one years, upon the request of the lessee, and his paying 6*l.* to the lessors, they would execute another lease of the premises unto the lessee, for and during the further term of twenty years, to commence from and after the expiration of the said term of sixty-one years, and so in like manner at the end and expiration of every twenty years, during the said term of sixty-one years, for the like consideration, and upon the like request, would execute another lease for the further term of twenty years, to commence at and from the expiration of the term then last before granted." Under this covenant the lessee cannot claim a further term of twenty years after the end of the lease, if he has omitted to claim a farther term at the end of the first and second twenty years in the lease. 1 T. R. 229. See Bateman v. Murray, Parl. Cases, tit. Lease.

A lease made to a man for seven years, if D. shall live so long, who is dead when the lease is made; by this the lessee hath an absolute lease for seven years. 9 Rep. 63. Lease for life is granted, and says, that if the lessee within one year do not pay 20*s.* then he shall have but a lease for two years; here, if he pays not the money, he shall have only the two years, although livery of seisin be had thereon. 1 Inst. 218. If a lease be made to A. B. during his own life and the lives of C. and D. it is one entire estate of freehold, and shall continue during the three lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and though the lessee can have it no longer than his own life, yet his assignee shall have the benefit of it so long as the other two are living. 5 Rep. 18; Moor. 32. Where one grants land by lease to A. B. and C. D., to hold to them during their lives, although the words "and the longest liver of them" be omitted, they shall hold it during the life of the longest liver. 5 Rep. 9. A lease is made to a person for sixty years, if A. B. and C. D. so long live; and afterwards A. B. dies, by his death the lease is determined. Though if the lease be made to one for the lives of A. B. and C. D. the freehold doth not determine by the death of one of them; and if in the other case of a term, the words or "either of them" be inserted in the lease, it will be good for both their lives. 15 Rep. 66.

A lease was made to a man for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live; and if he died within the term, the son to have it for the residue of the term; this was adjudged void as to the son, because there can be no limitation of the residue of a term which is determined. Cro. Eliz. 216. But if the words of the lease be, to hold during the residue of the ninety-nine years, and not during the rest of the term, in this case it may be good to the son also. 1 Rep. 158; Dyer, 253.

A lease was made for twenty-one years, if the lessee lived so long, and in the service of the lessor; the lessor died within the term, and yet it was held that the lease continued, for it was by the act of God that the lessee could serve no longer. Cro. Eliz. 643.

If a lease be to a man and to her whom he shall take to wife, it is void; because there ought to be such persons at the time of the commencement of the lease which might take. 4 Leon. 158. When a lease in reversion is granted as such after another lease, and that lease is void by assuage, &c. the reversionary lease, expectant upon the lease for years that is void, is void also. Cro. Car. 289. But where a man recites a lease, when in truth there is no lease, or a lease which is void, and misrecites the same in a point material, and grants a further lease, to commence after the determination thereof; in such case the new lease shall begin from the time of delivery. Dyer, 93; 6 Rep. 36; Vaugh. 73, 80, &c.

A man makes a lease for years to one, and afterwards makes a lease for years to another, of the same land; the second lease is not void, but shall be good for so many years thereof as shall come after the first lease ended. Noy's Max. 67. And if one make a lease for years, and afterwards the lessor enters upon the lands let, before the term is expired, and makes a lease of these lands to another, this second lease is a good lease until the lessee doth re-enter; and then the first lease is revived, and he is in thereby. 2 Lill. Abr. 152. It hath been held that a lease may be void as to one, and stand good to another; and leases voidable or void for the present, may after become good again. 1 Inst. 46; 3 Rep. 51. If a lease be made to two, to hold to them and two others, it is voidable as to the two other persons; and when the two first die, the lease is at an end. 2 Leon. 1.

A lease which is only voidable, and not absolutely void, must be made void by the lessor by re-entry; but if a lease be void absolutely, there needs no re-entry; and as a voidable lease is made void by re-entry, and putting out the lessee, so it is affirmed by accepting and receiving the rent, which acknowledges the lessee to be tenant. 21 Car. B. R.; 2 Lil. 149.

When a term for years in lease, and a fee-simple, meet in one person, the lease is drowned in the inheritance; yet in some cases it may have continuance, to make good charges and payments, &c. Poph. 39; 2 Nels. Abr. 1100. If a lease for years is made to a man and his heirs, it shall go to his executors. 1 Inst. 46, 388. And a lease for years, notwithstanding it be a very long lease, cannot be intailed by deed; but may be assigned in trust to several uses. 2 Lil. Abr. 150. A lease is sealed by the lessor, and the lessee hath not sealed the counterpart, action of covenant may be brought upon the lease against the lessor; but where the lease is sealed by the lessee, and not the lessor, nothing operates. Yels. 18; Owen, 100.

If lessee for years loses his lease, if it can be proved that there was such a term let to him by lease, and that is not determined, he shall not lose his term; so it is of any other estate in lands, if the deed that created it be lost, for the estate in the land is derived from the party that made it, and not from the deed, otherwise than instrumentally and declarative of the mind and intent of the party, &c. 2 Lil. Abr. 152.

A man out of possession cannot make a lease of lands, without entering and sealing the lease upon the land. Dalis. 81. The lessee is to enter on the premises let; and such lessee for years is not in possession, so as to bring trespass, &c. until actual entry; but he may grant over his term before entry. 1 Inst. 46; 2 Lil. 160. If a lessee of a future interest never enters by virtue of his term, but enters before, and continues after the commencement of the term, and then the lessor ousts him, the lessee may assign over his term of the land. 1 Lev. 47. But a lease to begin at Michaelmas, if the lessee enters before Michaelmas, and continues the possession immediately, is a disseisin. Ibid. 46.

If a lease be made of a close of land, by a certain name, in the parish of A., in the county of B., whereas the close is in another county, the said parish extending into both counties, such a lease is good to pass such land; though where a house is leased without a name, and the parish is mistaken, it hath been held otherwise. Dyer, 276, 292.

Land and mines are leased to a tenant; this only extends to the open mines, and the lessee shall not have any others, if there are such; and if land and timber are demised, the lessee is not empowered to sell it. 2 Lev. 184; 2 Mod. 193. A man makes a lease of lands for life, or years, the lessee hath but a special interest in the timber trees, as annexed to the land, to have the mast and shadow for his cattle; and when they are severed from the lands, or blown down with wind, the lessor shall have them as parcel of his inheritance. 4 Rep. 62; 11 Rep. 81.

A demise of premises in Westminster, late in the occupation of A., particularly describing them, part of which was a yard, does not pass a cellar situate under that yard, which was then in the occupation of B., another tenant to the lessor; and the lessor in an ejectment brought to recover the cellar, is not estopped by his deed from going into evidence, to show that the cellar was not intended to be demised. Whether parcel or not of the thing demised is always matter of evidence. 1 T. R. 701.

Declarations by tenants are admissible evidence after their death, to show that a certain piece of land is parcel of the estate which they occupied; and proof that they exercised acts of ownership in it, not resisted by contrary evidence, is decisive. 2 T. R. 53.

If the substance of a lease be put in writing, and signed by the parties, though it be not sealed, it shall have the effect of a lease for years, &c. Wood's Inst. 266. But a lease in writing, though not under seal, cannot be given in evidence, unless it be stamped. 1 T. R. 735. Articles with covenant to let and make a lease of lands, for a certain term, at so much rent, have been adjudged a lease. Cro. Eliz. 486. In a covenant with the words "have, possess, and occupy lands, in consideration of a yearly rent," without the word demise, it was held a good lease; and a licence to occupy, take the profits, &c. which passeth an interest, amounts to a lease. 3 Bulst. 204; 3 Salk. 223. An agreement of the parties, that the lessee shall enjoy the lands, will make a lease; but if the agreement hath a reference to the lease to be made, and implies an intent not to be perfected till then, it is not a perfect lease until made afterwards. Bridg. 18; 2 Shep. Abr. 374. If a man, on promise of a lease to be made to him, lays out money on the premises, he shall oblige the lessor afterwards to make the lease; the agreement being executed on the lessee's part, where no such expense hath been, a bare promise of the lease for a term of years, though the lessee have possession, shall not be good without some writing. Preced. Chan. 561. See Agreement.

A paper containing words of present contract, with an agreement that the lessee should take possession immediately, and that a lease should be executed in future, operates only as an agreement for a lease, and not as a lease itself. 1 T. R. 735. But an instrument containing words of present demise will operate as a lease, if such appears to be the intention of the parties, though it contain a clause for a future lease. Poole v. Bentley, 12 East, 168; 15 East, R. 244; 3 Taunt. 65.

An instrument on an agreement-stamp reciting that A. in case he should be entitled to certain copyhold premises on the death of B. would immediately demise the same to C., declaring that he did thereby agree to demise and let the same, with a subsequent covenant to procure a licence to let from the lord, operates as an agreement for a lease, and not as an absolute demise. 2 T. R. 739.

Words in an agreement that A. shall hold and enjoy, &c. if not accompanied with restraining words, operate as words of present demise; otherwise, if they be followed by others, which show that the parties intended that there should be a lease in future. The whole must depend on the intention of the parties. 5 T. R. 163.

These words in an instrument, "Be it remembered, that I. B. hath let, and by these presents doth demise," &c. held to operate as a present demise, although the instrument contained a further covenant for a future lease. 5 T. R. 165.

The provision as to a future lease does not necessarily prevent the instrument from operating as a present demise, especially if the terms of the future lease are ascertained at the time of signing the instrument. 8 Bing. 182. It is to be collected from the whole instrument, whether it is intended to operate as a present demise or as a mere executory agreement. 7 Bing. 590; 8 Bing. 178. Though the words are "agree to let," it may be a present demise, if such appears the intention. 7 Bing. 594. If the words of the instrument are ambiguous, the court will call in aid the acts of the parties done under it as a clue to their intention. 8 Bing. 181. "G. F. does this day agree to let to J. S. three cottages for ten years; he further agrees to build a store-house, and make a cellar, at the rent of 35*l.*; he agrees to pay the ground rent, and has this day received 4*l.* from J. S. in earnest." Held, an actual demise, and not a mere agreement. 7 Bing. 590; and see 8 Bing. 178; 2 N. & M. 187.

A lease at will, is at the will of the lessor or lessee, or regularly at the will of both parties. 1 Inst. 55. According to the strict letter of the old law, such a tenancy, as it existed only by the mutual will of the lord and tenant, might have been put an end to at any time by either party. Co. Lit. 55*a*; 2 Comm. 145. But in modern times estates at will have been looked upon with an unfavourable eye by the courts of law, and it is now clearly settled that where the relation of landlord and tenant is created without any limitation as to time, it is a tenancy from year to year, and not determinable at the will of either party, not even at the end of the current year, unless by a regular notice to quit. 3 T. R. 16; 6 T. R. 297; 7 T. R. 83; 8 T. R. 3; 3 East, 165. However a tenancy at will may still be created if two parties agree to let and take certain premises so long as both shall please, reserving a compensation accruing from day to day, without reference to any aliquot portion of a year; this will be strictly a tenancy at will. 4 Taunt. 128. And it would seem that a person who is permitted to live in a house rent-free, and without any limitation as to time, is still in the eye of law a tenant at will. Russ. & R. C. C. 498, 525. And see post, 4.

2. All persons seised or possessed of lands, may dispose of them according to the nature and quantity of their estates, provided they are under no legal disability. Where such disability exists, the demise may be either void or voidable.

He that is seised of an estate for life, may make a lease for his life according as he is seised; also he may make a lease for years of the estate, and it shall be good as long as the estate for life doth last; one possessed of lands for years may make a lease for all the years except one day, or any short part of the term; and if lessee for years make a lease for life, the lessee may enjoy it for the lessor's life, if the term of years last so long; but if he gives livery and seisin upon it, this is a forfeiture of the estate for years. Wood's Inst. 267.

If a person having an interest for three years make a lease for five years, it will be good for the three years, for though he exceed his authority, the lease is only void for the excess. Bull. N. P. 106.

If tenant in tail or for life make a lease generally, it shall be construed for his own life. 1 Inst. 42.

No restraint is imposed on civil corporations, as mayor and commonalty, bailiffs, burgesses, and the like, by common law or by statute, and they may therefore, consistently with their bye-laws, lease their lands for life or years, so as to bind their successors. 1 Sid. 161, 162.

With respect to statutable leases by ecclesiastical corporations, and tenants in tail, see post, II.

Joint-tenants, tenants in common, and coparceners, may make leases for life, years, or at will, of their own parts, which shall bind their companions; and in some cases, persons who are not seised of lands in fee, &c. may make leases for life or years, by special power enabling them to do it; when the authority must be exactly pursued. Wood's Inst. 267. But there is a difference, where there is a general power to make leases, and a particular power. See ante, and 8 Rep. 69.

If joint-tenants join in a lease, this shall be but one lease, for they have but one freehold; but if tenants in common join in a lease, it shall be several leases of their several interests. 2 Ro. Abr. 64; Com. Dig. tit. Estates, (G. 6.); Bac. Abr. Leases, (15.)

A lease by a feme covert is altogether void, for by marriage the free agency of the woman is suspended. Co. Lit. 46 b, 551 b; 2 Comm. 293.

If an infant be seised of land in fee-simple, and he make a lease for years of it, rendering no rent, this lease is void; but if there be a rent reserved upon the lease, then the lease is but voidable, and may, by the acceptance of the rent by the infant after his full age, be made good. Shep. Touchst. c. 14, cites 9 H. 7. c. 24; 18 E. 4. c. 2; Plowd. 545. In 3 Burr. 1806, it is said to have been long settled, that an infant may make a lease without rent, to try his title; and that all leases by an infant, whether with or without rent, if made by deed, are voidable only. See Infant, and Bac. Abr. tit. Leases B.; and addenda, (ed. by Gwillim & Dodd.)

By 1 W. 4. c. 65. § 12. infants and femes covert may by their guardians, &c. apply to the Courts of Chancery or Exchequer, or to the Courts of Equity of the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham, as to land within their jurisdiction, by petition or motion in a summary way; and by the order of those Courts respectively may by deed surrender leases for lives or years, and take new leases for lives or years of the premises comprised therein.

By § 16. infants and femes covert may, under the direction of the Court of Chancery, accept of surrenders of leases, and grant renewals thereof; and by § 17. infants may grant leases of their lands, under the direction of the Court, where it is for the benefit of their estates.

By § 18. if persons bound to renew are out of the jurisdiction of the Court, it may, on the petition of the parties entitled to such renewals, appoint persons to renew leases in the names of the individuals who ought to have renewed.

An idiot, or person non compos mentis, may make leases which will be prima facie binding; though after office found, the king, as guardian of insane persons, may avoid such leases. Co. Lit. 247 a; 4 Rep. 123; and so after his death, they may be avoided by his heir. Ibid.

For the provisions of the 1 W. 4. c. 65. with respect to leases to or by lunatics, see Idiots, IV. 2.

By various acts of parliament, and also by private settlements, a power is granted of making leases in possession, but not in reversion, for a certain time; the object being that the estate may not be incumbered, by the act of the party, beyond a specific time. Yet persons who had this limited power of making in possession only, had frequently demised the premises to hold from the day of the date; and the Courts in several instances had determined that the words "from the day of the date," excluded the day of making the deed, and that in consequence these were leases in reversion, and void; but this question having been brought again before the Court of B. R., it was determined that the words "from the day" might either be inclusive or exclusive; and therefore that they ought to be construed so as to effectuate these important deeds, and not to destroy them. Pugh v. Leeds, (Duke,) Comp. 714; and see Doug. 53, 185, in notis.

The lease of a tenant for life, who has power of leasing under certain conditions, must strictly comply with the conditions; and if it vary from them in the interest demised, or the rent reserved, it cannot be supported against the remainder-man. 5 T. R. 567.

Under a settlement, with power to every tenant for life in possession to lease for any term of years not exceeding 21 years, or for the life or lives of any one, two, or three person or persons, so as no greater estate than for three lives, be at any one time in being in any part of the premises; held that a lease made by tenant for life for ninety-nine years, determinable on lives, as it might exceed twenty-one years, was void at law, and not even good pro tanto for the twenty-one years. 10 East, 158.

Of all kinds of power the most frequent is that to make leases. In the making such leases, all the requisites particularly specified in the power must be strictly observed; and such leases must contain all such beneficial clauses and reservations as ought to be for the benefit of the remainder-man; the principle being, that the estate must come to him in as beneficial a manner as the ancient holders held it. See 1 Burr. 120, and tit. Power.—If a man hath power to lease for ten years, and he leaseth for twenty, the lease shall be good in equity for ten years. 1 Ch. Ca. 28. See further Shep. Touchst. c. 14, in n.

Where lessor leased lands which he held in fee, with others, of which he was only tenant for life, at one entire rent, and the lease was not well executed according to the power, it was held, that the lease was good for the lands in fee, though bad for the other lands, for the rent might be apportioned. 2 Mau. & Sel. 276.

A lease executed by the tenant for life, in which the reversioner, who was then under age, is named, but who does not execute the lease, is void on the death of the tenant for life; and an execution by the reversioner only afterwards is no confirmation of it, so as to bind the lessee in an action of covenant. 1 T. R. 86.

Under the settlement of an estate with a power to the tenant in possession to let all or any part of the premises, so as the usual rents be reserved, a lease of tithes which had not been let before was held void. In these cases, the intention of the parties is to govern the Court in construing the power. 3 T. R. 665.

Where tenant for life has a power "to grant leases in possession, but not by way of reversion or future interest," a lease per verba de presenti is not contrary to the power; though the estate, at the time of making the lease, was held by tenants at will, or from year to year; if, at the time, they received directions from the grantor of the lease to pay their rent to the lessee. Dougl. 565, Goodtitle v. Fenucan.

Under a power to demise for twenty-one years in possession, and not in reversion, a lease dated in fact on 17th February, habendum from 25th March next ensuing, the date thereof, is good if not executed and delivered till after the 25th March, for it then takes effect as a lease in possession with reference back to the date actually expressed. 10 E. R. 427.

A lease purported on the face of it to have been made on the 25th of March, 1783, habendum to the lessee from the 25th of March now last past, for 35 years. There was evidence to show that the lease was not executed until after the 25th March, 1783. Held, that it took effect from the delivery, and not from the date; and consequently that the term commenced on the 25th March, 1783, and not on the 25th of March, 1782. 4 B. & C. 272, and see ibid. 908.

Under a power "to lease all manors, messuages, lands, &c. so as there be reserved as much rent as is now paid for the same," such parts of the estates enumerated in the power as have never been demised may be let; but in a family settlement of an estate consisting of some ground always occupied with the family seat, and of lands let to tenants upon rents reserved, the qualification annexed to the power of leasing, "that the ancient rent must be reserved," excludes the mansion-house and lands about it never let. Doug. 565—9, 574.

Under a power to lease, reserving the best rent, a lease at £43 a year cannot be impeached by shewing that two specific offers to give £50 and £60 for the premises were rejected by the lessor, for all other requisites of a good tenant may be regarded by him as well as the mere amount of the rent offered. 10 East, 278.

Where premises have been jointly let by one demise at one rent, and the power directs that the letting shall be at the accustomed rent, a part of such premises may be demised, reserving a rent bearing the same proportion to the old rent that the premises demised by the new lease bore to the whole premises formerly demised. 5 B. & Adol. 363.

Under a power to a tenant for life to lease for years, reserving the usual covenants, &c. a lease made by him containing a proviso that in case the premises were blown down or burned, the lessor should rebuild, otherwise the rent should cease, was held void, the jury finding that such covenant was unusual. 1 T. R. 705.

By the Bankrupt Act, 6 G. 4. c. 16. § 77. the powers vested in any bankrupt, which he might execute for his own benefit, may be executed by his assignees; and this clause, of course, extends to any power of leasing which he may possess.

By the Insolvent Act, 7 G. 4. c. 57. and which has been continued by subsequent statutes, powers of leasing vested in insolvents may be exercised by their assignees.

3. If a house falls down by tempest, &c. the lessee hath an interest to take the timber to re-edify it for his habitation. 4 Rep. 63.

Tenants suffering houses to be uncovered or in decay; taking away wainscot, &c. fixed to the freehold, unless put up by the lessee and taken down before the term is expired; cutting down timber-trees to sell; permitting young trees to be destroyed by cattle, &c.; ploughing up ground that time out of mind hath not been ploughed; not keeping banks in repair, &c. are guilty of waste. 1 Inst. 52; Dyer, 37; 1 Salk. 368.

Lessees are bound to repair their tenements, except it be mentioned in the lease to the contrary. Though a lessee for years is not obliged to repair the house let to him, which is burnt by accident, if there be not a special covenant in the lease that he shall leave the house in good repair at the end of the term; yet if the house be burnt by negligence, the lessee shall repair it, although there be no such covenant. Pasch. 24 Char. B. R. A lessee at will is not bound to sustain or repair, as tenant for years is. If the house of such tenant is burnt down by negligence, action lies not against the tenant; but action lies for voluntary waste, in pulling down houses or cutting woods, &c. 5 Rep. 13. See Fire.

In an action of covenant for non-repair, the question is, whether the covenant to repair has been substantially complied with. Minute damage, as the non-repair of the broken glass of a sky-light, is not sufficient to constitute a breach; and where the verdict is for the defendant, the court will not grant a new trial to enable the plaintiff to recover nominal damages. 1 M. & Rob. 173.

A lessee who covenants to pay rent and to repair, with an exception of casualties by fire, is liable upon the covenant for rent, though the premises are burnt down, and not rebuilt by the lessor after notice. 1 T. R. 310; Anstr. Rep. Scac. 687; or if there is no covenant under seal, the landlord may in such case recover for use and occupation; Baker v. Holtzapffel, 4 Taunt. 45; sed vide Ry. & Moo. 268, from which it appears the tenant cannot be liable in this action if he has no beneficial occupation; but see Brown v. Quilter, Amb. 619, where the tenant was relieved in equity, the landlord having recovered the value against the insurer: but in general equity will not relieve or grant an injunction in such a case; Holtzapffel v. Baker, 18 Ves. 115.

A covenant on the part of the lessor, at the end of eighteen years of the term, or before, on the request of the lessee, to grant a new lease of the premises for the like term of twenty-one years, at the like rent, with all covenants as in that indenture contained, was held to be satisfied by a tender of such a new lease, containing all the former covenants, except the covenant for future renewal. 7 East, 237. See Comp. 819.

A lessee of land in the Bedford Level cannot, to an action by his landlord for a breach of covenant, object that the lease was void by the 15 Car. 2. c. 17. because not registered; that act not avoiding it between the parties themselves, but only postponing its priority with respect to subsequent incumbrances. 10 Last, 350.

Covenant will lie against an original lessee, before he takes actual possession; and so before actual possession, against an assignee, under an absolute indefeasible assignment of the whole interest in the term; and against a mortgagee of the term, though he has never entered. Williams v. Bosunquet, 1 Brod. & B. 238, which over-rules the contrary decision of Eaton v. Jaques, Dough. 455.

A covenant on the part of a lessor, his executors, &c. and assigns, not to hire persons to work on the premises, who were settled in other parishes, without a parish certificate, was held not to run with the land, or bind the assignee of the lessee. 10 East, 130.

But a covenant in a lease, that the lessee, his executors and administrators, shall constantly reside on the demised premises during the demise, is binding on the assignee of the lessee, though he be not named. 2 H. Bla. 133.

Whether a covenant by the lessee to insure is, in general, a covenant running with the land, is a question not decided; but if all the premises are situate within the London bills of mortality, it is decided to be so, since the Building Act, which extends to that district, compels the insurance office to have the money insured laid out in rebuilding the premises. Vernon v. Smith, 5 B. & A. 1.

If a lease contain a covenant that the lessee, his executors, &c. shall not set, let, or assign over, the whole or part of the premises, without leave in writing, on pain of forfeiting the lease, the administratrix of the lessee cannot under-let without incurring a forfeiture, though for less time than the whole term: a parol licence to let part of the premises does not discharge the lessee from the restriction of such a proviso. 2 T. R. 425. And so even if part be let to be occupied exclusively by a partner, the original lessee still residing in part of the premises. 1 M. & S. 297.

Where the lessee covenanted not to allow any trade or business to be exercised upon the premises, held that the assignment of the lease to a schoolmaster who had sixty pupils was a breach of this covenant. 1 M. & S. 95.

An assignee of a bankrupt, a devisee, and a personal representative, are assignees in law to the purpose of being liable to actions on a covenant for rent in a lease to the bankrupt, devisor, or intestate. Dougl. 184. But whether the transfer to them was such an assignment as would occasion a forfeiture under a provision not to assign, was for some time a much litigated question. 3 Wils. 237. Dougl. 184, in note. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 100. It is, however, now settled, that the common covenant and proviso against assigning do not apply to assignments in law, and that the assignee under a commission of bankrupt may assign a lease without consent of the lessor, notwithstanding such proviso. 3 M. & S. 358.

And so a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, on which a lease is taken in execution, and sold, is no forfeiture of the lease under a covenant not to let, set, assign, &c. 8 T. R. 57. But it being afterwards proved that the tenant gave the warrant of attorney to the creditor for the express purpose of enabling the creditor to take the lease in execution, this was held a fraud on the covenant, and the landlord recovered the premises in ejectment. 8 T. R. 300.

However, a special provision guarding against the bankruptcy of the tenant, may be inserted; for instance, a proviso in a lease for twenty-one years, that the landlord shall re-enter on the tenant's committing any act of bankruptcy, whereon a commission shall issue, is good. 2 T. R. 133.

And so where one leased for twenty-one years, if the tenant, his executors, &c. should so long continue to inhabit and dwell in the farm-house, and actually occupy the lands, &c., and not let, or assign over, or part with the lease: held that the tenant having become bankrupt, and the assignees having sold the lease, and the bankrupt being out of possession and occupation of the farm, the lessor might maintain ejectment without a previous re-entry. 8 East, 185.

The bankruptcy of the lessee was formerly no bar to an action of covenant (made before his bankruptcy) brought against him for rent due after the bankruptcy. 4 T. R. 94. But now the bankrupt will be discharged from the rent and covenants if the assignees accept the lease; or in case they decline it, if the bankrupt, within fourteen days after notice of their declining, shall deliver up the lease to the lessor; 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. § 75. The former bankrupt act (49 Geo. 3. c. 121. § 19.) was held only to apply to cases between the lessor and lessee, and not to cases between the lessee and the assignee of the lessee. Buck, 189; 3 B. & A. 521. And the lessee who has assigned over, is not discharged by the circumstance of his assignee having become bankrupt, and having delivered up the lease to the lessor; for the statute of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. does not put an end to the lease, but merely discharges the bankrupt personally from the rents and covenants. 3 B. & Adol. 211.

Though a bankrupt cannot give a lien on any particular goods, yet he may take a demise, and agree that the rent shall be payable on a particular day, e. g. he may agree to pay half-a-year's rent in advance, where by the custom of the country half-a-year's rent becomes due on the day on which a tenant enters: and in this case the law gives the landlord a power of distraining on that day. 2 T. R. 600. See Distress, Rent.

If both lessee and lessor sign a lease, the lessee is estopped from pleading nil habuit in tenementis to an action of debt for rent by the lessor. 6 T. R. 62.

Under a proviso that all assignments of a lease shall be void if not enrolled, under-leases are not included; and an under-lease is no assignment to the effect of working a forfeiture under a proviso not to assign. Dougl. 56 to 58, 184. But what cannot be supported as an assignment, shall be good as an under-lease, against the party granting it. Dougl. 188, in note.

When the whole term is made over by the lessee, although in the deed by which that is done, the rent and a power of entry for non-payment is reserved to him, and not to the original lessor, this is an assignment and not an under-lease. Palmer v. Edwards, Dougl. 187, in note; and 8 Taunt. 593;

but it has lately been held, that it is a lease and not an assignment, though it is clear that in such a case the lessor cannot distrain, since he has no reversion. Preece v. Corrie, 5 Bing. 24. However, in Curtis v. Wheeler, Moo. & Mal. 493, it was held by Lord Tenterden, that a tenant from year to year, under-letting from year to year, had a reversion which entitled him to distrain. In that case the under-lease was of parts of the premises demised.

A landlord cannot maintain an action of covenant for rent against an under-tenant who holds for a term less than the time granted in the original lease. Hadford v. Hatch, Dougl. 12.

A lessee for twenty-one years, at a pepper-corn rent for the first half-year, and a rack-rent for the rest of the term, who by agreement was to put the premises in repair, and covenanted to pay the land-tax, and all other taxes, rates, assessments, and impositions, having assigned his term for a small sum in gross, was held not to be liable to pay the expense of a party-wall, either by the provisions of 11 Geo. 3. c. 78. § 41. or by the covenant, but the charge must in such case be borne by the original landlord; for the statute intended to throw that burthen on persons to whom long leases had been granted, with a view to an improvement of the estate, and who afterwards under-let at a considerable increase of rent. 8 T. R. 458.

A lessor, who has a right of re-entry for breach of a covenant not to under-let, does not, by waiving his re-entry on one under-letting, lose his right on a subsequent similar cause of forfeiture. 4 Taunt. 735.

And if a lessee exercise a trade contrary to the covenants of his lease, the landlord does not, by merely lying by and witnessing the act for six years, waive the forfeiture, for there must be an express waiver. 3 Taunt. 78.

So a right of re-entry, accruing by the tenant's omission to repair within three months after notice, is not waived by the acceptance of rent falling due during the three months. And such right is only suspended, not waived, by an agreement to allow the tenant further time to repair. 1 N. & M. 1.

Where a tenant for years under a lease delivered up possession of the premises and the lease, in fraud of his landlord, to a person claiming under a hostile title, with the intention of enabling him to assert such hostile title, and not to hold under the lease, it was held a forfeiture of the term. 1 C. M. & R. 187.

By 32 Hen. 8. c. 34. grantees of reversions have the same remedy against lessees, their executors, &c. as their grantors had. See Covenant, III.

4. Lands are leased at will, the lessee cannot determine his will before or after the day of payment of the rent, but it must be done on that very day; and the law will not allow the lessee to do it to the prejudice of the lessor, as to the rent; nor that the lessor shall determine his will to the prejudice of the lessee, after the land is sown with corn, &c. Sid. 339; Lev. 109. For where lessee at will sows the land, if he does not himself determine the will, he shall have the corn; and where tenant for life sows the corn, and dies, his executors shall have it; but it is not so of tenant for years, where the term ends before the corn is ripe, &c. 5 Rep. 116. The lessor and lessee, where the estate is at will, may determine the will when they please; but if the lessor doth it within a quarter, he shall lose that quarter's rent; and if the lessee doth it, he must pay a quarter's rent. 2 Salk. 413. By words spoken on the ground, by the lessor in the absence of the lessee, the will is not determined, but the lessee is to have notice. 1 Inst. 55. If a man makes a lease at will, and dies, the will is determined; and if the tenant continues in possession, he is tenant at sufferance. Ibid. 57. But where a lessor makes an estate at will to two or three persons, and one of them dies, it has been adjudged this doth not determine the estate at will. 5 Rep. 10. Tenant at will grants over his estate to another, it determines his will. 1 Inst. 57.

As to the time when the landlord's right to make an entry or distress, or bring an action, to recover land in the possession of a tenant at will, is to be deemed to have accrued, see 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 7. under tit. Limitation of Actions.

Tenant for term of years hath incident to and inseparable from his estate, unless by special agreement, the same estovers which tenant for life is entitled to, that is to say, house-bote, fire-bote, plough-bote, and hay-bote. Co. Lit. 45. See Bote, Estovers.

With regard to emblements, or the profits of lands sowed by tenant for years, there is this difference between him and tenant for life, that where the term of tenant for years depends upon a certainty, as if he holds from Midsummer for ten years, and in the last year he sows a crop of corn, and it is not ripe and cut before Midsummer, the end of his term, the landlord shall have it, for the tenant knew the expiration of his term, and therefore it was his own folly to sow what he could never reap the profits of. Lit. § 68. But where the lease for years depends upon an uncertainty, as upon the death of the lessor, being himself only tenant for life, or being a husband seised in right of his wife, or if the term of years be determinable upon a life or lives, in all these cases an estate for years not being certainly to expire at a time foreknown, but merely by the act of God, the tenant or his executors shall have the emblements in the same manner that a tenant for life or his executors shall be entitled thereto. Co. Lit. 56. Not so if it determine by act of the party himself; as if tenant for years does any thing that amounts to forfeiture, in which case the emblements shall go to the lessor and not to the lessee, who hath determined his estate by his own default. Co. Lit. 55. See a recent case on emblements, 5 Barn. & Adol. 105. And see 2 Comm. 144, and tit. Emblements.

Persons for whose lives estates are held by lease, &c. remaining beyond sea, or being absent seven years, if no proof be made of their being alive, shall be accounted dead. 19 Car. 2. c. 6. See Life Estate, Occupancy.

A lease in 1785 for three, six, or nine years, determinable at the end of three or six years, by either of the parties, in 1788, 91, 94, is a lease for nine years, determinable on giving reasonable notice to quit. 3 T. R. 463.

A proviso in a lease, that either party, his executors or administrators, might upon notice to the other party, his heirs, executors, or administrators, determine it, extends to the devise of the lessor, who was entitled to the rent and reversion. 12 East, 464.

Under a lease for fourteen or seven years, the lessee only has the option of determining it. 9 East, 16.

A surrender is either in fact, or by operation of law. Co. Lit. 338 a. Since the Statute of Frauds, a surrender of things lying in possession cannot be made by parol; but a note in writing is sufficient. A surrender of things lying in grant, must however be still made by deed; Wils. 26; as at common law, Co. Lit. 338 a.

Where a lease came into the hands of the original lessor, by an agreement entered into between him and the assignee of the original lessee, "that the lessor should have the premises as mentioned in the lease, and should pay a particular sum over and above the rent annually, towards the goodwill already paid by such assignee," such agreement operates as a surrender of the whole term. 1 T. R. 441.

The mere cancelling a lease is not a surrender within the Statute of Frauds, nor is the recital in a second lease that it was granted in part consideration of the surrender of a former lease, it not purporting in the terms of it to be of itself a surrender. See 6 East, 86.

But where a lease of lands belonging to a bishoprick was surrendered by deed-poll, and a new lease granted in consequence of such surrender, which was afterwards avoided by the succeeding bishop, it was held the first lease was not revived by such avoidance. 1 Barn. & Adol. 847.

A., the tenant of a house, three cottages, and a stable and yard, let to him for seven years at an entire rent, assigned all the premises to B. for the remainder of the term, the house and cottages being in the occupation of under-tenants, the stable and yard in that of A. The landlord accepted a sum of money, as rent, up to the day of the assignment, which was in the middle of a quarter. B. took possession of the stable and yard only. The occupiers of the cottages subsequently left them, and before the expiration of the term, the landlord re-let them. A. paid no rent after the assignment, but the landlord received rent from the under-tenants; and before the term expired, he advertised the whole premises to be let or sold: held that there was a surrender, by operation of law, of all the premises. 1 C. M. & R. 31.

Where a tenant under-let part of the premises, and surrendered the remainder to his landlord, the latter is not entitled to recover against the sub-lessee, upon giving half-a-year's notice to quit, in his own name. Pleasant v. Benson, 14 East, 234.

If a landlord lease for seven years by parol, and agree that the tenant shall enter at Lady-day, and quit at Candlemas; though the lease be void by the Statute of Frauds as to the duration of the term, the tenant holds under the terms of the lease in other respects, and therefore the landlord can only put an end to the tenancy at Candlemas. 5 T. R. 471.

Where the term of a lease is to end on a precise day, there is no occasion for a notice to quit, because the lease is of course at an end, unless the parties come to a fresh agreement. 1 T. R. 54, 159, 162, 165. But a demand of possession, and notice in writing, are necessary to entitle the landlord to double rent or value. 8 East, 358. In the case of a tenancy from year to year, there must be half-a-year's notice to quit, ending at the expiration of the year; six calendar months' notice is not sufficient. And there is no distinction between houses and lands as to the time of giving notice to quit. 1 T. R. 54, 159, 162, 163.

If a tenant hold under an agreement for a lease at a yearly rent, by which it is stipulated that an agreement shall continue for the life of the lessor, and that a clause shall be inserted in the lease, giving the lessor's son power to take the house for himself when he came of age, the son must make his election in a reasonable time after he comes of age. The delay of a year is unreasonable, and the tenant cannot be ejected upon half a year's notice to quit, served after such a delay; but if the son had elected within a week or a fortnight, that would have been reasonable. 2 T. R. 436.

Under an agreement of demise, dated in January, of a dwelling-house, land, &c. to carry on a manufacture, to commence as to the land on 25th December last, and as to the rest of the premises from the 1st May: held that a notice to quit served on 28th September, to quit at the expiration of the current year of holding, was good. Doe d. Bradford v. Watkins et al., 7 East, 551. See 11 East, 498.

A notice to quit the T. B. (the name of a farm) where the principal mansion was, must be intended to mean T. B. cum soens. 14 East, 245.

Tenant from year to year before a mortgage or grant of the reversion, is entitled to six months' notice to quit, before the end of the year, from the mortgagee or grantee. 1 T. R. 380, 382. But ejectment will lie by a mortgagee against a tenant, under a lease from a mortgagor, made subsequent to the mortgage, without notice to quit. Ketch v. Hall, Dougl. 21. And see Ejectment, V.

Where an infant becomes entitled to the reversion of an estate leased from year to year, he cannot eject the tenant without giving the same notice to quit as the original lessor must have given. 3 T. R. 159.

Where a landlord, about to sell his premises, gave his tenant a regular notice to quit, but promised not to turn him out unless they were sold: held that the tenant was bound to quit after the expiration of six months from the service of the notice, whenever desired by his landlord, and that if he did not, he was a trespasser. 10 East, 13.

Where the tenant of an estate holden by the year has a dwelling-house at another place, the delivery of a notice to quit, to his servant at the dwelling-house, is strong presumptive evidence that the master received the notice, and ought to be left to the jury. 4 T. R. 464.

If notice to quit at Midsummer be given to a tenant holding from Michaelmas, he may insist on the insufficiency of the notice at the trial, though he did not make any objection at the time it was served. 4 T. R. 361.

Since the new stile, a demise of land to hold from the Feast of St. Michael, means from new Michaelmas, and cannot be shown by extrinsic evidence to refer to old Michaelmas; and a notice to quit at old Michaelmas, though given half a year before new Michaelmas, is bad. 11 East, 312. But in this case the demise was by deed; where, however, the tenant held under a written agreement, not under seal, from Lady-day, a notice to quit on the 6th April was held good, it being proved by parol evidence, which was admissible, that the parties meant old Lady-day. Doe v. Benson, 4 B. & A. 588.

It seems that a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery, with authority to let lands from year to year, may also determine such tenancies by a regular notice to quit. 12 East, 57.

Under a proviso that either the landlord or the tenant, or their respective executors or administrators, might determine a lease at the end of fourteen years, by six months' notice in writing under his or their hands; a notice signed by two only of these executors, on behalf of themselves and the third executor, was held not to be good, although the third executor joined in the ejectment. 5 East, 491.

II. The enabling statute, 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. empowers three manner of persons to make leases, to endure for three lives or one-and-twenty years, which could not do so before; as, first, tenant in tail may by such leases bind his issue in tail, but not those in remainder or reversion. secondly, a husband seised in right of his wife, in fee-simple or fee-tail, provided the wife joins in such lease, may bind her and her heirs thereby: lastly, all persons seised of an estate in fee-simple in right of their churches, which extends not to parsons and vicars, may (without the concurrence of any other person) bind their successors. But then many requisites must be observed, which the statute specifies, otherwise such leases are not binding. Co. Lit. 44. 1st, the lease must be by indenture, and not by deed-poll or parol: 2d, it must begin from the making, or day of the making, and not at any greater distance of time: 3d, if there be any old lease in being, it must be first absolutely surrendered, or be within a year of expiring: 4th, it must be either for twenty-one years or three years, and not for both: 5th, it must not exceed the term of three lives, or twenty-one years, but may be for a shorter time: 6th, under this statute, 32 Hen. 8. it must have been of corporeal hereditaments and not of such things as lie merely in grants; for no rent can be reserved thereout by the common law, as the lessor cannot resort to them to distress; but now by the statute 5 Geo. 3. c. 17. a lease of tithes or other incorporeal hereditaments alone may be granted by any bishop or any such ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporation, and the successor shall be entitled to recover the rent by an action of debt, which (in case of a freehold lease) he could not have brought at the common law: 7th, it must be of lands and tenements most commonly letten for twenty years past; so that if they had been let for above half the time (or eleven years out of the twenty) either for life, for years, at will, or by copy of court-roll, it is sufficient: 8th, the most usual and customary form of rent for twenty years past, must be reserved yearly on such lease: 9th, such lease must not be made without impeachment of waste. These are the guards imposed by the statute (which was avowedly made for the security of farmers, and the consequent improvement of tillage,) to prevent unreasonable abuses, in prejudice of the issue, the wife, or the successor, of the reasonable indulgence here given.

Next follows, in order of time, the disabling or restraining statute, 1 Eliz. c. 19. (made entirely for the benefit of the successor) which enacts, that all grants by archbishops and bishops (which include even those confirmed by the dean and chapter, the which, however long and unreasonable, were good at common law), other than for the term of twenty-one years, or three lives, from the making, or without reserving the usual rent, shall be void. Concurrent leases, if confirmed by the dean and chapter, are held to be within the exception of this statute, and therefore valid, provided they do not exceed, together with the lease in being, the term permitted by the act. Co. Lit. 45. But by a saving expressly made, this statute of 1 Eliz. did not extend to grants made by any bishop to the crown; by which means Queen Elizabeth procured many fair possessions to be made over to her by the prelates, either for her own use, or with intent to be granted out again to her favourites, whom she thus gratified without any expense to herself: to prevent which for the future, the 1 Jac. 1. c. 3. extends the prohibitions to grants and leases made to the king, as well as to any of his subjects. 11 Rep. 71.

Then came 13 Eliz. c. 10. explained and enforced by 14 Eliz. c. 11, 14; 18 Eliz. c. 11; 43 Eliz. c. 20., which extend the restrictions laid by the 1 Eliz. c. 19. on bishops, to certain other inferior corporations, both sole and aggregate. From laying all which together, we may collect, that all colleges, cathedrals, and other ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporations, and all parsons and vicars, are restrained from making any leases of their lands, unless under the following regulations: 1st, they must not exceed twenty-one years or three lives, from the making: 2d, the accustomed rent, or more, must be yearly reserved thereon (and they must be of lands, &c. which have been before demised, 1 Bing. 28): 3d, houses in corporations or market towns may be let for forty years, provided they be not the mansion-houses of the lessors, nor have above ten acres of ground belonging to them, and provided the lessee be bound to keep them in repair; and they may also be aliened in fee-simple for lands of equal value in recompence: 4th, where there is an old lease in being, no concurrent lease shall be made, unless where the old one will expire within three years: 5th, no lease, by the equity of the statute, shall be made without impeachment of waste; Co. Lit. 45: 6th, all bonds and covenants tending to frustrate the provisions of the 13 & 18 Eliz. shall be void.

Concerning these restrictive statutes two general observations are to be made. First, That they do not, by any construction, enable any persons to make such leases as they were by common law disabled to make. Therefore a parson or vicar, though he is restrained from making longer leases than for twenty-one years or three lives, even with the consent of the patron and ordinary, yet is not enabled to make any lease at all, so as to bind his successor, without obtaining such consent. Co. Lit. 44. Secondly, That though leases contrary to these statutes are declared void, yet they are good against the lessor, during his life, if he be a sole corporation; and are also good against an aggregate corporation, so long as the head of it lives, who is presumed to be the most concerned in interest. For the statute was intended for the benefit of the successor only; and no man shall take an advantage of his own wrong. Co. Lit. 45; 2 Comm. c. 20.

The power of leasing lands belonging to hospitals and houses for the poor, is further restrained by the 39 Eliz. c. 5 § 2. whereby all leases, grants, conveyances, or estates made by any corporation so to be founded, exceeding twenty-one years, and that in possession, and whereupon the accustomed yearly rent, or more by the greater part of twenty years' rent before the making of such lease, shall not be reserved and yearly payable, shall be void.

Where a new thing is demised with lands accustomedly let, though there be great increase of rent, the lease is void: but more rent than the accustomed rent may be reserved. 5 Rep. 5; 6 Rep. 37.

By the 29 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 41. where any part of the possessions of any archbishop, bishop, master and fellows, dean and chapter, master or guardian of any hospital, or any other person or persons, or body or bodies politic or corporate, having any ecclesiastical living, shall be demised by several leases which were formerly demised by one lease under one rent; or where a part shall be demised for less than the ancient rent, and the residue shall be retained in the possession of the lessor; the several rents reserved on the separate demises of the specific parts shall be taken to be the ancient rents within the meaning of the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28; 1 Eliz. c. 19; 13 Eliz. c. 10; and 14 Eliz. c. 11.

A guardian during the minority of an infant tenant in tail, who was but one year old, made a lease for twenty years, and it was adjudged not good by the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. to bind the issue in tail; and it is the same in the case of tenant in dower, tenant by the curtesy, or husband seised in right of his wife, because they have no inheritance. Dyer, 271.

If a lease of the wife's land is not warranted by the statute, it is a good lease against the husband, though not against the wife: the husband and wife cannot bind him in reversion or remainder. 1 Inst. 362.

A lease by the husband of a feme covert's estate, though not within 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. is only voidable. But a mortgage of a feme covert's estate, though in form of a lease, is void. Dougl. 53, 54, in n.

If a bishop have two chapters, as there may be two or more to one bishoprick, both chapters must confirm leases made by the bishop. 1 Inst. 131. A lease by a bishop made to begin presently for twenty-one years, when there is an old lease in being, is good, notwithstanding the statute of 1 Eliz. c. 19; Moor Cas. 241. But if such lease is to commence at a day to come it will be void. 1 Leon. 44. Lease for three lives by a bishop of tithes, is void against the successor, although the usual rent be duly reserved. Moor Cas. 1078.

Leases of a dean and chapter are good, without confirmation of the bishop. Dyer, 273; 2 Nels. Abr. 1096. Where there is a chapter and no dean, they may make grants, &c. and are within the statute. 1 Mod. 204. A prebendary is seised in right of the church within the equity of the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 28; 4 Leon. 51. A prebendary's lease confirmed by the archbishop, who is his patron, is good, without confirmation of dean and chapter. 3 Bulstr. 290. But where a prebendary made a lease for years of part of his prebend, and this was confirmed by the dean and chapter, because it was not confirmed likewise by the bishop, who was patron and ordinary of the prebend, the lease was adjudged void. Dyer, 60. If a prebend hath rectories in two several dioceses belonging to his prebend, and his lease of them is confirmed by the bishop, dean, and chapter of the diocese of which he is prebendary, it is good, though not confirmed by the other. Sid. 75.

A chancellor of a cathedral church may make a lease, and it is said it will be good against the successor, though not confirmed, &c. Sid. 158. If a parson or vicar makes a lease for life or years, of lands usually letten, reserving the customary rent, &c. it must be confirmed by the patron and ordinary, for they are out of the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. And if the parson and ordinary make a lease for years of the glebe to the patron, and afterwards the patron assigns this lease to another, such assignment is good, and is a confirmation of that lease to the assignee. 5 Rep. 15. Ancient covenants in former leases may be good to bind the successor, so as to discharge the lessee from payment of pensions, tenths, &c. but of any new matter they shall not. 1 Vent. 223.

A lease for years of a spiritual person will be void by his death, if it is not according to the statutes; and a lease for life is voidable by entry, &c. of the successor; and so in like cases leases not warranted by statute are void or voidable on the deaths of their makers: acceptance of rent on a void lease shall not bind the successor. 2 Cro. 173.

If a bishop be not bishop de jure, leases made by him to charge the bishoprick are void, though all judicial acts by him are good. 2 Cro. 353. And where a bishop makes a lease, which may tend to the diminution of the revenues of the bishoprick, &c. which should maintain the successor; there the deprivation or translation of the bishop is all one with his death. 1 Inst. 329.

A manor belonging to a bishop's see had been usually leased out for lives at a certain rent—the bishop grants a lease excepting the demesnes, but reserving the whole of the former rent, and received only part of it in payment according to the proportion, deducting for the demesnes excepted. The successor was held to be entitled to the full rent reserved under the lease. Dyke v. Bath and Wells (Bishop,) Parl. Cases, tit. Rent, Case 1.

There is yet another restriction with regard to college leases by 18 Eliz. c. 6. which directs that one-third of the old rent then paid should for the future be reserved in wheat or malt, reserving a quarter of wheat for each 6s. 8d. or a quarter of malt for every 5s.; or that the lessees should pay for the same according to the price that wheat and malt should be sold for, in the market next adjoining to the respective colleges, on the market day before the rent becomes due. This is said to have been an invention of Lord Treasurer Burleigh and Sir Thomas Smith, then principal secretary of state; who observing how greatly the value of money had sunk, and the price of all provisions risen, by the quantity of bullion imported from the new-found Indies, which effects were likely to increase to a greater degree, devised this method for upholding the revenues of colleges. Their foresight and penetration have, in this respect, been very apparent: for though the rent so reserved in corn was at first but one-third of the old rent, or half of what was still reserved in money, yet now the proportion is nearly inverted, and the money arising from corn-rents is, communibus annis, almost double to the rents reserved in money. 2 Comm. c. 20.

It has been observed that the price of a quarter of wheat brings at present near 50s. and the colleges receiving one-third of their rent in corn, i. e. a quarter of wheat, or its value, for every 13s. 4d. which they are paid in money, it follows, that the corn-rent will be in proportion to the money-rent, nearly as four to one. But these rents united are very far from the present value. Colleges, therefore, in order to obtain the difference, generally take a fine upon the renewal of their leases. It was a great object in colleges to restrain those in possession from making long leases, and impoverishing their successors, by receiving the whole value of the lease by a fine at the commencement of the term. The corn-rent has made the old rent approach in some degree nearer to its present value: otherwise it should seem the principal advantage of a corn-rent is to secure the lessor from the effect of a sudden scarcity of corn. Christian's Note to 2 Comm. c. 20. p. 322.

The leases of beneficed clergymen are farther restrained in case of their non-residence, by 13 Eliz. c. 20; 14 Eliz. c. 11; 18 Eliz. c. 11; 43 Eliz. c. 9; which direct, that if any beneficed clergyman be absent from his cure above fourscore days in any one year, he shall not only forfeit one year's profit of his benefice, to be distributed among the poor of the parish, but that all leases made by him of the profits of such benefice, and all covenants and agreements of a like nature, shall cease and be void; except in the case of licensed pluralists, who are allowed to demise the living on which they are non-resident, to their curates only; provided such curates do not absent themselves above forty days in any one year. On these statutes it has been determined, that where an incumbent has leased his rectory, and had been afterwards absent for more than eighty days in a year, his tenant could not maintain an ejectment against a stranger who had got into possession without any right or title whatever. 2 Term Rep. 749. If the curate leases over, the lease will become void by his absence; but not by the absence of the incumbent. Gibbs, 740.

But now, by 57 Geo. 3. c. 99. these statutes are repealed as far as relates to spiritual persons holding farms, and to leases of benefices and livings, and to buying and selling, and to the residence of spiritual persons on their benefices.

By 13 Eliz. c. 20. it is enacted that all chargings of benefices with cure with any person, or with any profit out of the same, to be yielded or taken, other than rents to be reserved upon leases thereafter to be made according to the meaning of the act, should be utterly void. By the 48 Geo. 3. c. 84. § 10. this act, and the statutes explaining and continuing it, were wholly repealed; but by the 57 Geo. 3. c. 99. § 1. (taking effect 10th July, 1817,) the 48 Geo. 3. c. 84. was in its turn repealed. The effect, therefore, of the 57 Geo. 3. c. 99. § 1. is to revive the clause of the 13 Eliz. c. 20. as to chargings of benefices, and consequently a demise by a parson of his benefice subsequent to the 57 Geo. 3. c. 99. for securing an annuity, is void, it being in substance a charging of the benefice. 10 Barn. & C. 241. And so also a warrant of attorney for securing an annuity charged on a benefice, and executed to the intent that the grantee might obtain a sequestration. 1 Barn. & Adol. 378. But a demise of a rectory for securing an annuity made between the passing of the 48 Geo. 3. c. 84. (7th July, 1803,) and of the 57 Geo. 3. c. 99. is valued. 6 Barn. & C. 126. And so also is an assignment made, after the passing of the last acts, of a term granted between the passing of the two acts for securing an annuity out of a benefice for the term when created, was legal, and the assignment is only a continuance of the same security. 9 Barn. & C. 344.

III. 1. If a bishop, before the statute 1 Eliz. c. 19. § 5. leased part of his bishoprick for term of years, reserving rent, and then died, and after another was made bishop, who accepted and received the rent when due; by this acceptance the lease was made good, which otherwise the new bishop might have avoided. It is the same if baron and feme, seised of lands in right of the feme, join and make a lease or feoffment, reserving rent, and the baron dies, after whose death the feme receives or accepts the rent; by this the lease or feoffment is confirmed, and shall bar her from bringing a cui in vita. Co. Lit. 211. Tenant in tail made a lease for years, rendering 20s. rent, and afterwards released 19s. and died; the issue in tail accepted the 12d. rent; the better opinion was, that by the acceptance of the shilling for rent he had affirmed the lease, and could not distrain for the 19s. rent. Dyer, 304. Tenant for life, remainder in tail; a stranger levies a fine to him in remainder, who leased the lands to the conusor, rendering rent, the tenant for life died, and the issue in tail accepted the rent; adjudged, that by the fine and acceptance of the rent, the lease was affirmed. Dyer, 299. See Smith v. Stapleton, Plond. 426, 434.

Lord and tenant; the rent is behind many years, the tenant made a feoffment in fee, and the lord accepted the rent of the feoffee which became due in his time; adjudged, that by such acceptance he shall lose all the arrearsages, and cannot avow for the same. 3 Rep. 65; Penant's case. Lease for years, rendering rent, with a clause of re-entry; the lessee paid the rent, which the lessor accepted and put into a bag, but afterwards finding brass money amongst it, he refused to carry it away, and entered for the condition broken; but adjudged unlawful, because after he had accepted the rent he is barred. 5 Rep. 118; Wade's case.

Acceptance of the next rent due, at a day afterwards, will bar one to enter for a condition broken before by reason of non-payment of the rent; because the lessor thereby affirmeth the lease to have continuance. Co. Lit. 211. And taking a distress affirmeth the continuance of the rent; but if rent was due at a day before, and thereby the condition was broken, one may receive the rent, and yet re-enter; and if he accept of part of the rent, he may enter for a condition broken, and retain the lands until he has the whole rent. 3 Rep. 64; Co. Lit. 203.

If an infant accepts of rent at his full age, it makes the lease good, and shall bind him. Plow. 418.

If a lessor accepts of rent from an assignee, knowing of the assignment, it bars him from action of debt against the lessee, for the privity of contract is extinguished; but after such acceptance, the lessor or his assigns may maintain an action against the first lessee upon his covenant for payment of the rent. 1 Saund. 241; 3 Rep. 24. But acceptance of rent from the assignee has been adjudged a sufficient notice of the assignment, so that the lessor could not resort to the first lessee. 2 Bulst. 151.

Lessee for years assigned his term, and died intestate; the lessor brought debt against his administrator, who pleaded the assignment, and that the plaintiff had notice, and had accepted the rent of the assignee; adjudged, that by the death of the lessee, the privity of contract was determined, and the action would not lie against the administrator. Cro. Eliz. 715; cited in Walker's case. 3 Rep. 24.

Tenant for life makes a lease for years to commence on a certain day, and dies before the expiration of the lease, in the middle of a year. The remainder-man receives rent from the lessee, who continues in possession (but not under a fresh lease,) for two years together, on the days of payment mentioned in the lease. This is evidence from which an agreement will be presumed between the remainder-man and the lessee, that the lessee should continue to hold from the day and according to the terms of the original demise; and notice to quit on that day is proper. 1 H. Black. 97.

2. If a parson, &c. makes a lease for years not warranted by the 32 Hen. 8. c. 34., but it is void by his death; acceptance of rent by a new parson or successor will not make it good. 1 Saund. 241. And if a tenant for life makes a lease for years, there no acceptance will make the lease good, because the lease is void by his death. Dyer, 46, 239.

Tenant in tail made a lease for years, rendering rent to him and his heirs, and died; his son and heir accepted the rent, and was afterwards executed for treason, leaving issue a son; the king accepted the rent, but that did not make the lease good, the lands being in his hands by the attainder, and not in the reverter. Dyer, 115. Lease for years, with condition that the lessee shall not alien or assign, without the assent of the lessor, and if he did, that then the lessor should re-enter, he assigned part of the land without assent, &c. and then the lessor, before notice of the assignment, accepts the rent, and afterwards entered for the condition broken; and adjudged lawful; for the condition being collateral, he might assign the land so secretly, that it may be impossible for the lessor to know it. 3 Rep. 65; Penant's case; Cro. Eliz. 558 S. C.

Lease for twenty-one years, rendering rent, on condition, that if the lessee did let any part of it above three years, then the lease may be void, and that the lessor might enter; he let it out for three years, and so from three years to three years, during the term of twenty-one years, if he so long lived; the lessor accepted the rent of the assignee, and afterwards entered; this was a breach of the condition, and the acceptance of it afterwards did not dispense with it, because the original lease was void and determined. Cro. Car. 361. If tenant in tail make a lease for years to commence after his death, rendering rent, in such case acceptance of rent by the issue will not make the lease good to bar him, because the lease did not take effect in the life of his ancestor. Plowd. 418.

Where one in remainder, after the expiration of an estate for life, gave notice to the tenant to quit on a certain day, and afterwards accepted half a year's rent; such acceptance being only evidence of a holding from year to year is rebutted by the previous notice to quit, and therefore the notice remains good. See 1 T. R. 161.

The lessor's receiving rent after a forfeiture is no waiver, unless the forfeiture were known to him at the time. 2 T. R. 425; 6 T. R. 220; 3 Taunt. 78.

A lease void in its creation as against a remainder-man, does not become valid in law by his accepting rent, and suffering the lessee to make improvements after his remainder vests in possession; though it seems that in such case equity would afford relief. See Doe v. Butcher, Doughl. 50—54, in n.

Where a lease is ipso facto void by the condition or limitation, no acceptance of rent afterwards can make it have continuance as between the grantor and grantee; but it is otherwise of a lease voidable only. See Doughl. 578, in n. See further on this subject, Covenant, Disclaimer, Distress, Ejectment, Forfeiture, Injunction, Rent, Replevin, &c.

LEASES OF THE KING. Leases made by the king, of part of the duchy of Cornwall, are to be for three lives, or thirty-one years, and not to be made dishonourable of waste, whereon the ancient rent is to be reserved; and estates in reversion, with those in possession, are not to exceed three lives, &c. See 13 Car. 2. c. 4.

All leases and grants made by letters-patent, or indentures under the great seal of England, or seal of the Court of Exchequer, or by copy of court-roll, according to the custom of the manors of the duchy of Cornwall, not exceeding one, two, or three lives, or some term determinable thereon, &c. are confirmed; and covenants, conditions, &c. in leases for lives or years, shall be good in law, as if the king were seised in fee simple. 1 Jac. 2. c. 9. See 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 18; 12 Ann. c. 22. Leases from the crown of lands in England and Wales, and under the seals of the duchy of Lancaster, &c. for one, two, or three lives, or terms not exceeding fifty years, allowed time for enrolment, &c. by 10 Ann. c. 18. Leases made by the Prince of Wales of lands, &c. in the duchy of Cornwall, for three lives, or thirty-one years, on which is reserved the most usual rent paid for the greatest part of twenty years before, shall be good against the king, the prince, and their heirs, &c. and the conditions of such leases be as effectual as if the prince had been seised of an absolute estate in fee-simple in the lands. 10 Geo. 2. c. 29. See Cornwall, King.

LEASE AND RELEASE. A conveyance of the fee-simple, right, or interest in lands or tenements under the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. giving first the possession, and afterwards the interest, in the estate conveyed. Though the deed of feoffment was the usual conveyance at common law, yet, since the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. the conveyance by lease and release has taken place of it, and is become a very common assurance to pass lands and tenements; for it amounts to a feoffment, the use drawing after it the possession without actual entry, &c. and supplying the place of livery and seisin, required in that deed: in the making it, a lease or bargain and sale for a year, or such like term, is first prepared and executed, "to the intent," as is expressed in the deed, "that by virtue thereof the lessee may be in actual possession of the land intended to be conveyed by the release; and thereby, and by force of the statute 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. for transferring of uses into possession, be enabled to take and accept a grant of the reversion and inheritance of the said lands, &c. to the use of himself and his heirs for ever." Upon which the release is accordingly made, reciting the lease, and declaring the uses; and in these cases a pepper-corn rent in the lease for a year is a sufficient reservation to raise an use, to make the lessee capable of a release. 2 Vent. 35; 2 Mod. 282.

Blackstone says, this species of conveyance was first invented by Serjeant Moore, soon after the Statute of Uses, and is now the most common of any, and therefore not to be shaken; though very great lawyers, as particularly Mr. Noy, attorney-general to King Charles I., formerly doubted its validity. 2 Mod. 252. It is thus contrived: a lease, or rather bargain and sale upon some pecuniary consideration for one year, is made by the tenant of the freehold, to the lessee or bargainee. Now this, without any enrolment, makes the bargainor stand seised to the use of the bargainee, and vests in the bargainee the use of the term for a year; and then the statute immediately annexes the possession. He therefore being thus in possession is capable of receiving a release of the freehold and reversion, which must be made to a tenant in possession, and accordingly the next day a release is granted to him. This is held to supply the place of livery of seisin, and thus a conveyance by lease and release is said to amount to a feoffment. Co. Lit. 270; Cro. Jac. 604.

The form of this conveyance is originally derived to us from the common law; and it is necessary to distinguish in what respect it operates as a common law conveyance, and in what manner it operates under the Statute of Uses. At the common law, where the usual mode of conveyance was by feoffment with livery of seisin, if there was a tenant in possession, so that livery could not be made, the reversion was granted, and the tenant attorned to the reversioner. As by this mode the reversion or remainder of an estate might be conveyed without livery, when it depended on an estate previously existing, it was natural to proceed one step further, and to create a particular estate for the express and sole purpose of conveying the reversion; and then by a surrender or release, either of the particular estate to the reversioner, or of the reversion to the particular tenant, the whole fee vested in the surrenderee or releasee. It was afterwards observed, that there was no necessity to grant the reversion to a stranger; and that if a particular estate was made to the person to whom it was proposed to convey the fee, the reversion might be immediately released to him, which release, operating by way of enlargement, would give the releasee (or releasee as he is sometimes termed) a fee. In all these cases, the particular estate was only an estate for years; for at the common law the ceremony of livery of seisin is as necessary to create even an estate of freehold, as it is to create an estate of inheritance. Still an actual entry would be necessary on the part of the particular tenant; for without actual possession the lessee is not capable of a release operating by way of enlargement. But this necessity of entry for the purpose of obtaining the possession, was superseded or made unnecessary by the Statute of Uses, (27 Hen. 8. c. 10. above alluded to); for by that statute the possession was immediately transferred to the cestui que use; so that a bargainee under that statute is as much in possession, and as capable of a release before or without entry, as a lessee is at the common law after entry. All, therefore, that remained to be done to avoid, on the one hand, the necessity of livery of seisin from the grantor, and to avoid, on the other, the necessity of an actual entry on the part of the grantee, was, that the particular estate (which, for the reasons above mentioned, should be an estate for years,) should be so framed as to be a bargain and sale within the statute. Originally it was made in such a manner as to be both a lease at the common law, and a bargain and sale under the statute; but as it is held, that where conveyances may operate both by the common law and statute, they shall be considered to operate by the common law, unless the intention of the parties appears to the contrary, it became the practice to insert, among the operative words, the words bargain and sell; (in fact, it is more accurate to insert no other operative words;) and to express that the bargain and sale, or lease, is made to the intent and purpose that thereby, and by the statute for transferring uses into possession, the lessee may be capable of a release. The bargain and sale therefore, or lease for a year, as it is generally called, operates, and the bargainee is in the possession by the statute. The release operates by enlarging the estate or possession of the bargainee to a fee. This is at the common law; but if the use be declared to the releasee in fee-simple, it continues an estate at the common law; but if the use is declared to a third person, the statute again intervenes, and annexes or transfers the possession of the releasee to the use of the person to whom the use is declared. It has been said, that the possession of the bargainee under the lease is not so properly merged in, as enlarged by, the release; but at all events it does not, after the release, exist distinct from the estate passed by the release. 1 Inst. 271. b. in n. See Release I.

As the operation of a lease and release depends upon the lease or bargain and sale, if the grantor is a body corporate, the lease will not operate under the Statute of Uses; for a body corporate cannot be seised to an use, and therefore the lease of possession, considered as a bargain and sale under the statute, is void; and the release then must be of no effect for want of a previous possession in the releasee. In cases of this nature, therefore, it is proper to make the conveyance by feoffment, or by a lease and release with an actual entry by the lessee previous to the release; after which the release will pass the reversion. It may also be observed, that in exchanges, if one of the parties die before the exchange is executed by entry, the exchange is void. But if the exchange is made by lease and release, this inconvenience is prevented, as the statute executes the possession without entry; and all incidents annexed to an exchange at common law will be preserved. 1 Inst. 271. b. in n.

When an estate is conveyed by lease and release, in the lease for a year there must be the words bargain and sell for money; and five shillings or any other sum, though never paid, is a good consideration, whereupon the bargainee for a year is immediately in possession on the executing of the deed, without actual entry: if only the words demise, grant, and to farm let, are used, in that case the lessee cannot accept of a release of the inheritance, until he hath actually entered, and is in possession. 2 Lil. Abr. 435. But where Littleton says, that if a lease is made for years, and the lessor releases to the lessee before entry, such release is void; because the lessee had only a right, and not the possession; and such release shall not enure to enlarge the estate, without the possession: though this is true at common law it is not so now upon the Statute of Uses. 2 Mod. 250, 251. And if a man make a lease for life, remainder for life, and the first lessee dieth, on which the lessor releases to him in remainder, before entry, this is a good release to enlarge the estate, he having an estate in law capable of enlargement by release, before entry had. 1 Inst. 270.

No person can make a bargain and sale, who hath not possession of the lands; but it is not necessary to reserve a rent therein; because the consideration of money raises the use. If a lease be without any such consideration the lessee hath not any estate till entry, nor hath the lessor any reversion; and therefore a release will not operate, &c. 1 Inst. 270, 278; Cro. Car. 169; 1 Mod. 263. On lease at will, a release shall be good by reason of the privity between the parties; but if a man be only tenant at sufferance, the release will not enure to him; and as to the person who hath the reversion it is void, for such tenant hath not any possession, there being no estate in him. Lit. § 461, 462; Cro. Elis. 21; Dyer, 251.

A lease and release make but one conveyance, being in the nature of one deed. 1 Mod. 252.

A lease dated two days before the release is good to support the latter, which refers to a lease as of the day next before the date of the release. 2 Mau. & Sel. Rep. 434.

LEASING or LESING. See Gleaning.

LEASING-MAKING. Slandorous and untrue speeches to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of the king, his council and proceedings, or to the dishonour, hurt or prejudice of the king or his ancestors. Scotch Acts, 1584, 1585. By these acts this offence was made capital, but being declared a grievance by the petition of right, the punishment of the offenders is, by the act 1703, c. 4. declared arbitrary.

LEATHER. By the 11 Geo. 4. c. 16. all the duties and restrictions on the manufacture of leather were repealed: and § 2. enacts, that nothing therein contained shall be construed to continue so much of the 48 Geo. 3. c. 60. as prohibits tanners from carrying on the business of shoemakers, curriers, leather-cutters, &c.

LECCATOR. A debauched person, lecher, or whore-master.

LECHERWITE. See Lairmite.

LECTRINUM. A pulpit. Mon. Angl. tom. 3. p. 243.

LECTURER. [Praeceptor.] A reader of lectures. In London, and other cities, there are lecturers who are assistants to the rectors of churches, in preaching, &c. These lecturers are chosen by the vestry, or chief inhabitants of the parish, and are usually the afternoon preachers: the law requires that they should have the consent of those by whom they are employed, and likewise the approbation and admission of the ordinary: and they are, at the time of their admission, to subscribe to the thirty-nine articles of religion, &c. required by the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. They are to be licensed by the bishop, as other ministers, and a man cannot be a lecturer without a licence from a bishop or archbishop; but the power of a bishop, &c. is only as to the qualification and fitness of the person, and not as to the right of the lectureship; for if a bishop determine in favour of a lecturer, a prohibition may be granted to try the right. Mich. 18 W. 3. B. R. If lecturers preach in the week-days, they must read the common prayer for the day when they first preach, and declare their assent to that book; they are likewise to do the same the first lecture-day in every month, so long as they continue lecturers, or they shall be disabled to preach till they conform to the same: and if they preach before such conformity, they may be committed to prison for three months, by warrant of two justices of the peace, granted on the certificate of the ordinary. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4.

Where lectures are to be preached or read in any cathedral or collegiate church, if the lecturer openly, at the time aforesaid, declare his assent to all things in the book of Common Prayer, it shall be sufficient, and university sermons of lectures are excepted out of the act concerning lecturers. There are lectures founded by the donations of pious persons, the lecturers whereof are appointed by the founders without any interposition or consent of rectors of churches, &c. though with the leave and approbation of the bishop: such as that of Lady Moier at St. Paul's, &c. But such are not entitled to the pulpit without the consent of the rector or vicar, in whom the freehold of the church is. Cases. B. R. 420, 433.

The court of B. R. will not grant a mandamus to a bishop to license a lecturer without the consent of the rector, where the lecturer is supported by voluntary contributions, unless an immemorial custom to elect without such consent is shown. R. v. London, (Bp.) 1 T. R. 331. Nor will that court grant a mandamus to the rector, to certify to the bishop the election of a lecturer chosen by the inhabitants, where no such custom is shown, though the lecturer has been paid out of the poor rates. But such immemorial custom, if in fact it exists, is binding on the rector. 4 T. R. 125.

LEGABILIS, signifies what is not entailed as hereditary; but may be bequeathed by legacy, in a last will and testament. Articula proposita in parlamento coram Rege; anno 1234.

LEGACY.

[LEGATUM.] A bequest, or gift of goods and chattels by will or testament: the person to whom it is given is styled the legatee: and if the gift is of the residue of an estate after payment of debts and legacies, he is then styled the residuary legatee.

This bequest transfers an inchoate property to the legatee; but the legacy is not perfect without the assent of the executor; for if one has a general or pecuniary legacy of 100*l.*, or a specific one of a piece of plate, he cannot in either case take it without the consent of the executor. For in him all the chattels are vested; and it is his business first of all to see whether there is a sufficient sum left to pay the debts of the testator. See Co. Litt. 111; Aley. 39; Bract. l. 2. c. 26. But if there is a fund to pay the debts, and the executor then refuses his assent to a legacy, he may be compelled to give it, either by the spiritual court, or by a court of equity. March, Rep. 19.

In case of a deficiency of assets, all the general legacies must abate proportionably, in order to pay the debts; but a specific legacy (of a piece of plate, a horse, or the like) is not to abate at all, or allow any thing by way of abatement, unless there be not sufficient without it. 2 Vern. 111. Upon the same principle, if the legatees have been paid their legacies, they are afterwards bound to refund a rateable part in case debts come in more than sufficient to exhaust the residue after the legacies paid. 2 Vern. 205.

If the legatee dies before the testator, the legacy is a lost or lapsed legacy, and shall sink into the residue. And if a contingent legacy be left to any one, as when he attains, or if he attains the age of twenty-one, and he dies before that time, it is a lapsed legacy. Dy. 59; 1 l. q. Ab. 29. But a legacy to one to be paid when he attains the age of twenty-one years, is a vested legacy; an interest which commences in presenti, although it be solvendum in futuro; and if the legatee dies before that age, his representatives shall receive it out of the testator's personal estate, at the same time that it would have become payable in case the legator had lived. This distinction is borrowed from the civil law; and its adoption in our courts is not so much owing to its intrinsic equity, as to its having been before adopted by the Ecclesiastical Courts. For since the Chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction with them, in regard to the recovery of legacies, it was reasonable that there should be a conformity in these determinations; and that the subject should have the same measure of justice in whatever court he sued. 1 Eq. Ab. 295. But if such (contingent) legacies be charged upon a real estate, in both cases they shall lapse for the benefit of the heir; for, with regard to devises affecting lands, the Ecclesiastical Court hath no concurrent jurisdiction. 2 P. Wms. 601, 610. And in case of a vested legacy due immediately, and charged on land, or money in the funds, which yield an immediate profit, interest shall be payable thereon from the testator's death; but if charged only on the personal estate, which cannot be immediately got in, it shall carry interest only from the end of the year after the death of the testator. 2 P. Wms. 26, 27.

Besides the formal legacies contained in a man's will and testament, there is also permitted another death-bed disposition of property; which is called a donatio causæ mortis; a gift in prospect of death. And that is, when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers, or causes to be delivered, to another the possession of any personal goods, (under which have been included bonds and bills drawn by the deceased upon his banker,) to keep in case of his decease. This gift, if the donor dies, needs not the assent of his executors; yet it shall not prevail against creditors; and is accompanied with this implied trust, that if the donor lives, the property thereof shall revert to himself, being only given in contemplation of death; mortis causæ. Pre. Ch. 269; 1 P. Wms. 406, 441; 3 P. Wms. 357. See 2 Ves. 431.

As this donation may be avoided by creditors, so may it by the wife or children of a freeman, if it break in on their customary shares. 2 Vern. 612. The delivery of receipts for South-Sea annuities does not amount to a gift of the annuities themselves. Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. 442. There may be a donatio causæ mortis of bonds, bank notes, and bills payable to bearer, but not of other promissory notes or bills of exchange, those being choses in action which do not pass by delivery. See 2 Ves. 431, Ward v. Turner; which case collects all the laws on the subject of donations causæ mortis, and particularly considers what shall be a sufficient delivery of different kinds of property to give effect to such donations.

One cannot sue in the spiritual court for a donatio causæ mortis. 2 Stra. 777. See further Donatio causæ mortis.

Having said thus much on the subject of legacies in general, we may proceed more particularly to inquire,

1. Who may be legatees; of legacies lapsed, vested or contingent, or conditional.
2. Of the payment of legacies; and herein of specific legacies.
3. Of interest on legacies.
4. Of suits to recover legacies.
5. Of devises to creditors, &c. in satisfaction of demands due from the testator.

Some persons are incapable of taking by legacy, under several statutes, as in 13 Wm. 3. c. 6. officers, counsellors, lawyers, &c. not taking the oaths, and persons twice denying the Christian religion to be true, or the divine authority of the Scriptures. (9 & 10 Wm. 3. c. 32.)

The name of a legatee being very falsely spelled, it was referred to a master in chancery, to examine who was the person intended. 1 P. Wms. 425.

The general rule is, that if a legatee die before the testator, or before the condition upon which the legacy is given be performed, or before it be vested in interest, the legacy is extinguished. Treat. Eq. lib. 4. pt. 1. c. 2. § 3.—Even where a legacy is given to a man and his executors, &c., or to a man and his representatives, if the legatee dies before the testator, though the executors are named, yet the legacy is lost; for the words "executors," &c. are deemed surplusage, inasmuch as those persons would have taken the legacy in succession, and not by way of representation, whether expressly named by the testator or not. 1 P. Wms. 83; 4 Ves. 435; 3 Bro. C. C. 128, 142, 143. But a bequest may be so specially framed as to prevent the death of the legatee operating as a lapse of the legacy. See 3 Atk. 572, 580. Neither will the rule extend to a legacy to two or more; for though, by the civil law, there is no survivorship amongst legatees, yet it is settled that a legacy to two or more jointly, is not extinguished by the death of one, but will vest in the survivor. Gill. Rep. 137; 2 Atk. 220. But where the legacy is to two or more severally, or to be divided share and share alike, and one dies, his share will lapse. See 1 P. Wms. 700; 2 P. Wms. 489; 2 Str. 820, and the notes there. Where, however, a legacy is given to a class of persons in general terms as tenants in common, as to the children of A., the death of one of them before the testator will not occasion a lapse of any part of the fund, but those of the described class who survive the testator will take the whole. 2 Cox, 190; S. C. 2 Bro. C. C. 658. A further exception, as to the doctrine of lapse in cases of legacies given to tenants in common, occurs in instances where the will contains a limitation over of the legacy to the survivors. 9 Ves. 566. Nor will the rule extend to those cases where the legacy is given over after the death of the first legatee; for in such cases the legatee in remainder shall have it immediately. 1 And. 33, pl. 82; 2 Vern. 207; 1 P. Wms. 274; 3 P. Wms. 113; Pre. Ch. 37; Mosel. 319; 2 Vern. 378. Nor will a legacy lapse by the death of a legatee in the testator's life-time, if he be to take as a trustee. See 1 Ves. 140; 1 Cox, 1; and 2 Vern. 468, in which latter case the point is doubted.

A man devised 200*l.* a piece to the two children of A. B. at the end of ten years after the death of the testator; afterwards the children died within the ten years, and it was held a lapsed legacy; for there is a difference where a devise is to take effect at a future time, and where the payment is to be made at a future time; and whenever the time is annexed to the legacy itself, and not to the payment of it, if the legatee dies before the time happens, it is a lapsed legacy. 2 Salk. 415. A bequest of money to one at the age of twenty-one, or day of marriage, without saying to be paid at that time, and the legatee dies before the term, this is a lapsed legacy: and so it is if the devise had been to her when she shall marry, or when a son shall come of age, and they die before. Godb. 182; 2 Vent. 342.

But a devise of a sum of money, to be paid at the day of marriage, or age of twenty-one years, if the legatee dies before either of these happen, the legatee's administrator shall have it, because the legatee had a present interest, though the time of payment was not yet come; and it is a charge on the personal estate which was in being at the testator's death; and if it were discharged by this accident, then it would be for the benefit of the executor, which was never intended by the testator. 2 Vent. 366; 2 Lev. 207. A father bequeathed goods to his son, when he should be of the age of twenty-one years, and if he die before that time, then his daughter should have them; afterwards the father died, and then the son died before he was of age; adjudged, that the daughter shall have the goods given in legacy immediately, and not stay till her brother would have been of age, if he had lived. 1 And. 33. And where a legacy was devised to an infant, to be paid when he shall come of age, and he died before that time: it was ruled that his administrator should have it presently, and not stay until the infant should have been of age, if he had lived. 1 Leon. 278. In a case of this nature, it has been decreed in equity, that although the administrator should have the legacy, yet he must wait for it till such time as the child would have come to twenty-one. 2 Vern. 199.

If the legacy be to the legatee payable to him at a certain age, and the legatee die before he attain such age, this is a vested and transmissible interest in the legatee. See 2 Vent. 342; 2 Ch. Ca. 155; 1 Vern. 462; 3 P. Wms. 138; 2 Vern. 199. Otherwise, if the legacy be to the legatee generally, at or when he attains such age. 2 Vent. 342; 2 Salk. 415; 1 Eq. Ab. 295, 6; and see 1 Bro. C. R. 119. If the legacy be made to carry interest, though the words to be paid, or payable, are omitted, it is a vested and transmissible interest. 2 Vent. 342; 2 Ch. Ca. 155; 2 Vern. 673; 2 Ves. 263; 3 Atk. 645. So if the bequest be to A.

for life, and after the death of A. to B., the bequest to B. is vested upon the death of the testator, and will not lapse by the death of B. in the life-time of A. 2 Vint. 347; 1 P. Wms. 566; 2 Vern. 378; Ambl. 167; 1 Bro. C. R. 119; and the notes there. 1 Bro. C. R. 181.

Where a legacy is to arise out of the real estate, it shall not go to the representative of the legatee, but sink in the inheritance. And yet where 1000*l.* was given by a person out of lands, to his daughter, and interest to be computed from his death, &c. here, though the legatee died before the time appointed for paying the same, it was held, the legacy should be raised notwithstanding; and the lord chancellor said, that this legacy was a vested one. 2 Vern. Rep. 617; Barnardist. 328, 330. A person by will, &c. gives a portion or legacy to a child, payable at twenty-one years of age, out of a real and personal estate, and the child dies before the legacy becomes payable; in that case so much thereof as the personal estate will pay, shall go to the child's executors and administrators; but so far as the legacy is charged upon the land, it is said shall sink. 2 Peere Williams, 613. Also if a legacy be given to one to be paid out of such a fund, and the same fails, it has been resolved that it ought to be paid out of the personal estate, and the failing of the manner appointed for payment shall not defeat the legacy. 1 P. Wms. 779.

A testatrix gave a legacy to the sole and separate use of a married daughter for life, with a power of appointment, and in default thereof to her next of kin, as if she were sole and unmarried; the daughter died in testator's life-time; held, that the legacy did not lapse, but that the next of kin took it as purchasers. Hardwick v. Thurston, 4 Russ. 380.

A conditional legacy is a bequest depending upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take place, or to be defeated.

By the civil law, which has been adopted in our courts of equity, (1 Eden, 116,) and which differs from the common law as regards devises of real estates,—when a condition precedent to the vesting of a legacy is impossible, the bequest is discharged of the condition, and the legatee will be entitled as if the legacy were unconditional. Swinb. pt. 4. c. 6. pl. 2, 3; Com. Rep. 738.

Where the performance of a condition subsequent is illegal, then, as well at the common law as by the civil law adopted in the courts of equity, the condition is void, and the bequest freed from it. Co. Lit. 206 a. b.; 6 Mad. 32.

A condition that a legatee shall not dispute the will, is generally considered merely in terrorem, and will not operate as a forfeiture, by reason of the legatee having disputed the validity (2 Vern. 90; 3 P. Wms. 344,) or effect (1 Atk. 114,) of the will. But it is otherwise if the legacy or breach of such a condition is given over to another person. 2 P. Wms. 528.

It is now settled that conditions which do not import an absolute injunction to celibacy are valid. 2 Dick. 721. Thus conditions restraining marriage under twenty-one, or other reasonable age, without consent of executors, guardians, &c. (1 Bro. C. C. 303; 3 Ves. 18; 1 Russ. 325,) or requiring or prohibiting marriage with particular persons, (2 Dick. 721; 9 Lant. 170,) and the like, are valid.

Where a father makes a provision for a child by his will, and afterwards gives to such child, being a daughter, a portion in marriage, or, being a son, a sum of money to establish him in life, (such portion or sum being in amount equal to, or greater than, the legacy,) it is an implied adoption of the legacy; for the law will not intend that the father designed two portions to one child. 1 P. Wms. 680; 2 Ch. Rep. 85; 2 Vern. 115, 257; 2 Atk. 216; Ambl. 325; 2 Bro. C. R. 307. But this implication will not arise, if the provision by the will be by bequest of the residue. 2 Atk. 216; or if the provision in the father's life-time be subject to a contingency, 2 Atk. 491,—or be not ejusdem generis with the legacy, 1 Bro. C. R. 425,—or if the testator be a stranger,

2 Atk. 516; 2 Bro. C. R. 499. And such implication is always liable to be refuted by evidence. 2 Atk. 516; 2 Bro. C. R. 165, 519.

2. If a legacy be given generally, without specifying the time of payment, it is due on the day of the death of the testator (Swinb. pl. 7. s. 23. pl. 1.) though not payable till the end of a year next after.

If a legacy, when due, be paid to the father of an infant, it is no good payment; and the executor may be obliged in equity to pay it over again; and where any legacy is bequeathed to a feme covert, paying it to her alone is not sufficient, without her husband. 1 Vern. 261.

An executor, however, may discharge himself from all responsibility with respect to the payment of legacies due to infants, by paying such legacies into the Bank of England, with the privity of the accountant-general, under the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. § 32.

Executors are not bound to pay a legacy, without security to refund. Chan. Rep. 149, 257. And if sentence be given for a legacy in the Ecclesiastical Court, a prohibition lies, unless they take security to refund. 2 Vent. 8. If an executor pays legacies, and seven years after covenant is broken, for which action is brought against the executor, the court inclined that it was a devastavit, and that the executor ought to have taken security for his indemnity upon payment of the legacies. Allen, 38. Though it has been adjudged that a covenant is no duty till broken; and therefore since it is uncertain whether it will be broken or not, it shall be presumed it will not; and the legacies being a present duty, it shall be paid by the executor notwithstanding any covenant not actually broken. Sty. 97; 1 Nels. Abr. 786. If one binds himself and his executors in an obligation, &c. to perform a certain thing, and in his will gives divers legacies, and dies, leaving goods only sufficient to pay the obligation when forfeited, this obligation shall be no bar to the legacies, because it is uncertain whether the same may ever be forfeited; though the executor may therefore make a delivery upon condition, viz. to return the legacies if the obligation becomes forfeited, and the penalty be recovered. 1 Roh. Abr. 928; 2 Vent. 358.

The old practice of the Court of Chancery was, that the legatee should in all cases give the executor security to refund, if debts should afterwards appear. 1 Chan. Cas. 257. But the court has ceased to require such security, and therefore creditors have in modern times been allowed to follow assets in the hands of legatees, as well as of the executor. By Lord Hardwicke, in Harg. MSS.; Amb. 804.

The executor is to pay the legacies after the debts; but executors cannot, in equity, pay their own legacies first, where there is not enough to pay all of them, but shall have an equal proportion with the rest of the legatees. Chan. R. 314. An executor has election, where any chattel is given to him, to have and take it in one right or the other, viz. as executor or legatee, which is to be made by a special taking or declaration, &c. 10 Rep. 17, Plowd. 519; Dyer, 277.

If there be a specific legacy given of any thing, as a horse, silver cup, &c. it must be delivered before any other legacy, provided there be assets. Off. Ex. 317. And if there be enough to pay all the legacies after the debts are satisfied, the legacies shall all be paid; but if there is not sufficient to pay debts or more, the legatees must lose their legacies, or a proportionable part of them. Plowd. 526. See 1 Lil. Ab. 579.

A specific legacy is, where, by the assent of the executor, the property of the legacy will vest; as there is a benefit one way to a specific legatee, that he shall not contribute (in case of a deficiency to pay all the legacies,) so there is a hazard the other way; for inasmuch, if such specific legacy, being a lease, be evicted; or, being goods, be lost or burnt; or, being a debt, be lost by the insolvency of the debtor; in all those cases such specific legatee shall have no contribution from the other legatees, and therefore shall pay none toward them. Hinton v. Pinke, 1 P. Wms. 539.

These consequences attending a specific legacy have raised, in the several cases to be met with in the books, the question whether a legacy was specific or general. A specific legacy (strictly speaking) is said by Lord Hardwicke, in Purse v. Snaphin, 1 Atk. 417, to be a bequest of a particular chattel, specifically described and distinguished from all other things of the same kind, or, in other words, an individual legacy. Money, therefore, if sufficiently distinguished, may be the subject of a specific bequest, as money in a certain chest, &c. Lamson v. Stitch, 1 Atk. 508. Or a particular debt, as to the redemption of which latter by payment in the testator's life-time, see Thomond (Earl) v. Suffolk (Earl), 1 P. Wms. 461. So of stock, in Ashton v. Ashton, Talb. 152; Acelyn v. Ward, 1 Ves. 424; Drinkwater v. Falconer, 2 Ves. 623. So a bequest of a part of a specific chattel may be equally a specific legacy. 3 Atk. 103.

But the legatees of specific parts, though not liable to abatement with general legatees, yet must abate, proportionably among themselves, upon deficiency of the specific thing bequeathed. Sleech v. Thorington, 2 Ves. 563; or on deficiency of the general assets for payment of debts. Long v. Short, 1 P. Wms. 403. So specific legacies of distinct chattels shall abate proportionably on a deficiency of general assets. Devon (Duke) v. Atkins, 2 P. Wms. 382.

On the other hand, a mere bequest of quantity, whether of money or any other chattel, is a general legacy; as of a quantity of stock; Purse v. Snaphin, 1 Atk. 414; Sleech v. Thorington, 2 Ves. 562. And where the testator has not such stock at his death, it is a direction to the executor to procure so much stock for the legatee. Partridge v. Partridge, Talb. 227. So the purpose to which a general legacy is to be applied will not alter its nature, as in the case of Hinton v. Pinke, 1 P. Wms. 539. Personal annuities given by will, are general legacies. Hume v. Edwards, 3 Atk. 693; Lewin v. Lewin, 2 Ves. 417. How far a legacy of money, to be paid out of a certain fund, shall be adeemed by the failure of the fund, see Savile v. Blackett, 1 P. Wms. 778; 2 P. Wms. 380; Mr. Cox's note (1); and see Treat. Eq. lib. 4. pt. 1. c. 2. § 5. in note.

The general rule is, that to complete the title to a specific legacy, the thing bequeathed must remain in specie, as described in the will, otherwise the legacy is considered as revoked by ademption: thus if a debt specifically bequeathed be received by the testator, the legacy is adeemed, because the subject is extinguished, and nothing remains to which the words of the will can apply. 3 Bro. C. C. 431.

A sum bequeathed out of a debt must be paid, though the debt is recovered by the testator; otherwise of a bequest of the debt itself. 2 Stra. 824.

As an executor is not obliged to pay a legacy without security given him by the legatee to refund, if there are debts, because the legacy is not due till the debts are paid, and a man must be just before he is charitable; so in some cases the executor may be compelled to give security to the legatee for the payment of his legacy; as where a testator bequeathed 1000*l.* to a person, to be paid at the age of twenty-one, and made an executor, and died; afterwards the legatee exhibited a bill in equity against the executor, setting forth that he had wasted the estate, and praying that he might give security to pay the legacy when it should become due; and it was ordered accordingly. 1 Chan. Rep. 136, 257. See post, 4.

By the Stamp Act, duties ad valorem are imposed on receipts given for payment of legacies; and these extend now as well to legacies secured on real as on personal property. For the amount of these stamps the executor is made liable, and it is his duty not to pay a legacy without a receipt duly stamped. The stamp is from 1*l.* up to 10*l.* per cent. (in Great Britain, and from 10*s.* to 5*l.* per cent. in Ireland,) according to the propinquity or distance of relationship between the deviser and legatee.

For the amount of the stamp duties in Great Britain, see the act 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. For the regulations by which executors are made liable for the payment of the duty, see 36 Geo. 3. c. 52; 42 Geo. 3. c. 99. And as to Ireland, see 47 Geo. 3. st. 1. c. 50, &c. See further tit. Executor.

5. If a legacy is devised, and no certain time of payment, the legatee shall have interest for the legacy from the expiration of one year after the testator's death; for so long the executor shall have, that he may see whether there are any debts. Interest is therefore payable from that time, unless some other period is fixed by the will. 13 Ves. 333, 334. Nor will interest be payable at an earlier date, although the will directs the legacy to be paid "as soon as possible." 8 Ves. 410, 413; 6 Mad. 15.

But after the expiration of a year from the testator's death, the legacy will carry interest, although payment be, from the condition of the estate, impracticable. 13 Ves. 334. And although the assets have been unproductive. See 1 Sch. & Lef. 10.

With respect to interest in general legacies, where the time of payment is fixed by the testator, the general rule is, that they will not carry interest before the arrival of the appointed period; as for instance, when the legatee shall attain twenty-one. 3 Atk. 101. 4 Ves. 1. Nor does it make any difference that the legacy is vested. 3 Atk. 102; 3 Ves. 10.

This rule is, however, subject to an exception where the testator is the parent, (or in loco parentis.) 1 P. W. 783; 1 Ves. sen. 308; 3 Ves. & B. 183, of the legatee. For in that case, whether the legacy be vested or contingent, if the legatee be not an adult (1 Swan. 553,) interest in the legacy will be allowed as a maintenance, from the death of the testator, provided there is no other provision for that purpose.

Where the payment of a legacy is postponed until the legatee attains twenty-one, and the will directs that payment shall then be made with interest, the legacy will only bear interest from the end of a year after the testator's death. 2 Sim. & Stu. 492.

Where a person gives a legacy charged upon land, which yields rents and profits, and there is no day of payment mentioned, the legacy shall carry interest from the testator's death, because the land yields profit from that time; though were it charged on the personal estate, and the will mentions no time for paying it, there the legacy bears interest only from the end of a year after the death of the testator, which is said to be the settled difference. 2 P. Wms. 26.

4. Legacies being gratuities, and no duties, action will not lie at common law for the recovery of a legacy, but remedy is to be had in the Chancery or Spiritual Court. Allen, 38.

Sometimes the common law takes notice of a legacy, not directly, but in a collateral way; as where the executor promised to pay the money, if the legatee would forbear to sue for the legacy, this was adjudged a good consideration to ground an action, but that it would not lie for a legacy in specie; which would be to divest the Spiritual Court of what properly belonged to their jurisdiction, by turning suits which might be brought there, into actions on the case. Raym. 23.

So if security be given by bond to pay a legacy, in such case an action at law is the proper remedy; by giving the bond, the legacy is, as it were, extinct, and becomes a debt at common law, and the legatee can never afterwards sue for it in the Spiritual Court. Yelv. 39.

It is now positively determined that no action at law lies for a legacy; the Court of Chancery being the proper jurisdiction for that purpose. Deeks v. Strutt, 5 T. R. 690. The reason given in this case seems to contradict the principle of two other cases in Comp. 284, 289, in which it was held, that if an executor, in consideration of assets in his possession, promises to pay a legacy, an action of assumpsit lies against him in his own right. In the first mentioned of these cases, however, no express promise was proved. But Deeks v. Strutt is considered as an unqualified decision that no action at law will lie for a legacy, whether there is an express promise or not. See per Littledale, J. 7 B. & C. 544. And it has lately been held, that an action at law will not lie against an administrator for a distributive share of an intestate's property. Jones v. Tanner, 7 B. & C. 542.

But the law is different with respect to specific legacies; for an action at law will lie against an executor to recover a specific chattel bequeathed, after his assent to the bequest. 3 East, 120; 3 Atk. 223.

And where executors have ceased to hold the money bequeathed in their representative character, an action at law may be maintained against them. 1 Moore & P. 209. So where, on demurrer to a declaration which was for a legacy that had been retained by the executor for several years, under an agreement by him to pay interest thereon to the legatee, the court was clearly of opinion that the action would lie. Wasney v. Earnshaw, Excheq. T. R. 1834, MS.

Suits for legacies are rarely instituted in the Ecclesiastical Courts, on account of their not possessing adequate jurisdiction to afford complete relief in many cases. 5 Madd. 357. Though recent instances of such proceedings may be found, 2 Phill. R. 335; 1 Hugg. Ecc. R. 535. And cases of bequests to married women and infants, which involve the execution of any trust, are subject to the exclusive cognizance of the Court of Chancery. 2 Roper on Leg. 693; and see 9 B. & C. 489, post.

The Spiritual Court administers redress in the case of subtraction or the withholding or detaining of legacies, as a consequential part of their testamentary jurisdiction; but in this case the Courts of Equity exercise a concurrent jurisdiction, as incident to some other species of relief required; and as it is beneath the dignity of the king's courts to be merely ancillary to other inferior jurisdictions, the cause when once brought there, receives there also its full determination. See 3 Com. 98. c. 7.

It is without question that the suit for a personal legacy may be brought in Chancery; and if the matter has proceeded to a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, it is proper to go into Chancery for the executor's indemnity, where the legatees are to give security to refund, and that court will see money put out for children. On like principles a bill for the distribution of an intestate's personal estate is proper in Chancery, for the Spiritual Court in that case has but an ineffectual jurisdiction. Fonb. Treat. Eq. lib. 4. pt. 1. c. 1 § 2.

An executor being in equity considered as a trustee for the legatee, with respect to his legacy, and as a trustee in certain cases for the next of kin as to the undisposed surplus, is the true ground of equitable jurisdiction in enforcing the payment of a legacy, or distribution of personal estate. See 1 P. Wms. 544, 575.

That the jurisdiction of our Courts of Equity is, in such cases, more effective and protective of the interest of creditors and legatees, is evident in several instances, particularly in compelling executors to give security for a legacy payable at a future day, the executor appearing to have wasted the estate. 1 Cha. Ca. 121. Or to bring the fund into court. 3 Bro. C. C. 365. And there are cases in which a Court of Equity will restrain proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court for a legacy; as where a husband is suing for a legacy in right of his wife. See 2 Atk. 420; Toth. 111. Pre. Ch. 548.

A testator devised lands to executors, in trust to sell, directing that the money thereby raised should be part of and subject to the dispositions concerning his personal estate; 1 then directed his personal estate should be sold, and bequeathed several legacies: held that these legacies could not be sued for in the Ecclesiastical Court, the money being equitable assets; and a prohibition issued accordingly. Barker v. May, 9 B. & C. 489.

It was held in an early decision, that the Statute of Limitations could not be pleaded in bar to a suit for a legacy, although it had been due twenty years. Anon. Freeman. C. C. 22. But though the statute could not be pleaded, it was frequently adopted in cases where there was no fraud, and the parties had permitted the assets to be distributed, without claiming the legacy for thirty-five or forty years. 2 Ves. jun. 572, 582. And it would seem that a lapse of twenty years from the testator's death, without any demand, would have been sufficient to afford a presumption of the legacy being paid. 1 Roper on Leg. 1792; and see 1 Russ. & Mylne, 453.

Now, by the recent Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 40.) no action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing, signed by the person to whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled, or his agent; and in such case no such action, &c. shall be brought but within twenty years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one.

And by § 42. no arrears of interest in respect of any legacy are recoverable but within six years after becoming due, or a similar acknowledgment thereof in writing to that mentioned in the above section. See further Limitation of Actions.

5. Where a testator gives his debtor a legacy greater than his debt, it shall be taken in satisfaction for it; though where the legacy is less, it shall not be deemed as any part thereof; but as a legacy is a gift, sometimes the legatee has been decreed both. 1 Salk. 155; 2 Salk. 508. If a greater legacy is given by a codicil to the same person that was legatee in the will, it shall not be a satisfaction unless so expressed. 1 P. Wms. 424.

Although a legacy is to be taken as a gift, yet a man shall be intended to be just before he is kind; so that a bequest of the same sum by the debtor to the creditor shall be applied in satisfaction of the debt. Pre. Ch. 394; 2 P. Wms. 130; 3 P. Wms. 354; 1 Ves. 123; Mosel. 7. See 2 P. Wms. 616. —Yet where there are assets, and the testator intended both, it may be as good equity to construe him both just and kind; and the construction of making a gift a satisfaction, has, in many cases, been carried too far. See 1 Salk. 155; 1 P. Wms. 410; 2 P. Wms. 616.

If a legacy be less than the debt, it was never held to go in satisfaction. 2 Salk. 508; Pre. Ch. 394; 2 P. Wms. 616; 2 Vern. 478; Mosel. 295.—So if the legacy were upon condition, or upon a contingency; for the will is intended for the legatee's benefit; and therefore it could not be supposed that the testator would give him an uncertain recompense in satisfaction of a certain demand. Pre. Ch. 394; Salk. 508; 2 Atk. 300, 491; 2 P. Wms. 555; 2 Ves. 519.—So where the legacy is not equally beneficial with the debt in some one particular, although it may be more so in another, as in time of payment. Pre. Ch. 236; 2 Vern. 478; 2 Atk. 300; 3 Atk. 96; 1 Bro. C. R. 129, 295.—So if the thing were of a different nature, as land, it should not go in satisfaction of money, unless there was a defect of assets. 2 P. Wms. 616; Salk. 508; 3 P. Wms. 345.—And a legacy of a specific chattel, however great its value, will not be a satisfaction of a debt, unless the testator bequeaths it with such condition expressed, and the legatee accepts it by way of satisfaction. 1

Cox, 49.—So if the debt was contracted after the legacy given; as the testator could not have had it in contemplation to satisfy a debt not then in being. 2 Salk. 508; 2 P. Wms. 342; 1 P. Wms. 409; 3 P. Wms. 353.—So if the debt was upon an open or running account, so that it might not be known to the testator whether he owed any money to the legatee or not. 1 P. Wms. 299.

Cases of this nature therefore depend upon circumstances; and where a legacy has been decreed to go in satisfaction of a debt, it must be grounded upon some evidence, or at least a strong presumption that the testator did so intend it; for a Court of Equity ought not to hinder a man from disposing of his own as he pleases; and therefore the intention of the party is to be the rule; for where he says he gives a legacy, the Court cannot contradict him, and say he pays a debt. See Treat. Eq. lib. 4. pt. 1. c. 1. § 5; and the notes there.

It is to be observed, that if the testator expressly bequeaths the debt to his debtor, this being no more than a release by will, operates only as a legacy; and is assets, therefore, subject to the payment of the testator's debts. 2 P. Wms. 331, 332; Toller, 338. See further on this subject, titles Executor, Will.

LEGALIS HOMO. He who stands rectus in curia, not outlawed, excommunicated, or infamous; and in this sense are the words probi & legales homines; hence also legality is taken for the condition of such a man. Leg. Ed. Conf. c. 18.

LEGALIS MONETA ANGLIÆ. Lawful money of England, is gold or silver money coined here by the King's authority, &c. 1 Inst. 207. See Coin.

LEGAL REVERSION. In the Scotch law, the period, (seven years) within which a proprietor is at liberty to redeem land adjudged from him for debt. Scotch Dict.

LEGAMANNUS. See Lagman.

LEGATARY [Legatarius.] He or she to whom any thing is bequeathed; a legatee. See 27 Eliz. c. 16. Statute—man says, it is sometimes used pro legato vel nuncio.

LEGATE [Legatus.] An ambassador or Pope's nuncio. There are three sorts of Legates,—Legatus à latere, Legatus natus, and Legatus datus. Legatus à latere was usually one of the Pope's family vested with the greatest authority in all ecclesiastical affairs over the whole kingdom where he was sent; and during the time of his legation he might determine even those appeals which had been made from thence to Rome. Legatus natus had a more limited jurisdiction, but was exempted from the authority of the Legatus à latere, and he could exercise his jurisdiction in his own province.

Legati dati, legates given; were such as had authority from the Pope by special commission. God. 18, 19, 20, 21.

The Popes of Rome had formerly in England the Archbishops of Canterbury their Legati nati; and upon extraordinary occasions sent over Legati à latere.

LEGATEE. The person to whom a legacy is bequeathed by a last will.

LEGATUM. In the ecclesiastic sense, was a legacy given to the church, or accustomed mortuary. Cowell.

LEGEM FACERE. To make law, on oath; legem habere, to be capable of giving evidence upon oath; minor non habet legem. Selden's Notes on Heng. 133. See Wager of Law.

LEGEND [Legenda.] Is that book which contained the lessons, whether out of the Scriptures or out of other books, which were to be read throughout the year. Lind. 251.

LEGITIMIL [Legitimus.] See Lawrite.

LEGITIMUS. Litigious, and so subjected to a course of law. Cowell.

LEGITIM. In Scotch law; the claim of children out of the free moveable estate of their father, amounting to one half, or one third, (according to circumstances,) of his moveables after paying his debts. Scotch Dict.

LEGITIMACY. See Bastard, Descent.

LEGITIMATION. The act whereby children born bastards are rendered lawful children; this (in Scotland) may be by the subsequent marriage of the parents. There is also a species of legitimation by letters of legitimation given by the sovereign; these, however, affect only the rights of the crown in regard to the succession to the bastard, but do not give him a legitimation which may enable him to claim as one lawfully born.

LEIPA. A departure from service.—Si quis à Domino suo sine licentia discedat, ut leipa emendetur & redire cogatur. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 43. Blount.—Rather, an Eloper, the person who escapes or departs. See Spelm. in v.

LEIRWIT [Muleta adulteriorum. Flota. lib. 1. c. 7.] Is used for a liberty, whereby a lord challengeth the penalty of one that lieth unlawfully with his bond-woman. Cowell.

LENT [From the Germ. Lentz, i.e. Ver. The Spring Fast.] A time of fasting for forty days, next before Easter; mentioned in 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 19. First commanded to be observed in England by Ercombert, seventh king of Kent, before the year 800. Baker's Chron. 7. No meat was formerly to be eaten in Lent, or on Wednesdays or other fish days, but by licence, under certain penalties. And butchers were not to kill flesh in the Lent, unless for victualling ships, &c.

LEP AND LACE [Leppe & Lasse.] A custom in the manor of Writtle, in Essex, that every cart which goes over Greenbury, within that manor, (except it be the cart of a nobleman,) shall pay 4d. to the lord. This Greenbury is conceived to have been accidentally a market-place, on which account this privilege was granted. Blount.

LEPA. A measure which contained the third part of two bushels; whence we derive a seed-leap. Du Cange.

LEPORIUM. A place where hares are kept together. Mon. Ang. tom. 2. fol. 1035.

LEPROSO AMOVENDO. An ancient writ that lay to remove a Leper or Lazar, who thrust himself into the company of his neighbours in any parish, either in the church, or at other public meetings, to their annoyance. Reg. Orig. 237. The writ lay against those lepers that appear outwardly to be such, by sores on their bodies, smell, &c. and not against others; and if a man were a leper, and keep within his house, so as not to converse with his neighbours, he shall not be removed. New Nat. Br. 521.

LE ROY LE VEUT. See Royal Assent, Parliament.

LE ROY S'AVISERA. By these words to a bill, presented to the King by his houses of parliament, are understood his denial of that bill. By this means the indelicacy of a positive refusal to give the Royal Assent to a bill passed by the Lords and Commons is avoided. See title Parliament.

LESCHEWES. Trees fallen by chance, or windfalls. Broke's Abr. 341.

LESIA. A leash of greyhounds, now restrained to the number of three, but formerly more. Spelm.

LESPEGEND, [Sax. Le spegen Buro minor.] Sint sub quolibet horum quatuor ex mediocribus hominibus quos Angli Lespegend nuncupant, Dani vero young-men vocant, locati, qui curam et onus tum viridis tum veneris suscipiant.—Hence it appears that this was an inferior officer in forests, to take care of the vert and venison therein, &c.—Constitut. Canut. de Foresta. Art. 2. See Forest, Regarder.

LESSA. A legacy; from this word also lease is derived. Mon. Ang. tom. 1. pag. 562.

LESSOR AND LENSLE. The parties to a lease. The former he who makes the lease, the latter to whom it is made.

LESTAGEFRY. Lestage-free, or exempt from the duty of paying ballast money. Cowell.

LESWES, or LELVES. Is a word used in Domesday, to signify pastures, and is still used in many places of England, and often inserted in deeds and conveyances. Cowell. Hence the modern term Leaseowes.

LETARE JERUSALEM. See Quadragesimalia.

LETHERWITE. See Leirwit.

LETTER MISSIVE FOR ELECTING OF A BISHOP. A letter from the King to the Dean and Chapter, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect. See Bishop.

LETTER MISSIVE IN CHANCERY. To a peer. See Chancery.

LETTERS OF ABSOLUTION [Litera absolutoria.] Absolutory letters, were such in former times, when an abbot released any of his brethren ab omni subjectione & obedientia, &c. and made them capable of entering into some other order of religion. Mon. Favershamensi, p. 7.

Ancient deeds were in the form of letters; and in Scotland, the charter and judicial writs, under the King's signet, bear still the form of letters.

LETTER OF ATTORNEY [Litera Attornati.] A writing, authorising another person, who, in such case, is called the attorney of the party appointing him, to do any lawful act in the stead of another; as to give seisin of lands, receive rents, or sue a third person, &c. A letter of attorney is either general or special. The nature of this instrument is to give the attorney the full power and authority of the maker, to accomplish the act intended to be performed; and sometimes these writings are revocable, and sometimes not so; but when they are revocable, it is usually a bare authority only; they are irrevocable when debts, &c. are assigned to another, in which case the word irrevocably is inserted; and the intention of them then is to enable the assignee to receive the debt, &c. to his own use.

In Walsh v. Whitcomb, 2 Esp. 565, it was held that where a power of attorney is given as part of a security, it is not revocable.

In cases of letters of attorney it was anciently held that the authority must be strictly pursued; if it be to deliver livery and seisin of lands between certain hours, and the attorney doth it before or after; or in a capital messuage, and he does it in another part of the land, &c. the act of the attorney to execute the estate shall be void. Plowd. 475. But notwithstanding the ancient opinions for pursuing authorities with great strictness and exactness, yet in case of livery and seisin they have been always favourably expounded of later times, unless where it hath appeared that the authority was not pursued at all; as if a letter of attorney be made to three, two cannot execute it, because they are not the parties delegated, and they do not agree with the authority. 2 Mod. Rep. 79. Where the attorney does less than the authority mentions, it is void; it is said if he doth more it may be good, for so much as he has power to do, and void for the rest; yet both these rules have divers exceptions and limitations. See 1 Inst. 258. Where two attorneys were made jointly and severally to deliver seisin of lands, &c. and one of them delivered seisin of part of the land, and after another attorney, being tenant thereof for years, gave livery of the other part of the land; this was held good, though made at several times. 1 And. 247. And if a man make a deed of feoffment of lands in divers counties, with such a letter of attorney, the livery must be at several times, otherwise it cannot be made. Ibid. See 1 Leon. 192, 260.

If a mayor and commonalty make a feoffment of lands, and execute a letter of attorney to deliver seisin, the livery and seisin, after the death of the mayor, will be good, by reason the corporation dieth not. 1 Inst. 52. In other cases, by the death of the party giving it, the power given by letter of attorney generally determines. See further as to letters of attorney, Com. Dig. tit. Attorney (C.). And as to Regrary thereof, this Dictionary, under the latter title.

A Letter of Attorney to receive Rents, Debts, and Dividends, and to demise Premises.

KNOW all men by these presents, That I, A. B. of the parish of Christ Church, in the county of Middlesex, spinster, for divers good causes and considerations me hereunto moving, have made, ordained, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, ordain, constitute, and appoint, C. D. of the parish of Christ Church aforesaid, weaver, my true and lawful attorney for me, and in my name, place, and stead, and for my use, to ask, demand, and receive, all and every rent and rents, sum and sums of money now due, or which hereafter shall or may grow due to me from any person and persons whomsoever, who have been, now are, or hereafter shall or may be, tenant or tenants of any messuages or tenements, lands, hereditaments, and premises, or of any part or parts, share or shares, of any messuages or tenements, lands, hereditaments, and premises, in Great Britain, the island of Jamaica, or elsewhere, belonging to me; and of and from all and every other person and persons liable to or empowered to pay the same; and upon receipt thereof, or of any part thereof, acquittances or other sufficient discharges for me, and in my name, or in his own name, to make and give for what he shall so receive, and for non-payment of such rent or rents, or any part thereof, to enter into and upon all or any of the messuages or tenements, lands and premises, liable to the payment thereof, and distrain for the same, and the distress and distresses then and there found to take away, sell, and dispose of according to law; and also for me and in my name, and for my use, to ask, demand, and receive, of and from all and every corporations and companies, all and every sum and sums of money now due, or which hereafter shall or may grow due to me for dividends, interest, or profits of any sum or sums of money, parts, or shares, now belonging, or which shall belong to me therein respectively, and likewise to ask, demand, sue for, recover, and receive all and every debt and debts, sum and sums of money due, or to grow due and payable to me, from any other person or persons, for any other matter, cause, or thing whatsoever, and upon receipt thereof, or of any part thereof in my name, or in his own name, to make and give proper receipts and discharges for the same; and in case any tenant or tenants of any messuages or tenements, lands and premises, wherein I have any right or interest, shall quit or leave the premises by them respectively holden, then and in that case I do hereby give and grant to my said attorney full power and authority to demise, let, and set the same respectively, or any part thereof, to such person or persons, and for such rent and rents, and for such term and time, and under such covenants and agreements, as my said attorney shall think fit, and to expend and apply such part of the rents and profits of the said premises as shall come to his hands, in repairing and improving the same, as my said attorney shall judge proper, and one or more attorney or attorneys under him, for all or any the purposes aforesaid, to make and at pleasure to revoke; Giving and hereby granting to my said attorney full power and authority in the performance of all and singular the premises aforesaid, as fully and amply in every respect as I myself might or could do if personally present; hereby ratifying and confirming all and whatsoever my said attorney shall lawfully do or cause to be done, in and about the said premises, by virtue hereof. In witness whereof I the said A. B. have hereunto set and subscribed my hand and seal, this — day of — in the year of our Lord —.

LETTERS CLAUSE [Litteræ Clausæ.] Close letters, opposed to letters-patent; being commonly sealed up with the king's signet or privy seal; whereas the letters-patent are left open and sealed with the broad seal.

LETTER OF CREDIT. Is where a merchant or correspondent writes a letter to another, requesting him to credit the bearer with a certain sum of money. Merch. Dict. See Bill of Exchange.

LETTERS OF EXCHANGE [Litteræ Cambii.] Reg. Orig. 194. See Bill of Exchange.

LETTER OF LICENCE. An instrument or writing made by creditors to a man that hath failed in his trade, allowing him longer time for the payment of his debts, and protecting him from arrests in going about his affairs. These letters of licence give leave to the party to whom granted to resort freely to his creditors, or any others, and to compound debts, &c. And the creditors severally covenant, that if the debtor shall receive any molestation or hindrance from any of them, he shall be acquitted and discharged of his debt against such creditor, &c.

LETTERS OF MARQUE. Commissions for extraordinary reprisals for reparation to merchants taken and despoiled by strangers at sea, grantable by the secretaries of state, with the approbation of the king and council; and usually in time of war, &c. Lex Mercat. 173.

The words marque and reprisal are used as synonymous; and signify, the latter a taking in return, the former the passing the frontiers in order to such taking. Dufresne, title Marca.

As the delay of making war by the sovereign power of the nation may sometimes be detrimental to individuals who have suffered by depredation from foreign states, the laws of England have, in some respect, armed the subject with powers to impel the prerogative of the crown in this particular, by directing his ministers to issue letters of marque and reprisal upon due demand; the prerogative of granting which is nearly related to, and plainly derived from, that of making war, (see tit. King;) this being indeed only an incomplete state of hostilities, and generally ending in a formal denunciation of war. These letters are grantable by the law of nations, wherever the subjects of one state are oppressed and injured by those of another; and justice is denied by that state to which the oppressor belongs. In this case, letters of marque and reprisal may be obtained, in order to seize the bodies or goods of the subjects of the offending state, until satisfaction be made, wherever they happen to be found; and in fact this custom of reprisals seems dictated by nature. The necessity, however, is obvious of calling in the sovereign power to determine when reprisals may be made; else every private sufferer would be a judge in his own cause. In pursuance of which principle it is declared by 4 Hen. 5. c. 7. that if any subjects of the realm are oppressed, in the time of truce, by any foreigners, the King will grant marque in due form, to all that feel themselves grieved; which form is thus directed to be observed; the sufferer must first apply to the lord privy seal, and he shall make out letters of request under the privy seal; and if after such request of satisfaction made, the party required do not within convenient time make due satisfaction or restitution to the party grieved, the lord chancellor shall make him out letters of marque under the great seal; and by virtue of these, he may attack and seize the property of the aggressor nation, without hazard of being condemned as a robber and a pirate. See 1 Comm. c. 7. p. 278, 59.

It is observable that the above statute of Henry V. is confined to the time of a truce, wherein there is no express mention that all marques and reprisals shall cease. It seems that the manner of granting letters of marque under this statute has been long disused, as it could only be granted to persons actually grieved. But if, during a war, a subject without any commission from the king should take an enemy's ship, the prize would not be the property of the captor, but would be one of the droits of admiralty, and would belong to the king, or his grantee the admiral. Carrh. 399. Therefore, to encourage merchants and others to fit out privateers, or armed ships, in time of war, the lord high admiral or the commissioners of the admiralty are, from time to time, empowered by various acts of parliament to grant commissions to the owners of such ships; and the prizes captured are divided between the owners and the captain and crew of the privateer. But the owners, before the commission is granted, give security to the admiralty, to make compensation for any violation of treaties between those powers with whom the nation is at peace; and that such armed ship shall not be employed in smuggling. These commissions are now upon all occasions, as well as in the statutes, called letters of marque; see 29 Geo. 2. c. 34; 19 Geo. 3. c. 67; 33 Geo. 3. c. 34, 66; 43 Geo. 3. c. 160; 45 Geo. 3. c. 72, &c. (temporary prize-acts passed during war.) Sometimes the lords of the admiralty have this authority by a proclamation from the king in council, as was the case in December, 1780, to empower them to grant letters of marque to seize the ships of the Dutch. See Christian's Note on 1 Comm. c. 7, ubi sup.

If a letter of marque wilfully and knowingly take a ship and goods belonging to another nation, not of that state against whom the commission is awarded, but of some other in amity, this amounts to a downright piracy. Roll. Abr. 430. See further tit. Reprisal.

LETTERS-PATENT [Litteræ patentis,] sometimes called letters overt. Are writings of the king sealed with the great seal of England, whereby a person is enabled to do or enjoy that which otherwise he could not; and so called because they are open with the seal affixed, and ready to be shown for confirmation of the authority thereby given. And we read of letters-patent to make denizens, &c. Letters-patent may be granted by common persons, but in such case they are not properly called patentees; yet, for distinction, the king's letters-patent have been called letters-patent royal. See 2 H. 6. c. 10; also tits. Grants of the King, Patents.

LETTERS OF SAFE CONDUCT. See Safe Conduct.

LEVANT AND COUCHANT. Is a law term for cattle that have been so long in the ground of another, that they have lain down and are risen again to feed; in ancient records levantes et cubantes. When the cattle of a stranger are come into another man's ground, and have been there a good space of time, (supposed to be a day and a night,) they are said to be levant and couchant. Terms de Ley; 2 Lil. Abr. 167. Beasts of a stranger on the lord's ground may be distrained for rent, though they have not been levant and couchant; but it is otherwise if the tenant of the land is in fault in not keeping up his mounds, by reason whereof the beasts escape upon the land. Wood's Inst. 190. See tit. Distress, I. 2.

LEVANT COMPANY. See Turkey Company.

LEVANUM [Lat. Levare, to make lighter,] Leavened bread.

LEVARE FENUM. To make hay, or properly to cast it into wind-rows, in order to cock it up. Paroch. Antiq. 320. Hence una levatio feni was one day's hay-making, a service paid the lord by inferior tenants. Paroch. Antiq. 402.

LEVARI FACIAS. A writ of execution directed to the sheriff for levying a sum of money upon a man's lands and tenements, goods and chattels, who has forfeited his recognizance. Reg. Orig. 298. This writ was given by the common law, before the statute West. 2. c. 18. gave the writ of elegit; and it commands the debt to be levied de castibus et profectis terræ, &c. Except in the case of outlawry it is now superseded in practice by the writ of elegit.

There is a levari facias damna disseisitoribus for the levying of damages, wherein the disseisor has formerly been condemned to the disseisee. Reg. Orig. 214. Also levari facias residuum debiti, to levy the remainder of a debt upon lands and tenements, or chattels of the debtor, where part has been satisfied before. Reg. Orig. 299. And a levari facias quando vicecomes returnavit quod non habuit emptores, commanding the sheriff to sell the goods of the debtor, which he has taken, and returned that he could not sell. Reg. Orig. 300. There is also a levari facias for executing the judgment of a county court, but this latter writ ought to be de bonis et catallis only, and not de tenis et catallis.

2 Lutw. 1413. And the goods cannot be sold without a special custom. Ibid. See title Execution.

LEUCA. A measure of land, consisting of 1500 paces. Ingulphus says, it is 2000 paces, p. 910. In the Monastic, 1 tom. p. 313, it is 480 perches.

LEUCATA. A space of ground, as much as a mile contains. Monastic, 1 tom. p. 768. And so it seems to be used in a charter of William the Conqueror to Battle Abbey. Comell.

LEVELLUS. A level, even or upon the level. Comell.

LEVITICAL DEGREES. The farthest between uncle and niece. See 1 Comm. 435. Gilb. Rep. 158.

LEVY [Levare,] Is used in the law for to collect or exact, as to levy money, &c. Sometimes it signifies to erect or cast up, as to levy a ditch, &c. To levy a fine of land is the usual term for the completing that conveyance; in ancient time, the word reva a fine was made use of. 17 Hen. 6. See Fine.

LEVYING MONEY WITHOUT CONSENT OF PARLIAMENT. No subject of England can be constrained to pay any aids or taxes, even for the defence of the realm or the support of government, but such as are imposed by his own consent, or that of his representatives in parliament. See 25 Edw. 1. c. 5, 6; 34 Edw. 1. c. 4. c. 1; 14 Edw. 3. c. 2. c. 1; the petition of right, 3 Car. 1. c. 1; 1 W. & M. c. 2. c. 2; and tits. Liberties, Taxes.

LEVYING WAR AGAINST THE KING. See tit. Treason.

LEWDNESS. Open and notorious lewdness is an offence against religion and morality, either by frequenting houses of ill fame, which is an indictable offence, Poph. 208; or by some grossly scandalous and public indecency, for which the punishment is fine and imprisonment; and in M. T. 15 Car. 2. a person was indicted for open lewdness in showing himself naked on a balcony, and other misdemeanors, and was fined 2000 marks, imprisoned for a week, and bound to his good behaviour for three years. 1 Sid. 168. In times past, when any man granted a lease of his house, it was usual to insert an express covenant, that the tenant should not entertain any lewd woman, &c.

Many offences of the incontinent kind fall properly under the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and are appropriated to it. But except those appropriated cases, the Court of King's Bench is the custos morum of the people, and has the superintendency of offences contra bonos mores. 3 Burr. 1498. An information has been granted in that court against a number of persons concerned in assigning a young girl as an apprentice to a gentleman under a pretence of learning music, but for the purposes of prostitution. 3 Burr. 1498, &c. There is also an instance of an information for a conspiracy, granted against a peer and several others, for enticing away a young lady from her father's house, and procuring her seduction by the peer. 3 St. Tr. 519. And all such acts of indecency and immorality are also punishable by indictment in any criminal court, as public misdemeanors. See 4 Comm. c. 4. p. 64; and Bawdy-house, Fornication, Indecency.

LEX. A law for the government of mankind in society. Lit. Dict. It is often taken for judicium Dei or ordeal. See Lada, Law.

LEX AMISSA, or legem amittere, vis. One who is an infamous, perjured, or outlawed person. See Bracton, lib. 4. c. 19, par. 2.

LEX APOSTATA, or LEGEM APOSTATARE. Is to do a thing contrary to law. See Leg. II. 1. c. 12. Qui legem apostatabit veræ suæ sit reus prima vice.

LEX BREHONIA. The Brehon or Irish law, overthrown by King John.

LEX BRETOISE. Was the law of the Ancient Britons or Marches of Wales. Lex Marchiarum.

LEX DERAISNIA. The proof of a thing which one denies to be done by him, where another affirms it; defeating the assertion of his adversary, and showing it to be against reason or probability; this was used among the old Romans as well as the Normans. Grand Coutumier, c. 126.

LEX JUDICIALIS. Ordeal. Leg. H. 1. See Lada.

LEX SACRAMENTALIS. Leg. H. 1. c. 9. Purgation by oath. See Wager of Law.

LEX TALIONIS. Is juris positivi; and the taliones among the Jews were converted into pecuniary estimates, so that the price of an eye, &c. lost, was allowed to the person injured. 1 Hale's P. C. 12.

It does not appear that this is a principle applicable to laws of a civilized state; when it was once attempted to introduce into England the law of retaliation, it was intended as a punishment for such only as preferred malicious accusations against others; it being enacted by 37 Edw. 3. c. 18. that such as preferred any suggestions to the king's great council, should put in sureties of taliation; that is, to incur the same pain that the other should have had in case the suggestions were found untrue. But after one year's experience, this punishment of taliation was rejected, and imprisonment adopted in its stead. 38 Edw. 3. c. 9. See 4 Comm. c. 1. p. 12, 14.

LEX TERRÆ. The law and custom of the land, distinguished by this name from the civil law. See Selden in Dissertatione ad Metam, c. 9. par. 3.

LEX WALLENSICA. The British law, or law of Wales. Statut. Wall.

LEY, LEYS. Fr. Law, laws.

LEY, LEE, LAY. Whether in the beginning or end of names of places, signifying an open field, or large pastures. From the Saxon, leag, compus, pascuum, as Blechingley, &c. Cowell. Leys in Domesday is used for pasture.

LEY-GAGER. Wager of Law. See that title.

LIBEL.

[LIBELLUS FAMOSUS.] A contumely or reproach, published to the defamation of the government, of a magistrate, or of a private person. Com. Dig. tit. Libel (A.)

It is termed libellus famosus seu infamatoria scripta, and from its pernicious tendency has been held a public offence at the common law; for men not being able to bear the having their errors exposed to public view, were found by experience to revenge themselves on those who made sport with their reputations, from whence arose duels and breaches of the peace; and hence written scandal has been held in the greatest detestation, and has received the utmost discouragement in the courts of justice. Lamb. Sax. Lam. 64; Bract. lib. 3. c. 36; 3 Inst. 174; 5 Co. 125; cited Bac. Abr. tit. Libel ad init.

It is also defined to be a malicious defamation, expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs, pictures, &c. tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby exposing him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73. § 1; Bac. Abr. tit. Libel; 5 Mod. 165; 5 Co. 121, 25.

Libels, says Blackstone, taken in their largest and most extensive sense, signify any writings, pictures, or the like, of an immoral or illegal tendency. Considered particularly as offences against the public peace, they are malicious declarations of any person, and especially a magistrate, made public by either printing, writing, signs, or pictures, in order to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt or ridicule. The direct tendency of these libels is the breach of the public peace, by stirring up the objects of them to revenge, and perhaps to bloodshed. 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 150; 3 Comm. c. 8. p. 125.

From the different modes in which a libel may be conveyed, a distinction has been made between a libel in scriptis, and one sine scriptis; i. e. in writing, or without writing. 3 Inst. 174.

VOL. II.

I. What shall be considered as a libel.

II. What is a publication.

III. When the truth of a libel may be pleaded in justification; and of evidence in mitigation of damages.

IV. Of the trial, punishment, &c. on a criminal prosecution.

I. A libel is the greatest degree of scandal, and does not die like words which may be forgot, an action for which is confined to the person; but the cause of action for scandal in a libel survives. 5 Rep. 125.

This species of defamation is usually termed written scandal, and thereby receives an aggravation, in that it is presumed to have been entered upon with coolness and deliberation; and to continue longer and propagate wider and farther than any other scandal. 5 Rep. 125; Bac. Abr. tit. Libel (A.).

According to Hob. C. J. scandalous matter is not necessary to make a libel; it is enough if the defendant induces an ill opinion to be had of the plaintiff, &c. And if a man speaks scandalous words, unless they are put in writing, he is not guilty of a libel; for the nature of a libel consisteth in putting the infamous matter into writing. 2 Salk. 417; 3 Salk. 226.

The important distinction between libels and words spoken was fully established in the case of Villiers v. Mousley, 2 Wils. 403. viz. That whatever renders a man ridiculous, or lowers him in the esteem and opinion of the world, amounts to a libel; though the same expressions, if spoken, would not have been defamation; as to call a person in writing an itchy old toad, was held in that case to be a libel; although as words spoken they would not have been actionable. 4 Taunt. 555. And on this ground a young lady of quality, in the year 1793, recovered £4000 damages for reflections upon her chastity, published in a newspaper, although she could have brought no action for the grossest verbal aspersions that could have been uttered against her honour. An action for a libel also differs from an action for words in this particular; that the former may be brought at any time within six years, and any damages will entitle the plaintiff to full costs. Christian's note on 1 Comm. p. 125, 126.

All libels are made against private men or magistrates, and public persons; and those against magistrates deserve the greatest punishment: if a libel be made against a private man, it may excite the person libelled, or his friends, to revenge or break the peace; and if against a magistrate, it is not only a breach of the peace, but a scandal to government, and stirs up sedition. 5 Rep. 121.

Upon the whole it may be collected, that any writings, pictures or signs, which derogate from the character of an individual, by imputing to him either bad actions, or vicious principles, or which diminish his respectability and abridge his comforts, by exposing him to disgrace and ridicule, are actionable, without proof of special damage; in short, that an action lies for any false, malicious, and personal imputation, effected by such means, and tending to alter the party's situation in society for the worse. 1 Starkie on Libel, 171.

Where a writing inveighs against mankind in general, or against a particular order of men, this is no libel; it must descend to particulars and individuals to make it a libel. Trin. 11 W. 3. B. R. But a general reflection on the government is a libel, though no particular person is reflected on: and the writing against a known law is held to be criminal. 4 Stat. Tr. 672. 903.

So a publication stating that "unarmed and unresisting men had been inhumanly cut down by the dragoons," is a libel on the king's troops, although no particular dragoons or troops were defined by it. 4 B. & A. 314. And a criminal information was granted against the editor of a newspaper for a libel reflecting on the clergy of a particular diocese, and generally upon the Church of England, though no individual prosecutor was named, and though the libellous matter was not negatived by affidavit. Rez v. Williams, 5 B. & A. 595.

A defamatory writing, expressing only one or two letters of a man's name, if it be in such a manner that from what goes before and follows after it must be understood, by the natural construction of the whole, to signify and point at such a particular person, is as properly a libel as if the whole name was expressed at large. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 73. § 5. For, adds Hankins, it brings the utmost contempt upon the law, to suffer its justice to be eluded by such trifling evasions: and it is a ridiculous absurdity to say that a writing which is understood by every the meanest capacity, cannot possibly be understood by a judge and jury. On application for an information for this offence, some friend of the party complaining should in such case state by affidavit the having read the libel, and that he understands and believes it to mean the party. 3 Bac. Abr. in n. And in the case of actions for libels by signs or pictures, it seems necessary always to shew, by proper innuendoes and averments of the defendant's meaning, the import and application of the scandal, and that some special damage has followed, otherwise it cannot appear that such libel by picture was understood to be levelled at the plaintiff, or that it was attended with any actionable consequences. 3 Comm. c. 8, p. 126.

So printing or writing may be libellous, though the scandal is not directly charged, but obliquely and ironically; and where a writing, pretending to recommend to one the characters of several great men for his imitation, instead of taking notice of what they are generally famous for, pitches on such qualities only which their enemies charge them with the want of; as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his learning, who is known to be a good soldier, but an illiterate man, &c. this will amount to a libel. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 73. § 4.

Though a private person or magistrate be dead at the time of making the libel, yet it is punishable, as it tends to a breach of the peace. Hob. 215; 5 Co. 125; Hank. P. C. c. 73. § 1; 4 T. R. 126; 129, in n. But an indictment for publishing libellous matter reflecting on the memory of a dead person, not alleging that it was done with a design to bring contempt on the family of the deceased, and to stir up the hatred of the king's subjects against them, and to excite his relations to a breach of the peace, cannot be supported; and judgment was in this case accordingly arrested. R. v. Topham, 4 Term Rep. 126. See 4 T. R. 129, in n.

A private libel for a private matter, as a letter scandalizing a person courting a woman, is indictable and punishable by fine. Sid. 270. No writing is esteemed a libel, unless it reflect upon some particular person; and a writing full of obscene ribaldry is not punishable by any prosecution at common law; but the author may be bound to the good behaviour, as a person of evil fame. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 73. § 9. It was so agreed in Read's case, 1 Mod. 142; but in the case of the K. v. Curl, Mich. 1 Geo. 2. for publishing an obscene book, the court were unanimous that it is a temporal offence, and that Read's case was not law. Stra. 788, 834. See also 4 Burr. 2527.

To print of any person that he is a swindler, is a libel, and actionable. 1 T. R. 748.

Accusing a bishop of the established church with offering money and preferment to a catholic priest, on condition of his becoming a protestant, was held to be a libel. 5 Bing. 28.

The petition of the seven bishops in the reign of King James II. against the king's declaration, setting forth, that it was founded on a dispensing power, which had been declared illegal in parliament, &c. was called a seditious libel against the king, and they were committed to the Tower; but after being tried at bar, they were acquitted, 3 Mod. 312. See State Trials. The printing of a petition to a committee of parliament, (which would be a libel against the party complained of, were it made for any other purpose,) and delivering copies thereof to the members of the committee, is not the publication of a libel, being justified by the order and course of proceedings in parliament. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 73. § 8.

Scandalous matter in legal proceedings by bill, petition, &c.

in a court of justice, amounts not to a libel, if the court hath jurisdiction of the cause. Dyer, 285; 4 Rep. 14. But he who delivers a paper full of reflections on any person, in nature of a petition to a committee to any other persons, except the members of parliament who have to do with it, may be punished as the publisher of a libel. 1 Hank. c. 73. § 8. And by the better opinion, a person cannot justify the printing any papers which import a crime to another to instruct counsel, &c. but it will be a libel. Sid. 414.

An order made by a corporation and entered in their books, stating, that A. B. (against whom a jury had found a verdict with large damages, in an action for a malicious prosecution for perjury, which verdict had been confirmed in C. B.) was actuated by motives of public justice in preferring the indictment, is a libel reflecting on the administration of public justice, for which the Court of K. B. will grant an information against the members making the order. 2 T. R. 199. But it is no libel to assign on the books of a Quakers' meeting their reasons for expelling a member. 1 Black. R. 386.

It has been determined that it is neither the subject of a criminal prosecution, nor of an action, to publish a true account of the proceedings in parliament, or the courts of justice. See R. v. Wright, 8 T. R. 293; Curry v. Wells, 1 Bos. & Pul. 525. But a member of the House of Commons was convicted in the Court of King's Bench upon an indictment for a libel, in publishing in a newspaper the report of a speech delivered by him in that house, containing libellous matter; although the publication was proved to be a correct report of such speech, and to be made in consequence of an incorrect publication having appeared in that and other newspapers. R. v. Creevey, 1 Mau. & Sel. 273.

As the privilege of publishing judicial proceedings with impunity, notwithstanding the inconvenience and mischief which such publications may occasion to individuals, is founded upon grounds of public policy and convenience, the condition necessarily annexed to immunity is, that the proceeding shall be fairly, impartially, and correctly reported. 1 Starkie on Libel, 269.

Therefore it is a libel to publish a highly-coloured account of proceedings in a court of record, mixed with the party's own observations and conclusions upon what passed in court, which contained an insinuation that the plaintiff had committed perjury. 7 East, 493.

So a report of a trial, containing the ex parte statement of the plaintiff's counsel, and those parts of the judge's address to the jury which were unfavourable to the defendant, and omitting all but a few sentences of the defence, was held not to be a privileged report. Saunders v. Mills, 6 Bingh. 218.

So the publishing a counsel's speech in a judicial proceeding, coupled with a general assertion, that his statement was proved by a witness called upon that trial, cannot be justified. 4 B. & A. 605. And where, in a recent case, the defendant published a report of the proceedings under a commission of lunacy, which the plaintiff had attended as a witness, and stated "that the object was to set aside a will; that the plaintiff's testimony, being unsupported by that of any other person, failed to have any effect on the jury; and that Mr. J. (the counsel against the commission) commented with cutting severity on the testimony of Mr. D. (the plaintiff)" it was held, that the whole, taken together, was a libel; and that a plea, justifying only the words "Mr. J. commented &c." was bad. 10 Bing. 519.

Neither is a reporter privileged in publishing a speech of a counsel containing reflections on the character of an individual, annexed to a short summary of the trial, without stating the evidence. 4 B. & C. 473.

But the publication of ex parte proceedings, as before magistrates, &c. is not privileged. 5 Esp. 123; 2 Camp. 268. So in the case of Duncan v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 17. it was decided, that the publication of a charge, imputing to the plaintiff indecent conduct to a female child, could not be justified on the ground that the alleged libel was no more than a correct account of the proceeding which had taken place at a public police office.

Where the writing is a confidential communication, which is reasonably called for by the occasion, it is not considered libellous. Thus a servant cannot maintain an action against his former master for words spoken, or a letter written, by him in giving the character of a servant, unless the latter prove the malice (or unless from the circumstances of the case malice may be inferred by a jury,) as well as the falsehood of the charge; even though the master make specific charges of fraud. See 1 T. R. 110; 3 Dos. & Pul. 587; 1 B. & A. 240; and tit. Servants.

II. No one is punishable for writing a libel unless he actually publishes it to the world. 5 Mod. 165, 167.

The communication of a libel to any one person is a publication in the eye of the law; Moor. 818; and therefore the sending an abusive private letter to a man is as much a libel as if it were openly printed; for it equally tends to a breach of the peace; 2 Brownl. 151, 157; 12 Rep. 35; Hob. 215; Poph. 139; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73. § 11; 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 150; Bac. Abr. tit. Libel (B 2); in which latter book it is stated that this was a matter of doubt; but a case is mentioned where an information was granted under such circumstances; and at all events it is an offence against the king's peace, punishable by indictment; and if copies of it are afterwards dispersed, it aggravates the crime, or rather makes it a new crime, for which the party may have an action. Poph. 15; Hob. 62. Writing a letter to a man, and abusing him for his public charities, &c. is a libellous act, punishable by indictment. Hob. 215. In the case of the seven bishops, the delivery by them to King James II. of a petition, which was termed a libel, was held a publication. See Phillips's State Trials, 300, 301.

In the making of libels, if one man dictates, and another writes a libel, both are guilty; for the writing after another shows his approbation of what is contained in the libel; and the first reducing a libel into writing may be said to be the making it, but not the composing; if one repeats, another writes, and a third approves what is written, they are all makers of the libel; because all persons who concur to an unlawful act, are guilty. 5 Mod. 167. The making a libel is the genus; and composing and contriving is one species; writing a second species; and procuring to be written, a third; and one may be found guilty of writing only, &c. 2 Salk. 419, &c. But observe, a mere writing, without a publication, was not in question in Salkeld. It is conceived that for the mere writing of a libel, not published, no action can be maintained, nor prosecution legally supported.

If one writes a copy of a libel, and does not deliver it to others, the writing is no publication: but it has been adjudged, that the copying a libel, without authority, is writing a libel; and he that thus writes it, is a contriver; and that he who hath written a copy of a known libel, if it is found upon him, this shall be evidence of the publication: but if such libel be not publicly known, then the mere having a copy is not a publication. 2 Salk. 417; 2 Nels. Abr. 1122. When a libel appears under a man's own handwriting, and no author is known, he is taken in the manner, and it turns the proof upon him; and if he cannot produce the composer, it is hard to find that he is not the very man. Ibid. If one reads a libel, or hears it read, and laughs at it, it is not a publishing; for before he reads or hears it read, he cannot know it to be a libel: though if he afterwards reads or repeats it, or any part thereof, in the hearing of others, it is a publication of it: yet if part of it be repeated in mirth without any malicious purpose of defamation, it is said to be no offence. 9 Rep. 59; Moor. 862. Every one convicted of publishing a libel ought to be esteemed the contriver or procurer; the procurer and writer of a libel have been held to be both contrivers; also he who procures another to publish it, and the publisher, are both publishers. Moor. 627; 5 Rep. 125; 3 Inst. 174; 3 Cro. 17. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73.

When any man finds a libel, if it be against a private person, he ought to burn it, or deliver it to a magistrate; and where it concerns a magistrate, he should deliver it presently to a magistrate. 5 Rep. 125. If a libel be found in a house, the master cannot be punished for framing, printing, and publishing it; but it is said he may be indicted for having it, and not delivering it to a magistrate. 2 Vent. 31.

The sale of a libel by a servant in a shop is prima facie evidence of a publication, in a prosecution against the master; and is sufficient for conviction, unless contradicted by contrary evidence showing that he was not privy, nor in any way assenting to it. 4 T. R. 126; 5 Burr. 2686, 2687; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73. § 10. in n.

So the proprietor of a newspaper is liable for whatever libel appears in it, but he may, under special circumstances, rebut such liability. M. & M. 433.

Proof that the defendant gave a bond to the stamp-office for the duties on the advertisements in a newspaper, under 29 Geo. 3. c. 50. § 10., and had occasionally applied at the stamp-office respecting the duties, is strong evidence to prove that he is the publisher. 4 T. R. 126.

A delivery of a newspaper, according to the provisions of 38 Geo. 3. c. 78., to the officer of a stamp office, is a sufficient publication, though it is directed by the statute, for the officer has an opportunity of reading it. 4 B. & C. 35.

For the regulations respecting the publication of newspapers, pamphlets, &c. see tit. Newspapers.

III. It is immaterial, on a criminal prosecution, with respect to the essence of a libel, whether the matter of it be true or false; because it equally tends to a breach of the peace; and the provocation, not the falsity, is the thing to be punished criminally; though doubtless the falsehood of it may aggravate its guilt and enhance its punishment. See 7 T. R. 4, that it is not necessary to allege the falsity of the libellous matter. In a civil action a libel must appear to be false as well as scandalous; for if the charge be true, the plaintiff has received no private injury, and has no ground to demand a compensation for himself, whatever offence it may be against the public peace: and therefore upon a civil action the truth of the accusation may be pleaded in bar of the suit. But in a criminal prosecution the tendency which all libels have to create animosities and to disturb the public peace is the whole that the law considers. And therefore in such prosecutions, the only points to be inquired into are, first, the making or publishing of a book or writing; and, secondly, whether the matter be criminal; and if both these points are against the defendant, the offence against the public is complete. 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 150, 151. See post, IV., and tit. Jury, III. 2. as to the intent of the party publishing.

It seems to be clearly agreed, that in an indictment or criminal prosecution for a libel, the party cannot justify that the contents thereof are true, or that the person upon whom it is made had a bad reputation; since the greater appearance there is of truth in any malicious invective, so much the more provoking it is: for as Lord Coke observes, in a settled state of government the party grieved ought to complain for every injury done him, in the ordinary course of law, and not by any means to revenge himself by the odious course of libelling or otherwise. Bac. Abr. tit. Libel (A. 5.) cites 5 Co. 125; Hob. 253; Moor. 627; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73.

But although it has been held, at least for these two centuries, that the truth of a libel is no justification in a criminal prosecution, yet in many instances it is considered as an extenuation of the offence; and the Court of King's Bench has laid down this general rule, viz. that it will not grant an information for a libel, unless the prosecutor who applies for it makes an affidavit, asserting directly and pointedly that he is innocent of the charge imputed to him. But this rule may be dispensed with, if the person libelled resides abroad; or if the imputations of a libel are general and indefinite; or if it is a charge against the prosecutor for language which he has held in parliament. Doughl. 271 (284), 372 (388); 5 B. & A. 595.

Where on application for an information the truth of the libel is not denied, the court (except in the particular instances above mentioned) will leave the injury to be remedied in the ordinary course of justice by action or indictment. Stra. 493. See post, IV. But the court will not grant this extraordinary remedy by information, nor should a grand jury find an indictment, unless the offence be of such signal enormity, that it may reasonably be construed to have a tendency to disturb the peace and harmony of the community. In such a case the public are justly placed in the character of an offended prosecutor, to vindicate the common right of all, though violated only in the person of an individual; for the malicious publication of even truth itself cannot in policy be suffered to interrupt the tranquillity of any well-ordered society. This is a principle so rational and pure that it cannot be tainted by the vulgar odium which has accompanied the derivation of the doctrine from the tyranny of the star-chamber; the adoption of it by the worst of courts can never weaken its authority; and without it all the comforts of society might with impunity be hourly endangered or destroyed. See Law of Libels; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73. § 6. in n.

The court of K. B. is now in the practice of granting an information for any description of libel. See Information.

With regard to libels in general, there are, as in many other cases, two remedies; one by indictment or information, and the other by action. The former for the public offence; for, as has been repeatedly remarked, every libel has a tendency to the breach of the peace, by provoking the person libelled to break it; which offence, we have seen, is the same in point of law, whether the matter contained be true or false, and therefore it is that the defendant, on an indictment for publishing a libel, is not allowed to allege the truth of it by way of justification. But in the remedy by action on the case, which is to repair the party in damages for the injury done him, the defendant may, as for words spoken, justify the truth of the facts, and show that the plaintiff has received no injury at all. The chief excellence, therefore, of a civil action for a libel consists in this, that it not only affords a reparation for the injury sustained, but it is a full vindication of the innocence of the person traduced. See 3 Comm. c. 8. p. 125, 126, and n.

It is not competent to a defendant charged with having published a libel, to prove that a paper, similar to that for the publication of which he is prosecuted, was published on a former occasion by other persons who have never been prosecuted for it. 5 T. R. 436.

Neither is it a defence to an action for the publication of a libel, that the libellous matter was communicated to the defendant by a third person, and that such defendant's name was published at the same time with the libel; and the court intimated that in oral slander, (see Holt, 513,) though a man, at the time of speaking the words, names the person who told him what he relates, cannot plead that circumstance to an action against him. Crespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing. 392.

It would seem that a defendant may, under the general issue, give general evidence of the plaintiff's character, but not of particular facts tending to show that he has been guilty of the act imputed to him, in mitigation of damages. See 2 Camp. 251; 1 M. & S. 251; and 2 Starkie on Libel, 87—97.

A libel in a newspaper purported to be a report of proceedings before one of the corporation commissioners. Under the general issue the defendant was allowed to give the accuracy of the report in evidence in mitigation of damages only; and the plaintiff was then allowed to give evidence in reply of the inaccuracy of the report. 6 C. & P. 385.

IV. In information and law proceedings there are two ways of describing a libel; by the sense and by the words: the first is cujus tenor sequitur, and the second quæ sequitur in hæc Anglicana verba, &c. in which the description is by particular words, and whereof every word is a mark; so that if there is any variance, it is fatal; in the other description by the sense, it is not material to be very exact in the words, because the matter is described by the sense of them. 2 Salk. 660. See Indictment, Information, Pleading.

The declaration for a libel must lay it to be "of and concerning the plaintiff," otherwise there can be no judgment. 2 Strange, 934.

It hath been held, that writing a seditious libel is not an actual breach of the peace; and that a member of parliament writing such a libel is entitled to his privilege from being arrested for the same. Wilkes's case, 2 Wils. 169, 261; but see title Parliament, IV. 2. ad fin.

The arguments in the case of Wilkes (as also in that of the Seven Bishops, State Trials, 4 Jac. 2.) seem to have assumed that a common person not having privilege of parliament might be legally apprehended on the charge of writing and publishing a seditious libel: and it is now settled that such person may be apprehended by a justice of the peace, and committed for want of bail for writing or publishing a seditious libel against the government, or a libel against a minister of state, or against a judge. The same principle seems also to apply to the case of writing or publishing a malicious libel against any person. See Bull's case, 1 Brot. & Bing. 548.

Previous to the 32 Geo. 3. c. 60. it was held, that on the trial of an indictment for a libel, the only questions for the consideration of the jury are the fact of publishing, and the truth of the innuendoes; that is, the truth of the meaning and sense of the passages of the libel, as stated and averred in the record; whether the matter be or be not a libel is a question of law for the consideration of the court. 3 T. R. 428. See further post.

The following extract from a modern historian, (Hallam's History of England from Henry VII. to Geo. II. c. 15.) affords a summary, applicable, as well to this offence itself as to the province of the jury upon the trial of offenders.

For the vigilant superintendence, (of the proceedings of the government by public opinion,) and, indeed, for all that keeps up in us permanently and effectually the spirit of regard to liberty and the public good, we must look to the unshackled and independent energies of the press. In the reign of William III., and through the influence of the popular principles in our constitution, this finally became free. The licensing act, suffered to expire in 1679, was renewed in 1685 for seven years. In 1692 it was continued to the end of the session, which took place in 1693. Several attempts were afterwards made to renew its operation, which the less courtly Whigs combined with the Tories and Jacobites to defeat. Both parties, indeed, employed the press with great diligence in that reign; but, while one degenerated into malignant calumny and misrepresentation, the signal victory of liberal principles is manifestly due to the boldness and eloquence with which they were promulgated. Even during the existence of a censorship, a host of unlicensed publications, by the negligence or connivance of the officers employed to seize them, bore witness to the inefficacy of the restrictions. The bitterest invectives of Jacobitism were circulated in the first four years after the Revolution.

The Liberty of the Press consists, in a strict sense, merely in an exemption from the superintendence of a licenser; but it cannot be said to exist in any security, or sufficiently for its principal ends, when discussions of a political or religious nature, whether general or particular, are restrained by too narrow or severe limitations. The law of libel has always been indefinite, an evil probably beyond any complete remedy, but which evidently renders the liberty of free discussion somewhat precarious in its exercise, perhaps more so than might be wished. It appears to have been the received doctrine in Westminster Hall before the Revolution, that no man might publish a writing reflecting on the government, nor upon the character or even capacity and fitness of any one employed in it. Nothing having passed to change the law, the law remained as before. Hence, in the case of Tutchin, it was laid down, that to possess the people with an ill opinion of the government (that is, the ministry,) was a libel. And the attorney-general, in his speech for the prosecution, urged that there could be no reflection upon those in office under the sovereign, but it must cast some reflection on the sovereign who employed them. Yet in that case the censure upon the administration in the passages selected for prosecution was merely general and without reference to any person; upon which the counsel for Tutchin relied. State Trials, (Howell's edit.) xiv. 1103, 1128.

It is manifest, that such a doctrine was irreconcilable with the interests of any party out of power; whose best hope to regain it is commonly by possessing the nation with a bad opinion of their adversaries. Nor would it have been possible for any ministry to stop the torrent of a free press, under the secret guidance of a powerful faction, by a few indictments for libel. They found it general'y more expedient, and more agreeable to borrow weapons from the same armoury, and retaliate with unsparing invective and calumny. This was practised with the avowed countenance of government, for the first time by Swift, in the Examiner, and some others of his writings. Both parties soon went such lengths in this warfare, that it became tacitly understood, that the public characters of statesmen and the measures of administration are the fair topics of pretty severe attack. Less than this, indeed, would not have contented the political temper of the nation, gradually and without intermission becoming more democratical, and more capable as well as more accustomed to judge of its general interests and of those to whom they were intrusted. The just limit between political and private censure has been far better drawn in these later times, (licentious as we may still justly deem the press,) than in an age when courts of justice had not deigned to acknowledge, as they do at present, its theoretical liberty. No writer, except of the most broken reputation, could venture at this day on the malignant calumnies of the great ministerial writer of that time.

Meanwhile the judges of the courts of law naturally adhered to their established doctrine, and in prosecutions for political libels were very little inclined to favour what they deemed the presumption, if not the licentiousness, of the press. They advanced a little farther than their predecessors, and, contrary to the practice both before and after the Revolution, laid it down as an absolute principle, that falsehood, though always alleged in the indictment, was not essential to the guilt of the libel; refusing to admit its truth to be pleaded or given in evidence, or even urged by way of mitigation of punishment. (See State Trials, xiv. 534; xvii. 639.) But as defendants could only be convicted by verdicts of juries and jurors, both partook of the general sentiment in favour of free discussion, and might, in certain cases, have acquired some prepossessions as to the real truth of the supposed libel, which the court's refusal to enter upon it could not remove, they were often reluctant to find a verdict of guilty. And hence arose by degrees a sort of contention, which sometimes showed itself upon trials, and divided both the profession of the law and the general public. The judges and the lawyers, for the most part, maintained, that the province of the jury was only to determine the fact of publication, and also whether the innuendoes on the record were correct, that is, whether the libel actually meant that which it was alleged in the indictment that it did mean, not whether such meaning were criminal or innocent—a question of law which the court were exclusively competent to decide. That the jury might acquit at their pleasure was undeniable; but it was asserted, that they would do so in violation of their oaths and duty if they should reject the opinion of the judge, by whom they were to be guided as to the general law. Others of great name in our jurisprudence and the majority of the public at large, conceiving that this would throw the liberty of the press altogether into the hands of the judges, maintained, that the jury had a strict right to take the whole matter into their consideration, and determine the defendants' criminality or innocence, according to the nature and circumstances of the publication. This controversy was put an end to by the act 32 Geo. 3. c. 60. (extended to Ireland by the Irish act 33 Geo. 3. c. 43.) which enacted, that on trials of indictment for libel, the jury might give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter in issue; and though, perhaps, the act is not drawn in the most intelligible and consistent manner, it was certainly designed or hoped that it would make the defendant's intention as it might be innocent or even laudable, or, on the other hand, seditious or malignant, a matter of fact for the inquiry and discussion of the jury. See more fully on this part of the subject, Jury, III. 2.

The punishment of libellers for either making, repeating, printing, or publishing the libel, is fine, and such corporal punishment, as imprisonment, pillory, &c. (now abolished,) as the court in its discretion shall inflict; regarding the quantity of the offence, and the quality of the offender. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73. § ult.

If a printer print a libel against a private person, he may be indicted and punished for it; and so may he who prints a libel against a magistrate, and much more one who does it against the king and state; nor can a person in such a case excuse himself by saying they were dying speeches, or the words of dying men; for a man may at his death justify his villainy; and he who publishes it is punishable; and it is no excuse for the printing or publishing a libel, to say that he did it in the way of trade, or to maintain his family. 1 St. Tr. 982, 986.

Also if booksellers publish or sell libels, though they know not the contents of them, they are punishable. It has been resolved, that where persons write, print, or sell, any pamphlets, scandalizing the public, or any private persons, such libellous books may be seized, and the persons punished by law; and all persons exposing any books to sale, reflecting on the government, may be punished: also writers of news (though not scandalous, seditious, or reflecting on the government, if they write false news,) are indictable. 2 St. Tr. 477. See False News, Scandalum Magnatum.

One was indicted for a libel in scandalizing the King's witnesses, and reflecting on the justice of the nation, and had judgment of the pillory and fine 3 St. Tr. 50. A person for libelling the Lord Chancellor Bacon, affirming that he had done injustice, and other scandalous matter, was sentenced to pay 1000*l.* fine; to ride on a horse with his face to the tail from the Fleet to Westminster, with his fault written on his head; to acknowledge his offence in all the courts at Westminster, stand in the pillory; and that one of his ears should be cut off at Westminster, and the other in Cheapside, and to suffer imprisonment during life. Poph. 135. One who exhibited a libel against a Lord Chief Justice, directed to the King, calling the Chief Justice traitor, perjured judge, &c. had judgment to stand in the pillory, was fined 1000 marks, and bound to good behaviour during life. Cro. Car. 125.

When a person is brought before the court to receive judgment for a libel, his conduct subsequent to his conviction may be taken into consideration, either by way of aggravation or mitigation of his punishment. 3 T. R. 432.

The stat. 60 Geo. 3. c. 8. "for the more effectual prosecution and punishment of blasphemy and seditious libels," enables the court before whom any offender is convicted, or wherein there is judgment by default, to make an order for seizing the copies of the libel. By § 4. persons on a second conviction might have been banished from the united kingdom and all other parts of the king's dominions; but this punishment of banishment (which at the passing of the act was much opposed,) was repealed by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Will. 4. c. 78. § 1. See tit. Newspapers.

In all the instances where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels, are punished by the English law, some with a greater, others with a less degree of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is, indeed, essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications; and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public: to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done both before and since the Revolution, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. But to punish, as the law does at present, any dangerous or offensive writings, which, when published, shall on a fair and impartial trial be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order of government and religion, the only solid foundation of civil liberty. Thus, the will of individuals is still left free; the abuse only of that free-will is the object of legal punishment. Neither is any restraint hereby laid upon freedom of thought or inquiry; liberty of private sentiment is still left. The disseminating or making public of bad sentiments, destructive to the ends of society, is the crime which society corrects. A man (says a fine writer on this subject) may be allowed to keep poisons in his closet, but not publicly to vend them as cordials. And to this we may add, that the only plausible argument heretofore used in the restraining of the just freedom of the press, "that it was necessary to prevent the daily abuse of it," will entirely lose its force when it is shown (by a reasonable exertion of the laws,) that the press cannot be abused to any bad purpose without incurring a suitable punishment; whereas it can never be used to any good one, when under the control of an inspector. So true it will be found, that to censure the licentiousness is to maintain the liberty, of the press. 4 Comm. c. 11. ad fin.

The above observations deserve the serious attention of every juryman who wishes well to the constitution and happiness of his country; to them we shall add the remark of another celebrated writer on this subject:—"The danger of such unbounded liberty (of unlicensed printing,) and the danger of bounding it, have produced a problem in the science of government, which human understanding seems hitherto unable to solve. If nothing may be published but what civil authority shall have previously approved, power must always be the standard of truth: if every dreamer of innovations may propagate his projects, there can be no settlement; if every murmur at government may diffuse discontent, there can be no peace; and if every sceptic in theology may teach his follies, there can be no religion. The remedy against these evils is to punish the authors; for it is yet allowed that every society may punish, though not prevent, the publication of opinions which that society shall think pernicious. But this punishment, though it may crush the author, promotes the book; and it seems not more reasonable to leave the right of printing unrestrained, because writers may afterwards be censured, than it would be to sleep with doors unbolted, because by our laws we can hang a thief." Johnson, in vita Milton.

The law of libel has of late been much discussed, and a committee of the House of Commons was appointed in the last session (1833) for the purpose of investigating it, previous to the consideration of the important changes which have been proposed by Mr. O'Connell and other members of parliament.

LIBEL, in the Spiritual Court, from libellus, a little book: the original declaration of any action in the civil law. See 2 Edw. 6. c. 18.

By the 2 Hen. 5. c. 3. a libel of that which is surmised against any party cited to appear in the Spiritual Court, is to be granted and delivered without any difficulty.

If upon a libel for any ecclesiastical matter, the defendant make a surmise in B. R. to have a prohibition, and such surmise be insufficient, the other party may show it to the court, and the judges will discharge it. 1 Leon. 10, 128. The libel used in ecclesiastical proceedings, consists of three parts. 1. The major proposition, which shows a just cause of the petition. 2. The narration, or minor proposition. 3. The conclusion, or conclusive petition, which conjoins both propositions, &c. 3 Comm. 100.

In the Scotch law, the term libel is used to express the source of complaint, or ground of the charge, on which either a civil action or criminal prosecution takes place.

LIBER NIGER. See Black Book.

LIBERA. A livery or delivery of so much grass or corn to a customary tenant, who cut down or prepared the said grass or corn, and received some part or small portion of it as a reward or gratuity. Conell.

LIBERA BATELLA. A free boat. Right of fishing. Plac. in itin. ap. Cestr. 14 H. 7.

LIBERA CHASEA HABENDA. A judicial writ granted to a person for a free chase belonging to his manor; after proof made by inquiry of a jury, that the same of right belong to him. Reg. Orig. 36.

LIBERAM LEGEM, amittere liberam legem. Is to become infamous, and not to be accounted liber et legalis homo. See Battle, Champion.

LIBERA PISCARIA. A free fishery, which being granted to one, he hath a property in the fish, &c. 2 Salk. 637. See Fish, Fisheries, and Fishing.

LIBER TAURUS. A free bull. Norf. 16 Edw. 1.

LIBERA WARA. See Wara.

LIBERATE. A writ that lies for the payment of a yearly pension or other sum of money granted under the great seal, and directed to the treasurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer, &c. for that purpose. In another sense it is a writ to the sheriff of a county for the delivery of possession of lands and goods extended, or taken upon the forfeiture of a recognizance. Also a writ issuing out of the Chancery, directed to a gaoler, for delivery of a prisoner that hath put in bail for his appearance. F. N. B. 182; 4 Inst. 116. This writ is most commonly used for delivery of goods, &c. on an extent; and by the extent the conusee of a recognizance hath not any absolute interest in the goods, until the liberate. 2 Lil. 169. It has been adjudged, that where an extent is upon a statute-merchant, there needs no liberate, for the sheriff may deliver all in execution without it; but where an extent is upon a statute-staple, or a recognizance, there must be a return made of such an extent, and then a liberate before there can be a delivery in execution. 3 Salk. 159. See Extent, Execution.

LIBERATIO. Money, meat, drink, clothes, &c. yearly given and delivered by the lord to his domestic servants. Blount.

LIBERTAS ECCLESIASTICA. This is a frequent phrase in our old writers, to signify church liberty, or ecclesiastical immunities; the right of investiture, extorted from our kings by force of papal power, was at first the only thing challenged by the clergy, as their libertas ecclesiastica. but by degrees, under weak princes and prevailing factions, under the title of 'church liberty,' they contended for a freedom of their persons and possessions from all secular power and jurisdiction, as appears by the canons and decrees of the council held by Boniface, Archbishop of Canterbury, at Merton, A. D. 1258, and at London, A. D. 1260, &c. Corwell.—See Lord Littlton's Hist. of Hen. II. and Robertson's Hist. of Eng. C. V.

LIBERATE PROBANDA. An ancient writ which lay for such as, being demanded for vicims, offered to prove themselves free; directed to the sheriff, that he should take security of them for the proving of their freedom before the justices of assize, and that in the meantime they should be un molested. P. N. B. 77. See Tenures, Villein.

LIBERTATIBUS ALLOCANDIS. A writ lying for a citizen or burgess, impleaded contrary to his liberty, to have his privilege allowed. Reg. Orig. 262. And if any claim special liberty to be impleaded within a city or borough, and not elsewhere, there may be a special writ de libertatibus allocandis, to permit the burgesses to use their liberties, &c. These writs are of several forms, and may be used by a corporation, or by any single person, as the case shall happen. New Nat. Br. 509, 513. The barons of the cinque ports, &c. may sue forth such writs, if they are delayed to have their liberties allowed them. Ibid.

LIBERTATIBUS EXIGENDIS IN ITINERE. An ancient writ whereby the king commands the justices in eyre to admit of an attorney for the defence of another man's liberty. Reg. Orig. 19.

LIBERTIES or FRANCHISES. These are synonymous terms, and their definition is, a royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject. The kinds of them are various, and almost infinite. See Franchises.

A LIBERTY. A privilege held by grant or prescription, by which men enjoy some benefit beyond the ordinary subject. Bract.

LIBERTY,

In its most general signification, is said to be a power to do as one thinks fit, unless restrained by the law of the land; and it is well observed, that human nature is ever an advocate for this Liberty, it being the gift of God to man in his creation; therefore every thing is desirous of it, as a sort of restitution to its primitive state. Locke. 96. It is upon that account the laws of England in all cases favour liberty, and which is accounted very precious, not only in respect of the profit which every one obtains by his liberty, but also in respect of the public. 2 Lib. Abr. 169.

According to Montesquieu, liberty consists principally in not being compelled to do any thing which the law does not require; because we are governed by civil laws, and therefore we are free, living under those laws. Spirit of Laws, lib. 26, c. 20.

The absolute Rights of Man, considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him to be the most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated The Natural Liberty of Mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature; being a right inherent in us by birth, and one of the gifts of God to man at his creation, when he endowed him with the faculty of free will. 1 Comm. c. 1.

But every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty, as the price of so valuable a purchase; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws which the community has thought proper to establish.

This species of legal obedience and conformity is infinitely more desirable than that wild and savage liberty which is sacrificed to obtain it. For no man who considers a moment, would wish to retain the absolute and uncontrolled power of doing whatever he pleases; the consequence of which is, that every other man would also have the same power; and then there would be no security to individuals in any of the enjoyments of life. See Mont. Spirit of Laws, lib. 11, c. 3.

Political or civil liberty, therefore, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws, and no farther, as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public. 1 Comm. c. 1, p. 125.

Hence we may collect, that the law, which restrains a man from doing mischief to his fellow-citizens, though it diminishes the natural, increases the civil liberty of mankind; but that every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practised by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny; nay, that even laws themselves, whether made with or without our consent, if they regulate and constrain our conduct in matters of mere indifference without any good end in view, or regulations destructive of liberty; whereas, if any public advantage can arise from observing such precepts, the control of our private inclinations, in one or two particular points, will conduce to preserve our general freedom in others of more importance, but supporting that state of society which alone can secure our independence. So that laws, when prudently framed, are by no means subversive, but rather introductive of liberty; for where there is no law there is no freedom. Locke on Gov. part 2, § 57. But then, on the other hand, that constitution or form of government, that system of laws is alone calculated to maintain civil liberty, which leaves the subject entire master of his own conduct, except in those points wherein the public good requires some direction or restraint. 1 Comm. 125, 6.

The above definition of the learned commentator is admitted by his latest editor to be clear, distinct, and rational, as far as relates to civil liberty; in the definition of which, however, he adds, it ought to be understood, or rather expressed, that the restraints introduced by the law should be equal to all; or as much so as the nature of things will admit. 1 Comm. 126, n.

Political liberty is distinguished by Mr. Christian from civil liberty; and he defines it to be, the security with which, from the constitution, form, and nature, of the established government, the subjects enjoy civil liberty. No ideas, continues he, are more distinguishable than those of civil and political liberty; yet they are generally confounded; and the latter cannot yet claim an appropriate name. The learned Judge (Blackstone) uses political and civil liberty indiscriminately; but it would perhaps be convenient uniformly to use those terms in the respective senses here suggested, or to have some fixed specific denominations of ideas which, in their natures, are so widely different. The last species of liberty has, probably more than the rest, engaged the attention of mankind, and particularly of the people of England. Civil liberty, which is nothing more than the impartial administration of equal and expedient laws, they have long enjoyed, nearly to as great an extent as can be expected under any human establishment; and under a king who has no power to do wrong, yet all the prerogatives to do good, with the two houses of parliament, the people of England have a firm reliance that this civil liberty is secure, and that they shall retain and transmit its blessings, and those of political liberty also, to the latest posterity. See 1 Comm. 126, n.

There is another common notion of liberty, which is nothing more than the freedom from confinement. This is a part of civil liberty; but it being the most important part, as a man in a gaol can have but the exercise and enjoyment of few rights, it is κατ' εὐχην called liberty.

The different definitions of the term liberty, here given and commented upon, should not be thought tautologous or uninteresting, since it is a word which it is of the utmost importance to mankind that they should clearly comprehend; for though a genuine spirit of liberty is the noblest principle that can animate the heart of man, yet liberty, in all times, has been the clamour of men of profligate lives and desperate fortunes: Falso libertatis vocabulum obtendi ab iis, qui, privatim de generis, in publicum extiosi, nihil spei nisi per discordias habeant. Tac. Ann. 11. c. 17.

The idea and practice of this political or civil liberty flourish in their highest vigour in these kingdoms; where it falls little short of perfection, and can only be lost or destroyed by the folly or demerits of its owners; the legislature, and of course the laws of England, being particularly adapted to the preservation of this inestimable blessing, even in the meanest subject. 1 Comm. 126, 7.

The absolute rights of every Englishman, (which, taken in a political and extensive sense, are usually called their liberties,) as they are founded on nature and reason, so they are coeval with our form of government, though subject at times to fluctuate and change; their establishment, excellent as it is, being still human. At some times we have seen them depressed by overbearing and tyrannical princes: at others, so luxuriant as even to tend to anarchy, a worse state than tyranny itself; as any government is better than none at all. But the vigour of our free constitution has always delivered the nation from these embarrassments; and as soon as the convulsions consequent on the struggle have been over, the balance of our rights and liberties has settled to its proper level; and their fundamental articles have been, from time to time, asserted in parliament as often as they were thought to be in danger.

First, By the great charter of liberties, which was obtained, sword in hand, from King John; and afterwards, with some alterations, confirmed in parliament by King Henry III., his son; which charter contained very few new grants; but as Sir Edward Coke observes (2 Inst. proēm.) was for the most part declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England. Afterwards by the statute called Confirmatio Cartarum, 25 Edw. 1, whereby the great charter is directed to be allowed as the common law, all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all the cathedral churches, and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those who by word, deed, or counsel, act contrary thereto, or in any degree infringe it. Next, by a multitude of subsequent corroborating statutes from Edward I. to Henry IV.; of which the following are the most forcible.

25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 4. None shall be taken by petition or suggestion made to the king or his council, unless it be by indictment of lawful people of the neighbourhood, or by process made by writ original at the common law. And none shall be put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and forejudged by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed and holden for none.

42 Edw. 3. c. 3. No man shall be put to answer without presentment before justices, or matter of record of due process, or writ original, according to the ancient law of the land. And if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be void in law, and held for error.

After a long interval these liberties were still further confirmed by the Petition of Right; which was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by King Charles I. in the beginning of his reign; and is classed among our statutes as 3 Car. 1. c. 1. By this it was provided that no one should be compelled to make, or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without consent by act of parliament; (as to which liberty or privilege, see 25 Edw. 1. cc. 5, 6; 34 Edw. 1. st. 4. c. 1.; & 11 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 1.) This petition of right was closely followed by the still more ample concessions made by that unhappy prince to his parliament (particularly the dissolution of the Star-chamber, by 16 Car. 1. c. 10,) before the fatal rupture between them; and by the many salutary laws, particularly the Habeas Corpus Act, passed under King Charles II.

To these succeeded the Bill of Rights, or Declaration delivered by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange, February 13, 1688; and afterwards enacted in parliament, when they became King and Queen; which is as follows:—

Stat. 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. § 1. Whereas the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, assembled at Westminster, representing all the estates of the people of this realm, did upon the 13th of February, 1688, present unto their majesties, then Prince and Princess of Orange, a declaration, containing that,

The said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, being assembled in a full and free representative of this nation, for vindicating their ancient rights and liberties, DECLARE,

That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal:

That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal:

That the commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious:

That levying money for or to the use of the Crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time, or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal:

That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king; and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal:

That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in the time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law:

That the subjects which are protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law:

That elections of members of parliament ought to be free:

That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament:

That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted:

That jurors ought to be duly impanelled and returned, and jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason, ought to be freeholders:

That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction, are illegal and void:

And for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently:

And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties; and that no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example.

§ 6. All and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration are the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom, and so shall be esteemed, allowed, adjudged, and taken to be; and all the particulars aforesaid shall be firmly holden as they are expressed in the said declaration; and all officers shall serve their majesties according to the same in all times to come.

§ 12. No dispensation by non obstante of any statute shall be allowed, except a dispensation be allowed of in such statute; and except in such cases as shall be specially provided for during this session of parliament.

§ 13. No charter granted before the 23d of October, 1689, shall be invalidated by this act, but shall remain of the same force as if this act had never been made.

Lastly. These liberties were again asserted at the commencement of the last century, in the Act of Settlement, 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 2. whereby the Crown was limited to his present majesty's illustrious house; and some new provisions were added at the same fortunate era, for better securing our religion, laws, and liberties, which the statute declares to be "the birthright of the people of England;" according to the ancient doctrine of the common law.

Thus much for the declaration of our rights and liberties. The rights themselves thus defined by these several statutes, consist in a number of private immunities; which will appear, from what has been premised, to be indeed no other than either that residuum of natural liberty, which is not required by the laws of society to be sacrificed to public convenience; or else those civil privileges which society hath engaged to provide in lieu of the natural liberties so given up by individuals. These, therefore, were formerly, either by inheritance or purchase, the rights of a mankind; but in most other countries of the world, being now more or less debased or destroyed, they at present may be said to remain, in a peculiar and emphatical manner, the rights of the people of England.

These rights may be reduced to three principal or primary articles:—

The right of personal security.

The right of personal liberty.

The right of private property.

As there is no other known method of compulsion, or of abridging man's natural free will, but by an infringement or diminution of one or other of these important rights, the preservation of these, inviolate, may justly be said to include the preservation of our civil immunities in their largest and most extensive sense. 1 Comm. 129.

The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation. The enjoyment of this right is secured to every subject by the various laws made for the punishment of those crimes by which it is any way violated; for a particular detail of which, see titles Assault, Homicide, Murder, Libel, Naisance, &c.

Life, however, may, by the Divine permission, be frequently forfeited for the breach of those laws of society which are enforced by the sanction of capital punishments. On this subject it is sufficient at present to observe, that whenever the constitution of a state vests in any man, or body of men, a power of destroying at pleasure, without the direction of laws, the lives or members of the subject, such constitution is in the highest degree tyrannical; and that whenever any laws direct such destruction for light and trivial causes, such laws are likewise tyrannical, though in an inferior degree; because here the subject is aware of the danger he is exposed to, and may, by prudent caution, provide against it. The statute law of England does therefore very seldom, and the common law does never, inflict punishment extending to life or limb, unless upon the highest necessity; and the constitution is an utter stranger to any arbitrary power of killing or maiming the subject without the express warrant of law. The words of the Great Charter, c. 29, are "Nemo liber homo capiatur, imprisonetur, vel aliquo modo destruat, nisi per le- gale judicium parium suorum aut per legem terræ. No freeman shall be taken, imprisoned, or any way destroyed, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land." Which words, aliquo modo destruat, according to Coke, include a prohibition not only of killing or maiming, but also of torturing, (to which our laws are strangers,) and of every oppression by colour of an illegal authority. And it is enacted by 5 Edw. 3. c. 9. that no man shall be attached by any accusation, nor forejudged of life or limb, nor shall his lands or goods be seized into the king's hands contrary to the Great Charter, and the law of the land. And again by 28 Edw. 3. c. 3. that no man shall be put to death without being brought to answer by due process of law. 1 Comm. 133.

The right of personal liberty consists in the power of loco-motion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law. On this right there is at present no occasion to enlarge. For the provisions made by the laws of England to secure it, see titles Arrest, Bail, False Imprisonment, Habeas Corpus, &c. &c.

The absolute right of property, inherent in every Englishman, consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only the laws of the land. The origin of private property is probably founded in nature; but certainly the modifications under which we at present find it, the method of conserving it in the present owner, and of translating it from man to man, are entirely derived from society; and are some of those civil advantages in exchange for which every individual has resigned a part of his natural liberty. The laws of England are, therefore, in point of honour and justice, extremely watchful in ascertaining and protecting this right. Upon this principle the Great Charter, c. 29, has declared that no freeman shall be disseised or divested of his freehold, or of his liberties or free customs, (or be outlawed, banished, or otherwise destroyed, nor shall the king pass or send upon him,) but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by a variety of ancient statutes it is enacted, that no man's lands or goods shall be seized into the king's hands, against the Great Charter and the law of the land; and that no man shall be disinherited, nor put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed and holden for none. See 5 Edw. 3. c. 9; 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 4; ante, 28 Edw. 3. c. 3.

So great, moreover, is the regard of the law for private property, that it will not authorise the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community. In instances where the property of an individual is necessary to be obtained for the accommodation of the public, as in the case of enlarging or turning highways, all that the legislature does is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power indulged with caution, and which none but the legislature, or those acting under their immediate direction, can perform. See 13 Geo. 3. c. 78; and title Way.

Another effect of this right of private property is, that no subject of England can be constrained to pay any aids or taxes, even for the defence of the realm, or the support of the government, but such as are imposed by his own consent, or that of his representatives in parliament. By 25 Edw. 1. c. 5. 6. it is provided that the king shall not take any aids or tasks, but by the common assent of the realm. And what the common assent is, is more fully explained by the instrument usually called the statute de Tallagio non concedendo, usually classed as statute 34 Edw. 1. st. 4. c. 1; which enacts that no tallage or aid shall be taken, without the assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land; and again, by 14 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 1. the prelates, earls, barons, and commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants, shall not be charged to make any aid, if it be not by the common assent of the great men and commons in parliament. And as this fundamental law had been shamefully evaded, under many preceding princes, by compulsive loans and benevolences, extorted without a real and voluntary consent, it was made an article in the Petition of Right, 3 Car. 1. that no man shall be compelled to yield any gift, loan, or benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament. And lastly, by the Bill of Rights, 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. it is declared, that levying money for or to the use of the crown by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament, or for longer time, or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal. 1 Comm. 140.

The above is a short view of the principal absolute rights which appertain to every Englishman; and the constitution has provided for the security of their actual enjoyment, by establishing certain other auxiliary, subordinate, rights, which serve principally as outworks or barriers to protect and maintain those principal rights inviolate. These are,

The constitution, powers, and privileges of parliament.

The limitation of the king's prerogative.

The right of applying to courts of justice for redress of injuries.

The right of petitioning the king or parliament.

The right of having arms for defence.

This last auxiliary right of the subjects of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law, is declared by the Bill of Rights; and it is, indeed, a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanction of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression. See tit. Arms.

As to the first and second of the subordinate rights above mentioned, see titles King, Parliament. With respect to the third and fourth, some short information is here subjoined.

Since the law is, in England, the supreme arbiter of every man's life, liberty, and property, courts of justice must at all times be open to the subject, and the law be duly administered therein. The emphatical words of Magna Charta, c. 29. spoken in the person of the king, who, in judgment of law, (says Sir Edw. Coke.) is ever present, and repeating them in all his courts, are these: "Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel justitiam."—To none will we sell, to none will we deny, or delay, right or justice." And therefore every subject, for injury to him in his goods, his lands, or his person, by any other subject, be he ecclesiastical or temporal, without any exception, may take his remedy by the course of law, and have justice and right for the injury done to him, freely without sale, fully without any denial, and speedily without delay. 2 Inst. 55.

It were endless to enumerate all the affirmative acts of parliament wherein justice is directed to be done according to the law of the land; and what that law is every subject knows, or may know if he pleases; for it depends not upon the arbitrary will of any judge, but is permanent, fixed, and unchangeable, unless by authority of parliament. A few negative statutes may however be mentioned, whereby abuses, perversions, or delays of justice, especially by the prerogative, are restrained. It is ordained by Magna Charta, c. 29. that no freeman shall be outlawed, that is, put out of the protection and benefit of the law, but according to the laws of the land. By 2 Edw. 3. c. 8; 11 Ric. 2. c. 10. it is enacted, "that no commands or letters shall be sent under the great seal, or the little seal, the signet or privy seal, in disturbance of the law; or to disturb or delay common right; and though such commandments should come, the judges shall not cease to do right." This is also made a part of their oath, by 18

Edw. 3. st. 4. And by the Bill of Rights it is declared, that the pretended power of suspending or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal.

Not only the substantial part, or judicial decisions of the law, but also the formal part, or method of proceeding, cannot be altered but by parliament; for, if once those outworks were demolished, there would be an inlet to all manner of innovation in the body of the law itself. The king, it is true, may erect new courts of justice, but then they must proceed according to the old established forms of the common law; for which reason it is declared in the 16 Car. 1. c. 10. upon the dissolution of the Court of Star Chamber, that neither his majesty nor his privy council have any jurisdiction, power, or authority, by English bill, petition, articles, or libel (which were the course of proceedings in the Star Chamber, borrowed from the civil law,) or by any other arbitrary way whatsoever, to examine or draw into question, or dispose of, the lands or goods of any subjects of this kingdom, but that the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary courts of justice, and by course of law. See Chancery, Courts, Judges, &c.

The right of petitioning the king, or either house of parliament, for the redress of grievances, appertains to every individual in cases of any uncommon injury or infringement of the rights already particularized, which the ordinary course of law is too defective to reach. The restrictions, for some there are, which are laid upon the right of petitioning in England, while they promote the spirit of peace, are no check upon that of liberty; care only must be taken, lest, under the pretence of petitioning, the subject be guilty of any riot or tumult, as happened in the opening of the memorable parliament in 1640, and to prevent this, it is provided by 15 Car. 2. st. 1. c. 5. that no petition to the king or either house of parliament, for any alteration in church and state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace, or the major part of the grand jury in the county, and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; nor shall any petition be presented by more than ten persons at a time: but under these regulations it is declared by the Bill of Rights, that the subject hath a right to petition, and that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal. The sanction of the grand jury may be given either at the assizes or quarter sessions: the punishment for offending against the 15 Car. 2. not to exceed a fine of 100*l.* and three months imprisonment. Upon the trial of Lord George Gordon, the Court of King's Bench declared that they were clearly of opinion that this statute was not in any degree affected by the Bill of Rights. Dougl. 571.

In the several articles above enumerated, consist the Rights, or, as they are more frequently termed, the Liberties of Englishmen—liberties more generally talked of than thoroughly understood, and yet highly necessary to be perfectly known and considered by every man of rank or property, lest his ignorance of the points whereon they are founded, should hurry him into faction and licentiousness on the one hand, or a pusillanimous indifference and criminal submission on the other; and all these rights and liberties it is our birth-right to enjoy entire, unless where the laws of the country have laid them under necessary restraints—restraints in themselves so gentle, and so moderate, as will appear on minute inquiry that no man of sense or probity would wish to see them slackened; for all of us have it in our choice to do every thing that a good man would desire to do, and are restrained from nothing but what would be pernicious either to ourselves or our fellow-citizens: so that this review of our situation may fully justify the observation, that the English is the only nation in the world where political or civil liberty is the direct end of its constitution. Montesq. Sp. L. xi. 5. See 1 Comm. c. 1. ad fin.

LIBERTY TO HOLD PLEAS. Signifies to have a court of one's own, and to hold it before a mayor, bailiff, &c. See Franchise.

LIBLACUM. The manner of bewitching any person; also a barbarous sacrifice. Leg. Athelstan, 6.

LIBRÆ, ARSÆ, and PENSATÆ, and AD NUMERUM. A phrase which often occurs in the Domesday Register and some other memorials of that and the next age, as "Ailesbury, in Buckinghamshire, the king's manor. In totis valentis reddit lvi libr. arsas et pensatas, & de thelonio x libr. ad numerum, i. e. in the whole value it pays fifty-six pounds burnt and weighed, and for toll ten pounds by tale." For they sometimes took their money ad numerum, by tale in the current coin upon consent; but sometimes they rejected the common coin by tale, and money coined elsewhere than at the king's mint, by cities, bishops, and noblemen, who had mints, as of too great alloy, and would therefore melt it down to take it by weight when purified from the dross: for which purpose they had in those times always a fire ready in the Exchequer to burn the money and then weigh it. Concill. See further, So H. Ellis's General Introduction to Domesday Book, vol. 1, p. 121.

LIBRA PENSA. A pound of money in weight. See the preceding article.

LIBRARY. Where a library is erected in any parish, it shall be preserved for the uses directed by the founders; and incumbents and ministers of parishes, &c. are to give security therefore, and make catalogues of the books, &c. None of the books shall be alienable without consent of the bishop, and then only where there is a duplicate of such books; if any book shall be taken away and detained, a justice's warrant may be issued to search for and restore the same; also action of trover may be brought in the name of the proper ordinary, &c. And bishops have power to make rules and orders concerning libraries, appoint persons to view their condition, and inquire of the state of them in their visitation. 7 Ann. c. 14.

Cotton Library settled in the family for the use of the public, 12 & 13 Wm. 3. c. 5; vested in the crown, 5 Ann. c. 30; transferred to the British Museum, 26 Geo. 2. c. 22; 27 Geo. 2. c. 11. § 3.

LIBRATA TERRÆ. Four oxgangs of land, every oxgang containing thirteen acres. Skene, verb. Librata terræ. So much land, anciently, as was worth twenty shillings a year: for in Henry the Third's time, he that had quindecim libras terræ, was to receive the order of knighthood. See Farding-deal.

LICENCE [licentia.] A power or authority given to a man to do some lawful act; and is a personal liberty to the party to whom given, which cannot be transferred over; but it may be made to a man, or his assigns, &c. 12 Hen. 7. 25. There may be a parol licence, as well as by deed in writing; but if it be not for a certain time, it passes no interest. 2 Nels. Abr. 1123. And if there be no time certain in the licence, as if a man license another to dig clay, &c. in his land, but doth not say for how long, the licence may be countermanded; though if it be until such a time, he cannot. Poph. 161. If a lessor license his lessee (who is restrained by covenant from aliening without licence) to alien, and such lessor dies before he aliens, this is no countermand of the licence: so it is if the lessor grants over his estate. Cro. Jac. 133. But where a lord of a manor for life granteth a licence to a copyhold tenant to alien, and dieth, the licence is destroyed, and the power of alienation ceaseth. 1 Inst. 52. Copyhold tenants leasing their copyhold for a longer time than one year, are to have a licence for it, or they incur a forfeiture of their estates. 1 Inst. 63. If any licence is given to a person, and he abuses it, he shall be adjudged a trespasser ab initio. 8 Rep. 146.

A grants to B. a way over his ground, or licence to go through it to the church; by this none but B. himself may go in it. But if one give me licence to go over his land with my plough, or to cut down a tree therein, and take it away, by this I may take what help is needful to do the same. So if it be to hunt, and kill, and carry away deer; not if it be to hunt and kill only. 12 Hen. 7. 25; 13 Hen. 7. 8; 8 Rep. 146.

A mere licence to enjoy a privilege in land, may be granted without deed, and even without writing, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. Say. 3; Palm. 81; 8 East, 310; 7 Bing. 682. See further Copyhold, Lights, Trespass, Way, &c.

By licence a man may practise physic and surgery in London, and do divers other things. Licences are also necessary for the carrying on various trades and professions, on which a duty is laid for the purpose of raising a revenue to government. See Taxes.

LICENCE TO ALIEN IN MORTMAIN. Alienations in mortmain to ecclesiastical persons, &c. are restrained by several statutes; but the king may grant licences to any person or bodies politic, &c. to alien or hold lands in mortmain. See 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 37; and tits. Charitable Uses, Mortmain.

LICENCE TO ARISE [licentia surgendi.] A liberty or space of time anciently given by the court to a tenant to arise out of his bed, who was essoigned de malo lecti, in a real action; and it was also the writ thereupon. Bracton. And the law in that case was, that the tenant might not arise or go out of his chamber until he had been viewed by knights thereto appointed, and had a day assigned to him to appear; the reason whereof was, that it might be known whether he caused himself to be essoigned deceitfully or not; and if the demandant could prove that he was seen abroad before the view or licence of the court, he should be taken to be deceitfully essoigned, and to have made default. Bract. lib. 5; Fleta, lib. 6. c. 10. See Essoin.

LICENCE TO FOUND A CHURCH. Granted by the king. See Church.

LICENCE TO GO TO ELECTION of bishops, is by congrê d'elire directed to the dean and chapter to elect the person named by the king, &c. Reg. Writs, 294. 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. See Bishops.

LICENCE OF THE KING to go beyond sea may be revoked before the time expires, because it concerns the public good. Jenk. Cent. See Ne exeat Regnum.

LICENCE OF MARRIAGE. Bishops have power to grant licences for the marrying of persons; and parsons marrying any person without publishing the bans of matrimony, or without licence, incur a forfeiture of 100*l.* &c. by 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 35. See also 4 Geo. 4. c. 76; and tit. Marriage.

LICENCE TO ERECT A PARK, WARREN, &c. See Park, Warren.

LICENSING OF BOOKS. See Libel, Printing.

LICENTIA CONCORDANDI. Is that licence for which the king's silver was paid on passing a fine. See Fine of Lands.

LICENTIA SURGENDI. See Licence to arise.

LICENTIA TRANSFRETANDI. A writ or warrant directed to the keeper of the port of Dover, or other seaport, commanding them to let such persons pass over sea, who have obtained the king's licence thereunto. Reg. Orig. 193.

LICKING OF THUMBS. A form by which bargains of importance were amicably completed, and still in use in trifling bargains among the lower orders. Scotch. Dict.

LIDFORD LAW. A proverbial speech, intending as much as to hang a man first, and judge him afterwards.

LIEGE [Ligeus.] Is used for liege lord, and sometimes for liege man. Liege lord is he that acknowledgeth no superior; and liege man is he who oweth allegiance to his liege lord. The king's subjects are called liege people, because they owe and are bound to pay allegiance to him.

8 Hen. 6. c. 10; 14 Hen. 8. c. 2. But in ancient times, private persons, as lords of manors, &c. had their lieges. Skene saith, that this word is derived from the Italian liga, a bond or league; others derive it from litis, which is a man wholly at the command of the lord. Blount. See Allegiance.

LIEGES and LIEGE PEOPLE [Ligati.] See Liege.

LIEGE POUSTIE. A state of health, in contradistinction to death-bed. A person possessed of the lawful power (legitima potestas) of disposing, is said to be in liege poustie.

LIEN [Fr.] Is a word used in the law, of two significations; personal lien, such as bond, covenant, or contract; and real lien, a judgment, statute, recognizance, which oblige and affect the land. Terms de Ley.

It signifies an obligation, tie, or claim annexed to, or attaching upon, any property; without satisfying which such property cannot be demanded by its owner.

In 2 East, 235, Lord Ellenborough defined a lien to be a right in one man to retain that which is in his possession belonging to another, till certain demands of him, the person in possession, are satisfied.

The possession must be lawful: a creditor cannot tortiously seize upon his debtor's goods, and then claim to retain them by virtue of a lien. 2 Moore, 730. See 8 Price, 547.

There are two kinds of lien known to the law, viz. particular or general. 3 B. & P. 494. A particular lien is a right to retain the thing itself in respect of which the claim arises. 4 Burr. 2214, 2223; 7 East, 230. A general lien is a right to hold, not only for demands arising out of the thing retained, but for a general balance of accounts relating to dealings of the like character.

The former is recognized and favoured by the common law, with some exceptions. See 1 Atk. 228; Doug. 100. But the latter is regarded strictly, and is only to be established either by express contract, or by that which is evidence of a contract, (6 T. R. 14,) the usage of trade, (7 East, 224,) or previous dealings between the same parties wherein such a right has been allowed. 1 Atk. 236; 4 Burr. 2221.

1. Who have particular liens.
2. Who have general liens.
3. How a lien may be lost or waived.

1. When a person has bestowed labour and skill in the alteration or improvement of any article delivered to him, he has a lien on it for his charge. Thus a tailor, (9 East, 433) a miller and shipwright, (1 Atk. 235; 4 B. & A. 341), have each a lien; so has a farrier for the expense of keeping and training a race-horse, for, by his instruction he has wrought an essential improvement in the animal's character and capabilities. 1 M. & M. 256. But the rule does not appear to extend to keepers of livery stables, R. & M. 193; 1 C. & M. 743; although it does to innkeepers, principally on the ground, it would seem, that the latter are bound by law to entertain travellers, and to take care of their goods and horses. See 3 B. & A. 288; and tit. Innkeepers, III.

Every one, whether an attorney or not, has by the common law a lien on the specific deed or paper delivered to him to do any specific work or business upon; but not on other papers of the same party, unless he be an attorney. 4 Taunt. 807.

The master of a ship has no lien on it for money expended, or debts incurred by him for repairs done to it on the voyage. 9 East, 426. 1 B. & A. 575.

2. An attorney has a lien for his general balance on papers of his client which come to his hands in the course of his professional employment. 1 M. & S. 535. A factor has a lien upon each portion of goods in his possession for his general balance, as well as for the charges upon those particular goods. 6 T. R. 262; 2 East, 529. So have packers, where they are in the nature of factors. 4 Burr. 2214. Bankers also have a lien upon bills deposited with them for a general account, 5 T. R. 488; 1 B. & P. 546; 9 East, 14; but not on securities pledged with them for a specific sum; 3 Bro. C. C. 21; or on muniments casually left in their banking-houses after they have refused to advance money upon them. 7 Taunt. 278. Policy brokers have also a general lien. 4 Campb. 60, 349. It has likewise been determined that calico-printers, 3 Esp. 268; dyers, 4 Esp. 53; and wharfingers, 1 Esp. 109; 3 Esp. 81; have liens for their general balance, but not fullers; 2 B. Moore, 547.

A printer has a general lien upon the copies of a work not delivered, for his balance. 3 M. & S. 167.

The lien of a common carrier for his general balance, however it may arise in point of law from an implied agreement to be inferred from a general usage of trade, proved by instances sufficiently numerous and general to warrant so extensive a conclusion, affecting the custom of the realm, is not to be favoured; nor can it be supported by a few recent instances of detention of goods by four or five carriers for their general balance. But such a lien may be inferred from evidence of the particular words of dealing between the respective parties. 6 East, 519. See also 7 East, 224.

3. Goods subject to a lien are in the nature of a pledge, 3 T. R. 123; 6 T. R. 263; which being personal, cannot be transferred, 5 T. R. 606; 1 East, 337; so that if they are parted with, the lien in general is lost; 1 Burr. 494; 1 Bla. 114; 1 East, 4.

But where the master of a ship, in obedience to revenue regulations, lands goods at a particular wharf or dock, he does not thereby lose his lien on them for the freight. 1 M. & S. 157.

If a party having a lien on goods cause them to be taken in execution at his own suit, and purchase them, he so alters the nature of the possession, that his lien is destroyed, though the goods may never have left his premises. 8 Taunt. 149. So if he abuse the goods, as for instance by pledging them, his lien is forfeited. 1 M. & Rob. 252; 3 Tyrr. 577.

Where a person, when goods are demanded from him, claims to retain them on some other ground, and makes no mention of his lien, he will be considered as having waived it. 1 Campb. 410, n.; 6 B. & C. 36.

The right of lien may also be lost or waived by the special agreement of the parties. If a factor enter into a contract inconsistent with the exercise of the right (as if he stipulate for a particular mode of payment,) he must be understood as waiving it. 16 Ves. 280; 6 T. R. 258; 7 T. R. 64.

A vendor who takes a promissory note in payment, and negotiates it, loses his lien, nor is it revived by the dishonour of the note outstanding in the hands of an indorsee. 5 T. R. 313; 3 B. & A. 497; 6 B. & C. 373; 1 N. & M. 229. See further Attorney, Factor, &c.

LIEU. Instead or in place of another thing. And when one thing doth come in the place of another, it shall be of the same nature as that was; as in case of an exchange, &c. 2 Shep. Abr. 359. See Exchange.

LIEU CONUS. In law proceedings signifies a castle, manor, or other notorious place, well known and generally taken notice of by those that dwell about it. 2 Lil. Abr. 641. A venire facias for a jury to appear, may be from a lieu conus; and a fine or recovery of lands in lieu conus, was good; but it is said in a scire facias to have execution of such fine, the will or parish must have been named. 2 Cro. 574; 2 Mod. 48, 49.

LIEUTENANT [Locum Tenens.] Is the king's deputy, or he that exercises the king's or any other's place, and represents his person; as the Lieutenant of Ireland. See 4 Hen. 4. c. 6; 2 & 3 Edm. 6. c. 2. The Lieutenant of the Ordnance. See 39 Eliz. c. 7. And the Lieutenant of the Tower, an officer under the Constable, &c. The word lieutenant is also used for a military officer next in command to the captain.

LIFE ESTATES. Estates of freehold, not of inheritance. Of these some are conventional, or expressly created by the act of the parties; others merely legal, or created by construction and operation of law. See Curtsey, Dower, Estates Tail, Tail after Possibility, &c.

Expressly for life estates, created by deed or grant, (which alone are properly conventional,) are, where a lease is made of lands or tenements to a man to hold for the term of his own life, or for that of any other person, or for more lives than one; in any of which cases he is styled tenant for life; only when he holds the estate by life of another, he is usually called tenant pur autre vie (for another's life.) Lit. § 56.

These estates for life are, like inheritance, of a feudal nature; and were for some time the highest estate that any man could have in a feud. See Tenures. They are given and conferred by the same feudal rights and solemnities, the same investiture or livery of seisin, as fees themselves are; and they are held by fealty it demanded, and such conventional rents and services as the lord and lessor and his tenant or lessee have agreed on. 2 Comm. c. 8. p. 120.

Estates for life may be created, not only by the express words before mentioned, but also by a general grant, without defining or limiting any specific estate. As if one grant to A. B. the manor of Dale, this makes him tenant for life. Co. Lit. 42. For though, as there are no words of inheritance or heirs mentioned in the grant, it cannot be construed to be a fee, it shall however be construed to be as large an estate as the words of the donation will bear, and therefore an estate for life. Also such a grant at large, or grant for term of life generally, shall be construed to be an estate for the life of the grantee, in case the grantor hath authority to make such a grant; for an estate for a man's own life is more beneficial and of a higher nature than for any other life, and the rule of law is, that all grants are to be taken most strongly against the grantor, unless in the case of the king. Co. Lit. 36, 42.

Such estates for life will endure, generally speaking, as long as the life for which they are granted; but there are some estates for life which may determine upon future contingencies before the life which they are created express. As if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood, or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice; in these and similar cases, whichever the contingency happens, when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains a benefice, the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone. Co. Lit. 42; 3 Rep. 20. Yet while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life, because the time for which they will endure being uncertain, they may by possibility last for life; if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen.

In case an estate be granted to a man for his life generally, it may also determine by his civil death; for which reasons, in conveyances the grant is usually made for the term of a man's natural life, which can only determine by his natural death. This civil death was formerly held to commence if any man was banished or abjured the realm, by the process of the common law, (see Abjuration), or entered into religion, that is, went into a monastery, and became there a monk professed, in which cases he was absolutely dead in law, and his next heir should have his estate; for such banished man was entirely cut off from society; and such monk, upon his profession, renounced solemnly all secular concerns. But even in the times of Popery the laws of England took no cognizance of profession in any foreign country, because the fact could not be tried in our courts. Co. Lit. 132; and, therefore, since the Reformation this disability is held to be abolished, 1 Salk. 162; as is also the disability of banishment consequent upon abjuration, by 21 Jac. 1. c. 28. One species of civil death may, however, still exist in this country, that is, where a man by act of parliament is attainted of treason or felony, and, saving his life, is banished for ever; this Lord Coke declares to be a civil death; but he says, a temporary exile is not a civil death. Under this reasoning, where a man receives judgment of death, and afterwards leaves the kingdom for life, upon a conditional pardon, there can be very little doubt but this amounts to a civil death; this practice did not exist in the time of Lord Coke, who says, that a man can only lose his country by authority of parliament. 1 Inst. 133. See 1 Comm. c. 1. p. 131, 133, and n.

The incidents to an estate for life are principally the following, which are applicable not only to those species of tenants for life, which are expressly created by deed, but also to those which are created by act and operation of law. See 2 Comm. c. 8.

First, every tenant for life, unless restrained by covenant or agreement, may of common right take upon the land demised to him reasonable estovers or botes. Co. Lit. 41. For he hath a right to the full enjoyment and use of the land, and all its profits, during his estate therein. See Common of Estovers. But he is not permitted to cut down timber, or do other waste upon the premises; for the destruction of such things as are not the temporary profits of the tenement, is not necessary for the tenant's complete enjoyment of his estate, but tends to the permanent and lasting loss of the person entitled to the inheritance. 1 Inst. 53. See Waste.

In the second place, Tenant for life, or his representatives, shall not be prejudiced by any sudden determination of his estate; because such a determination is contingent and uncertain. Co. Lit. 55. Therefore, if a tenant for his own life sows the lands, and dies before harvest, his executors shall have the emblements or profits of the crop; for the estate was determined by the hand of God, and it is a maxim in the law, actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. The representatives therefore of the tenant for life shall have the emblements to compensate for the labour and expense of tilling, manuring, and sowing the lands, and also for the encouragement of husbandry, which being a public benefit, tending to the increase and plenty of provisions, ought to have the utmost security and privilege that the law can give it. Wherefore by the feudal law, if a tenant for life died between the beginning of September and the end of February, the lord who was entitled to the reversion was also entitled to the profits of the whole year; but if he died between the beginning of March and the end of August, the heirs of the tenant received the whole. From hence our law of emblements seems to have been derived, but with very considerable improvements; and its advantages are particularly extended to the parochial clergy by 25 Hen. 8. c. 11; for all persons who are presented to any ecclesiastical benefice, or to any civil office, are considered as tenants for their own lives, unless the contrary be expressed in the form of the donation. 1 Comm. c. 8. p. 122, 123. See title Emblements.

A third incident to estates for life relates to the under-tenants or lessees; for they have the same, nay, greater indulgencies than their lessors, the original tenants for life. The same; for the law of estovers and emblements, with regard to the tenant for life, is also law with regard to his under-tenant, who represents him and stands in his place. Co. Lit. 55. Greater, for in those cases where tenant for life shall not have the emblements, because the estate determines by his own act, the exception shall not reach his lessee, who is a third person. As in the case of a woman who holds durante viduitate; her taking a husband is her own act, and therefore deprives her of the emblements; but if she leases her estate to an under-tenant, who sows the lands, and she then marries, this her act shall not deprive the tenant of his emblements, who is a stranger, and could not prevent her. Cro. Eliz. 461; 1 Rol. Abr. 727. The lessees of tenants for life had also at the common law another most unreasonable advantage; for at the death of their lessors, the tenants for life, these under-tenants might, if they pleased, quit the premises, and pay no rent to any body for the occupation of the land, since the last quarter-day, or other day assigned for payment of rent. 10 Rep. 127. To remedy which, it was enacted by 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 15, that the executors or administrators of tenant for life, on whose death any lease determines, shall recover of the lessee a rateable proportion of rent, from the last day of payment to the death of such lessor.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 22. the provisions of the above act are extended to rents reserved on leases determining on the death of the persons making them, (though not strictly tenants for life,) or on leases of lands held pur autre vie.

By § 2. all rents-service, rents-charge, and other rents, annuities, pensions, moduses, compositions, and all other payments due at fixed periods, reserved in leases made, or payable under instruments executed, or (being a will) coming into operation, after the passing of the act, shall be apportioned, and a proportionable part thereof, from the last time of payment to the day of the death of the party interested therein, paid to his or her executors, &c. See further Rent.

By 19 Car. 2. c. 6. where persons for whose lives estates are held, shall absent themselves for seven years, they shall be presumed dead. And by 6 Ann. c. 18. persons for whose lives estates are held, shall, on application to the lord chancellor, be produced. The tenant holding after the determination of the life, deemed a trespasser. See Death. Posthumous children enabled to take in remainder, where the life estate is determined. 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 16. See Occupancy.

LIFE RENT. A rent which a man receives for term of life, or the sustentation of it. Skena.

LIGEANCE [Legeancy, ligentia.] The true and faithful obedience of a subject to his sovereign; and is also applied to the territory and dominion of the liege lord; as children born out of the ligeance of the king, &c. 25 Edw. 3; Co. Lit. 129. See Allegiance.

LIGHTING AND WATCHING. By the 11 Geo. 4. c. 27. provision was made for the lighting and watching of parishes in England and Wales. But doubts having arisen as to the construction of some of its clauses, that act was repealed by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 90. The latter statute (§ 5.) enacts, that on the application of three rated inhabitants the churchwardens of any parish are to convene a meeting of the rate-payers to determine whether the provisions of the act shall be adopted. By § 8. the majority in favour of the adoption must consist of two-thirds of the votes of the rate-payers.

LIGHTS. A right to the enjoyment of light and air may have its commencement in an express agreement, or in mere occupancy. If I have an ancient window overlooking my neighbour's ground, he may not erect any blind to obstruct the light; but if I build my house close to his wall, which darkens it, I cannot compel him to demolish his wall; for there the first occupancy is rather in him than me. 2 Comm. 402. Every man in his own land has a right to all the light and air which will come to him, and he may erect, even on the extremity of his land, buildings, with as many windows as he pleases, without any consent of the owner of the adjoining lands. After he has erected his building, the owner of the adjoining land may within twenty years build upon his own land, and so obstruct the light which would otherwise pass to the building of his neighbour. But if the light be suffered to pass without interruption during that period to the building so erected, the law implies, from the non-obstruction of the light for that length of time, that the owner of the adjoining land has consented that the person who has erected the building upon his own land shall continue to enjoy his light without obstruction so long as he shall continue the specific mode of enjoyment which he had been used to have during that period. It does not, indeed, imply that the consent is given by way of grant; for light and air, not being to be used in the soil of the land of another, are not the subject of actual grant; but the right to insist upon the non-obstruction and non-interruption of them more properly arises by a covenant which the law would imply not to interrupt the free use of the light and air. Per Littledale, J. 3 B. & Cr. 340. See 2 B. & Cr. 691.

A parol licence given to put out a window, after it has been acted on and expense incurred, cannot be revoked. 8 East, 308.

The enjoyment of lights for twenty years without any obstruction from the party entitled to object, has been long held to be a sufficient foundation for raising the presumption of an agreement not to obstruct them. 2 B. & Cr. 686; Darwin v. Upton, cited 3 T. R. 159; 2 Wms. Saund. 175.

Previous, however, to the recent act (2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71.) the acquiescence of lessees or tenants for life in the enjoyment of lights did not bind the landlord or reversioner, unless they had knowledge and acquiesced for twenty years; and a presumption against the owner of lands was not so easily inferred in the case of lights as in cases of rights of way or common, where the tenant suffered an immediate injury. Thus it was held, that an enjoyment of lights for more than twenty years, during the occupation of the opposite premises, by a tenant, did not preclude his landlord, who was ignorant of the fact, from disputing the right to such enjoyment; although he would have been bound by twenty years acquiescence after having known that the windows were opened. 11 East, 370. So where light had been enjoyed for more than twenty years contiguous to land which within that period had been glebe land, but was conveyed to a purchaser under the 55 Geo. 3. c. 147., it was decided that no action would lie against such purchaser for building so as to obstruct the lights; inasmuch as the rector, who was tenant for life, could not grant the easement, and therefore no valid grant could be presumed. 4 B. & Ald. 579. See also 2 B. & Cr. 686.

Now by the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. § 3. when the access and use of light to and from any dwelling-house, workshop, or other building, shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing.

Under the above clause an absolute right to light may be acquired by an enjoyment without interruption for twenty years, as the eighth section of the act, providing for possession during particular estates, does not extend to lights.

A man cannot derogate from his own grant, and therefore where a person possesses a house, having the actual use of certain lights, and also possesses the adjoining land, and sells the house to another, although the lights be new, neither he nor any one claiming under him can build on the adjoining land, so as to obstruct or interrupt the enjoyment of such lights. 1 Lev. 122; 1 Ventr. 237; 1 Price, 27; 1 R. & M. 24; 1 M. & M. 398; 9 Bing. 804; 2 Cr. & Jerv. 128. Upon the same principle, where several adjoining portions of land, on which the building of houses had been commenced, were sold, and by the conditions of sale were to be finished according to a particular plan within the space of two years, it was held that a purchaser of one of the lots could not, by erecting an additional building at the back of his house, obstruct the light from the windows of another purchaser who had built his house according to the plan. 1 Price, 27. For the lots were sold under an implied condition, that nothing should be done by which the windows for which spaces were then left might be obstructed. Ibid. And where the plaintiff purchased a house of A., and the defendant at the same time purchased the adjoining land, upon which an erection of one story high had formerly stood, although in the conveyance to the plaintiff his house was described as bounded by building ground belonging to the defendant; it was held, that the defendant was not entitled to build a greater height than one story, if by so doing he obstructed the plaintiff's lights. 9 Bing. 305.

Shutting up windows with bricks and mortar for above twenty years will destroy the privilege of light. 3 Campb.

514. And the right to the use of light and air, which a party has appropriated to his own use, may be lost by a mere non-user, even for a less period than twenty years, unless an intention of resuming the right in a reasonable time be shown when it ceased to be used. Thus where a person entitled to ancient lights pulled down his house, and erected a blank wall in the place of a wall in which there had been windows, and suffered such blank wall to remain about seventeen years, and the defendant erected a building against it, when the plaintiff opened a window in the same place where there had formerly been a window in the old wall, it was held, in an action for obstructing the light of the new window, that it must at least be shown (which the plaintiff was bound to prove) that at the time of the erection of the blank wall, and the apparent abandonment of the former lights, it was not a perpetual but a temporary abandonment of the enjoyment, with an intention to resume it at a reasonable time. 3 B. & Cr. 536. And it was said by Littledale, J., that if a man pulls down a house, and does not make any use of the land for two or three years, or converts it into tillage, he may be taken to have abandoned all intention of rebuilding the house; and, consequently, that his right to the light had ceased. But if he builds upon the same site, and places windows in the same spot, or does any thing to show that he did not mean to convert the land to a different purpose, then his right would not cease. Ibid. 341.

Stopping lights of a house is a nuisance, but stopping a prospect is not, being only matter of delight, not of necessity; and a person may have either an assize of nuisance against the person erecting any such nuisance, or he may stand on his own ground and abate it. 9 R. p. 53; 1 Mod. 54.

When a party has acquired a right to the use of light, an action lies on the case for obstructing it. 9 Rep. 59 a; Bury v. Pope, 1 Lum. 108. In order to sustain such an action, it is not necessary to show a total privation of light. If the plaintiff can prove that by reason of the obstruction he cannot enjoy the light in so free and ample a manner as he did before, it will be sufficient. 4 Esp. 69. Where an ancient window is closed, the owner of the adjoining land cannot lawfully obstruct the passage of light to any part of the house occupied by the ancient window, although a greater portion of light be admitted by the unobstructed part of the charged window than was anciently enjoyed. 3 Campb. 80. A building, after having been used for twenty years as a malt-house, is converted into a dwelling-house, it is entitled in its new state only to the same degree of light which it possessed in its former state. 1 Campb. 322. So where an old house is pulled down and a new one built, the light in the new house must be in the same place, of the same dimensions, and not more in number than in the old house. 2 Lum. 646. Where one party has the enjoyment of light, and alterations are made in the adjoining buildings, the diminution of light, as a ground of action against the party building, must be such as makes the premises to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business or occupation. 5 Cur. & P. 301, 328. The opening of a window, whereby the plaintiff's privacy is disturbed, is not actionable; the only remedy is to build on the adjoining land, opposite the offensive window. 3 Campb. 80. See 9 R. p. 186, 4 Esp. N. P. C. 69. So the building of a wall which merely intercepts the prospect of another window obstructing his lights, is not actionable. 1 Mod. 57, 2 Keb. 111, 612. See 2 Ves. sen. 453. In a recent case it was held, that the use of an open space of ground for the purpose of requiring light and air, as a timber yard and saw-pit, for twenty years, did not give a right to preclude the adjoining owner from building on his land so as to obstruct the light and air. 1 Moo. & Rob. 240. A reversioner may maintain an action for obstructing lights, for if he were prevented from suing for such an injury during the continuance of the lease, he might have great difficulty in proving his right when he came into possession. 1 Mood. & Malk. 350. See 3 Taunt.

139. And if the obstruction be continued, a new action may be maintained, notwithstanding the former recovery. 2 B. & Adol. 97. And the owner of the inheritance of a house may maintain an action against his own lessee for obstructing lights. Say. R. 215. See also Burr. 2141; 3 Leo. 109. Such an action may be brought not only against the party who first erected the nuisance, but also his lessee or assignee for continuing it. 12 Mod. 635; 2 Salk. 460; 1 Ld. Raym. 713. See also Carth. 456; 1 Keb. 194. But after damages have been recovered from the lessor the right of action against the lessee will be barred, as but one satisfaction will be given, 12 Mod. 640; Carth. 455; unless a continuance of the nuisance be laid in the declaration. Not only the person who erected the obstruction, and the occupier of the premises where it is erected, but even the workmen who performed, and the clerk who superintended the works, are liable to an action. 6 B. Moore, 47.

The court of Chancery will grant an injunction to restrain the owner of a house from making any erection or improvements, so as to darken or obstruct the ancient lights or windows of an adjoining house. 2 Russ. 121.

The foundation of the jurisdiction to interfere by injunction in these cases is such material injury to the comfort of those who dwell in the neighbouring house, as to require the application of a power to prevent as well as remedy an evil, for which damages, more or less, would be given at law; but the court will not interfere upon every degree of darkening ancient lights, nor in every case where an action may be maintained. 16 Ves. 338. See Injunction.

LIMITATION.

[LIMITATIO.] A certain time, assigned by statute, within which an action must be brought. In Scotland it is termed Prescription.

I. The Nature and Origin of Periods of Limitation.

II. The various Statutes of Limitation as applicable to— 1, Actions relating to Real Property; 2, Penal; and, 3, Personal Actions.

III. Of the Time when the Right of Action accrues so as to be affected by the Statute (21 Jac. 1. c. 16.) and of the Courts bound thereby.

IV. *The Exceptions in that Statute—*1, Relating to Infants; 2, Merchants' Accounts; 3, Persons beyond Sea; 4, Executors and Administrators; 5, In cases of Defect in Jurisdiction; 6, Of suing out a Writ to save the Statute; 7, Of reviving a Debt barred by the Statute; 8, Of Pleading.

I. The time of limitation is two-fold; first, in writs by divers acts of parliament; secondly, to make a title to any inheritance, and that is by the common law. Co. Lit. 114, 115.

It seems that by the common law there was no stated or fixed time to bring actions; for though it be said by Bracton, that omnes actiones in mundo infra certa tempora limitationem habent; yet Lord Coke says, that the limitation of actions was by force of divers acts of parliament; also, says he, this general position of Bracton's admitted of several exceptions. Bract. lib. 2. fol. 228; 2 Inst. 95; Co. Lit. 115; 4 Co. 10, 11.

But by the ancient law there was a stated time for the heir of the tenant to claim after the death of his ancestor, that is to say, a year and a day after he was fourteen years old, or else he lost his land, according to the feudal text; Præterea si quis infeudatus major quatuordecim annis sua incuria, vel negligentia per ann. et diem steterit, quod feudi investituram à proprio domino non petierit, transacto hoc spatio, feudum amittit et ad dominum redeat. Spelm. Gloss. 32.

The fixing upon the period of a year and a day, upon several other occasions, seems to have been deduced from this ancient rule; and on this occasion was pitched upon because the services appointed seem to be annually computed; therefore the feud was ordered to be taken up within such time as such annual services became due, or else it was lost and returned to the lord; and the same time that was appointed to the tenant to claim from the lord was also appointed to make his claim upon any disseisor; and if no such claim was made, the disseisor dying seised cast the right of possession upon the heir; and this was to keep the same uniformity in point of time through the law, as also that the lord might be at a certainty whom he might take for his tenant, and admit upon every descent; and since the heir of the tenant anciently lost the whole land, in case he did not take it up within time, it was fit the tenant should lose the right and possession, in case he did not claim within the same time upon the disseisor; that the heir of the disseisor might be in peace, in case the person that had right did not make his claim upon him, and that from thenceforth the lord might receive him into his feud; and as upon the ancient plan of feudal constitution, if the heir did not take up the feud within a year and a day, a desertion and dereliction was presumed; so also if the disseisee did not claim within the same time, the right of possession was relinquished. Spelm. Gloss. annus et dies, 32, 33.

Before the 32 Hen. 8. c. 2. certain remarkable periods were fixed upon within which the titles whereon men designed to be relieved must have accrued; thus in the time of Henry III. by the statute of Merton, 20 Hen. 3. c. 8. at which time the limitation in a writ of right was from the time of King Henry I. it was reduced to the time of King Henry II.; and for assizes of mort d'ancestor, they were thereby reduced by the last return of King John out of Ireland, which was 12 Johannis; and for assizes of novel disseisin, à prima translatione Regis in Normanniam, which was 5 Hen. 2. and which before that had been post ultimum reditum Henrici III. de Britannia: and this limitation was also afterwards by the statutes Westm. 1. (3 Edw. 1.) c. 39. and Westm. 2. (3 Edw. 1.) c. 46. reduced to a narrower compass, the writ of right being limited to the first coronation of Henry III. For these ancient limitations, see Co. Lit. 14 b, 15 a; 2 Inst. 94, 95; 2 Rol. Abr. 111; Hale's Hist. of the Law, 122; 2 Keb. 45. This last date of limitation continued so long unaltered, that it became indeed no limitation at all; it being above three hundred years from Henry III.'s coronation to the year 1540, when the Statute of Limitations, 32 Hen. 8. c. 2. was made. This statute, therefore, instead of limiting actions from the date of a particular event, as before, which in process of years grew abused, took another and more direct course, which might endure for ever, by limiting a certain period of time previous to the commencement of every suit. See 3 Comm. c. 10. p. 189.

Since the passing of that act, various other statutes of limitation have been enacted, which will be noticed under the next division.

By 21 Jac. 1. c. 2. a time of limitation was extended to the case of the King, viz. sixty years precedent to February 19, 1623; 3 Inst. 189. But this becoming ineffectual by efflux of time, the same term of limitation was fixed, by 9 Geo. 3.

c. 16. to commence and be reckoned backwards, from the time of bringing any suit or other process, to recover the thing in question; so that a possession for sixty years is now a bar even against the prerogative, in derogation of the ancient maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi. And the like provision was extended to Ireland by 18 Geo. 3. c. 47. The King is likewise bound by the Prescription Act. (2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71.) and by the Modus Act (2 & 3 W. 4. c. 100.) See tit. King, V. 2.

II. 1. By 32 Hen. 8. c. 2. it is enacted, "That no person shall from thenceforth sue, have, or maintain any writ of right, or make any prescription, title, or claim, to or for any manors, lands, tenements, rents, annuities, commons, pensions, portions, corodies, or other hereditaments, of the possession of his or their ancestor or predecessor, and declare and allege any further seisin or possession of his ancestor or predecessor, but only of the seisin or possession of his ancestor or predecessor, which hath been, or now is, or shall be seised of the said manors, lands, tenements, rents, annuities, commons, pensions, portions, corodies, or other hereditaments, within threescore years next before the teste of the same writ, or next before the said prescription, title, or claim so hereafter to be sued, commenced, brought, made, or had." See title Possession.

Par. 2. "No manner of person shall sue, have, or maintain, any assize of mort d'ancestor, cosenage, ayle, writ of entry upon disseisin, done to any of his ancestors or predecessors, or any manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, of any further seisin or possession of his or their ancestor or predecessor, but only of the seisin or possession of his or their ancestor or predecessor, which was, or hereafter shall be seised of the same manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, within fifty years next before the teste of the original of the same writ hereafter to be brought."

Par. 3. "No person shall sue, have, or maintain any action for any manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, of or upon his or their own seisin or possession therein, above thirty years next before the teste of the original of the same writ hereafter to be brought."

Par. 4. "No person shall hereafter make any avowry or cognizance for any rent, suit, or service, and allege any seisin of any rent, suit, or service, in the same avowry or cognizance in the possession of any other, whose estates shall pretend or claim to have, above fifty years next before the making of the said avowry or cognizance."

Fifty years is the true term of limitation in this instance though Rastall's, and some other editions of the statute, make it only forty years; an error adopted by Coke (2 Inst. 95.) and other writers. See 3 Comm. c. 10. p. 189. in n.

Par. 5. "All formedons in reverter, formedons in remainder, and scire facies upon fines of any manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, at any time hereafter to be sued, shall be sued and taken within fifty years next after the title and cause of action fallen, and at no time after the fifty years past."

In this statute are contained provisions for suits depending or to be commenced within six years after passing the act, also for parties being at the time of the act under age, covert, or otherwise disabled: but there are no general savings in this act for any such disabilities.

By 1 Mar. st. 2. c. 5. it was enacted that the 32 Hen. 8. c. 2. should not extend to any writ of right of advowson, quare impedit, or assize of darrein presentment, nor jus patronatus, nor to any writ of right of ward, writ of ravishment of ward for the wardship of the body, or for the wardship of any castles, honours, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, holden by knight-service; but that such suits might be brought as before the making of the said act.

There was, therefore, no limitation with regard to the time within which any actions touching advowsons were to be brought; at least none later than the times of Richard I. and

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, II. 1.

Henry III. previous to the recent act 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. See post.

By 21 Jac 1. c. 16. which the preamble declares to be for quieting men's estates, and avoiding of suits, it is enacted, § 1. "That all writs of formoden in descender, formoden in remainder, and formoden in reverter, at any time hereafter to be sued or brought of or for any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereunto any person or persons now hath or have any title, or cause to have or pursue any such writ, shall be sued and taken within twenty years next after the end of this present session of parliament; and after the said twenty years expired, no person or persons, or any of their heirs, shall have or maintain any such writ of or for any of the said manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments; and that all writs of formoden in descender, formoden in remainder, formoden in reverter, of any manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments whatsoever, at any time hereafter to be sued or brought by occasion or means of any title, or cause hereafter happening, shall be sued and taken within twenty years next after the title and cause of action first descended or fallen, and at no time after the said twenty years; and that no person or persons that now hath any right or title of entry, into any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, now held from him or them, shall ~~enter~~ enter, but within twenty years next after the end of this present session of parliament, or within twenty years next after any other title of entry accrued; and that no person or persons shall at any time hereafter make any entry into any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, but within twenty years next after his or their right or title, which shall hereafter first descend or accrue to the same; and in default thereof such persons so not entering, and their heirs, shall be utterly excluded and disabled from such entry after to be made; any former law, &c."

"Provided, that if any person or persons that is or shall be entitled to such writ or writs, or that hath or shall have such right or title of entry, be or shall be, at the time of the said right or title first descended, accrued, come, or fallen, within the age of one-and-twenty years, feme covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned, or beyond the seas; that then such person and persons, and his and their heir and heirs, shall or may, notwithstanding the said twenty years be expired, bring his action, or make his entry, as he might have done before this act; so as such person and persons, or his or their heir and heirs, shall within ten years next after his and their full age, discovery, coming of sound mind, enlargement out of prison, or coming into this realm, or death, take the benefit of and sue forth the same, and at no time after the said ten years."

By the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27., founded upon the first report of the Real Property Commissioners, and entitled "An Act for the Limitation of Actions and Suits relating to Real Property, and for simplifying the Remedies for trying the Rights thereto," a variety of most important changes have been introduced: real actions, with one or two exceptions, have been abolished, and twenty years adopted as the leading period of limitation.

§ 1 Enacts, "That the words and expressions hereinafter mentioned, which in their ordinary signification have a more confined or a different meaning, shall in this act, except where the nature of the provision or the context of the act shall exclude such construction, be interpreted as follows; (that is to say,) the word "land" shall extend to manors, messuages, and all other corporeal hereditaments whatsoever, and also to tithes (other than tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole), and also to any share, estate, or interest in them or any of them, whether the same shall be a freehold or chattel interest, and whether freehold or copyhold, or held according to any other tenure; and the word "rent," shall extend to all heriots, and to all services and suits for which a distress may be made, and to all annuities and periodical sums of money charged upon or payable out of any land (except moduses or compositions belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole); and the person through whom another person is said to claim shall mean any person by, through, or under, or by the act of whom, the person so claiming became entitled to the estate or interest claimed, as heir, issue in tail, tenant by the curtesy of England, tenant in dower, successor, special or general occupant, executor, administrator, legatee, husband, assignee, appointee, devisee, or otherwise, and also any person who was entitled to an estate or interest to which the person so claiming, or some person through whom he claims, became entitled as lord by escheat; and the word "person" shall extend to a body politic, corporate, or collegiate, and to a class of creditors or other persons, as well as an individual; and every word importing the singular number only shall extend and be applied to several persons or things, as well as one person or thing; and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male."

§ 2. "That after the 31st December, 1833, no person shall make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same."

§ 3. "That in the construction of this act, the right to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued at such time as hereinafter is mentioned; (that is to say,) when the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through whom he claims, shall, in respect of the estate or interest claimed, have been in possession or in the receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent, and shall while entitled thereto have been dispossessed, or have discontinued such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such disposition or discontinuance of possession, or at the last time at which any such profits or rent were or was so received; and when the person claiming such land or rent shall claim the estate or interest of some deceased person who shall have continued in such possession or receipt in respect of the same estate or interest until the time of his death, and shall have been the last person entitled to such estate or interest who shall have been in such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such death; and when the person claiming such land or rent shall claim in respect of an estate or interest in possession granted, appointed, or otherwise assured by any instrument (other than a will to him, or some person through whom he claims, by a person being in respect of the same estate or interest, in the possession or receipt of the profits of the land, or in the receipt of the rent, and no person entitled under such instrument shall have been in such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which the person claiming as aforesaid, or the person through whom he claims, became entitled to such possession or receipt by virtue of such instrument; and when the estate or interest claimed shall have been an estate or interest in reversion or remainder, or other future estate or interest, and no person shall have obtained the possession or receipt of the profits of such land or the receipt of such rent in respect of such estate or interest, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which such estate or interest became an estate or interest in possession; and when the person claiming such land or rent, or the person through whom he claims, shall have become entitled by reason of any forfeiture or breach of condition, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued when such forfeiture was incurred or such condition was broken."

This clause introduces an important alteration in the law with respect to landlords and tenants. Under the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. the mere non-payment of rent by a lessee was not considered as raising an adverse possession in him, which would cause that statute to operate, although the non-payment had extended over a period of more than 20 years. 2 Bos. & P. 542. Now, however, in consequence of the above section declaring that a party's right of entry shall be deemed to have accrued at the last time at which rent was received, it follows that 20 years' possession by a tenant, without payment of rent, or any acknowledgment in writing of the owner's title (see § 14.) will be a complete bar to the landlord.

§ 4. "That when any right to make an entry or distress or to bring an action to recover any land or rent by reason of any forfeiture or breach of condition shall have first accrued in respect of any estate or interest in reversion or remainder, and the land or rent shall not have been recovered by virtue of such right, the right to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover such land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued in respect of such estate or interest at the time when the same shall have become an estate or interest in possession, as if no such forfeiture or breach of condition had happened."

A remainder-man or reversioner is not bound to take advantage of a forfeiture, but may waive it, and wait until the expiration of the particular estate, before he proceeds to make his entry, or bring his action. 1 Ves. sen. 278. The object, therefore, of the above section is to continue to him his option.

§ 5. "That a right to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action to recover any land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued, in respect of an estate or interest in reversion, at the time at which the same shall have become an estate or interest in possession, by the determination of any estate or estates in respect of which such land shall have been held, or the profits thereof or such rent shall have been received, notwithstanding the person claiming such land, or some person through whom he claims, shall at any time previously to the creation of the estate or estates which shall have determined, have been in possession or receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent."

§ 6. "That for the purposes of this act, an administrator claiming the estate or interest of the deceased person of whose chattels he shall be appointed administrator, shall be deemed to claim as if there had been no interval of time between the death of such deceased person and the grant of the letters of administration."

The intention of this section is to get rid of a practical inconvenience which resulted from the former state of the law, under which it had been decided that as the property of an intestate only vested in his administrator from the time of the grant of administration (see 5. B. & A. 744,) the Statute of Limitations, as to rights accruing after the death of the deceased, only began to run from the obtaining of such grant. Consequently a right to a term of years might have been kept alive for an indefinite period, notwithstanding adverse possession, by delay or neglect to administer on the part of the next of kin.

§ 7. "That when any person shall be in possession or in receipt of the profits of any land, or in receipt of any rent, as tenant at will, the right of the person entitled subject thereto, or of the person through whom he claims, to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover such land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued either at the determination of such tenancy, or at the expiration of one year next after the commencement of such tenancy, at which time such tenancy shall be deemed to have determined: Provided always, that no mortgagor or cestui que trust shall be deemed to be a tenant at will, within the meaning of this clause, to his mortgagee or trustee."

§ 9. "That when any person shall be in possession or in receipt of the profits of any land, or in receipt of any rent, by virtue of a lease in writing, by which a rent amounting to the yearly sum of twenty shillings or upwards shall be reserved, and the rent reserved by such lease shall have been received by some person wrongfully claiming to be entitled to such land or rent in reversion immediately expectant on the determination of such lease, and no payment in respect of the rent reserved by such lease shall afterwards have been made to the person rightfully entitled thereto, the right of the person entitled to such land or rent subject to such lease, or of the person through whom he claims, to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action after the determination of such lease, shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which the rent reserved by such lease was first so received by the person wrongfully claiming as aforesaid; and no such right shall be deemed to have first accrued upon the determination of such lease to the person rightfully entitled."

Previous to this act, if there was a subsisting lease, a right of entry was preserved to the owner until the determination of the term, although no rent had been received by him. Orwell v. Maddox, Runn, Eject. No. 1; nor did the adverse receipt of rent by another person for upwards of twenty years, deprive the party of his right of entry at the expiration of the lease. 7 East, 299; and see 2 Sch. & Lef. C. 25.

§ 10. "That no person shall be deemed to have been in possession of any land within the meaning of this act merely by reason of having made an entry thereon."

§ 11. "That no continual or other claim upon or near any land shall preserve any right of making an entry or distress or of bringing an action."

§ 12. "That when any one or more of several persons entitled to any land or rent as coparceners, joint tenants, or tenants in common, shall have been in possession or receipt of the entirety, or more than his or their undivided share or shares of such land, or of the profits thereof, or of such rent, for his or their own benefit, or for the benefit of any person or persons other than the person or persons entitled to the other share or shares of the same land or rent, such possession or receipt shall not be deemed to have been the possession or receipt of or by such last-mentioned person or persons, or any of them."

This section alters the rule of law that the possession of any one coparcener, joint tenant, or tenant in common, was the possession of the others of them, so as to prevent their being barred by the former statutes of limitation. Possession by one coparcener created a seisin in another, which carried her share by descent to her heirs, although she never actually entered, 7 T. R. 386; and the entry of one coparcener, when not adverse to the rest, enured to the benefit of all. Co. Lit. 243 b.; 6 East, 173.

Neither was the receipt of the rents and profits by one held to be as an ouster of the others. Co. Lit. 243 b. n. (1). 373 b. 1 Salk. 285. Thus the bare receipt of rent for twenty or more years by a tenant in common, without accounting to the other, was considered to be no evidence of ouster. 5 Burr. 2604. But possession for 40 years by one tenant in common, where there was no evidence of any account having been demanded, or any rent paid, or of any claim on the part of the lessors of the plaintiff, or of any acknowledgment of title in them, or in those under whom they claimed, was held sufficient ground for the jury to presume an actual ouster. Comp. 207. And a claim of the whole, by one tenant in common in possession, who denied possession to the other, was decided to be evidence of an ouster of the latter. 11 East, 49.

§ 18. "That when a younger brother or other relation of the person entitled as heir to the possession or receipt of the profits of any land, or to the receipt of any rent, shall enter into the possession or receipt thereof, such possession or receipt shall not be deemed to be the possession or receipt of or by the person entitled as heir."

This clause is also an alteration of the law. Where a younger son, on the death of his father, entered by abatement into his lands, and had issue, and died seized thereof, the elder son, or his issue, might enter, notwithstanding the descent, nor did the Statute of Limitation operate; as the law intended that when the younger son abated into the land, he entered claiming as heir to his father, and the elder son, or his issue, claimed by the same title. See Lit. 396.

§ 11. "Provided always, that when any acknowledgment of the title of the person entitled to any land or rent shall have been given to him or his agent in writing, signed by the person in possession, or in receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent, then such possession or receipt of or by the person by whom such acknowledgment shall have been given, shall be deemed, according to the meaning of this act, to have been the possession or receipt of or by the person to whom or to whose agent such acknowledgment shall have been given at the time of giving the same, and the right of such last-mentioned person, or any person claiming through him, to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover such land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued at and not before the time at which such acknowledgment, or the last of such acknowledgments, if more than one, was given."

§ 15. "Provided also, that when no such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall have been given before the passing of this act, and the possession or receipt of the profits of the land, or the receipt of the rent, shall not at the time of the passing of this act have been adverse to the right or title of the person claiming to be entitled thereto, then such person, or the person claiming through him, may, notwithstanding the period of twenty years hereinbefore limited shall have expired, make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover such land or interest at any time within five years next after the passing of this act."

§ 16. "Provided, that if at the time at which the right of any person to make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent shall have first accrued as aforesaid, such person shall have been under any of the disabilities hereinafter mentioned, (that is to say,) infancy, coverture, idiocy, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or absence beyond seas, then such person, or the person claiming through him, may, notwithstanding the period of twenty years hereinbefore limited shall have expired, make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover such land or rent at any time within ten years next after the time at which the person to whom such right shall first have accrued as aforesaid shall have ceased to be under any such disability, or shall have died (which shall have first happened)."

Imprisonment, which was one of the disabilities comprised in the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. is omitted in the above section, as well as in the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. and 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 100.

§ 17. "Provided nevertheless, that no entry, distress, or action shall be made or brought by any person who, at the time at which his right to make an entry or distress or to bring an action to recover any land or rent shall have first accrued, shall be under any of the disabilities hereinbefore mentioned, or by any person claiming through him, but within forty years next after the time at which such right shall have first accrued, although the person under disability at such time may have remained under one or more of such disabilities during the whole of such forty years, or although the term of ten years from the time at which he shall have ceased to be under any such disability, or have died, shall not have expired."

§ 18. "Provided always, that when any person shall be under any of the disabilities hereinbefore mentioned at the time at which his right to make an entry or distress or to bring an action to recover any land or rent shall have first accrued, and shall depart this life without having ceased to be under any such disability, no time to make an entry or distress or to bring an action to recover such land or rent beyond the said period of twenty years next after the right of such person to make an entry or distress or to bring an action to recover such land or rent shall have first accrued, or the said period of ten years next after the time at which such person shall have died, shall be allowed by reason of any disability of any other person."

Under the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. the time when that statute began to run, might be protracted for an indefinite period by a succession of disabilities in the person having the right of entry, or his heir, provided that no interval between such disabilities to which the statute could attach, occurred; for when once the statute began to run, no subsequent disability, whether voluntary or involuntary, would prevent its operation. 4 T. R. 310; 4 Taunt. 826; 6 East, 80.

§ 19. "That no part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, nor the islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, nor any island adjacent to any of them (being part of the dominions of his majesty) shall be deemed to be beyond seas within the meaning of this act."

§ 20. "That when the right of any person to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent to which he may have been entitled for an estate or interest in possession shall have been barred by the determination of the period hereinbefore limited, which shall be applicable in such case, and such person shall at any time during the said period have been entitled to any other estate, interest, right, or possibility, in reversion, remainder, or otherwise, in or to the same land or rent, no entry, distress, or action shall be made or brought by such person, or any person claiming through him, to recover such land or rent, in respect of such other estate, interest, right, or possibility, unless in the meantime such land or rent shall have been recovered by some person entitled to an estate, interest, or right which shall have been limited or taken effect after, or in defeasance of such estate or interest in possession."

§ 21. "That when the right of a tenant in tail of any land or rent to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action to recover the same, shall have been barred by reason of the same not having been made or brought within the period hereinbefore limited, which shall be applicable in such case, no such entry, distress, or action shall be made or brought by any person claiming any estate, interest, or right which such tenant in tail might lawfully have barred."

§ 22. "That when a tenant in tail of any land or rent, entitled to recover the same, shall have died before the expiration of the period hereinbefore limited, which shall be applicable in such case, for making an entry or distress or bringing an action to recover such land or rent, no person claiming any estate, interest, or right which such tenant in tail might lawfully have barred, shall make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover such land or rent, but within the period during which, if such tenant in tail had so long continued to live, he might have made such entry or distress or brought such action."

These two last clauses effect a great alteration, with respect to persons having remainders in reversion dependant upon estates tail. The 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. in no case began to operate with respect to any individual, until his title to the possession had accrued; and, therefore, as the right of entry of a remainder-man did not arise until the failure of the

The former statutes of limitation were held not to bar the right but only the remedy. 1 Saund. 282, a. n.; 2 B. & Ad. 418. The present act has wisely put an end to such an absurd distinction.

§ 35. "That the receipt of the rent payable by any tenant from year to year, or other lessee, shall, as against such lessee or any person claiming under him (but subject to the lease), be deemed to be the receipt of the profits of the land for the purposes of this act."

§ 37. "Provided always, that when, on the said 31st December, 1834, any person who shall not have a right of entry to any land shall be entitled to maintain any such writ or action as aforesaid in respect of such land, such writ or action may be brought at any time before the 1st June, 1835, in case the same might have been brought if this act had not been made, notwithstanding the period of twenty years hereinbefore limited shall have expired."

§ 38. "Provided also, that when, on the said 1st June, 1835, any person whose right of entry to any land shall have been taken away by any descent cast, discontinuance, or warranty, might maintain any such writ or action as aforesaid in respect of such land, such writ or action may be brought after the said 1st of June, 1835, but only within the period during which by virtue of the provisions of this act an entry might have been made upon the same land by the person bringing such writ or action, if his right of entry had not been so taken away."

§ 39. "That no descent cast, discontinuance, or warranty which may happen or be made after the said 31st December, 1833, shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land."

§ 40. "That after the said 31st December, 1833, no action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought, to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twenty years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one, was given."

§ 41. "That after the said 31st December, 1833, no arrears of dower, nor any damages on account of such arrears, shall be recovered or obtained by any action or suit for a longer period than six years next before the commencement of such action or suit."

§ 42. "That after the said 31st December, 1833, no arrears of rent or of interest in respect of any sum of money charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, or in respect of any legacy, or any damages in respect of such arrears of rent or interest, shall be recovered by any distress, action, or suit, but within six years next after the same respectively shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment of the same in writing shall have been given to the person entitled thereto, or his agent, signed by the person by whom the same was payable, or his agent: provided nevertheless, that where any prior mortgagee or other incumbrancer shall have been in possession of any land, or in the receipt of the profits thereof, within one year next before an action or suit shall be brought by any person entitled to a subsequent mortgage or other incumbrance on the same land, the person entitled to such subsequent mortgage or incumbrance may recover in such action or suit the arrears of interest which shall have become due during the whole time that such prior mortgagee or incumbrancer was in such possession or receipt as aforesaid, although such time may have exceeded the said term of six years."

§ 43. "That after the said 31st December, 1833, no person claiming any tithes, legacy, or other property for the recovery of which he might bring an action or suit at law or in equity shall bring a suit or other proceeding in any spiritual court to recover the same but within the period during which he might bring such action or suit at law or in equity."

§ 44. "Provided always, that this act shall not extend to Scotland; and shall not, so far as it relates to any right to permit to or bestow any church, vicarage, or other ecclesiastical benefice, extend to Ireland."

It is to be observed, that in consequence of the abolition of fines by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 74. a title to lands can no longer be obtained by a fine levied with proclamations, and non-claim for five years under the provisions of the 4 H. 7. c. 24. See tit. Fine of Lands.

2. By 31 Eliz. c. 5. par. 5, it is enacted, "That all actions, suits, bills, indictments, or informations, which shall be brought for any forfeiture upon any statute penal, made or to be made, whereby the forfeiture is or shall be limited to the queen, &c. shall be brought within two years after the offence: and that all actions, suits, bills, or informations, which shall be brought for any forfeiture upon any penal statute, made or to be made, except the statutes of tillage, the benefit and suit whereof is or shall be by the said statute limited to the queen, her heirs or successors, and to any other that shall prosecute in that behalf, shall be brought by any person that may lawfully sue for the same within one year next after the offence committed; and in default of such pursuit, that then the same shall be brought for the queen's majesty, her heirs or successors, any time within the two years after that year ended. Where a shorter time is limited by any penal statute, the prosecution must be within that time."

Also see 18 Eliz. c. 5; 21 Jac. 1. c. 4; the former requiring a memorandum of the day of exhibiting an information, the latter an oath from the informer.

In the construction of these statutes it hath been holden. That the 21 Jac. 1. c. 4, does not extend to any offence created since that statute; so that prosecutions on subsequent penal statutes are not restrained thereby, but that statute is to them as it were repealed pro tanto. 1 Salk. 373:

5 Mod. 425. And that the said statute, 21 Jac. 1. only applies to those penal statutes, on which proceedings may be had before the justices of assize, justices of the peace, &c. 3 Term Rep. 362.

That if an offence prohibited by any penal statute be also an offence at common law, the prosecution of it as of an offence at common law, is no way restrained by any of these statutes. Hob. 270; 4 Mod. 144.

That if an information tam quam be brought after the year on a penal statute, which gives one moiety to the informer, and the other to the king, it is naught only as to the informer, but good for the king. Cro. Car. 391; Cro. Jac. 386. See Dalis. 60.

That if a suit on a penal statute be brought after the limited time, the defendant need not plead the statute, but may take advantage of it on the general issue. 1 Show. 353.

It seems doubtful whether the suit by a common informer on a penal statute, which first gives an action to the party grieved, and in his default, after a certain time, to any one who will sue, be within the restraint of these statutes. 1 Show. 353, 354.

The party grieved was not within the restraint of these statutes, but might have sued in the same manner as before. Cro. Eliz. 645; Noy, 71; 3 Leon. 237.

But by the 9 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. § 3. all actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved by any statute now or hereafter to be in force, shall be commenced and sued within two years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after.

It has been held by three judges, that suing out a latitat within the year was a sufficient commencement of the suit to save the limitation of time on a penal statute; because the latitat is the original in B. R. and may be continued on record as an original. But Holt held otherwise, for the action being for a penalty given by a statute, the plaintiff might have brought an action of debt by original in B. R. because the statute gives the action; and he held, that there was a difference between a civil action, and an action given by statute; for in the first case, the suing out a latitat within the time, and continuing it afterwards, will be sufficient; but in the other case, if the party proceeds by bill, he ought to file his bill within the time, that it may appear so to be on the record itself. Carth. 232, 233 n. 353. But upon a writ of error, all the judges in the Exchequer Chamber held, that a latitat is a kind of original in the King's Bench. 2 Ld. Raym. 883. And accordingly, in two subsequent cases, it was holden to be a good commencement of the suit in a penal action. 2 Burr. 950; 3 Burr. 1243; Comp. 454.

2. By the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. § 3. it is enacted, that all actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, trespass, detinue, trover, and replevin for taking away of goods and cattle; all actions of account and upon the case, other than such accounts as concern the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants; all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty; all actions of debt for arrearages of rent; and all actions of assault, menace, battery, wounding, and imprisonment of them, shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereafter expressed, and not after (that is to say), the said actions upon the case (other than for slander), and the said actions for account, and the said actions for trespass, debt, detinue, and replevin for goods or cattle, and the said action of trespass quare clausum fregit, within six years next after the cause of such actions or suit, and not after; and the said actions of trespass, of assault, battery, wounding, imprisonment, or any of them, within four years next after the cause of such actions or suit, and not after; and the said actions upon the case for words, within two years next after the words spoken, and not after.

By § 4. where judgment is given for a plaintiff, and reversed by writ of error; or if judgment for a plaintiff be arrested, or if a defendant in an action by original be outlawed, and the outlawry reversed, the plaintiff may commence a new action within twelve months after such reversal or arrest of judgment respectively, though it be beyond the time of limitation directed by the statute.

By § 7. an exception is introduced in favour of persons within the age of twenty-one, femes covert, persons non compos mentis, imprisoned, or beyond seas, who are at liberty to bring the same actions, so as they take the same within such times as are before limited after their coming to, or being of full age, discovery, of sane memory, at large, and return from beyond the seas, as other persons having no such impediment should have done. And see 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 7. post, as to what places shall not be deemed to be beyond the seas within this act.

The action of assumpsit is not mentioned eo nomine in the statute; but the last proviso extends not only to those actions therein enumerated, but also to an assumpsit and all other actions on the case. *Bac. Under the head of actions upon the case are included actions for libels, criminal conversation, seduction, and actions for such words as are not actionable without a special damage; and all other actions on the case, being of equal mischief, and plainly within the intention of the legislature. Where the plaintiff complained of a plea of trespass, for that the defendant with force and arms assaulted and seduced the plaintiff's wife, whereby he lost the comfort of her society &c., against the peace &c., to his damage &c.; whether this be trespass or case, (and former authorities have considered it to be case,) at any rate a plea of 'not guilty within six years' is good on a general demurrer, 6 East, 387.

It seems, that if a man brings trespass for beating his servant, per quod servitium amisit, this is not such an action as is within the branch of the statute relating to actions of trespass, being founded on the special damage. 1 Salk. 206; 5 Mod. 74.

If to an action of assault, battery, and imprisonment, the defendant pleads, as to the assault and imprisonment, the statute of limitations, without answering particularly to the battery, otherwise than by using the words transgressio prædicta, it is sufficient; for these words are an answer to the whole. 1 Lev. 31.

That it extends not to actions for slander of title; for that is not properly slander, but a cause of damage; and the slander intended by the statute is to the person. Cro. Car. 141.

That if the words are of themselves actionable, without the necessity of alleging special damages, although a loss ensues, yet in this case the statute of limitations is a good bar; but if the words, at the time of the speaking of them, are not actionable, but a subsequent loss ensues, which entitles the plaintiff to his action, in such case the statute is no bar. 1 Sid. 95; Raym. 61; and see 3 Mod. 111.

But by the 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. § 5. no action shall be brought for recovery of any penalty for not setting out tithes, nor any suit instituted in any Court of Equity, or Ecclesiastical Court, to recover the value of any tithes, unless such action be brought or such suit commenced within six years from the time when such tithes became due.

So it was held an action of debt for rent reserved on a lease by indenture was out of the statute, the lease by indenture being equal to a specialty. Hutt. 109; 1 Saund. 38.

Also an action of debt for an escape was not within the statute; not only because it is founded in maleficio, and arises on a contract in law, which is different from those actions of debt on a lending or contract mentioned in the statute, but also because it is grounded on 1 Rich. 2. c. 12. which first gave an action of debt for an escape, there being no remedy for creditors before, but by action on the case. 1 Saund. 37; Jones v. Pope, 1 Lev. 191; 2 Keb. 908; 1 Sid. 305.

Neither did the statute extend to actions of covenant, nor to any actions of debt in specialties, or other matter of a higher nature. 1 Saund. 38. Thus a scire facias being founded in matter of record was not within the act.

So this statute could not be pleaded to an action of debt brought against a sheriff for money by him levied on a feri facias; because the action is founded in maleficio, as also upon the judgment on which the feri facias issued, which is a matter of record. 1 Mod. 212, 245; 2 Show. 79.

And an action of debt on an award under the hand and seal of the arbitrators, though the submission was by parol, was not within the statute. 2 Saund. 64; Sid. 415; 1 Lev. 273; 1 Keb. 462, 496, 533.

Nor an action of debt for a fine of a copyholder. 1 Keb. 536; 1 Lev. 273.

Neither was an action of debt upon bond within the statute, Comp. 102; but after a lapse of twenty years, without payment of interest or any acknowledgment of it by the obligor, the law presumed it to be satisfied, 1 Term Rep. 270, and in some cases satisfaction was presumed within that period. 1 Burr. 131, n. (n); 1 Term Rep. 270; 1 Comp. 26.

Now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. with a view of fixing a period of limitation for such actions as had been held not to be within the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. it is enacted, § 3. "that all actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise, all actions of covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty, and all actions of debt or scire facias upon any recognizance, and also all actions of debt upon any award where the submission is not by specialty, or for any fine due in respect of any copyhold estates, or for an escape, or for money levied on any feri facias, and all actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved, by any statute now or hereafter to be in force, that shall be sued or brought at any time after the end of the present session of parliament, shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation herein-after expressed, and not after; that is to say, the said actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise, or covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty, actions of debt or scire facias upon recognizance, within ten years after the end of this present session, or within twenty years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after; the said actions by the party grieved, one year after the end of this present session, or within two years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after; and the said other actions within three years after the end of this present session, or within six years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after; provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any action given by any statute where the time for bringing such action is or shall be by any statute specially limited."

But by § 4. "if any person or persons that is or are or shall be entitled to any such action or suit, or to such scire facias, is or are or shall be, at the time of any such cause of action accrued, within the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis, or beyond the seas, then such person or persons shall be at liberty to bring the same actions, so as they commence the same within such times after the coming to or being of full age, discovert, of sound memory or returned from beyond the seas, as other persons having no such impediment should, according to the provisions of this act, have done; and if any person or persons against whom there shall be any such cause of action is or are, or shall be at the time such cause of action accrued, beyond the seas, then the person or persons entitled to any such cause of action shall be at liberty to bring the same against such person or persons within such times as are before limited after the return of such person or persons from beyond the seas."

§ 5. Provided, "that if acknowledgment shall have been made, either by writing signed by the party liable by virtue of such indenture, specialty, or recognizance, or his agent, or by part payment or part satisfaction on account of any principal or interest being then due thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the person or persons entitled to such actions to bring his or their action for the money remaining unpaid and so acknowledged to be due within twenty years after such acknowledgment by writing or part payment or part satisfaction as aforesaid, or in case the person or persons entitled to such action shall at the time of such acknowledgment be under such disability as aforesaid, or the party making such acknowledgment be, at the time of making the same, beyond the seas, then within twenty years after such disability shall have ceased as aforesaid, or the party shall have returned from beyond the seas, as the case may be; and the plaintiff or plaintiffs in any such action on any indenture, specialty, or recognizance, may, by way of replication, state such acknowledgment, and that such action was brought within the time aforesaid, in answer to a plea of this statute."

§ 6. "If in any of the said actions judgment be given for the plaintiff, and the same be reversed by error, or a verdict pass for the plaintiff, and upon matter alleged in arrest of judgment the judgment be given against the plaintiff, that he take nothing by his plaint, writ, or bill, or if in any of the said actions the defendant shall be outlawed, and shall after reverse the outlawry, that in all such cases the party plaintiff, his executors or administrators, as the case shall require, may commence a new action or suit from time to time within a year after such judgment reversed, or such judgment given against the plaintiff, or outlawry reversed, and not after."

§ 7. No part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, nor the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, nor any islands adjacent to any of them, being part of the dominions of his majesty, shall be deemed to be beyond the seas within the meaning of this act, or of the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16.

For the clause of the above statute permitting actions of trespass, or trespass on the case to be maintained by or against executors or administrators for injuries done to the real estate of the deceased persons in their life-times, or by the latter to the real and personal property of others, provided the cause of action has accrued, and the action is brought within the time prescribed by the act. See tit. Executor, VI. 1.

The statute of limitations (21 Jac. 1. c. 16.) bars the remedy, not the debt. Therefore an attorney retains his lien on a judgment for his costs, though his remedy by action is barred. 2 B. & Ad. 413.

III. 1. The 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. cannot be a bar unless the six years are expired, after there hath been complete cause of action; as if a man promise to pay 10*l.* to J. S. when he came from Rome, or when he marries, and ten years after J. S. marries, or comes from Rome, the right of action accrues from the happening of the contingency; from which time the statute shall be a bar, and not from the time of promise. Godb. 437.

So in an action on the case wherein the plaintiff declared, that in consideration that he would forbear to sue the defendant for some sheep killed by the defendant's dog, the defendant promised to make him satisfaction upon request, and that at such a time he requested, &c. it was held that the right of action accrued from the request, not from the time of killing the sheep; that therefore the defendant could not plead the statute of limitations, the request being within six years, though the killing the sheep and promise of satisfaction was long before. Godb. 437. See also 1 Lev. 48; 1 Sid. 66; 1 Keb. 177.

And where the plaintiff declared that in consideration, he, at the defendant's request, would receive A. and B. into his house as guests and diet them, the defendant promised &c.; it was held that the statute began to run from the time of the dieting, and not from the time of making the promise. 2 Salk. 422; S. C. 2 Lord Ray. 888.

So if a note or bill of exchange is given, payable at a certain time after date, the cause of action does not accrue until after the expiration of the time specified; and if an action is brought within six years after that time, the statute is not a bar. But if the suit is not commenced within six years after that time, the defendant may plead that the cause of action did not accrue within six years, but he must not plead that he did not promise within six years, i. e. if he is the person first liable to the payment, because the promise is made at the time of making the notes, &c. It may be otherwise in the case of an indorser, who is not liable until default made by the drawer of the note, or acceptor of the bill, but in this case non accret infra sex annos is a safe and good plea. And see 1 Vent. 191; 3 Keb. 613; Cro. Car. 245, 6, 353; 1 John. 52; 3 Mod. 110, &c.; Allen, 62; 2 Salk. 420; Comb. 26; 1 H. Black. 681.

The statute is no bar to a bill payable at a specified time after sight, unless it has been presented for payment, for debt does not accrue upon such a bill until it is presented. 2 Taunt. 323.

And the statute was held no bar to an action on a promissory note, dated about thirteen years before and payable twenty-four months after demand, no demand having been made until within three years before action brought. 1 R. & M. 888. But a promissory note payable on demand is payable immediately; and the statute runs from the date of the note. 1 Selm. N. P. 137.

Where a demand is necessary to complete the cause of action, the statute only runs from the time of such demand. But in some cases, after a reasonable period has elapsed, a jury may presume that the demand has been made. See 1 Taunt. 572.

Where the breach of a contract is attended with special damage, the statute runs from the time of the breach, and not from the time it was discovered or the damage arose. 2 B. & B. 78; 3 B. & A. 288, 626.

In trover the statute runs from the conversion, 7 Mod. 99; 4 Esp. 20; and in other actions founded upon tort, from the time when the cause of action is complete.

Where the agreement on the sale of goods was for payment at the end of six months by a bill at two or three months at the option of the purchaser: held, (Park, J. diss.) that this was a credit for nine months, and that the statute did not begin to run till the expiration of that time. 2 B. & Ad. 431.

It has been agreed, that the statute of limitations is no plea in the Court of Admiralty or Spiritual Court, where they proceed according to their law, and in a matter in which they have cognizance. 6 Mod. 25, 26; 2 Salk. 424; 3 Keb. 386, 392.

Therefore, for a suit upon a contract super altum mare, no prohibition should go upon their refusal of a plea of the statute of limitations. 3 Mod. 26.

So it has been held not to be pleadable to a proceeding in the Spiritual Court, pro violenta manuum injectione in clericum, because the proceeding is pro reformatione morum, not for damages. 2 Salk. 424.

It was formerly doubted, whether, to a suit in the Admiralty for mariners' wages, this statute was a good plea; because it was said, that this was a matter properly determinable at common law; and the allowing the Admiralty jurisdiction therein only a matter of indulgence. 2 Salk. 424; 6 Mod. 25.

But it was enacted by the 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16, that all suits and actions in the Court of Admiralty for seamen's wages shall be commenced and sued within six years next after the cause of such suits or actions shall accrue, and not after.

IV. 1. The statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 16, being general, infants had been included, had they not been particularly excepted. 1 Lev. 3.

It hath been holden, that if an infant, during his infancy, by his guardian, bring an action, the defendant cannot plead the statute of limitations; although the cause of action accrued six years before; and the words of the statute are, that after his coming of age, &c. 2 Saund. 121.

It hath been held in Chancery, that if one receives the profits of an infant's estate, and six years after his coming of age he brings a bill for an account, the statute of limitations is as much a bar to such a suit as if he had brought an action of account at common law; for this receipt of the profits of an infant's estate is not such a trust as, being a creature of the court of equity, the statute shall be no bar to; for he might have his action of account against him at law, and therefore no necessity to come into this court for the account; for the reason why the bills for an account are brought here, is from the nature of the demand, and that they may have a discovery of books, papers, and the party's oath, for the more easy taking of the account, which cannot be so well done at law; but if the infant lies by for six years after he comes of age, as he is barred of his action of account at law, so shall he be of his remedy in this court. 1 Abr. Eg. 304, c. 10; Pre. Ch. 518.

2. It hath been a matter of much controversy, whether the exception relative to a merchant's accounts extends to all actions and accounts relating to merchants and merchandize, or to actions of account open and current only; the words of the statute being, "All actions of trespass, &c. all actions of account and upon the case, other than such actions as concern the trade of merchants;" so that by the words, other than such actions, not being said actions of account, it has been insisted that all actions concerning merchants are excepted. But it is now settled, that accounts open and current only are within the statute; that therefore if an account be stated and settled between merchant and merchant, and a sum certain agreed to be due to one of them, if in such case he to whom the money is due does not bring his action within the limited time, he is barred by the statute. See 1 Jon. 401; 2 Saund. 124, 125; 1 Lev. 287, 298; 2 Keb. 622; 1 Vent. 90; 1 Mod. 270; 2 Mod. 312; 2 Vern. 456.

So it hath been adjudged, that by the exception in the statute concerning merchants' accounts, no other actions are excepted but actions of accounts. Carth. 226. But the law is now held to be, that the exception applies to actions on the case. 2 Will. Saund. 127, b. n. (7).

Also it hath been adjudged, that bills of exchange for value received are not such matters of account as are intended by the exception in the statute of limitations. Carth. 226.

An open current account, between tradesmen or others, is not within the statute, supposing the last article of the debt in the account was contracted within the last six years; otherwise, in such case, the statute is a bar. J. M.

This exception does not extend to a tradesman's account with his customer; for in this case there are not mutual dealings; and the tradesman is barred by the statute from recovering for more than those articles which have been sold within six years. Bull. N. P. 149. See Rothery v. Munnings, 1 B. & Adol. 15, acc. Quære. Whether, in case of a bill for work done (as a proctor's), the right of action accrues de die in diem, or whether it is incomplete till the completion of the business in hand? Ibid.

3. The clause of the statute, as to persons beyond sea, extends only to such as are actually so. For where to non assumpsit infra sex annos, the plaintiff replied, that, when the cause of action accrued, he was resident in foreign parts out of the kingdom of England, viz. Glasgow in Scotland; this was held ill, on demurrer; Scotland not being a foreign part within the meaning of the statute, the express words of which are, beyond the seas. 1 B. 256. Therefore a foreigner, or person resident abroad, shall never be barred from bringing his action, from any length of time while out of the kingdom, for the statute does not begin to run until he has come into it; though any of the persons, who are under the disabilities mentioned in the statute, may nevertheless, during the time such disabilities exist, bring their actions. Espinasse, N.P. 149, 150.

If the plaintiff be in England at the time the cause of action accrues, the time of limitation begins to run, so that if he, or (if he dies abroad) his representative, does not sue within six years, he is barred by the statute. 1 Wils. par. 1, 134.

If one only of a number of partners lives abroad, if the others be in England, the action must be brought within six years after the cause of action arises. 4 T. R. 516.

It seems to have been agreed, that the exception extends only where the creditors or plaintiffs are so absent, and not to debtors or defendants, because the first only are mentioned in the statute; and this construction has the rather prevailed, because it was reputed the creditor's folly that he did not file an original, and outlaw the debtor, which would have prevented the bar of the statute. Cro. Car. 245, 333; 1 Jon. 252; 1 Lev. 143; 3 Mod. 311; 2 Lutw. 950; 1 Salk. 420.

But as the creditor's being beyond sea is saved by 21 Jac. 1. c. 16; so now by 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. it is enacted, that if any person or persons, against whom there is or shall be any cause of suit or action for seamen's wages, or against whom there shall be any cause of action of trespass, detinue, action sur trover or replevin, for taking away goods or chattels, or of action of account, or upon the case, or of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty, of debt for arrearages of rent, or assault, menace, battery, wounding, and imprisonment, or any of them, be, or shall be, at the time of any such cause of suit or action given or accrued, fallen or come, beyond the seas, that then such person or persons, who is or shall be entitled to any such suit or action, shall be at liberty to bring the said actions against such person or persons after their return from beyond the seas, within such times as are limited for the bringing of the said actions by 21 Jac. 1. c. 16.

If the cause of action accrue in India, and the plaintiff sues the defendant in England within six years after the defendant's return to this country, according to the 4 Anne, c. 16. the defendant cannot plead the statute of limitations, although more than six years elapsed in India after the cause of action accrued there. 13 East, 439.

See now 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. § 7. as to what places shall be deemed not beyond seas within the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16, ante, II.

A. received money belonging to a person who before died intestate, and to whom B. after such receipt took out administration, and brought an action against A. to which he pleaded the statute of limitations; the plaintiff replied, and shewed that administration was committed to him such a year, which was infra sex annos; though six years were expired since the receipt of the money, yet not being so since the administration committed, the action not barred by the statute. 1 Salk. 421; Skin. 555; 4 Mod. 376; Latch. 335.

It is said in general, that where one brings an action before the expiration of six years, and dies before judgment, the six years being then expired, this shall not prevent his executor. 2 Salk. 424, 425.

But if an executor sues upon a promissory note to the testator, and dies before judgment, and six years from the original cause of action are actually expired, and the executor brings a new action in four years after the first executor's death, the statute of limitations shall be a bar to such action; for though the debt does not become irrecoverable by an abatement of the action after the six years elapsed by the plaintiff's death; yet the executor should make a recent prosecution, to which the clause in the statute, § 4. that provides a year after the reversal of a judgment, &c. may be a good direction, or show that he came as early as he could, because there was a contest about the will, or right of administration for the statute was made for the benefit of the defendants, to free them from actions when their witnesses were dead, or their vouchers lost. 2 Stra. 907; Fitzgib. 81.

Under the equity of the above-mentioned section, in all cases of executors, if the six years be not elapsed at the time of the testator's death, and the executor takes out proper process within the year, it will save the bar by reason of the limitation, even though the six years, within which the demand accrued, be elapsed before process sued out. Bull. N. P. 150; Caver v. James, Trin. 15 Geo. 2. C. B.

If there be no executor against whom the plaintiff may bring his action, he shall not be prejudiced by the statute of limitations, nor shall any laches in such cases be imputed to him, 2 Vern. 695; and so also where a bill of exchange was drawn, payable to the intestate in his life, but was accepted after his death, it was held, that the statute only began to run from the date of the letters of administration, for till that time there was no person capable of suing. 5 B. & A. 204; 8 B. & C. 285.

Where a party brings an action within the six years, and dies before judgment, the six years being then expired, it has been held that his executor or administrator may, within the equity of the fourth section of the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. bring a new action, provided he does so within a reasonable time. 2 Salk. 425; 1 Lutw. 260. What is a reasonable time has not been expressly decided, although it seems to have been thought the period allowed should not exceed one year. See 1 Lord Raym. 484; 2 Str. 907; Fitz. 170, 289. And the executor ought to bring a new action as soon as he can, and at all events not delay it beyond a year. 2 Saund. 63 h. note.

5. It seems agreed, that there being no courts, or the courts of justice being shut, is no plea to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations; as where after the civil war a assumpsit was brought, and the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations; to which the plaintiff replied, that a civil war had broke out, and that the government was usurped by rebels, which hindered the course of justice, and by which the courts were shut up, and that within six years after the war ended he commenced his action; this replication was held, for the statute being general, must work upon all cases which are not exempted by the exception. 1 Keb. 157; Lev. 91; Carth. 157; 2 Salk. 420.

It is clearly agreed, that the defendant's being a member of parliament, and entitled to privilege, will not save a bar of the statute; because the plaintiff might have filed an original without being guilty of any breach of privilege. Lev. 31, 111; Carth. 136, 137.

It is said, that if a man sues in Chancery, and pending the suit there, the statute of limitations attaches on his demand, and his bill is afterwards dismissed, the matter being properly determinable at common law; in such case the court will preserve the plaintiff's right, and will not suffer the statute to be pleaded in bar to his demand. 1 Vern. 73, 74.

If the statute of limitations be pleaded to an action, the plaintiff to save his action may reply, that he had commenced the suit in an inferior court within the time of limitation, and that it was removed to Westminster by habeas corpus, and this shall be allowed by a favourable construction of the statute of limitations; although in strictness the suit is commenced in the court above, when it is removed by habeas corpus. 1 Sid. 228; 3 Keb. 263; 1 Lev. 143; also see 2 Salk. 424; 2 Stra. 719; Bull. N. P. 151. See post, 6.

6. It is clearly agreed, that the suing out an original writ save a bar of the statute of limitations, and that thereupon the defendant may be outlawed; and that if beyond sea at the time of the outlawry, though it shall be reversed after his return, yet the plaintiff may bring another original by journey accounts, and thereby take advantage of his first writ. Carth. 156; 1 Salk. 420; 5 Mod. 311.

Also it is agreed, that the suing out a latitat is a sufficient commencement of a suit, to save the limitation of time, because the latitat is the original in B. R. and may be counted on record as an original writ. 1 Sid. 53, 60; Carth. 233; 1 Salk. 421; see ante, II, 2.

The same is law as to a bill of Middlesex. See Sty. 156, 178; 2 Lord Raym. 880, 1441; 1 Stra. 550; 2 Stra. 736; and 2 Burr. 961.

But if the suing out of a latitat be replied to a plea of the statute of limitations, the defendant, in order to maintain that plea, may aver the real time of suing it out in opposition to the teste. 2 Burr. 50. — And though the suing out an original, or latitat, will be a sufficient commencement of a suit; yet the plaintiff, in order to make it effectual, must show that he hath continued the writ to the time of the action brought. Carth. 144; 2 Salk. 420; 1 Lutw. 101, 254; 5 Mod. 35. The continuances may be entered up at any time before the plaintiff replies. The process sued and filed, and the continuances thereon, must be set forth by the plaintiff in his replication. See 3 T. R. 662; 1 Wils. 167; Esp. N. P. 153.

It is sufficient to prove a writ sued out within time, and a declaration within a year afterwards, without showing such writ returned, 7 T. R. 6; unless where the first writ is continued by subsequent writs sued out after the time of limitation. 6 T. R. 617; and see 2 Bos. & Pul. 157.

It is to be observed, that the above decisions are all prior to the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 39; but the principle they establish will apply to cases where the new writs given by that act have been sued out. It may also be remarked, that by the general rules of H. T. 4 Will. 4. the entry of continuances is abolished.

Where a writ of summons under the 2 Will. 4. c. 39, tested in time to save the statute of limitations, was rescinded in consequence of an alteration in the description of the defendant and of his residence, and was not served till after the expiration of the six years; it was held that the rescinding did not amount to a reissuing of the writ, and that the plaintiff need not show when it took place. 2 C. & M. 408.

7. Assumpsit appears to be the only action in which it has been held that an acknowledgment or promise has the effect of taking the case out of the statute of 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. See 1 B. & A. 92; 3 Bng. 331; 6 B. & C. 605; although from the framing of the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. hereafter noticed, Lord Tenterden seems to have thought that the doctrine was equally applicable to actions of debt on simple contract. The action of assumpsit must either be a case of guarantee, 1 B. & A. 690; or for a simple contract debt. Thus in 2 Campb. 160, Lord Ellenborough held, that if a cause of action, arising from the breach of contract in not doing an act (other than the payment of money) at a specific time, be once barred, no new acknowledgment or promise can revive it.

Previous to the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. a parol acknowledgment (Carth. 470) or promise was sufficient to take the case out of the statute, but much inconvenience being found to result from such a state of the law, it was enacted by the above act, commonly called Lord Tenterden's Act, "That in actions of debt or upon the case, grounded upon any simple contract, no acknowledgment or promise by words only shall be deemed sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, whereby to take any case out of the operations of the said enactments, (of the Eng. Act, 21 Jac. 1. c. 16; and the Irish Act, 10 Car. 1. sess. 2. c. 6.) or either of them, or to deprive any party of the benefit thereof, unless such acknowledgment or promise shall be made or contained by or in some writing to be signed by the party chargeable thereby; and that where there shall be two or more joint-contractors, or executors, or administrators, of any contractor, no such joint-contractor, executor, or administrator, shall lose the benefit of the said enactment, or either of them, so as to be chargeable, in respect or by reason only of any written acknowledgment or promise made and signed by any other or others of them. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall alter, or take away, or lessen the effect of payment of any principal or interest made by any person whatsoever: Provided also, that in actions to be commenced against two or more such joint-contractors, or executors, or administrators, if it shall appear at the trial, or otherwise, that the plaintiff, though barred by either of the said recited acts or this act, as to one or more such joint-contractors, executors, or administrators, shall, nevertheless, be entitled to recover against any other or others of the defendants, by virtue of a new acknowledgment, or promise, or otherwise judgment may be given and costs allowed for the plaintiff as to such defendant or defendants against whom he shall recover, and for the other defendant or defendants against the plaintiff."

§ 3. "No indorsement or memorandum of any payment, written or made after the time appointed for this act, to take effect upon any promissory note, bill of exchange, or other writing, by or on the behalf of the party to whom such payment shall be made, shall be deemed sufficient proof of such payment, so as to take the case out of the operation of either of the said statutes."

§ 4. "The said recited acts and this act shall be deemed, and taken to apply to the case of any debt or simple contract, alleged by way of set-off on the part of any defendant, either by plea, notice, or otherwise."

The 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. has made no alteration with respect to the effect of payment of any part of the principal, or of any interest.

In the case of debt due from a single individual, it has been long established, that the payment of either part of the principal, or of interest, is an admission of the debt which would take it out of the statute.

And where there are several debtors, it has been held that a payment by one of them was sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Dougl. 652.

One of two makers of a joint and several promissory note having become a bankrupt, the payee receives a dividend under his commission, on account of the note; this will prevent the other maker from availing himself of the statute of limitations, in an action brought against him for the remainder of the money due on the note; the dividend having been received within six years before the action brought. 2 H. Bl. 340.

A payment by one of two makers of a joint and several note, operates as a promise to the full extent of the promise in the instrument, and consequently takes the note out of the statute, as against the administrator of the other, who died after the payment made. 8 B. & C. 36. which recognizes 2 H. Black. 340; and Dougl. 652. But after the death of one maker of a joint and several note, the joint-contract is severed, and a payment by the executor of the deceased will not take the note out of the statute against the surviving maker. 1 B. & A. 396; and see 2 B. & C. 23.

As to the payment of interest on a note given by parish officers, see 1 Ad. & E. 196; and as to the payment of principal and interest to one of two legatees, see 2 C. & M. 322; 4 Tyr. 94.

8. It seems to be admitted, that the statute of limitations must be pleaded positively by him that would take advantage thereof; and that the same cannot be given in evidence, especially in an assumpsit, because the statute speaks of a time past, and relates to the time of making the promise. 1 Lev. 111; 1 Sid. 253; and see Cro. Jac. 115. See ante, II. 2.

But, in debt for rent, upon nil debet pleaded, the statute of limitations might have been given in evidence. 1 Salk. 278.

The modern practice however has been to plead the statute in debt as well as assumpsit, and it was held by Mr. Justice Bayley, that the statute could not be given in evidence on nil debet. Woodhouse v. Williams, Bac. Ab. Limitation of Actions, (F.) (7th ed.)

Now by the general rules of H. T. 4 W. 4. the plea of nil debet has been abolished, and consequently the statute must in all cases be pleaded.

Where the cause of action is to arise from an executory consideration, as some act to be performed, and a promise to pay in consequence of it, there non assumpsit infra sex annos is not the proper plea; for the assumpsit does not arise till the consideration is performed; it should be actio non accrevit infra sex annos. Espinasse, 156. See 2 Salk. 422.

In replevin the defendant pleaded Not guilty, De capi' prædict' infra sex annos jam ultimo elapsos; and though it was urged, that this was the same with pleading non cepit, and if he did not take, he could not be guilty of the detainer; and if this way of pleading were not allowed, the statute would be entirely evaded as to this action; yet the plea was held ill, because he ought to have answered to the detainer, as well as to the taking; also a thing may be lawfully distrained, although unlawfully kept; as by being put into a castle, &c. by which means it could not be replevied. 1 Sid. 81; Keb. 279; and see Lord Raym. 86; 1 Lev. 110; 1 Keb. 566.

If a debt be set off by way of plea, the statute of limitations may be replied to it. 2 Stra. 1271.

Evidence of an acknowledgment by the defendant within six years of an old existing debt, of above six years' standing, due to the plaintiff's intestate, but which acknowledgment was made after the intestate's death, will not support a count by the administrator, laying the promise to be made to his intestate, to which the statute of limitations was pleaded. 3 East, 409.

To an action brought by the assignees of an insolvent debtor, to recover money owing to him before his insolvency, in which the plaintiffs declare, that in consideration of the money being due to the insolvent the defendant promised to pay them as assignees, it is a bad plea to say that the cause of action first accrued to the insolvent before the plaintiffs became assignees, and that six years had elapsed before the cause of action accrued to the insolvent, and before the suing out of the writ. 2 H. Blackst. 561.

Assumpsit on a note payable by instalments; plea in bar as to the said several causes of action, except the last instalment, "that the said several causes of action did not nor did any of them accrue within six years;" held on special demurrer, that though some of the instalments might be barred, and the others not, yet, that the introduction to the plea and the body of it were inconsistent. 2 Bos. & Pul. 427.

LIMITATION OF THE CROWN. See King, I.

LIMITATION OF ESTATE. A modification or settlement of an estate, determining how long it shall continue; or is rather a qualification of a precedent estate. A limitation by Littleton, a condition in law. Lit. § 980; 1 Inst. 234.—It is generally made by such words as durante vita, quandiu, dum, &c. And if there be not a performance according to the limitation, it shall determine an estate without entry or claim; which a condition doth not. 10 Rep. 41; 1 Inst. 204. See Condition, I. 2.

Limitation is also taken for the compass and time of an estate; or where one doth give lands to a man, to hold to him and to his heirs male, and to him and the heirs female,

&c., here the daughters shall not have any thing in it so long as there is a male, for the estate to the heirs male is first limited. Co. Lit. 3, 13.

If a limitation of an estate be uncertain, the limitation is void; and the estate shall remain as if there had been no such limitation. Cro. Eliz. 216. But a thing that is limited in a will by plain words, shall not be afterwards made uncertain by general words which follow. Hil. 23 Car. B. R. Where a devise is to the eldest son, upon condition that he pays such legacies; and if he refuses, the land to remain to such legacies; on his refusal, the legatees may enter by way of limitation. Noy, 51. And in all cases, where, after a condition, an interest is granted to a stranger, it is a limitation. 1 Leon. 269; Cro. Eliz. 204. See Condition, I. 2.

As to the origin and progress of the Limitation of Estates, see 1 Inst. 271. b. in n; and see Conveyance. See also Deed, Estate, Feoffment, Gift, Grant, Lease and Release, Powers, Remainder, Trusts, Uses, &c. From the note above cited has been extracted the following summary with respect to the limitations and modifications of landed property, unknown to the common law, which have been introduced under the statute of uses, 27 H. 8. c. 10.

The principal of these are known by the general appellation of springing or secondary uses. No estate could be limited upon or after a fee, though it were a base or qualified fee; nor could a fee or estate of freehold be made to cease as to one person and to vest in another, by any common law conveyance. But there are instances where even by the common law these secondary estates seem to have been allowed, when limited, or rather when declared by way of use. See Jenk. Cent. 8. c. 52. After the statute of uses the judges seem to have long hesitated whether they should receive them. In Chudleigh's Case, (1 Rep. 120; Jenk. 276; Poph. 70; 1 And. 309.) it was strongly contended, that it would be wrong to make any estate of freehold an inheritance, lawfully vested, to cease as to one, and to vest in others against the rule of law; and that no estates should be raised by way of use, but those which could be raised by livery of seisin at the common law. The courts, however, admitted them. After they were admitted it was found necessary to circumscribe them within certain bounds: because when an estate in fee-simple is first limited, there is no method by which the first taker can bar or destroy the secondary estate; as it is not affected either by a fine or common recovery.

It is now settled, that when an estate in fee-simple is limited, a subsequent estate may be limited upon it, if the event upon which it is to take place be such, that if it does happen, it must necessarily happen within the compass of one or more life or lives in being, and twenty-one years and some months over; [i. e. as many months as it is possible a child may be legitimately born after the death of its father.] It was long before the courts agreed on this period; which was not arbitrarily prescribed by our courts of justice with respect to these secondary fees, but wisely and reasonably adopted in analogy to the cases of freehold and inheritance, which cannot be limited by way of remainder, so as to postpone a complete bar of the entail by fine or recovery for a longer space. 1 Inst. 20. in n.

But the reason which induced the courts to adopt this analogy, with respect to these estates when limited upon an estate in fee-simple, does not hold when they are limited upon or after an estate in tail; because in this latter case, the tenant in tail, by suffering a common recovery before the event takes place, bars or defeats the secondary estate, and acquires the fee-simple absolutely discharged from it. See Page v. Haywood, 2 Salk. 570, and 1 Lev. 35; Goodman v. Cook, 2 Sid. 102. Hence, if these secondary estates are limited upon or after an estate in tail, they may be limited generally, without restraining or confining the event or contingency upon which they are to take place to any period. See Treat. Eq. ii. 95.

Thus, if an estate be limited to A. and his heirs; and if B. (a person in esse) dies without leaving any issue of his body living at the time of his decease; or, having such issue, if all of them die before any of them attain the age of twenty-one years, then to C. and his heirs: here the limitation to C. is limited after a previous limitation in fee-simple, and it is a good limitation; because the event upon which it is to take place must, if it does happen at all, necessarily happen within the period of a life in being, and twenty-one years and a few months. But if the estate were limited to A. and his heirs; and, after the decease of B., and a total failure of heirs, or heirs-male of the body of B., to C. and his heirs; here as the secondary use is limited after a previous limitation in fee-simple, and the event on which the fee limited to C. is to take place, is not such as must necessarily happen within the period prescribed by law, (for B. may have issue, and that issue may not fail for many years after the expiration of twenty-one years after B.'s decease,) the limitation to C. and his heirs is void. But suppose the estates were limited to A. for life, then to trustees and their heirs, during his life, for preserving contingent remainders, then to A.'s first and third sons successively in tail-male, with several remainders over; with a proviso if B. dies, and there should be a total failure of heirs or heirs-male of his body, the uses limited to A. and his sons, and the remainders over, shall determine, and the lands remain and go over to C. and his heirs; here the limitation to C. and his heirs is limited upon or after previous limitations for life or in tail; and the event upon which it is to take effect may possibly not happen till after a period of one or more life or lives in being and twenty-one years: but so far as it is limited on an event which may happen during the continuance either of one or more life or lives in being, it is within the bounds mentioned; and so far as it is limited on an event which may happen during the continuance of the estate of the tenants in tail, or after them, the first tenant in tail in possession, by suffering a recovery before the event happens, may bar the limitations over, and thereby acquire an estate in fee-simple: and therefore the limitation to C. and his heirs is good. See tit. Executory Devise.

LINARIUM. A flax plat, where flax is sown. Put. 22 Hen. 4. par. 1. m. 35.

LINCOLN. In attain of a verdict of the city of Lincoln, the jury shall be impanelled of the county of Lincoln. See 13 Rich. 2. st. 1. c. 18; 2 Hen. 5. st. 2. c. 5.

LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS. To be enclosed by trustees, who may employ artificers, &c. And yearly rates shall be made on all houses there, not exceeding 10. 6d. in the pound: this square and back streets are to be a distinct ward, as to the scavengers' rates and watch; and the persons annoying the fields by filth, to forfeit 20s.; and assembling to use sports, or breaking fences, &c. incur a forfeiture of 20s. levied by the warrant of a justice of the peace. 8 Geo. 1. c. 26.

LINDESFERN. A place often mentioned in our ancient histories; being formerly a Bishop's See, now II by Island.

LINEAL CONSANGUINITY. Is that which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other. See tit. Descent, Kindred.

LINEAL DESCENT. The descent of estates from ancestor to heir, i. e. from one to another, in a right line. See tit. Descent.

LINEAL DESCENT OF THE CROWN. See tit. King, I.

LINEAL WARRANTY. Was where the heir derived, or might by possibility have derived his title to land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty. See tit. Warranty.

LINEN. No person shall put up to sale any piece of dowlas, linen, &c. unless the just length be expressed thereon, on pain to forfeit the same. 28 Hen. 8. c. 4. Using means whereby linen cloth shall be made deceitfully, incurs a forfeiture of the linen, and a month's imprisonment and a fine. 1 Eliz. c. 12.

By 15 Cha. 2. c. 15. § 2. any person, native or foreigner, may without paying any thing, in any place privileged or unprivileged, corporate or non-corporate, set up and exercise the occupation of breaking, hickling, or dressing of hemp or flax, as also of making or whitening of thread; as also of spinning &c. any cloth made of hemp or flax only; as also the mystery of making twine or nets for fishing, or of stoving of cordage; as also the trade of making tapestry hangings.

§ 3. Foreigners that shall use any of the trades aforesaid three years, shall (taking the oaths of supremacy before two justices near unto their dwellings) enjoy all privileges as natural born subjects.

Linen of all sorts made of flax or hemp, of the manufacture of this kingdom, may be exported duty free. 3 Geo. 1. c. 7.—Stealing of linen, &c. from whitening grounds, or drying houses, to the value of 10s., is felony. 4 Geo. 2. c. 16.

By the 17 Geo. 2. c. 30. affixing on foreign linens any stamp put upon Scotch or Irish linens, or affixing a counterfeit stamp on British or Irish linens, incurs a penalty of 5*l.*

Besides various other premiums and encouragements, bounties were granted on the exportation of linen for a long period down to 1830, when they were withdrawn.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 122. the former acts for the regulation of the linen and hempen manufactures of Ireland were repealed, and other provisions substituted. That act was repealed by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 62. which in its turn has been supplanted by the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 77. which is to continue in force for two years, from the end of the then session of parliament, and from their expiration to the end of the then next session.

By the 27 Geo. 3. c. 13. a sum of 6335*l.* 15*s.* was set apart out of the customs for the encouragement of raising and dressing hemp and flax, but that and all other acts authorizing money to be so appropriated have been repealed by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 14.

Linen and other goods are protected whilst in the course of their manufacture by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 16. which punishes by transportation for life or years, imprisonment and whipping, the stealing of them to the value of ten shillings, whilst placed or exposed during any stage or process of manufacture in any building, field, or other place.

As to the malicious destruction of linen in the course of manufacture, &c. see tits. Frauds, Malicious Injuries.

LION. See Lyon.

LIQUORICE. Is among the drugs liable to certain duties on importation, under the laws relative to the Customs.

LITERA. [From the Fr. litiere, or litiere, Lat. lectum,] litter: it was anciently used for straw for a bed, even the king's bed. It is now only in use in stables among horses: tres carcetulus literæ, three cart-loads of straw, or litter. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 33.

LITERATURA. Ad literaturam ponere, signifies to put children out to school; which liberty was anciently denied to those parents who were servile tenants, without the consent of the lord: and this prohibition of educating sons to learning, was owing to this reason; for fear the son being bred to letters might enter into orders, and so stop or divert the services which he might otherwise do as heir to his father. *Paroch. LITERARY PROPERTY.

The property that the author, or his assignee, hath in the copy of any literary work.

The right which an author may be supposed to have in his own original literary compositions, so that no other person without his leave may publish or make profit of the copies, is classed by Blackstone among the species of property acquired by occupancy; being grounded on labour and invention. He expresses, however, some doubt whether it subsists by common law: and this being still, after all the determinations on the subject, in some measure, versata questio, the following extracts deserve the attention of the student. See 2 Comm. 405.

When a man, by the exertion of his rational powers, has produced an original work, he seems to have clearly a right to dispose of that identical work as he pleases; and any attempt to vary the disposition he has made of it, appears to be an invasion of that right. Now the identity of a literary composition consists entirely in the sentiment and the language. The same conceptions, clothed in the same words, must necessarily be the same composition; and whatever method be taken of exhibiting that composition to the ear or to the eye of another, by recital, [see post, the case of Colman v. Watken,] by writing, or by printing, in any number of copies, or at any period of time, it is always the identical work of the author which is so exhibited; and no other man, it hath been thought, can have a right to exhibit it, especially for profit, without the author's consent. This consent may perhaps be tacitly given to all mankind when an author suffers his work to be published by another hand, without any claim or reserve of right, and without stamping on it any marks of ownership: it being then a present to the public, like building a church or bridge, or laying out a new highway. But in case the author sells a single book, or totally grants the copyright, it hath been supposed, in the one case, that the buyer hath no more right to multiply the copies of that book for sale, than he hath to imitate for the like purpose the ticket, which is bought for admission to an opera or a concert; and, in the other, that the whole property, with all its exclusive rights, is perpetually transferred to the grantee. On the other hand it is urged, that though the exclusive property of the manuscript, and all which it contains, undoubtedly belongs to the author before it is printed or published; yet from the instant of publication, the exclusive right of an author, or his assigns to the sole communication of his ideas, immediately vanishes and evaporates; as being a right of too subtle and unsubstantial a nature, to become the subject of property at the common law, and only capable of being guarded by positive statutes and special provisions of the magistrate. 2 Comm. 406.

The Roman law adjudged, that if one man wrote any thing on the paper or parchment of another, the writing should belong to the owner of the blank materials, meaning thereby the mechanical operation of writing; for which it directed the scribe to receive a satisfaction: for in works of genius and invention, as in painting on another man's canvas, the same law gave the canvas to the painter. As to any other property in the works of the understanding the law is silent; though the sale of literary copies, for the purposes of recital or multiplication, is certainly as ancient as the times of Terence, Martial, and Statius. 2 Comm. 407.

But whatever inherent copyright might have been supposed to subsist by the common law, the 8 Ann. c. 19, hath now declared, that the author and his assigns shall have the sole liberty of printing and reprinting his works for the term of fourteen years, and no longer; [the words of the statute]; and hath protected that property by additional penalties and forfeitures: directing farther, that if at the end of that term the author himself be living, the right shall then return to him for another term of the same duration. A similar privilege is extended to the inventors of prints and engravings, by 8 Geo. 2. c. 13; 7 Geo. 3. c. 38; 17 Geo. 3. c. 57.—The above parliamentary protections appear to have been suggested by the exception in the statute of monopolies, 21 Jac. 1. c. 3; which allows a royal patent of privilege to be granted for fourteen years to any inventor of a new manufacture, for the sole working or making of the same: by virtue whereof it is held, that a temporary property therein becomes vested in the king's patentee. 1 Vern. 65; 2 Comm. 407. See tit. Patents.

Whether the productions of the mind could communicate a right of property, or of exclusive enjoyment, in reason and nature; and if such a moral right existed, whether it was recognized and supported by the common law of England, and whether the common law was intended to be restrained by the statute of queen Anne, are questions upon which the learning and talents of the highest legal characters in this kingdom have been powerfully and zealously exerted. These questions have, by the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, been so determined, that an author has no right at present beyond the limits fixed by that statute. See the case of Donaldson v. Beckett, Bro. P. C.

As that determination, however, was contrary to the opinion of Lord Mansfield, of the learned commentator, and of several other judges, Mr. Christian has remarked, that every person may still be permitted to indulge his own opinion upon the propriety of it, without incurring the imputation of arrogance; and he proceeds to deliver his sentiments in the following manner.

Nothing is more erroneous than the common practice of referring the origin of moral rights, and the system of natural equity, to that savage state, which is supposed to have preceded civilized establishments; in which literary composition, and of consequence the right to it, could have no existence. But the true mode of ascertaining a moral right seems to be to inquire whether it is such as the reason, the cultivated reason of mankind, must necessarily assent to. No proposition seems more conformable to that criterion, than that every one should enjoy the reward of his labour, the harvest where he has sown, or the fruit of the tree which he has planted. And if any private right ought to be preserved more sacred and inviolate than another, it is that where the most extensive benefit flows to mankind from the labour by which it is acquired. Literary property, it must be admitted, is very different in its nature from a property in substantial and corporeal objects; and this difference has led some to deny its existence as property; but whether it is sui generis, or under whatever denomination of rights it may more properly be classed, it seems founded upon the same principle of general utility to society, which is the basis of all other moral rights and obligations. Thus considered, an author's copyright ought to be esteemed an inviolable right, established in sound reason and abstract morality: no less than eight of the twelve judges were of opinion, that it was a right allowed and perpetuated by the common law of England; but six held, either that it did not exist, or that the enjoyment of it was abridged by the statute of queen Anne; and that all remedy for the violation of it was taken away after the expiration of the term specified in the act; and agreeable to that opinion was the final judgment of the House of Lords. 1 Comm. 407. in n.

For the arguments at length of the judges of the King's Bench, and the opinions of the rest, see the case of Milner v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303; 1 Blackst. Rep. 675. In that case the Court of King's Bench determined that an exclusive and permanent copyright did actually subsist in authors by the common law. But the effect of their opinion was contradicted by the determination of the House of Lords in Donaldson v. Beckett, as above stated.

But whatever the common law may be with respect to the copyright of a printed work, it has been decided that, independent of the statute law, an author has an absolute property over his work, whilst it exists in manuscript. 1 Burr. 231, 237; 2 Merr. 155. And the mere delivery of the manuscript to a printer will not divest his right; for the consent to print must be in writing. 4 Vin. Ab. 278. Neither is a person to whom a manuscript has been lent, with liberty to take a copy and make what use of it he thinks fit, empowered to print and publish the work. 2 Eden, 329. And it has been decided that the copyright in a piece of music is not lost, although it has been published in manuscript a year before it is printed. 2 B. & A. 298.

Injunctions have also been frequently granted to restrain the publication of private letters either by the parties to whom they have been written, or by third persons. 2 Atk. 342; Amb. 737.

The following is a general abstract of the statutes relative to this interesting subject, and of some points determined on their construction.

The 8 Ann. c. 19. and 41 Geo. 3. c. 107, enacted, that the author of any book, and his assigns, should have the sole liberty of printing it for fourteen years, and for a further term of fourteen years, if the author were living at the end of the first fourteen.—By 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 4. this term is extended to twenty-eight years absolute, and to the end of the author's life: and this advantage is given to authors of books published before the act, § 8, 9.

An author whose works had been published more than twenty-eight years before the passing the act 54 Geo. 3. is not entitled to the copyright for life. Brooke v. Clarke, 1 B. & A. 396.

By the acts 41 Geo. 3. c. 107. § 1; and 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 2, booksellers, printers, &c. in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any part of the British European dominions, who shall print, reprint, or import, or publish, or expose to sale any such book, without consent of the proprietor, shall be liable to a special action in the case for damages at the suit of the proprietor, and shall also forfeit all the books to the proprietor; and further 3*d.* per sheet, half to the king, and half to the informer.

No bookseller, printer, or other person, shall be liable to these forfeitures, unless the title to the copy of the book, [the whole book and every volume thereof, 15 Geo. 3. c. 53. § 6] shall before such publication be entered in the register book of the Company of Stationers, at their Hall in London, and unless the consent of the proprietor be entered, § 2; nor unless nine copies of each book be delivered to the company's warehouse-keeper before publication, for the use of the royal library, the libraries of the university of Oxford and Cambridge, of the four universities in Scotland, of St. John's College in London, and of the advocates at Edinburgh, § 5, and see 15 Geo. 3. c. 53. § 6; and 41 Geo. 3. c. 107. § 6, requiring copies to be delivered to Trinity College, and King's Inns, Dublin.

Doubts having been entertained, whether the copies required for the several public libraries were to be delivered if the works were not entered at Stationers' Hall, it is enacted by 54 Geo. 3. c. 156, that the provisions of the acts 8 Ann. and 41 Geo. 3. as to delivering copies of books to public libraries, shall be repealed, and that seven copies of all works whatever, printed or published, shall be delivered to the several universities &c. if demanded within twelve months after the publication,—but not copies of second or subsequent editions without alteration: and that amendments of early editions may be printed separately, and delivered. 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 1, 2, 3.

A part of a work published separately and before the completion of the whole, is not demandable by the public bodies mentioned in 54 Geo. 3. c. 156, under the words "the whole of every book, and every volume thereof." British Museum v. Payne, 4 Bing. 450.

All books are required to be entered (within one month if published in London, and three months if published elsewhere,) at Stationers' Hall, and one copy on the best paper to be then delivered for the British Museum.—Two shillings to be paid for each entry; penalty for neglect of entry, 5*l.*, and eleven times the price of the book. 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 5. The warehouse-keeper at Stationers' Hall is to transmit lists of all publications to the librarians of the several libraries entitled to copies: and to demand the copies of the publishers; but who may deliver the books at the several libraries, if they please, § 6, 7.

An action may be brought, or an injunction obtained in a Court of Equity, although the publication be not entered in the register of the Stationers' Company. 1 Black. 330. In Beckford v. Hood, it was explicitly determined that an author whose work is pirated before the expiration of twenty-eight years, from the first publication of it, may maintain an action on the case for damages against the offending party, although the work was not entered at Stationers' Hall, and although it was first published without the name of the author affixed. 7 T. R. 620.

And to remove all doubt it was enacted by the 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 5, that a failure in making the entry shall not affect the copyright, but only subject the publisher to the penalty imposed.

If the clerk of the Stationers' Company shall neglect to make due entry, or to give a certificate thereof, then notice being given in the Gazette, the proprietor shall have the same benefit as if an entry were actually made: and the clerk shall forfeit 20*l.* 8 Ann. c. 19. § 3; 41 Geo. 3. U. K. c. 107. § 4, 5.

The above statute 8 Ann. c. 19. particularly provided, by § 9, that the right of the universities or any other person, to the printing or reprinting of any book already printed, should not be either prejudiced or confirmed: after the determination of the case of Donaldson v. Beckett, the universities were so much alarmed at the decision, that they applied for and obtained an act, 15 Geo. 3. c. 53, which secured to the two universities in England, the colleges or houses of learning within the same, the four universities in Scotland, and the colleges of Eton, Westminster, and Winchester, a perpetuity in the copyright of all books given, or devised to, or in trust for them by the authors; which was sanctioned by the same penalties as those contained in the 8 Ann. so long as the books or copies belonging to the said universities or colleges are printed only at their own printing-presses, within the universities or colleges, and for their sole benefit. § 8.

A fair and bond fide abridgment of any book is considered as a new work: and however it may injure the sale of the original, yet it is not deemed in law to be a piracy, or violation of the author's copyright. 1 Bro. C. R. 451; 2 Atk. 141.

A translation of a work, either from the ancient classic authors, or of a work written in Latin by an Englishman, 2 Merr. 441. n.; or of papers in any of the modern languages, as the French and German, 5 Fos. & B. 77, is protected by the 8 Ann. c. 19.

Musical compositions have been held to be within the meaning and protection of the statute, Comp. 623; and an action is maintainable for pirating a single sheet of music. 11 East, 111.

Every distinct and independent part of a work is also a book within the meaning of the statute, as a tale or piece of music, printed and bound up with other tales or pieces of music. Id.; 2 B. & A. 295.

The author or publisher of a work of a libellous or immoral tendency can have no legal property in it: and no action can be maintained for printing such work, (the book in question was the History or Amours of a Courtesan.) It is no answer to such objection that the defendant is a wrong-doer in publishing the work, and that, therefore, he ought not to act upon it immediately. Stockdale v. Omphyn, 7 D. & R. 625; 5 B. & C. 173; 2 C. & P. 163.

And it makes no difference whether the offensive matter be represented in prints, 4 Esp. 97, or pictures, 2 Campb. 511, or expressed in books.

Assignments of copyright under the 8 Ann. must be in writing. 3 M. & S. 7.

Evidence that the defendant acted a piece on the stage, of which the plaintiff had bought the copyright, is not evidence of a publication by the defendant, within the meaning of the statute. 5 T. R. 245.

And if the author has published a tragedy, it is no piracy to act it abridged at a theatre without his consent. 5 B. & A. 657.

But no one has a right to take down a play in short-hand, and to print it before it is published by the author. Amb. 694.

And now by the 3 Will. 4. c. 15. dramatists have been placed on an equal footing with other authors. See tit. Dramatic Literary Property.

Previous to the union there was no statute in Ireland to protect the copyright of authors, but immediately after that event an act was passed (41 Geo. 3. c. 10.) enacting similar provisions with respect to that country as those contained in the 8 Ann. and 15 Geo. 2. The 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. extends to the whole of the United Kingdom, as well as the Isles of Man, Jersey, and Guernsey, and all other parts of the British dominions.

The right of printing books given or bequeathed to Trinity College, Dublin, is secured to that college by 41 Geo. 3. c. 107. § 3.

No person shall import into any part of the United Kingdom for sale any book first written or printed and published within the United Kingdom, and reprinted elsewhere, on penalty of forfeiture of the books, 10*l.* and double the value of each copy so imported.—Books may be seized by officers of customs and excise, who shall be rewarded by their respective commissioners.—These penalties do not extend to books not having been printed in the United Kingdom within twenty years; nor to books reprinted abroad, and inserted among other books or tracts for the most part foreign. 41 Geo. 3. c. 107. § 7.

Whether an author, by publishing a book abroad, makes his work publici juris, is not decided; but it is clear he does so, unless he take prompt measures to publish it also in England. And where an author published his work in 1814 in Paris, and soon after sold the right of publishing to the plaintiff here, but without writing, and the plaintiff thereupon published it, and in 1818 the defendant published the work in England, and in 1822, the author, by writing, assigned the right of printing to the plaintiff, it was held, that the publication by the defendant was lawful and not actionable,—for the work has been published in England by the author, nor was the publication in 1814, by his legal assignee, for want of writing, and the author could not, by the valid assignment in 1822, enable the plaintiff to maintain an action for selling a copy after that assignment was executed. 2 B. & C. 861.

All actions, indictments, &c. for offences must be commenced within six months after commission of the offence, 41 Geo. 3. c. 107. § 8; within twelve months, 54 Geo. 3. c. 156. § 10.

It is worthy of remark, that the determination of the House of Lords, in Donaldson v. Beckett, which was supposed, at the time, to have given a mortal blow to the property and prosperity of authors and booksellers, has, in fact, been one great means of increasing both. Few books are now republished without considerable alterations, additions, or annotations, by means of which they become, in fact, new works; and it is not worth any body's while then to pirate them in their original state. And an action lies to recover damages for pirating the new corrections and additions to an old work. 1 East, 558, 561, 563, in n.

This has proved a spur to the industry of authors, and the liberality of booksellers; and perhaps no period ever produced so many publications of acknowledged utility, as that which has elapsed since the memorable decision above alluded to, which for the moment cast a melancholy gloom over those who now enjoy its beneficial effects.

The following are the principal features and distinctions of the three statutes relative to prints and engravings. The 8 Geo. 2. c. 13, gives an exclusive privilege of publishing, to those who invent or design any print, for fourteen years only. The 7 Geo. 3. c. 28, extends the term to twenty-eight years absolutely, to all who either invent the design, or make a print from another's design or picture; and those who copy such prints within that time, forfeit all their copies to be destroyed; and 5*s.* for each copy. Maps, charts, or plans, are among the prints enumerated in the above act. The 17 Geo. 3. c. 57, gives the proprietor an action on the case to recover damages, and double costs for the injury he has sustained by the violation of his right.

Actions under the two former statutes must be brought within six months, but no limitation is imposed by the 17 Geo. 3.

The assignee of a print may maintain an action on this last statute against any person who pirates it; and in such an action it is not necessary to produce the plate itself in evidence; one of the prints taken from the original plate is good evidence. The date must always appear on the print. 5 T. R. 41.

The statutes only apply to engravings taken from pirated plates, and not engravings struck off illegally from a lawful plate. Therefore, where Heath was employed by Murray to engrave plates from drawings belonging to Murray, and H. took off proof impressions for his own use, and then became bankrupt, and his assignees sold them, it was held that neither H. nor his assignees were liable to an action on the 17 Geo. 3. c. 57. His act was a breach of contract, not a piracy. Murray v. Heath, 1 B. & A. 804.

The mere seller or publisher of a pirated copy of a print is liable to an action under 17 Geo. 3. c. 57, although it be not an exact copy of the original, and though the seller did not know it to be a copy. 1 D. & R. 400; 5 B. & A. 787.

It is no piracy of one engraving to make another from the original picture. Berenger v. Wheble, 2 Stark. 548.

In analogy also to the above doctrine of literary property, the 27 Geo. 3. c. 38. (which was enacted for one year, and afterwards extended by the 29 Geo. 3. c. 19. and made perpetual by the 34 Geo. 3. c. 23.) gives to the proprietors of new patterns in printed linens, cottons, muslins, &c. the sole right of printing them for two months, (enlarged to three months by the 29 Geo. 3. c. 19.) and gives the proprietor injured his remedy by an action for damages.

The jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity is not excluded by the special remedy given by the 34 Geo. 3. c. 23. Rust. & M. 159.

There is also a kind of prerogative copyright subsisting in certain books, which is held to be vested in the crown upon several reasons. Thus, 1. The king, as the executive magistrate, has the right of promulgating to the people all acts and state of government. This gives him the exclusive privilege of printing at his own press, or that of his grantees, all acts of parliament, proclamations, and orders of council. 2. As supreme head of the church, he hath a right to the publication of all Liturgies and books of Divine service. 3. He is also said to have a right by purchase to the copies of such law books, grammars, and other compositions, as were compiled or translated at the expense of the crown. And upon these two last principles combined, the exclusive right of printing the translation of the Bible is founded. See 2 Comm. c. 27. p. 410, n.

For the acts giving a property in sculpture, models, &c. see tit. Sculpture.

LITH OF PICKERING. In the county of York, viz. the liberty, or a member of Pickering, from the Saxon, lid, i. e. scutellum.

LITIGIOUS. The litigiousness of a church is where several persons have, or pretend to, several titles to the patronage, and present several clerks to the ordinary; it excuses him from refusing to admit any of them, till a trial of the right by jure patronatus, or otherwise. Jenk. Cent. 11.

LITTERA. Litter;—Tres carectas litteræ, three cart-loads of straw or litter. Mon. Angl. 2. par. fol. 33. b.

LITTLETON. Was a famous lawyer in the days of the reign of Edward IV., as appears by Stamf. Pract. c. 21. fol. 72. He wrote a book of great account, called Littleton's Tenures. See tit. Lam Books.

LIVERY [From livre, i. e. in aigne gestamen; or livrer, tradere.] Hath three significations. In one sense, it was used for a suit of clothes, cloak, gown, hat, &c. which a nobleman or gentleman gave to his servants or followers, with cognizance or without; mentioned in 1 Rich. 2. c. 7. and divers other statutes. Formerly great men gave liveries to several who were not of their family, to engage them in their quarrels for that year; but afterwards it was ordained, that no man of any condition whatsoever should give any livery but to his domestics, his officers, or counsel learned in the law. By 1 R. A. 2. it was prohibited on pain of imprisonment; and the 1 Hen. 4. c. 7. made the offenders liable to ransom at the king's will, &c. which statute was afterwards confirmed and explained unus 2 & 7 Hen. 4. and by 3 Hen. 8. c. 4; and yet this offence was so deeply rooted that Edward IV. was obliged to confirm the former statutes, and further to extend the meaning of them, adding a penalty of 10*l.* to every one who gave such livery, and the like on every one retained for maintenance, either by writing, oath, or promise, for every month. 8 Edm. 4. c. 2. But most of the above statutes are repealed by 3 Car. 1. c. 4.

Livery, in the second signification, meant a delivery of possession to those tenants who held of the king in capite, or knight's service; as the king by his prerogative hath primer seisin of all lands and tenements so holden of him. Stamf. Prærog. 12.

In the third sense, livery meant the writ which lay for the heir of age, to obtain the possession of seisin of his lands at the king's hands. F. N. B. 155. By the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. all wardships, liveries, &c. are taken away. See Tenures.

LIVERY i. e. DELIVERY, OF SEISIN; Liberatio seisinæ. A delivery of possession of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, unto one that hath a right to the same; being a ceremony in the common law used in the conveyance of lands, &c. where an estate of fee-simple, fee-tail, or other freehold passeth. Bract. lib. 2. c. 18. And it is a testimonial of the willing departing of him who makes the livery, from the thing whereof the livery is made; and of willing acceptance of the other party receiving the livery; first invented that the common people might have knowledge of the passing or alienation of estates from man to man, and thereby be better able to try in whom the right of possession of lands and tenements were, if the same should be contested, and they should be impeached on juries, or otherwise have to do concerning the same. West. Symb. par. 1. lib. 2.

The common-law conveyance by feoffment is by no means perfected by the mere words of the deed; this ceremony of livery of seisin is very material to be performed, for without this the feoffee has but a mere estate at will. Lit. § 66. This livery of seisin is no other than the pure feudal investiture or delivery of corporeal possession of the land or tenement, which was held absolutely necessary to complete the donation. 2 Comm. c. 20. p. 311. See Conveyance, Deed, Estate, Feoffment, III., Tenures.

Investitures, in their original rise, were probably intended to demonstrate in conquered countries, the actual possession of the lord, and that he did not grant a bare litigious right, which the soldier was ill qualified to prosecute, but a peaceable and firm possession. And at a time when writing was seldom practised, a mere oral gift, at a distance from the spot that was given, was not likely to be either long or accurately retained in the memory of the by-standers, who were very little interested in the grant. Afterwards they were retained as a public and notorious act, that the country might take notice of and testify the transfer of the estate; and that such as claimed title by other means might know against whom to bring their actions. 2 Comm. 311.

In all well-governed nations some notoriety of this kind has ever been held requisite in order to acquire and ascertain the property of lands. And even in ecclesiastical promotions, where the freehold passes to the person promoted, corporeal possession is required at this day to vest the property completely in the new proprietor, who, according to the canonists, acquires the jus ad rem, or inchoate and imperfect right by nomination and institution; but not the jus in re, or complete and full right, unless by corporeal possession. Therefore in dignities possession is given by instalment; in rectories and vicarages by induction; without which no temporal rights accrue to the minister; though every ecclesiastical power is vested in him by institution. So also even in descents of lands by our law, which are cast on the heir by act of the law itself, the heir had not until recently plenum dominium, or full and complete ownership, till he had made an actual corporeal entry into the lands; for if he died before entry made, his heir was not entitled to take the possession, but the heir of the person who was last actually seised. 2 Comm. 312. See Descent.

The corporeal tradition of lands being sometimes inconvenient, a symbolical delivery of possession was in many cases anciently allowed, by transferring something near at hand, in the presence of credible witnesses, which by agreement should serve to represent the very thing designed to be conveyed; and an occupancy of this sign or symbol was permitted as equivalent to occupancy of the land itself. With our Saxon ancestors the delivery of a turf was a necessary solemnity to establish the conveyance of lands. And to this day the conveyance of our copyhold estates is usually made from the seller to the lord or his steward, by delivery of a rod or verge; and then from the lord to the purchaser, by delivery of the same in the presence of a jury of tenants. 2 Comm. 313.

Conveyances in writing were the last and most refined improvement. The mere delivery of possession, either actual or symbolical, depending on the ocular testimony and remembrance of the witnesses, was liable to be forgotten and misrepresented, and became frequently incapable of proof. Besides, the new occasions and necessities, introduced by the advancement of commerce, required means to be devised of charging and incumbering estates, and of making them liable to a multitude of conditions and minute designations, for the purposes of raising money without an absolute sale of the land; and sometimes like the proceedings were found useful in order to make a decent and competent provision for the numerous branches of a family, and for other domestic views, none of which could be effected by a mere simple corporeal transfer of the soil from one man to another, which was principally calculated for conveying an absolute unlimited dominion. Written deeds were therefore introduced in order to specify and perpetuate the peculiar purposes of the party who conveyed; yet still, for a very long series of years, they were never made use of but in company with the more ancient and notorious method of transfer by delivery of corporeal possession. 2 Comm. 314.

Livery of Seisin, by the common law, is necessary to be made upon every grant of an estate of freehold in hereditaments corporeal, whether of inheritance or for life only. In hereditaments incorporeal it is impossible to be made, for they are not objects of the senses; and in leases for years, or other chattel-interests, it is not necessary; the solemnity being appropriated to the conveyance of a freehold. And this is one reason why freeholds cannot be made to commence in futuro, because they cannot at the common law be made but by livery of seisin; which livery, being an actual manual tradition of the land, must take effect in presenti, or not at all. 2 Comm. 314. See Feoffment, III., Limitation of Estate, Remainder.

On the creation of a freehold remainder at one and the same time with a particular estate for years at the common law, livery must be made to the particular tenant, without which nothing passeth to him in remainder, it being for the benefit of him in remainder, and not the lessee, who hath only a term; and if the lessee entereth, before livery and seisin made to him, the livery shall be void. Lit. 60; 1 Inst. 49. But if such a remainder be created afterwards, expectant on a lease for years now in being, the livery must not be made to the lessee for years, for then it operates nothing; nam quod semel meum est, amplius meum esse non potest; but it must be made to the remainder-man by consent of the lessee for years; for without his consent no livery of the possession can be given; partly because such forcible livery would be an ejectment of the tenant from his term, and partly for reasons connected with the doctrine of attainments. 2 Comm. 314, 315. See 1 Inst. 48, 49.

A man may make a letter of attorney to deliver seisin by force of the deed, which may be contained in the same deed; and a letter of attorney may be likewise made to receive livery and seisin. 5 Rep. 91; 1 Inst. 49, 52.

This livery of seisin is either in deed or in law; the distinctions between which are stated and explained ante, Feoffment, III. Anciently this seisin was obliged to be delivered coram paribus de vicineto, before the peers or freeholders of the neighbourhood, who attested such delivery in the body or on the back of the deed; according to the rule of the feudal law, pares debent interesse investituræ feudi, et non alii; for which this reason is expressly given; because the peers or vassals of the lord, being bound by their oath of fealty, will take care that no fraud be committed to his prejudice, which strangers may be apt to connive at. And though afterwards the ocular attestation of the pares was held unnecessary, and livery might be made before any credible witnesses, yet the trial, in case it was disputed, (like that of all other attestations) was still reserved to the pares, or jury of the county; and this is the reason why, if lands conveyed by feoffment lie in several counties, there must be as many liveries of seisin as there are counties. 2 Comm. 315, 316. See Feoffment, III. In addition to what is there said, the following determinations afford information on the subject.

Where a house and lands are conveyed, the house is the principal, and the lands accessory; and there the livery must be made, and not upon the land. 2 Rep. 31; 4 Leon. 374.

If a house or lands belong to an office, by grant of the office by deed, the house or land passeth without livery; and by a fine, which is a feoffment of record, by a lease and release, bargain and sale by deed inrolled, exchange, &c. a freehold passeth without livery; and so in a deed of feoffment to uses, by virtue of the statute of uses. 1 Inst. 49. So that livery and seisin is not so commonly used as formerly; neither can an estate be created now by livery and seisin only, without writing. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. See Conveyance, Estate.

If a deed of feoffment be delivered upon the land, "in the name of seisin of all the lands," it will be a good livery and seisin; but the bare delivery of a deed upon the land, though it may make the deed, it shall not amount to livery and seisin, without those words. 1 Inst. 52, 181. If one makes a feoffment to four persons, and seisin is delivered to three of them in the name of all, the estate is vested in all of them. 3 Rep. 26.

No person ought to be in the house, or upon the land, when livery is made, but the feoffor and feoffee; all others are to be removed from it; if the lessor, feoffor makes livery and seisin, the lessee being upon the land contradicting it, the livery is void. Cro. Eliz. 321; Dalis. Rep. 94.

But livery of seisin is not invalidated by omitting to remove from the house a child found there, unless such child be part of the family of a person having an immediate estate or interest in the premises, and has been placed there for the purpose of continuing his possession. 2 N. & M. 508.

Form of livery and seisin indorsed on the deed.

MEMORANDUM. That on the day and year within written, full possession and seisin was had and taken of the messuage or tenement, and premises within granted, by A. B. one of the attorneys within named, and by him delivered over unto the within named C. D. To hold to him, his heirs, &c. according to the contents and true meaning of the within written indenture, in the presence of, &c.

LIVERY and OUSTER-LE-MAIN. Where by inquest before the escheator, it was found that nothing was held of the king, then he was immediately commanded by writ to put from his hands the lands taken into the king's hands. 29 Edm. 1; 28 Edm. 3. c. 4. See Ouster-le-Main.

LIVERYMEN OF LONDON. In the companies of London, liverymen are chosen out of the freemen, as assistants to the masters and wardens, in matters of council, and for better government; and if any one of the company refuse to take upon him the office, he may be fined, and an action of debt will lie for the sum. 1 Mod. 10. See London.

LOAN. A contract by which the use of any thing is given under condition of its being returned to the owner. See Bailment. As to loans of money, see Usury; and as to public loans, see National Debt.

LOBBE. A large kind of North-sea fish. See 31 Edm. 3. st. 3. c. 2. And loich comprehends lob, ling, and cod.

LOBSTERS. May be imported by natives or foreigners, and in any vessels, notwithstanding 10 & 11 Wm. 3. c. 24. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 18. No person shall with trunks, hoop-nets, &c. take any lobsters on the sea-coast of Scotland, from the first of June to the first of September yearly, on pain of 5*l.* to be recovered before two justices. 9 Geo. 2. c. 33. See Fish, Navigation Acts.

LOCAL [localis.] Tied or annexed to a certain place. Real actions are local, and to be brought in the county where the lands lie; but a personal action, as of trespass or battery, &c. is transitory, not local; and it is not material that the action should be tried or laid in the same county where the fact was done; and if the place be set down, it is not needful that the defendant should traverse the place, by saying he did not commit the battery in the place mentioned, &c. Kitch. 230. See Action, Venue. A thing is local that is fixed to the freehold. Kitch. 180.

LOCATION. A contract by which a hire is agreed to be given for the use of any thing, or for the labour of any person. See Bailment, Master and Servant.

LOCKMAN. In the Isle of Man the lockman is an officer to execute the order of the governor, much like our undersheriff. King's Descrip. Isle of Man, 26.

LOCKS, in navigation. See Malicious Injuries.

LOCUS IN QUO. The place where any thing is alleged to be done in pleadings, &c. 1 Salk. 94. See Trespass.

LOCUS PARTITUS. A division made between two towns or counties, to make trial where the land or place in question lieth. Flet. lib. 4. c. 15.

LOCUS PENITENTIAE. A power of drawing back from a bargain before any act has been done to confirm it in law. See Agreement, Fraud.

LOCUTORIUM. The monks and other religious in monasteries, after they had dined in their common hall, had a withdrawing room, where they met and talked together among themselves, which room, for that sociable use and conversation, they called locutorium à loquendo; as we call such a place in our houses parlour, from the French parler; and they had another room which was called locutorium forinsecum, where they might talk with laymen. Walsing. 257.

LODE-MANAGE. The hire of a pilot for conducting a vessel from one place to another. Conell The pilot receives a lode-manage of the master for conducting the ship up the river, or into port; but the loadman is he that undertakes to bring a ship through the haven after being brought thither by the pilot, to the quay or place of discharge, and if through his ignorance, negligence, or other fault, the ship or merchandise receive any damage, action lies against him at the common law. Roughton, fol. 27.

LODE-MERFGE. Mentioned in the laws of Oleron, is expounded to be the skill or art of navigation. Conell. Quere, if it is not a corruption of lode-manage.

LODE-SHIP. A kind of fishing vessel, mentioned in 31 Edw. 3. c. 2.

LODGERS and LODGINGS. As to thefts of furniture by lodgers, see Larceny.

LOGATING. An unlawful game, mentioned in 38 Hen. 8. c. 9. now disused.

LOGIA. A little house, lodge, or cottage. Mon. Angl. tom. 1. p. 400.

LOGWOOD [lignum nigrum] Wood used by dyers, brought from foreign parts, prohibited by 23 Eliz. c. 9; but allowed to be imported by 14 Car. 2. c. 11.

LOITH, or LOYCH FISH. A large North-sea fish, mentioned in 31 Edw. 3. st. 3. c. 2. Vide Lobbe.

LOLLARDS. Are said to have had their name from one Walter Lollard, a German, who lived about the year 1315. They were termed Heretics, and began to abound in England in the reigns of King Edward III. and Henry V. Wycliffe being the chief of them in this nation. Stow's Annals 45. Spotwood, in his History of Scotland, says, the intent of these Lollards was to subvert the Christian faith, the law of God, the church, and the realm. See 2 Hen. 5. c. 7. repealed by 1 Edw. 6. c. 12. and tit. Heresy. These Lollards were in fact the founders of the Protestant religion. As to the derivation of the term, see Life of Wycliffe prefixed to Baber's edition of Wycliffe's Translation of the New Testament, p. xxxiii. n. 4to. 1810.

LOLLARDY. The doctrine and opinion of the Lollards. See 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 6.

LOMBARDS. The company shall be answerable for their debts. 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 23. See Bills of Exchange.

LONDON.

The metropolis of this kingdom, formerly called Augusta, has been built above three thousand years, and flourished for fifteen hundred years. Its Exchange, where merchants of all nations meet, is not to be equalled, and for stretchiness of buildings, extent of bounds, learning, arts and sciences, traffic and trade, this city gives place to none in the world. Stow.

London is a county of itself. 4 Inst. 248. See title Counties Corporate. So it is a corporation by prescription, known by several names. 2 Inst. 330, quo warranto, passim.

During two violent proceedings that took place in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II. it was, among other things, thought expedient to new-model most of the corporation towns in the kingdom; for which purpose many of those bodies were persuaded to surrender their charters; and informations in the nature of quo warranto were brought against others, upon a supposed, or frequently a real forfeiture of their franchises by neglect or abuse of them; and the consequence was, that the liberties of most of them were seized into the hands of the king, who granted them fresh charters, with such alterations as were thought expedient; and during their state of anarchy the crown named all their magistrates. This exertion of power, though perhaps, in summo jure, it was for the most part strictly legal, gave a great and just alarm, the new-modelling of all corporations being a very large stride towards establishing arbitrary power; and therefore it was thought necessary, at the Revolution, to bridle this branch of the prerogative, at least so far as regarded the metropolis, by 2 W. & M. st. 1. c. 8. which enacts, that the franchises of the city of London shall never hereafter be seized or forejudged for any forfeiture or misdemeanor whatsoever. The quo warranto against London issued in Trinity term, 35 Car. 2. on which judgment was given in B. R. that the charter and franchises of the said city should be seized into the king's hands as forfeited. This judgment was reversed by the above 2 W. & M. and all officers and companies restored, &c.; and the act provided, that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the city of London should for ever thereafter be, and prescribe to be, a body corporate and politic, &c.; and enjoy all their franchises, &c. See 3 Comm. 263, 4. Before this, by Magna Charta, c. 9. it was provided, that the city of London should have all their ancient usages, liberties, and customs which they had used to enjoy; which is confirmed by 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 1.

It is divided into twenty-six wards, over each of which there is an alderman; and is governed by a lord mayor, who is chosen yearly, and presented to the king, or in his absence to his justices, or the barons of the Exchequer at Westminster. Chart. K. Hen. 3.

Before the time of Henry III. the city was divided into twenty-four wards. By parliament, anno 17 R. 2. Farringdon-without was severed from Farringdon-within, and made a distinct ward. By charter 1 Edw. 3. and patent 4 Edw. 6. the king granted to the citizens and their successors, the villa, manor, and borough of Southwark; whereupon, by an order of the Court of Mayor and Aldermen, confirmed by the Common Council, Southwark was made the 26th ward, by the name of the Bridge Ward-without, on the last day of July, 4 Edw. 6. See Com. Dig. title London, (A).

Before and since the Conquest, to the time of Ric. 1. London was governed by a port-reeve, and 1 R. 1. by two bailiffs, and afterwards by a mayor appointed by the king; but King John, in the tenth year of his reign, granted them liberty to choose a mayor. 2 Inst. 253. See 2 Stow, 450; Com. Dig. title London, (C). The presenting and swearing of the lord mayor at Westminster to be on the 9th of November, new style; 24 Geo. 2. c. 48. § 11; to be admitted and sworn at Guildhall, London, the day preceding. 25 Geo. 2. c. 30. § 4.

The lord mayor of London for the time being is chief justice of gaol delivery, escheator within the liberties, and bailiff of the river Thames, &c. He is a high officer in the city, having all Courts for distribution of justice under his jurisdiction, viz. The Court of Hustings, Sheriffs' Court, Mayor's Court, Court of Common Council, &c. 2 Inst. 330.

King Henry IV. granted to the mayor and commonalty of London the assise of bread, beer, ale, &c. and victuals, and things saleable in the city. In London every day, except Sunday, is a market overt, for the buying and selling of goods and merchandise. 5 Rep. 85. But no person, not being a freeman of London, shall keep any shop or other place to put to sale by retail any goods or wares, or use any handicraft trade for hire, gain or sale within the city, upon pain of forfeiting £5. 8 Rep. 124; Chart. Car. 1.

Persons making ill and unserviceable goods in London, the chief officers of the company to which such persons do or ought to belong, may seize and carry them to the Guildhall, and have the goods tried by a jury; and if found defective, they may break them, &c. Trin. 34 Car. 2. B. R. A person must be a freeman of London to be entitled to carry on merchandise there. Chart. Car. 1.

By charter Henry 1. all the men of London, and all their goods, shall be free from scot and lot, dane-gilt and murder; and from all toll, passage and lestage, and all other customs through all England, and the ports of the sea. So by charters 11 Hen. 3. and 50 Hen. 3. See 4 Inst. 252. But he who claims these privileges must not only be a freeman, but an inhabitant of London. 1 H. Black. 206; 4 T. R. 144.

There are three ways to be a freeman of London: by servitude of an apprenticeship; by birthright, as being the son of a freeman; and by redemption, i.e. by purchase, under an order of the Court of Aldermen. 4 Mod. 145.

The child of a freeman, when of age, may, in consideration of a present fortune, bar herself of her customary part. 2 Strunge, 947. An agreement on marriage, that the husband shall take up the freedom of London, binds the distribution of his effects. 1 Strunge, 455. See tit. Executor, V. 9.

The city of London is entitled to a fine, imposed for a misdemeanor committed within the city, though it be adjudged by the Court of King's Bench at Westminster. (Charters of 23 H. 6; 20 H. 7; 14 Car. 1; and 15 Car. 2.) 1 C. M. & R. 1.

The customs of London are many and various.—They are against the common law, but made good by special usage, and confirmed by act of parliament. 4 Inst. 249; 8 Rep. 126. In setting forth a custom or usage in the city of London, it must be said antiqua civitas, or it will not be good. 2 Leon. 99.

There is a custom in London to punish by information in the Mayor's Court, in the name of the common serjeant of the city, assaults on aldermen, and affronting language, &c. 7 Mod. 28, 29.

Where a woman exerciseth a trade in London, wherein her husband doth not intermeddle, by the custom she shall have all advantages, and be sued as a feme sole merchant; but if the husband meddle with the trade of the wife, or carry on the same trade, it is otherwise. 1 Cro. 63; 3 Keb 902. See titles Bankrupt, Baron and Feme.

An arrest may be made in London on the plaintiff's entering his plaint in either of the compters, and a serjeant of London need not show his mace when he arrests one; and the liberties of the city extend to the suburbs and Temple Bar. Jenk. Cent. 291.

The customs of the city of London shall be tried by the certificates of the mayor and aldermen, certified by the mouth of their recorder, upon a surmise from the party alleging it, that the custom ought to be thus tried; else it must be tried by the county. 1 Inst. 74; 4 Burr. 248; Bro. Abr. title Trial, pl. 96. As the custom of distributing the effects of freemen deceased; (see title Executor, V. 9.) of enrolling apprentices; or that he who is free of one trade may use another; if any of these or other similar points come in issue. But this rule admits of an exception where the corporation of London is party, or interested in the suit; as in action brought for a penalty inflicted upon by the custom; for there the reason of the law will not endure so partial a trial; but this custom shall in such case be determined by a jury. Hob. 86. In some cases the sheriff of London's certificate shall be the final trial; as if the issue be whether the defendant be a citizen of London or foreigner, in case of privilege pleaded to be sued only in the city Courts. 1 Inst. 714. See title Customs of London.

Upon the customs of London concerning the payment of the wharfage, &c. by every freeman to the corporation, the trial shall not be by the mouth of the recorder, as customs generally are, but by the country, and a jury from Surrey adjoining. Moor, c. 129.

The mayor of London is to cause errors, defaults, and misprisions there to be redressed, under the penalty of 100 marks; and the constable of the Tower shall execute process against the mayor for default, &c. 28 Edm. 3. c. 10. See 17 Ric. 2. c. 12; 1 Hen. 4. c. 15. by which latter the fine is to be at the discretion of the justices.

The several Courts within the city of London (and other cities and corporations throughout the kingdom) held by prescription, charter, or act of parliament, are of a private and limited species. The chief of those in London are the Sheriffs' Court, holden before their steward or judge; from which a writ of error lies to the Court of Hustings, before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs; and from thence to justices appointed by the king's commission, who used to sit in the church of St. Martin-le-Grand. F. N. B. 32. And from the judgment of those justices a writ of error lies immediately to the House of Lords. 3 Comm. 80, n. See titles Courts, Court of Hustings, Inferior Courts, &c.

The Court of Requests, or Court of Conscience for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. was first established in London so early as the reign of Henry VIII. by an act of the Common Council; which was, however, certainly insufficient for that purpose, and illegal, till confirmed by the 3 Jac. 1. c. 15. explained and amended by the 14 Geo. 2. c. 10. By the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 104. further amendments have been made in these statutes, and the jurisdiction of the Court extended to £5. See title Courts of Conscience.

The gaol-delivery for the county of Middlesex, as well as that for London, was until recently held at the Old Bailey, in the city of London, eight times in the year; and it was by 3 Geo. 3. c. 18, provided, that when such session should have begun before the essoin-day of any term, it might continue to be held, and be concluded notwithstanding the sitting of the Court of King's Bench. And this act, by 32 Geo. 3. c. 48, was extended to the Middlesex sessions.

And see the 9 Geo. 4. c. 9. providing for the holding of the sessions of the peace at Westminster, notwithstanding the sitting of the King's Bench.

Now by the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 36. after reciting that "it is expedient, for the more effective and uniform administration of justice in criminal cases, that offences committed in the metropolis and certain parts adjoining thereto, should be tried by justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery in the city of London," it is enacted,

§ 1. That the lord mayor of London, the lord chancellor the judges of the courts of law and of bankruptcy, and of the admiralty, the dean of the arches, the aldermen, recorder, and common serjeant of London, &c. and such others as his majesty may appoint, shall be judges of a court to be called the "Central Criminal Court," to which his majesty may direct his general commission as after mentioned; and which court shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all offences as after specified.

§ 2. His majesty may issue commissions of oyer and terminer to inquire of, hear, and determine all treasons, murders, felonies, and misdemeanors committed within the city of London and county of Middlesex, and certain parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey; and also commissions of gaol delivery to deliver his majesty's gaol of Newgate of the prisoners therein charged with any of the offences aforesaid, committed within the limits aforesaid; and it shall be lawful for the justices and judges of the Central Criminal Court aforesaid, or any two or more of them, to inquire of, hear, determine, and adjudge all such treasons, murders, felonies, and misdemeanors, and all treasons, murders, felonies, and misdemeanors which might be inquired of, heard and determined under any commission of oyer and terminer of the city of London or county of Middlesex, or commissions of gaol delivery to deliver the gaol of Newgate, or which in case the parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey respectively comprised within the limits aforesaid had been counties of themselves, might have been inquired of, heard, and determined under commissions of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery for such counties, and to deliver the said gaol of Newgate at such times and places in the said city, or the suburbs thereof, as by the said commissions shall be appointed, or as the said justices and judges by virtue and in pursuance thereof, or any two or more of them, shall appoint, and to award and issue all precepts and process, and use and exercise all powers and authorities belonging to justices of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery: provided always, that such court shall have power and jurisdiction to proceed on every such commission so issued as aforesaid, and act under such commission until a new commission shall be issued.

§ 3. The district situated within the limits of the jurisdiction hereinbefore established shall be deemed in all cases tried before the said justices and judges one county, for all purposes of venue, local description, trial, judgment, and execution, not herein specially provided for; and that in all indictments and presentments preferred and tried before the said justices and judges, the venue laid in the margin shall be as follows: "Central Criminal Court to wit;" and all offences which in other indictments would be laid to have been committed in the county where the trial is had, and all material facts which would be in other indictments averred to have taken place in the county where the trial is had, shall, in indictments prepared and tried in the said court, be laid to have been committed, and averred to have taken place "within the jurisdiction of the said court."

§ 4. The sheriffs of the city of London and of the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, respectively, shall execute and obey all precepts and process which the said justices and judges shall award and direct unto them respectively, and shall, whenever required, summon from the said city of London and county of Middlesex, and from the parts of the said counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, within the act, a competent number of persons qualified according to law to inquire of, present, and try all offences and other matters cognizable by the said justices and judges; and the persons so returned, whether taken wholly from the city of London or the said counties, or taken indiscriminately from the said city and the said counties, shall have authority to inquire of, present, hear, try, and determine all such offences and other matters, and all issues and all matters of fact arising out of such trials, notwithstanding they are not inhabitants of the city, county, or place where such offences or other matters may be committed or arise.

§ 5. His majesty, by order in council, to appoint the places of confinement for prisoners charged with offences committed within the limits of the act.

But by § 6, the Penitentiary at Milbank is to be one of the prisons under this act.

§ 7. Persons sentenced to imprisonment by any court beyond the limits of this act, may still be removed to the Penitentiary at Milbank.

And § 8. The regulations in all Penitentiary Acts shall apply to prisoners confined there by the authority of the act.

§ 9. The said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, or any two or more, may commit persons brought before them charged with any offence cognizable under the act, or who shall be convicted or attainted before them, to such gaol, house of correction, or other prison as may be specified in any order of council made by virtue of the act, or if no such order shall have been made, then to the common gaol, house of correction, or other prison of the city, county, or place to which such offender might have been committed if the act had not passed, or to Newgate, there to remain until discharged by due course of law, or in execution of their respective judgments; and in case of such commitment to Newgate, execution of such judgments shall be done upon such persons by the sheriffs of the said city of London.

§ 10. Until his majesty shall order and direct in what gaol, &c. persons charged with or convicted of offences committed within the limits of the act shall be imprisoned, any justice of the peace or coroner for the counties of Essex or Kent, so far as relates to the parishes lying within their respective counties, to commit persons charged with offences aforesaid cognizable by the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery by virtue of the act to Newgate; and also for any justice of the peace or coroner for the county of Surrey, so far as relates to the several parishes lying within that county, to commit any person charged with any such offences aforesaid to his majesty's gaol of Horsemonger Lane or Newington, in and for the county of Surrey.

§ 11. Every justice or coroner acting within the limits of the act shall specify in the commitment that the persons charged are committed under the authority of the act; and such justice or coroner shall take the like examinations, informations, bailments, and recognizances, and certify the same to the said justices of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, as required by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 64; and any justice or coroner, in default of so doing, shall be liable to the same fines and penalties to be imposed by the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, in the same manner as mentioned in the said act; and when any persons shall be committed to his majesty's gaol for the county of Surrey, for any offence cognizable by virtue of this act, by a commitment specifying that such persons are committed under the act, the sheriff of the said county of Surrey, or the keeper of the gaol for the said county, shall, six days at least before the sitting of the next court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery appointed under the act, or at such other time as the said justices and judges of oyer, &c. or any two or more, shall from time to time direct, cause such persons, with their commitments and detainers, to be safely removed from the gaol of the said county of Surrey, without the issuing of any writ of habeas corpus or other writ, to the said gaol of Newgate, there to remain until delivered by due course of law.

§ 12. Any two of the said justices and judges of oyer, &c. may order the costs and expenses of prosecutors and witnesses, in all cases where prosecutors and witnesses may be by law entitled thereto, to be paid by the treasurer of the county in which the offence of any person prosecuted would have been tried but for the act; and every such treasurer or some known agent shall attend the said justices and judges during the sitting of the court, to pay all such orders.

§ 13. No bill of indictment for any misdemeanor (other than perjury or subornation of perjury) which can be presented to the grand jury at any sessions of the peace for the city of Westminster and borough of Southwark, and counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey respectively, in which such misdemeanor was committed, shall be presented to the grand jury summoned under the act, unless the prosecutor or other person presenting such indictment shall have been bound by recognizance to prosecute or give evidence at the sessions to be held under the act against the persons accused of such misdemeanor, or unless such persons accused shall have been detained in custody, or shall be bound by recognizance to appear at the said sessions to be held under the act.

§ 14. The court of the lord mayor and aldermen of London may contract with the justices of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, for the support of their prisoners in Newgate, and if they cannot agree, the judges are to settle the amount.

§ 15. The said justices and judges of oyer, &c. to be appointed under the act, or any two or more, shall hold a session for the said city of London and county of Middlesex, and the parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey hereinbefore mentioned, in the said city of London or suburbs thereof, at least twelve times in every year, (and oftener if need be,) such times to be fixed by general orders of the said court, which any eight or more of the said judges of his majesty's courts of Westminster are hereby empowered to make from time to time.

§ 16. His majesty's Court of King's Bench, or any judge thereof, or any commissioner of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery under the act, being a judge of any of the superior Courts at Westminster, or the chief judge or any other judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, or the recorder for the said city of London for the time being, if such court, judge, or recorder shall think proper, may issue any writ or writs of certiorari, or other process, directed to his majesty's justices of the peace for the cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, the borough of Southwark, and the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, commanding them to certify and return into the said court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery indictments or presentments found or taken before them, of any offences cognizable by virtue of this act, and the several recognizances, examinations, and depositions relative to such indictments and presentments, so that the same offences may be tried by the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery; and also for the like purpose, by writ or writs of habeas corpus, to cause any person or persons, who may be in the custody of any gaol or prison charged with any offences cognizable under the act, to be removed into the custody of the keeper of the gaol of Newgate.

§ 17. "The justices of the peace for the said cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, the borough of Southwark, and the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, shall not, at their respective general or quarter sessions of the peace, or any adjournment thereof, try any person or persons charged with any capital offence, or with any of the following offences committed or alleged to be committed within the limits of this act; that is to say, house-breaking, stealing above the value of five pounds in a dwelling-house, horse-stealing, sheep-stealing, cattle-stealing, maliciously wounding cattle, bigamy, forgery, perjury, conspiracy, assault with intent to commit any felony, administering or attempting to administer poison with intent to kill or to do some grievous bodily harm, administering drugs or other things, or doing any thing with intent to cause or procure abortion, manslaughter, destroying or damaging ships or vessels, the breaking of shops, warehouses, counting-houses, and buildings within the curtilage of dwelling-houses, killing sheep with intent to steal the carcasses, the uttering of all forged instruments, and the various offences enumerated in the act passed in the first year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled "An act for reducing into one act all such forgeries as shall henceforth be punished by death; and for otherwise amending the laws relative to forgery," forging the assay marks on gold or silver plate, and all the offences relating to coin enumerated in the act passed in the second year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled "An act for consolidating and amending the laws against offences relating to the coin," the abduction of women, bankrupts not surrendering under their commission or concealing their effects, breaking down bridges and banks of rivers, taking rewards for helping to stolen goods, personating any officer, seaman, or other persons, in order to receive any wages, pay, allowance, or prize money due or supposed to be due, or any out-pensioner of Greenwich Hospital, in order to receive any out-pension allowance due or supposed to be due, sending threatening letters and using threats to extort money, larceny on navigable rivers and canals, and stealing and destroying goods in progress of manufacture, and larcenies after a previous conviction, embezzlement, larceny by clerks and servants, and receivers of stolen goods, whether such person or persons shall be charged as principal offenders or as accessories before or after the fact."

§ 18. Every recognizance entered into for the prosecution before his majesty's justices of the peace aforesaid of any person for any offence cognizable under the act, and any recognizance for the appearance as well of any witness to give evidence upon any bill of indictment or presentment for any such offence as of any person to answer our lord the king concerning any such offence, or to answer generally before such justice of the peace, shall, in case any such writ of certiorari or habeas corpus be issued for removing such indictment or presentment or such person so in custody as aforesaid, be obligatory on the parties bound by such recognizance to prosecute and appear and give evidence and do all other things therein mentioned with reference to the indictment or presentment or the person so removed as aforesaid before the justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery acting by virtue of the act; provided that in cases of removal from the jurisdiction of justices of the peace for the cities of London or Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, the borough of Southwark, or counties of Middlesex and Surrey, two days' notice, and in case of removal from the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace for the counties of Essex and Kent, one week's notice, shall have been given either personally or by leaving the same at the place of residence as of which the parties bound by such recognizance are therein described, to appear before the court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery instead of the said other justices. Provided also, that the court, judge, or recorder who shall grant such writ of certiorari or habeas corpus, and it is hereby required that such court, &c. shall cause the party applying for such writ or writs, whether he be the prosecutor or party charged with such offence, to enter into a recognizance in such sum, and with or without sureties, as the court, judge, or recorder may direct, conditioned to give such notice as aforesaid to the parties bound by such recognizance to appear before the said court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery instead of before the said other justices respectively, and to do such other things as such court, &c. shall direct.

§ 19. The said justices of the peace for the cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, the borough of Southwark, and for the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, if they shall think fit, may certify and deliver to the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery any indictment or presentment found or taken before them at their said general or quarter sessions of the peace, or at any adjournment thereof, for offences cognizable by virtue of the act, in the same manner as the said justices might do if the said court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery was holden in the county where such indictments or presentments were found or taken.

§ 20. The said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, in sessions assembled, are authorized and required to make a table of fees and allowances to be received by the officers of the said court, and from time to time to alter the same; which said table of fees and allowances shall be hung up in the Court of Sessions, and a copy thereof transmitted to the clerks of the peace of the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey; or the said justices and judges may settle a salary in lieu of such fees and allowances, to be paid to the said officers or either of them for the performance of their respective duties, and order how and by whom such fees and allowances or salary shall be paid, and also order such portion as they shall think fit of the expense of preparing calendars and sessions papers, and of other expenses incident to the act, to be borne and paid by the treasurer of each of the said counties: Provided that the county of Middlesex shall not be liable to any portion of the expense of preparing calendars or sessions papers, or of any other expenses incident to the act, to which the said county would not have been liable in case the act had not been passed.

vent the justices of the peace for the said cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, the borough of Southwark, and the said counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, from holding their respective general or quarter sessions of the peace during the sitting of the said court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery to be held in pursuance of this act; and that neither this act, nor the commissions of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery from time to time issued thereunder, shall supersede or affect any other commission or commissions of oyer and terminer to be at any time issued by his majesty in the said counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, or the jurisdiction by virtue thereof, nor prevent the justices of oyer and terminer appointed by any commission to be issued under the authority of this act from holding their respective sessions at one and the same time.

By § 22. After reciting that "it is expedient that persons charged with certain offences committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, should speedily be brought to trial;" it is enacted that the justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery to be appointed by the commissions issued under the act, or any two or more, may inquire of, hear, and determine any offences committed or alleged to have been committed on the high seas, and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and deliver the gaol of Newgate of any persons detained therein for any offences alleged to have been committed upon the high seas aforesaid, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England; and all indictments found and trials and other proceedings had and taken by and before the said justices and judges, shall be valid and effectual; and any three of the said justices and judges may order the payment of the costs and expenses of such prosecutions in manner prescribed and directed by the before-recited act of the seventh of George the Fourth.

§ 23. Provided always, that nothing in the act contained shall extend to prejudice or affect the rights, interests, privileges, franchises, or authorities of the lord mayor, aldermen, and recorder of the city of London, or their successors, the sheriffs of the city of London and county of Middlesex, for the time being, or to prohibit or diminish any power, authority, or jurisdiction which at the time of making this act the said lord mayor, aldermen, and recorder for the time being of the said city might lawfully use or exercise; and that, notwithstanding any practice or custom of the said city of London to the contrary, it shall be lawful for the Lord Mayor's Court of the City of London to sit on any day on which any session of the peace, oyer and terminer and gaol delivery shall be held within the said city, and that all proceedings of the said Lord Mayor's Court that might have been taken if such sessions were not held, shall be taken, any practice, custom, or law to the contrary notwithstanding.

By § 24. The act is to take effect from and after the 31st October, 1834.

After the fire of London a judicature was enacted for determining differences relating to the houses burnt; and several rules were laid down for rebuilding the city, the streets, lanes, &c. The lord mayor and aldermen were to set out markers; the number of parishes and churches was ascertained, and a duty granted on coals for rebuilding the churches, &c. See 19 Car. 2. c. 2. & 22 Car. 2. c. 11. 14; 25 Car. 2. c. 10.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 66, the commissioners of the treasury were empowered to purchase out of the consolidated fund the duties of pack, g. s. v. go, ballage, and portage belonging to the corporation of London, with a view to the abolition of those offices. By § 4. the corporation may lay out the money so received in land, or § 5 may invest it in the purchase of the ground rents and reversions of the houses and parcels of ground mentioned in the act.

By the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 32, the rates of tonnage imposed on ships frequenting the port of London by various former acts are repealed, and the following reduced scale of charges enacted.

First Class.—For every ship or other vessel trading coastwise between the port of London and any port or place in Great Britain, Ireland, the Orkneys, Shetland, or the Western Islands of Scotland, there shall be paid for every voyage, both in and out of the said port, one halfpenny per ton:

Second Class.—For every ship or other vessel entering inwards or clearing outwards in the said port from or to Denmark, Norway, or Lapland (on this side of the North Cape,) or from Holstein, Hamburg, Bremen, or any other part of Germany bordering or near the Germanic Ocean, or from or to Holland or any other of the united provinces, or Brabant, Antwerp, Flanders, or any other part of the Netherlands, or from or to France (within Ushant), Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or the Isle of Man, there shall be paid for every voyage, both in and out of the said port, one halfpenny per ton:

Third Class.—For every ship or other vessel entering inwards or clearing outwards in the said port from or to Lapland (beyond the North Cape), Finland, Russia (without or within the Baltic sea,) Livonia, Courland, Poland, Prussia, Sweden, or any other country or place within the Baltic sea, there shall be paid for every voyage, both in and out of the said port, one halfpenny per ton:

Fourth Class.—For every ship or other vessel entering inwards or clearing outwards in the said port from or to France (between Ushant and Spain), Portugal, Spain (without the Mediterranean), or any of the Azores, Madeira, or Canary Islands, or any of the United States of America, or of the British Colonies or Provinces in North America or Florida, there shall be paid for every voyage both in and out of the said port, three farthings per ton:

Fifth Class.—For every ship or other vessel entering inwards or clearing outwards in the said port from or to Greenland, Gibraltar, France, or Spain (within the Mediterranean), or any country, island, port, or place, within or bordering on or near the Mediterranean or Adriatic sea, or from the West Indies, Louisiana, Mexico, South America, Africa, East India, China, or any other country, island, port, or place within or bordering on or near the Pacific Ocean, or from any other country, island, port, or place whatsoever to the southward of twenty-five degrees of north latitude, there shall be paid for every voyage both in and out of the said port, three farthings per ton.

By § 4, the said duties shall be under the management of the commissioners of Customs, and recovered in the same manner.

§ 5. Exempts from the above duties his Majesty's ships of war, or any ship or vessel being the property of his Majesty, or of any of the royal family, ships coming to or going coastwise from the port of London or to any part of Great Britain, unless such ships exceed forty-five tons register tonnage, vessels bringing corn coastwise, the principal part of whose cargo shall consist of corn, fishing smacks, lobster and oyster boats, or vessels for passengers, vessels or craft navigating the river Thames above and below London bridge as far as Gravesend only, and vessels entering the port of London inwards, or going from the port of London outwards, when in ballast.

By § 7, the commissioners are empowered after three years to reduce the duties, if they are found to be more than sufficient to defray the expenses of maintaining the mooring chains in the Thames and the salaries of the harbour-masters and their assistants, and the other charges which are by the act to be paid out of such duties.

A great variety of statutes have been passed to regulate various concerns of the city of London besides those already alluded to; the following is a very short abstract of the purport of those most material: and see title Police.

By Civ. London, 13 E. 1. st. 5, none shall walk the streets armed after curfew, unless noblemen or their servants with lights; taverns and alehouses shall be shut at curfew; fencing schools for buckler shall not be kept in London; none but freemen shall keep inns in the city; none shall be brokers in London but those who are admitted and sworn by the mayor and aldermen, (see post, Brokers.) the officers of the city shall not be punished for false imprisonment, unless it appear to be of malice.

Proceedings on a foreign voucher and recoveries. Glouc. 6 Ed. 1. c. 11, 12; Artic. St. Glouc. correc. 9 E. 1. Damages shall be assessed by the assise in novel disseisin, and amercements shall be offered by the barons of the Exchequer. Stat. Glouc. c. 14. Wines sold contrary to the assise shall be presented to the barons. Stat. Glouc. c. 15.

The manner of proceeding for arrears of rent and services. Stat. de Gavelet, 10 E. 2.

All vintners, victuallers, fishmongers, butchers, and poulterers, to be under the rule of the mayor and aldermen. 31 E. 3. st. 1. c. 10; 7 R. 2. c. 11.

Merchants of London free to pack their cloths. 1 H. 4. c. 16.

Freemen of London may carry their goods to any fair or market, notwithstanding their bye-laws. 3 H. 7. c. 9.

The 2d of September to be observed annually as a public fast, in commemoration of the dreadful fire 1666. 19 Car. 2. c. 3.

See under the several titles following, and the statutes referred to, for further information.

Aldermen; not to be elected yearly, but remain till they are put out for reasonable cause. 17 R. 2. c. 11. Their negative in common council established. 11 Geo. 1. c. 18. § 15. Repealed by 19 Geo. 2. c. 8.

Attaint; proceedings in, regulated. 11 H. 7. c. 21. § 2; 37 H. 8. c. 5. § 3. (Abolished by the 6 G. 4. c. 50. § 60.)

Ballastage; see 6 Geo. 2. c. 29; 3 Geo. 2. c. 16.

Blackwell-Hall; market for the sale of woollen-cloth, to be held there every Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and regulations relating thereto. 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 9; and see 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 5. § 26; 39 Eliz. c. 20. § 12; 1 Geo. 1. c. 15.

Bowyers; see 8 Eliz. c. 10.

Bread; see tit. Bread.

Bridges; see the acts for rebuilding London Bridge, and improving the approaches thereto; 4 G. 4. c. 50; 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 30; 10 G. 4. c. 136; 1 W. 4. c. 3; 2 W. 4. c. 23.

Brokers; to pay 40s. per ann. on their admission by the Court of Aldermen; 6 Ann. c. 16; and to enter in a bond conditioned for honest behaviour, and not to deal on their own account. See the terms Paley on Principal and Agent (ed. by Lloyd.) Although a broker contravenes the act by dealing for himself, this does not render the transaction invalid, but only subjects him to the penalty under the act. It seems that a stockbroker is liable to the payment of this fee of 40s. 7 East, 292.

Buildings; regulated and divided into seven rates or classes; their height, party-walls, &c. determined. Preventions against fire (see Fire), &c. 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. See Police.

Butchers; not to slay beasts within the walls of the city. 4 H. 7. c. 3. See further title Butchers.

Carriers; regulation of their charges. 21 Geo. 2. c. 28.

Carts; penalty on drivers riding on their carts, 10s. or 20s. if owner of the cart. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 57; 24 Geo. 2. c. 43; 30 Geo. 2. c. 22. Owner's name and number to be put on them. 18 Geo. 2. c. 33; 30 Geo. 2. c. 22; 7 Geo. 3. c. 44; 24 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 27; which also contain regulations for the behaviour of the drivers. See Police.

Cattle; salesmen not to buy cattle on the road. 31 Geo. 2. c. 40. Regulations as to driving cattle. 21 Geo. 3. c. 67. See Cattle, Police.

Chimney-Sweepers; see the act regulating chimney-sweepers and their apprentices, and for the safer construction of chimneys and flues. 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 35.

Churches; see 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 12. Buildings erected on any part of St. Paul's church-yard (except the chapter-house) to be deemed common nuisances. See also 9 Ann. c. 23. 10 Ann. c. 11; 1 G. 1. c. 23, &c. as to building fifty new churches by a duty on coals.

Coaches and Chairs. See title Coaches.

Coals. See title Coals.

Coopers' Company; regulated by 23 H. 8. c. 4; 31 Eliz. c. 8. Corn. See title Corn.

Docks, Quays, and Harbours. See 39 Geo. 3. c. lxxix, 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. xlvii.; 42 Geo. 3. c. cxliii.; and 43 Geo. 3. c. cxxvi.; and several other local acts; and the public acts, 44 Geo. 3. c. 100; 46 Geo. 3. c. 118, &c.; 47 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 60. 47 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. xxxi. c. lxxii.; 48 Geo. 3. c. viii.; 50 G. 3. c. 22; 52 Geo. 3. c. 49; 54 Geo. 3. c. 45. For the sale and conveyance of quays, &c. the property of the crown, situate between London bridge and the Tower, see 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 66. amended by 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 8.

Dyers; regulations as to journeymen, servants, and labourers. 17 Geo. 3. c. 33. Control of the Dyers' company to prevent frauds in dyeing woollen goods. 23 Geo. 3. c. 15.

Elections; of aldermen and common councilmen, are (1 Geo. 1. c. 18. s. 7, 8, 9.) to be by freemen householders paying scot and lot, and having houses of the value of 10*l.* a year. Formerly none could vote at the election of members of parliament for the city of London, but liverymen that had been twelve months on the livery, not discharged from payment of taxes, nor having received alms; (see 11 Geo. 1. c. 18.); but by the Reform Act, (2 W. 4. c. 45.) the privilege has been extended to all householders paying 10*l.* a year rent and complying with the other requisites of the statute. See title Parliament.

Fish; for regulating Billingsgate market, see 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 24; powers given to the Fishmongers' Company, 9 Ann. c. 26. LONDON ASSURANCE. See Insurance.

LONGELLUS. A word used in Thorn's Chronicle; it signifies a coverlet. Cowell.

LONGITUDE of a place, in geography, is an arch of the equator intercepted between the first meridian, and the meridian passing through the proposed place; which is always equal to the angle at the pole, formed by the first meridian, and the meridian of the place.

The first meridian may be placed at pleasure, passing through any place, as London, Paris, Teneriffe, &c. but with us it is generally fixed at London; and the degrees of longitude counted from it, will be either east or west, according as they lie on the east or west side of that meridian.

In other words, to explain the subject in a familiar manner to those wholly unacquainted with it, as by the latitude we learn the distance north or south, so by knowing the longitude, we know the distance from any given place east or west; allowing for the difference of a degree of longitude at the equator (or middle of the globe) and at the arctic circle, &c.

The longitude is, as before described, in other words, the distance of a place east or west from that imaginary line drawn from north to south, through a place fixed on for that purpose, and called the first meridian, i. e. the meridian or boundary from whence we reckon east or west; so that by ascertaining the latitude and longitude of a place, its situation on the natural or artificial globe, with respect to all other places, is known.

By 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 15; 26 Geo. 2. c. 25; 30 Geo. 3. c. 14. the lord admiral and commissioners of the admiralty were appointed commissioners to receive proposals for the discovery of a method to ascertain the longitude at sea, and were empowered to give rewards accordingly. Under 5 Geo. 3. c. 20; 43 Geo. 3. c. 118; 46 Geo. 3. c. 77. the commissioners may construct and publish nautical almanacks, which none must publish without their licence, under forfeiture of 20*l.* to be sued for by the commissioners' secretary. By 14 Geo. 3. c. 66 (repealing all former acts, except such clauses of them as relate to the authority of the commissioners,) rewards of 5,000*l.* 7,500*l.* and 10,000*l.* are offered to the discoverer of a method to find the longitude; in the first instance if determined within one degree, in the second if within two-thirds, and in the last if within half a degree. By this statute, and 21 Geo. 3. c. 52; 30 Geo. 3. c. 14; 48 Geo. 3. c. 118; 46 Geo. 3. c. 77; 55 Geo. 3. c. 75. the commissioners have been from time to time empowered to grant smaller rewards for less useful discoveries on the same account, not exceeding the sums marked under each statute.

By 16 Geo. 3. c. 6. if any ship discovers a passage between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans beyond the 52d degree of north latitude, the owner or commander, if a king's ship, shall receive 20,000*l.*; and 5,000*l.* shall be given in like manner to the first ship that shall approach within one degree of the North Pole.

LOQUELA. An imparlance; loquela sine die, a respite in law to an indefinite time. Paroch. Antiq. 210. See tit. Imparlance.

LORD, [dominus]. A word or title of honour, diversely used, being attributed not only to those who are noble by birth or creation, otherwise called lords of parliament, and peers of the realm, but to such so called by the courtesy of England, as all the sons of a duke, and the eldest son of an earl, and to persons honourable by office, as the Lord Chief Justice, &c. and sometimes to a private person, that hath the fee of a manor, and consequently the homage of the tenants within his manor; for by his tenants he is called Lord. In this last signification it is most used in our law-books; where it is divided into lord paramount, and lord mesne; and very lord, &c. Old. Nat. Br. 79. See titles Mean, Nobility, Parliament, Peers.

LORD HIGH ADMIRAL. See Admiral.

LORD HIGH STEWARD. A peer specially appointed by the crown to preside at the trial of any peer, or peeress, in the House of Lords, either upon an impeachment, or on an indictment found by a grand jury.

His judicial authority appears to have grown out of that which appertained to the Chief Justiciar at the period when that office was abolished: and thus in effect wherever he presides for the trial of peers, the power and jurisdiction of the curia regis is revived.

Of the trials of peers which have occurred before the lord high steward upon indictment, found by a grand jury, very few of those antecedent to the revolution of 1688 took place during a session of parliament. Subsequent to the revolution every trial of a peer or peeress which has occurred has taken place during some session of parliament.

Foster and Blackstone represent that there are two separate tribunals for the trials of peers, differing both in their constitution and in their jurisdiction, to which they give the distinguishing appellations of the court of parliament, and the court of the high steward. Fost. 141. 4 Comm. 261. In several cases, both in Hargrave's and Howell's Collection of State Trials, there is an error in the statement of the court.

It is settled that the office of lord high steward is not essential to the proceeding on impeachments; and on the impeachment of Lord Danby, and the popish lords, the Lords directed that the commission of the high officer, who was then appointed in consequence of an address to the crown, should be altered, by the omission of such expressions as intimated the necessity of his appointment; and the Lords have in several subsequent instances performed various judicial acts previous to his appointment. And in the case of Lord Ferrers, convicted of murder, it was decided by the judges that if the day appointed in the judgment for the execution of a peer convicted on an indictment should elapse before execution done, a new time of execution might be appointed, although no high steward were existing.

On trials, as well by indictment as impeachment, the House directs all parties appearing to address the Lords in general, and not the lord high steward in particular. On indictments it is usual for the Lords to address the King for the appointment of a high steward in the same manner as where the proceeding is by impeachment. See Amos's Dissertation on the Court of the Lord High Steward, annexed to the second volume of Phillips's State Trials, for much curious information on the subject. And see title Peers of the Realm, IV.

LORD IN GROSS, F. N. B. fol. 3. Is he that is lord, having no manor, as the King in respect of his crown. Ibid. fol. 5. And there is a case wherein a private man is lord in gross, viz. a man makes a gift in tail of all the lands he hath, to hold of him, and dieth; his heir hath but a seignior in gross. F. N. B. 8.

LORD OF A MANOR. See Copyhold.

LORD AND VASSAL. In the time of the feudal tenures, the grantor of land was called the proprietor, or lord; being the person who retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud or fee: and the grantee, who had only the use or possession, according to the term of the grant, was styled the feudatory or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of the lands; though, on account of the prejudices we have justly conceived against the doctrines which were afterwards grafted on this system, we now use the word vassal opprobriously as synonymous to slave or bondman. 2 Comm. 53. See title Tenures.

LORDS OF ERECTION. On the Reformation in Scotland, the King, as proprietor of benefices formerly held by abbots and priors, gave them out in temporal lordships to favourites, who were termed Lords of Erection. Scotch Dict.

LORDS LIEUTENANTS OF COUNTIES. See titles County, Militia, Soldiers.

LORDS MARCHERS. See Wales.

LORDS OF PARLIAMENT. See Parliament, Peer.

LORDS OF REGALITY. Persons to whom rights of regality, or rights of civil and criminal jurisdiction, were given by the crown. Scotch Dict.

LORIMERS [Fr. Lormiers, from Lat. lorum.] One of the companies of London, that make bits for bridles, spurs, and such like small iron ware, mentioned in st. 1 Rich. 2. c. 12.

LOSINGA. A flatterer, or sycophant. Brompt. Chron. p. 991.

LOT. A contribution or duty. See Scot.

LOT, or LOTH. The thirteenth dish of lead in the mines of Derbyshire, which belongs to the King. Escheat, anno 16 Edw. 1. See Copy.

LOTHERWITE, or LEYERWIT. A liberty or privilege to make amends of him that defileth a bond-woman without licence. Rastall's Exposition of Words; so that it is an amends for lying with a bond-woman. Cowell. See Leinwite.

LOTTERIES. The 4 Geo. 4. c. 60. was the last act authorizing a public lottery, since which time they have been discontinued. These state lotteries were publicly drawn, by commissioners appointed, according to schemes, which varied almost every year.

It was long a disputed point among politicians whether the benefits of a lottery arising from a large sum voluntarily subscribed to the exigencies of the government, were not more than counterbalanced by the evils through this means introduced, by private lotteries, and by the more pernicious mode of gambling by insurance of numbers. Repeated attempts were made to repress this fatal mischief, and the measure of treating the persons taking money for insurance as rogues and vagabonds, seems to have been attended with the most success.

The following is a short summary of the acts in force on this subject. See titles Advertisements, Gaming.

Statutes 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 17. declares ALL lotteries public nuisances; and all patents for lotteries void, and against law (the state lotteries were all managed under annual acts of parliament passed for each;) imposes a penalty of 500*l.* on every proprietor of a private lottery, and 20*l.* on each adventurer. And see stat. 42 Geo. 3. c. 119.

9 Ann. c. 6. commands justices of peace to assist in suppressing private lotteries.

10 Ann. c. 26. imposes the like penalty of 500*l.* on persons keeping offices for illegal insurances on marriages, &c. under various pretences.

5 Geo. 1. c. 9. puts the sale of Chances on the footing of private lotteries, and imposes a penalty of 100*l.* (above all other penalties,) recoverable by the persons possessed of the ticket, the chance of which was sold; and the offender may also be committed to the county gaol for a year.

8 Geo. 1. c. 2. imposes a penalty of 500*l.* on persons keeping offices for the disposal of houses, lands, advowsons, &c. in lottery; and adventurers to forfeit double the sum contributed.

This statute and those of 10 & 11 W. 3. and 9 Ann. shortly mentioned, are explained and rendered more effectual by 13 Geo. 2. c. 28. which imposes 10*l.* penalty on justices neglecting their duty under those acts; and prohibits the games of ace of hearts, pharaoh, basset, and hazard, as lotteries, and imposes 50*l.* penalty on the players; and see 13 Geo. 3. c. 12. as to the game of passage, and other games with dice.

9 Geo. 1. c. 19. and 6 Geo. 2. c. 35. impose a penalty on 200*l.* and a year's imprisonment on persons selling tickets in or publishing schemes of any foreign lottery. Ireland is excepted under 22 Geo. 3. c. 47. and 29 Geo. 2. c. 7. provided that offences against the English acts against private lotteries, though committed in Ireland, shall be liable to all the penalties imposed, as if they were committed in England.

The statutes 22 Geo. 3. c. 47., 27 Geo. 3. c. 1., and many subsequent acts, as to lottery-office keepers and the sale of tickets, are rendered invalid by the discontinuance of public state lotteries. As to the taking in payment of outstanding lottery tickets since the discontinuance of lotteries, see 2 Will. 4. c. 2.

An act of the 1 & 2 W. 4., for the improvement of Glasgow, was inadvertently passed by the legislature, which authorized money to be raised by way of lottery. All future lotteries under that statute have, however, been prohibited by the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 37. See further tit. Gaming.

LOVE. Provoking unlawful love was one species of the crime of witchcraft, punishable by 1 Jac. 1. c. 12. now repealed.

LOURCURDUS. A ram or bell-wether. Cowell.

LOWBELLERS. Such persons as go out in the night-time with a light and a bell, by the sight and noise whereof birds sitting upon the ground become stupified, and so are covered and taken with a net; the word is derived from the Saxon low, which signifies a flame of fire. Antiq. Warwick, p. 4.

LOWBOTE. A recompence for the death of a man killed in a tumult, or, as we say, by the mob. Cowell.

LUCRATIVE SUCCESSION of an heir to his ancestor; that succession which the heir receives by law without paying any value; and which renders him liable to the debts of his ancestor. Scotch Dict. See titles Descent, Heir, Limitation.

LUDI DE REGE ET REGINA. Playing at cards, so called, because there are kings and queens in the pack. Cowell.

LUMINARE. A lamp or candle, set burning on the altar of any church or chapel; for the maintenance whereof lands and rent-charges were frequently given to parish churches, &c. Kennet's Gloss.

LUNATICS. See title Idiots and Lunatics.

LUNDA. A weight or measure formerly used here.—Lunda angustiarum constat de 10 sticis. Flota, lib. 2. cap. 12.

LUNDRESS. A sterling silver penny, which has its name from being coined only at London, and not at the country mints. Lownd's Essay on Coin, p. 17.

LUPANATRIX. A bawd or strumpet; and by the custom of London a constable may enter a house, and arrest a common strumpet and carry her to prison. 3 Inst. 206, &c. Claus. 4 Ed. 1. p. 1. m. 16.

LUPINUM CAPUT GERERE. Signified to be outlawed and have one's head exposed like a wolf's, with a reward to him that should bring it in. Plac. Coron. 4 John. Rot. 2. See Outlawry.

LUPLICETUM [Lat.] A hop-garden, or place where hops grow. 1 Inst. 4.

LURGULARY. The casting any corrupt or poisonous thing in the water was styled lowrgulary, and felony. Stat. pro Sartis London, anno 1573.

LUSHBURGHIS or LUXENBURGHIS. A base sort of foreign coin, made of the likeness of English money, and brought into England in the reign of King Edward III. to deceive the king and his people; on account of which it was made treason for any one wittingly to bring any such money into the realm, knowing it to be false. 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 2, 3 Inst. 1.

LUSTRINGS. A company was incorporated for making, dressing, and lustrating alamoses and lustrings in England, who were to have the sole benefit thereof confirmed by the following statute; by which no foreign silks known by the name of lustrings or alamoses are to be imported, but at the port of London, &c. 9 & 10 W. 3. c. 48. See titles Navigation Acts, Silk.

LUXURY. There were formerly various laws to restrain excess in apparel, all repealed by 1 Jac. 1. c. 25. But as to excess in diet there still remains one ancient statute unrepealed, viz. 10 Edw. 3. st. 3. which ordains that no man shall be served at dinner, or supper, with more than two courses, except upon some great holidays there specified, in which he may be served with three. 4 Comm. 170, 171.

LYEF-YELD (i. e. GELD.) LEF-SILVER. A small fine or pecuniary composition, paid by the customary tenant to the lord, for leave to plow or sow, &c. Somn. of Gavelkind.

LYING-IN HOSPITALS. See Hospitals.

LYNDEWODE. Was a doctor both of the civil and canon laws, and dean of the arches. He was ambassador for Hen. V. into Portugal, anno 1422, as appeareth by the preface to his Commentary upon the provincials. Cowell.

LYNN. An act for regulating worsted weavers and their apprentices in the town of Lynn, &c. See 14 & 15 H. 8. c. 3.

LYON, KING OF ARMS. This officer takes his title from the armorial bearing of the Scotch King, the lion rampant. By Scotch acts 1592, c. 127, 1672, c. 21. he is empowered to inspect the arms, &c. of noblemen and gentlemen, and to grant arms, &c. Scotch Dict. See title Herald.

M.

M Was the letter with which persons convicted of manslaughter were formerly marked on the brawn of the left thumb. This punishment has recently been abrogated.

MACE-GRIEFÉ, or MACE-GREFES [Machecariu,] such as willingly buy and sell stolen flesh, knowing the same to be stolen. Britton, c. 28; Crompton's Justice of Peace, fol. 193. Vide Leges Innoce, c. 20.

MACE-CARIA, MACHEKUNA [Macella.] The flesh-market or shambles. Cowell.

MACER. Mace-bearer; an officer attending the Court of Session.

MACHECARIUS. A butcher. Cowell. Leg. Ed. Reg. c. 39. Stat. Wall. 12 E. 1.

MACHECOLLARE or MACHECOULARE, from the Fr. [Mashecoulis.] To make a warlike device, especially over the gate of a castle, resembling a gate, through which scalding water or offensive things may be thrown on pioneers or assailants. 1 Inst. 5 a.

MACHINERY. By the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 72. the remedy against the hundred given by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 31. in the cases therein mentioned, was extended to threshing machines damaged or destroyed by riotous or tumultuous assemblies. See tit. Hundred.

By the last act for the general regulation of the customs (3 & 4 W. 4. c. 52. § 104.) any machines, utensils, blocks, tools, &c. used in the calico, woollen, cotton, linen, or silk manufactures of this kingdom, are, together with a variety of other kinds of machinery and tools, prohibited to be exported, under the penalty of forfeiture.

For the wilful destruction of machinery, see titles Frames, Malicious Injuries.

MACIO, a mason. Cowell.

MACKAREL, may be sold on Sunday, 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 24. § 29.

MADDER, to be imported unmixed. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 30; repealed 15 Car. 2. c. 16. § 3. Tithes of madder settled, 31 Geo. 2. c. 12; 5 Geo. 3. c. 18. See title Tithes. See further titles Gardens, Malicious Injuries.

MADNING MONEY. Old Roman coins, sometimes found about Dunstable, are so called by the country people; they seem to retain this name from Magintum, used by the Emperor Antoninus, in his Itinerary, for Dunstable. Camden.

MADRIGALS. An old word, signifying country songs. Cowell

MAEREMIUM [Meresne, from Fr.] Properly signifies any sort of timber, fit for building; seu quodvis materiamentum. Carta de Foresta; stat. Claus. 16 Ed. 2. m. 3.

MAGAZINES. See Gunpowder, Malicious Injuries.

MAGBOTE or MÆGBOTE, from the Sax. [Mag. i. e. Cognatus et bote, compensatio.] A compensation for the slaying or murder of one's kinsman, in ancient times, when corporal punishments for murder, &c. were sometimes commuted into pecuniary fines, if the friends and relations of the party killed were so satisfied. Leg. Canuti, c. 2.

MAGIC [Magia, Necromantia.] Witchcraft and sorcery. See Conjuration.

MAGISTER. This title, often found in old writings, signified that the person to whom attributed had attained some degree of eminency in scientiâ aliquâ, præsertim literariâ; and formerly those who are now called doctors were termed magistri.

MAGISTRATE [magistratus.] A ruler; and he is said to be custos utriusque tabulæ; the keeper or preserver of both tables of the law. If any magistrate, or minister of justice, is slain in the execution of his office, or keeping of the peace, it is murder for the contempt and disobedience to the King and his laws. 9 Co.

The most universal public relation by which men are connected together is that of government; namely, as governors and governed; or, in other words, as magistrates and people. Of magistrates some also are supreme, in whom the sovereign power of the state resides; others are subordinate, deriving all their authority from the supreme magistrate, accountable to him for their conduct, and acting in an inferior secondary sphere. In all tyrannical governments the supreme magistracy, or the right of both making and enforcing laws, is vested in one and the same man, or one and the same body of men; and wherever these two powers are united together, there can be no public liberty. The magistrate (or magistracy) may enact tyrannical laws, and execute them in a tyrannical manner: since he is possessed, in quality of dispenser of justice, with all the power which as legislator he thinks proper to give himself. But when the legislative and executive authority are in distinct hands, the former will take care not to entrust the latter with so large a power as may tend to the subversion of its own independence, and therewith of the liberty of the subject. In England, therefore, this supreme power is divided into two branches; the one legislative, to wit, the parliament, consisting of King, Lords, and Commons; the other executive, consisting of the King alone.

His Majesty's great officers of state, the lord treasurer, lord chamberlain, and principal secretaries, or the like, are not in the capacity of subordinate magistrates, in any considerable degree the object of our laws; nor have they any very important share of magistracy conferred upon them; except that the secretaries of state are allowed the power of commitment in order to bring offenders to trial. 1 Leon. 70; 2 Leon. 175 Comb. 143; 5 Mod. 84; Salk. 347; Carth. 291. See titles Arrest, Commitment. As to the office and authority of the lord chancellor and the other judges of the superior courts of justice, see under those titles. The rights and dignities of mayors and aldermen, or other magistrates of particular corporations, are more private and strictly municipal rights, depending entirely upon the domestic constitution of their respective franchises. The magistrates and officers whose rights and duties are most generally in use, and have a jurisdiction and authority dispersedly throughout the kingdom, are principal sheriffs, coroners, justices of the peace, constables, surveyors of the highways, and overseers of the poor.

The negligence of public officers entrusted with the administration of justice makes the offender liable to be fined, and in very notorious cases will amount to a forfeiture of the office.

if it be a beneficial one. 4 Comm. 140. See further titles Constable, Justices, King, Office, Parliament, &c.

MAGNA ASSISA ELIGENDA. A writ directed to the sheriff, to summon four lawful knights before the justices of assize, there upon their oaths to choose twelve knights of the vicinage, &c. to pass upon the great assize, between A. B. plaintiff, and C. D. defendant, &c. Reg. Orig. 8. See titles Assise, Jury.

MAGNA CARTA.

The GREAT CHARTER OF LIBERTIES granted in the ninth year of King Henry III.—It is so called, either for the excellency of the laws therein contained, or because there was another charter called the Charter of the Forest, established with it, which was the less of the two; or in regard of the great troubles in obtaining it, and the remarkable solemnity in denouncing excommunication and anathemas against the breakers thereof. Spehman calls it Anglistimum Anglicarum Libertatum Diploma, & Sacra Anchora.

Edward the Confessor granted to the church and state several privileges and liberties by charter; and some were granted by the charter of King Hen. I. Afterwards Stephen and Hen. II. confirmed the charter of Henry I., and Rich. I. took an oath at his coronation to observe all just laws, which was an implicit confirmation of former charters. King John took the like oath. This king, likewise, after a difference between him and the pope, and being imbroiled in wars at home and abroad, granted the charter first specifically known by the name of Magna Carta de Libertatibus; bearing date at Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines, on 15th June, in the 17th year of his reign, being A. D. 1215; but soon after broke it, and thereupon the barons took up arms against him, and his reign ended in wars. To him succeeded Hen. III. who in the ninth year of his reign granted the Magna Carta now given in our statute books. This he confirmed by a charter granted in the 21st year of his reign. In the 37th year of his reign, after several breaches, and repeated confirmations of this charter, King Henry III. came to Westminster Hall, where, in the presence of the nobility and bishops, with lighted candles in their hands, Magna Carta was read; the king all that while laying his hand on his breast, and at last solemnly swearing faithfully and inviolably to preserve all things therein contained, as he was a man, a christian, a soldier, and a king. Then the bishops extinguished the candles, and threw them on the ground; and every one said, "Thus let him be extinguished and stink in hell, who violates this charter." Upon which the bells were set on ringing, and all persons by their rejoicing approved of what was done.

But notwithstanding this very solemn confirmation of this charter, the very next year King Henry invaded the rights of his people, till the barons levied war against him; and after various success, he confirmed this charter, and the Charter of the Forest, in the parliament of Marlbridge, and in the 2d year of his reign. The Charter of the Forest had been first granted in the 2d year, and more fully in the 9th year of King Henry III. His son, Edward I. confirmed both these charters in the 25th year of his reign, made an explanation of the liberties therein granted to the people, and added some which are new, called Articuli super Cartas. See the statute book in the 25th and 29th of Edward I. and the collection of charters prefixed to the first volume of the Statutes of the Realm, published under the authority of his Majesty's commissioners of the records. Magna Carta was confirmed more than thirty times afterwards. Co. Lit. 81.

This excellent charter, or body of law, at that time so beneficial to the subject, and of such great equity, is the most ancient written law of the land. It is divided into thirty-eight chapters; the 1st of which, after the solemn preamble of its being made for the honour of God, the exaltation of the Holy Church, and amendment of the kingdom, &c. ordains,

That the church of England shall be free, and all ecclesiastical persons enjoy their rights and privileges. The 2d is of nobility, knights-service, reliefs, &c. The 3d concerns heirs, and their being in ward. The 4th directs guardians for heirs within age, who are not to commit waste. The 5th relates to the custody of lands, &c. of heirs, and delivery of them up when the heirs are of age. The 6th is concerning the marriage of heirs. The 7th appoints dower to women, after the death of their husbands, a third part of the lands, &c. The 8th relates to sheriffs and their bailiffs, and requires that they shall not seize lands for debts where there are goods, &c., the surety not to be distrained where the principal is sufficient. The 9th grants to London, and all cities and towns, their ancient liberties. The 10th orders, that no distress shall be taken for more rent than is due, &c. By the 11th the court of Common Pleas is to be held in a certain place. The 12th gives assizes for remedy, on distress of lands, &c. The 13th relates to assizes of darrein presentment, brought by ecclesiastics. The 14th enacts, that no freeman shall be amerced for a fault, but in proportion to the offence; and by the oaths of lawful men. The 15th, no town shall be distrained to make bridges, &c. but such as of ancient times have been accustomed. The 16th is for repairing of sea-banks and sewers. The 17th prohibits sheriffs, coroners, &c. from holding pleas of the crown. The 18th enacts, that the king's debtor dying, the king shall be the first paid his debt, &c. The 19th directs the manner of levying purveyance for the king's house. The 20th concerns castleward, where a knight was to be distrained for money for keeping his cattle, on his neglect. The 21st forbids sheriffs, bailiffs, &c. to take the horses or carts of any person to make carriage without paying for it. By the 22d the king is to have lands of felons a year and a day, and afterwards the lord of a fee. The 23d requires weirs to be put down on rivers. The 24th directs the writ præcipe in capite for lords against tenants offering wrong, &c. The 25th declares that there shall be but one measure throughout the land. The 26th, inquisition of life and member, to be granted freely. The 27th relates to knight's service, petit serjeanty, and other ancient tenures; (taken away, together with wardship, &c. by stat. 12 Car. 2. c. 24. See title Tenures.) The 28th directs, that no man shall be put to his law on the bare suggestion of another, but by lawful witnesses. The 29th, no freeman shall be disseised of his freehold, imprisoned and condemned, but by judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. The 30th requires that merchant strangers be civilly treated, &c. The 31st relates to tenures coming to the king by escheat. By the 32d no freeman shall sell land, but so that the residue may answer the services. The 33d, patrons of abbeyes, &c. shall have the custody of them in the time of vacation. The 34th, a woman to have an appeal for the death of her husband. The 35th directs the keeping of the county-court monthly, and also the times of holding the sheriff's tourn, and view of frankpledge. The 36th makes it unlawful to give lands to religious house in mortmain. The 37th relates to escuage and subsidy, to be taken as usual. And the 38th ratifies and confirms every article of this great charter of liberties.

The following is Blackstone's summary of this celebrated charter, and its occasion and effect.

In King John's time, and that of his son Henry III. the rigours of the feudal tenures and the forest laws were so warmly kept up, that they occasioned many insurrections of the barons or principal feudatories; which at last had this effect, that at first King John, and afterwards his son, consented to the two famous charters of English liberties, Magna Carta and Carta de Foresta. Of these the latter was well calculated to redress many grievances and encroachments of the crown in the exertion of forest law; and the former confirmed many liberties of the church, and redressed many grievances incident to feudal tenures, of no small moment at the time; though now, unless considered attentively, and with this retrospect, they seem but of trifling concern.

But besides these feudal provisions, care was also taken by Magna Carta to protect the subject against other oppressions, then frequently arising from unreasonable amercements, from illegal distresses, or other process for debts or services due to the crown, and from the tyrannical abuse of the prerogative of purveyance and pre-emption. It fixed the forfeiture of lands for felony, prohibited for the future the grants of exclusive fisheries, and the erection of new bridges so as to oppress the neighbourhood. With respect to private rights, it established the testamentary power of the subject over part of his personal estate, the rest being distributed among his wife and children. It laid down the law of dower, and prohibited the appeals of women, unless for the death of their husbands. In matters of public police and national concern, it enjoined an uniformity of weights and measures; gave new encouragement to commerce, by the protection of merchant strangers, and forbade the alienation of lands in mortmain. With regard to the administration of justice, besides prohibiting all denials or delays of it, it fixed the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, that the suitors might no longer be harassed with following the king's person in all his progresses; and at the same time brought the trial of issues home to the very doors of the freeholders, by directing assizes to be taken in the proper counties, and establishing annual circuits. It also corrected some abuses incidental to the trial by wager of law and of battle; directing the regular awarding of inquests, for life or member; prohibiting the king's inferior ministers from holding pleas of the crown, or trial of any criminal charge, whereby many forfeitures might otherwise have unjustly accrued to the exchequer; and regulated the time and place of holding the inferior tribunals of justice, the county court, sheriff's tourn and court-leet. It confirmed and established the liberties of the city of London, and all other cities, boroughs, towns, and ports of the kingdom. And lastly, (by which alone it would have merited the title that it bears, of the great charter;) it protected every individual of the nation in the free enjoyment of his life, his liberty, and his property, unless declared to be forfeited by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. 4 Comm. c. 33. p. 423, 4.

The following are the words of the often quoted 29th chapter of Magna Carta, 9 Hen. III. relating to the personal liberty of Englishmen.

"Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disreisiatur de libero tenemento suo vel libertatibus vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagetur, aut exiliatur, aut aliquo modo destruat, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terræ.—Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel justitiam." See further, title Liberty.

MAGNA PRECARIA. A great or general reap-day. And in 21 R. 2. the lord of the manor of Harrow on the Hill, in com. Middlesex, had a custom that by summons of his bailiff on a general reap-day, then called Magna precaria, the tenant should do a certain number of days' work for him; every tenant that had a chimney being obliged to send a man. Phil. Purvey. p. 145.

MAGNA CENTUM. The great hundred, or six score. Chart. 20 H. 2.

MAGNUS PORTUS. The town and port of Portsmouth.

MAIHEMATUS. Maimed or wounded.

MAHOMERIA. The temple of Mahomet; and because the gestures, noise, and songs there, were ridiculous to the christians, therefore they called antic dancing, and any thing of ridicule, a momerie. Mat. Paris.

MAIDS. See title Abduction, Guardian, Marriage, Rape.

MAIDEN ASSISES. Is when at any assizes no person is condemned to die.

MAIDEN RENTS. A noble paid by every tenant in the manor of Buiith, in com. Radnor, at their marriage; anciently given to the lord for his omitting the custom of mar-cheta. (See title Marchet.) More probably a fine for a licence to marry a daughter.

MAIGNAGIUM, [Fr. maignen. i. e. faber ætarius.] A brazier's shop; though some say it signifies a house. Lib. Rames. § 265.

MAIHEM, or MAYHEM, [maiheimium, from the Fr. mehaigne, i. e. membri mutilationem.] A maim, wound, or corporeal hurt, by which a man loseth the use of any member, proper for his defence in fight. As if a man's skull be broke, or any bone broken in any other part of the body; a foot, hand, finger, or joint of a foot, or any member be cut off; if by any wound the sinews be made to shrink; or where any one is castrated; or if any eye be put out, or any fore tooth broke, &c. But the cutting off an ear or nose, the breaking of the hinder teeth, and such like, was held no maihem by the common law; as they were not a weakening of a person's strength, but a disfiguring and deformity of the body. Glanv. lib. 4. c. 7; Bract. lib. 3. tract. 2; Britton, c. 25. S. P. C. lib. 1. c. 41.

Maihem is accurately thus defined; the violently depriving another of the use of such of his members as may render him the less able in fighting, either to defend himself, or to annoy his adversary. Brit. lib. 1. c. 25; 1 Hank. P. C. c. 44.

By the ancient law of England, he that maimed any man, whereby he lost any part of his body, was sentenced to lose the like part, membrum pro membro. 3 Inst. 118; Brit. c. 25. But this went afterwards out of use; partly because the law of retaliation is at best but an inadequate rule of punishment, and partly because on a repetition of the offence, the punishment could not be repeated; so that by the common law, as it for a long time stood, maihem was only punishable by fine and imprisonment. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 44. § 3. Unless perhaps the offence of maihem by castration, which all old writers held to be felony; and this, although the maihem was committed on the highest provocation, such as the party maimed being caught in adultery with the wife of the offender. See Bract. fo. 144; 3 Inst. 62; S. P. C. 32; H. P. C. 193.

But subsequent statutes put the crime and punishment of maihem more out of doubt. The stat. 37 H. 8. c. 6. directed that if a man should maliciously and unlawfully cut off the ear of any of the king's subjects, he should not only forfeit treble damages to the party grieved, to be recovered by action of trespass at common law, as a civil satisfaction, but also £10 by way of fine to the king, which was his criminal amercement. But by far the most severe and effectual of these statutes was 22 & 23 C. 2. c. 1. called the Coventry Act; being occasioned by an assault on Sir John Coventry in the street, and slitting his nose, in revenge (as was supposed) for some obnoxious words uttered by him in parliament. By this statute it was enacted, that if any person should, of malice aforethought, and by lying in wait, unlawfully cut out or disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, cut off a nose or lip, or cut off or disable any limb or member of any other person with intent to maim or disfigure him, such person, his counsellors, aiders, and abettors, should be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy; though no attainder of such felony should corrupt the blood, or forfeit the dower of the wife, or lands or goods of the offender.

The above acts, as well as the subsequent one of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 58. commonly called Lord Ellenborough's Act, were repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. and the 9 Geo. 4. c. 81.

By the 11th section of the latter statute it is enacted, that if any person shall unlawfully and maliciously shoot at any person, or by drawing a trigger, or in any other manner attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person, or unlawfully and maliciously stab, cut, or wound any person with intent, in any such case, to murder such person, the offender, and every person counselling, aiding and abetting therein, shall suffer death as a felon. By § 12. the like acts are punishable also with death if committed with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or to do some grievous bodily harm, or to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension and detaining of the party offending, or any accomplice, for any offence for which they are liable to be apprehended or detained. But it is provided, that if it shall appear on the trial, that the offence was committed under such circumstances that if death had ensued, it would not in law have amounted to murder, the person indicted shall be acquitted of felony.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 53. § 59. maliciously shooting at, maiming, or dangerously wounding any officer of the army, navy, or marines, employed for the prevention of smuggling, and on full pay, or any officer of customs or excise, or any person acting in his aid, is a capital offence in the party offending, and every one aiding, abetting, or assisting therein.

There is a distinction between the provisions of the 22 Car. 2. c. 1. and the 9 Geo. 4. c. 1. The former required a lying in wait of the offender to render the crime complete, and therefore did not apply to a sudden attack. 1 Hawk. c. 55. s. 12; 1 Leach, 187; 1 East, P. C. 308, 399. It is also to be remarked, that the 13 Geo. 3. c. 58. did not extend to the wounding with a blunt instrument, the words being merely stab or cut. See R. & R. 404; 1 Russ. 597. But the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. extends to a wounding with whatever instrument inflicted, provided the offence is properly charged in the indictment. Where an actual cutting is inflicted by an instrument, it will support a charge of cutting in the indictment, whether the instrument is intended for cutting or not, or is ordinarily used for some other purpose. R. & R. 78. Where a man struck a woman in the face with the claw of a hammer and it cut her, it was holden to be a cutting within the statute. R. & R. 104. To be a wound within the statute, the continuity of the skin must be broken. Moo. C. C. 278. But if the skin be broken, the nature of the instrument with which the injury is inflicted is immaterial. Thus, a wound from a kick is within the statute. Moo. C. C. 318; 4 C. & P. 558.

With respect to the intents mentioned in the statute, we have noticed what amounts to a maiming. To disfigure is to do a man some external injury, which detracts from his personal appearance; to disable is to do something creating a permanent disability, and not a mere temporary injury. See R. & R. 24. It is not requisite that a grievous bodily harm, within the meaning of the statute, should be either permanent or dangerous. R. & R. 362.

Maihem may be punished by indictment, or a remedial action of trespass vi et armis may be brought to recover damages for the injury.

Upon an appeal of maihem, (which formerly might have been brought by the party injured, but which proceeding in this as well as in all other cases of felony is abolished by the 59 Geo. 3. c. 46.) the issue joined was, whether it was maihem or no maihem, and this was to be decided by the court upon inspection; for which purpose they might call in the assistance of surgeons. 2 Ro. Abr. 578. And by analogy to this it is, that now, in an action of trespass for maihem, the court (upon view of such maihem as the plaintiff has laid in his declaration, or which is certified by the judges who tried the cause, to be the same as was given in evidence to the jury,) may increase the damages at their own discretion. 1 Sid. 108. As may also be the case upon view of an atrocious battery. Hard. 408; see 1 Wils. 5; 1 Barnes, 106.

A person who maims himself, that he may have the more colour to beg, may be indicted and fined. 1 Inst. 127. And by the like reason, a person who disables himself that he may not be impressed for a soldier. Burn's Justice.

As to the maiming of cattle, see Malicious Injuries.

MAIL INDUCTIO. An ancient custom for the priest and people of country villages to go in procession to some adjoining wood on a May-day morning, and return with a May-pole, boughs, flowers, garlands, and other tokens of the spring. This May-game, or the rejoicing at the coming of the spring, was for a long time observed, and still is in some parts of England, but it was condemned and prohibited in the diocese of Lincoln, by bishop Groshead.

MAIL, [macula.] A coat of mail, so called from the Fr. maille, which signifies a square figure, or the hole of a net; so maille de haubergeons was a coat of mail, because the links or joints in it resemble the squares of a net. Mail is likewise used for the leathern bag wherein letters are carried by the post, from bulga, a budget.

MAILE. Anciently a kind of money; and silver halfpence were termed mailes. 9 Hen. 5. By indenture in the Mint, a pound weight of old sterling silver was to be coined into three hundred and sixty sterlings or pennies, or seven hundred and twenty mailes or half-pennies, or one thousand four hundred and forty farthings. Lownd's Ess. on Coin, 38. See Black-mail.

MAILLS and DUTIES. In Scotch law, the rents of an estate, whether in money or victual; an action for the rents of an estate is therefore termed an action of mailles and duties. By act 1669. c. 9. a tenant is not liable to arrears of rent after five years from the time of his removing from the lands.

MAIMING. See Maihem.

MAINAD. A false oath, or perjury. Leg. Incæ, c. 34.

MAINE-PORT, [In mana portatum.] A small tribute, commonly of loaves of bread, which in some places the parishioners pay to the rector of their church, in recompence for certain tithes. Cowell.

This mainport bread was paid to the vicar of Blyth. See Antiq. of Nottinghamshire, p. 473.

MAINOVRE, or Mainœuvre, [from the Fr. main, i. e. manus, and œuvrer, operari.] Handy-work; some trespass committed by a man's hand. See 7 Rich. 2. c. 4.; Brit. 62: and the succeeding article.

MAINOUR, or MANOUR, or MEINOUR; [from the Fr. manier, i. e. manu tractare.] In a legal sense denotes the thing taken away, found in the hand of the thief who taketh away, or stealth. This is to be taken with the mainour, Pl. Cor. fol. 179, is to be taken with the thing stolen about him; and again, fol. 194, it was presented, that a thief was delivered to the sheriff or viscount, together with the mainour; and again, fol. 186, if a man be indicted, that he feloniously stole the goods of another, where, in truth, they are his own goods, and the goods be brought into the court as the mainour, and it be demanded of him what he saith to the goods, and he disclaim them; though he be acquitted of the felony, he shall lose the goods. Cowell.

Thus the court of attachments in the forest may attach all offenders against vert and venison, by their bodies, if taken with the mainour, that is, in the very act of killing venison, or stealing wood, or preparing so to do, or by fresh and immediate pursuit after the act is done, else they must be attached by their goods. Carth. 79; 4 Inst. 289.

One mode of prosecution, by the common law, without any previous finding by a jury, was, when a thief was taken with the mainour, that is, with the thing stolen upon him, in manu; for he might, when so detected, flagrante delicto, be brought into court, arraigned and tried without indictment. But this proceeding was taken away by several statutes in the reign of Edward III., though in Scotland a similar process remains to this day. See 2 Hal. P. C. 149; 4 Comm. c. 23, p. 307: and tit. Court-leet.

MAINPERNABLE. That may let to bail. See (the repealed) stat. West. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 15.; and Bail, Mainprize.

MAINPERNORS, [manuceptores.] Are those persons to whom a man is delivered out of custody or prison, on their becoming bound for his appearing, &c. which, if he do not do, they shall forfeit their recognizances; and they are called manu captores, because they do as it were manu capere et ducere captivum à custodiâ vel prisonâ.

MAINPRISE, [manu captio, from the Fr. main, i. e. manus et pris, captus.] The taking or receiving of a person into friendly custody, who otherwise might be committed to prison, upon security given that he shall be forthcoming at a time and place assigned. Thus to let one to mainprise is to commit him to those that undertake he shall appear at the day appointed. Old Nat. Br. 42; F. N. B. 249.

Manwood makes this difference between mainprise and bail: He that is mainprised is said to be at large, after the day he is set to mainprise, until the day of his appearance; but where a man is let to bail by any judge, &c. until a certain day, there he is always accounted by the law to be in their ward of time; and they may, if they will, keep him in prison, so that he that is so bailed shall not be said to be at large, or at his own liberty. Manwood, p. 167.

A man under mainprise is supposed to go at large, under no possibility of being confined by his sureties or mainperners, as in case of bail. 4 Inst. 179. Mainprise is an undertaking in a certain sum; bail answers the condemnation in civil cases, and in criminal, body for body. Sed qu. If this, as to body for body, is now law? If it is, it is never put in force.

Mainprise may be where one is never arrested, or in prison; but no man is bailed but he that is under arrest, or in prison; so that mainprise is more large than bail. H. P. C. 96; Wood's Inst. 582, 618. Upon a capias or exigent awarded against a man, he shall find mainprise for his appearance; and if the defendant make default, his manucaptors are to be amerced, &c. And a bill of mainprise, acknowledged and put into court, is good, though it be not inrolled. Jenk. Cent. 129.

There is an ancient writ of mainprise, whereby those who are bailable, and have been refused the benefit of it, may be delivered out of prison. Reg. Orig. 269; F. N. B. 250.

The writ of mainprise, manu captio, is a writ directed to the sheriff, (either generally when any man is imprisoned for a bailable offence, and a bail hath been refused, or especially when the offence or course of punishment is not properly bailable below,) commanding him to take sureties for the prisoner's appearance, usually called mainperners, and to set him at large. F. N. B. 250; 1 Hal. P. C. 141; Co. Bail & M. c. 10; and see 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 15, § 30.

Mainperners differ from bail, in that a man's bail may imprison or surrender him up before the stipulated day of appearance; mainperners can do neither, but are barely sureties for his appearance at the day. Bail are only sureties that the party be answerable for the special matter for which they stipulate; mainperners are bound to produce him to answer all charges whatsoever. 3 Comm. c. 8, p. 128. cites Co. Bail & M. c. 3; 4 Inst. 179.

Of the writ of mainprise little notice is taken in the late books; yet the law relating to it seems to be still in force in many cases; and consequently in such cases those who are bailable, and have been refused the benefit of the bail, may still, by virtue thereof, be delivered out of prison; (upon their finding sureties to the sheriff that they will appear and answer to the crimes alleged against them, before the justices, in the writ mentioned, &c.) as those who are imprisoned for a slight suspicion of felony, or indicted of larceny before the steward of a leet, or of trespass before justices of peace, and many other persons. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 15, § 29.

The 3 Edm. 1. c. 15. directed what prisoners should be mainpernable by the sheriffs, and which not. That statute, together with several subsequent acts, was repealed by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. § 32. which empowers justices in certain cases to admit parties charged with felony or suspicion of felony to bail. See Bail, II.

MAINSWORN. See Male-sworn.

MAINTAINORS. Are those that maintain or second a cause depending between others, by disbursing money, or making friends, for either party, &c. not being interested in the suit, or attorneys employed therein. 19 Hen. 7. c. 14. See Maintenance.

MAINTENANCE, [manutenentia.] The unlawful taking in hand, or upholding of a cause or person; metaphorically drawn from the succouring of a young child that learns to go by one's hand; and in law is taken in the worst sense. See 32 Hen. 8. c. 9. Also it is used for the buying or obtaining of pretended rights to lands. Stat. Ibid.

Maintenance is an offence that bears a near relation to barratry; being an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party with money, or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it; a practice that was greatly encouraged by the first introduction of uses. 4 Comm. c. 10, p. 184.

Maintenance is either ruralis, in the country; as where one assists another in his pretensions to lands, by taking or holding the possession of them for him; or where one stirs up quarrels or suits in the country; or it is curialis, in a court of justice; where one officiously intermeddles in a suit depending in any court, which no way belongs to him, and he had nothing to do with, by assisting the plaintiff or defendant with money or otherwise, in the prosecution or defence of any such suit. Co. Lit. 368; 2 Inst. 213; 2 Rot. Abr. 115. And he who fears that another will maintain his adversary, may, by way of prevention, have an original writ grounded on the statutes prohibiting him so to do. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, § 42; Reg. Orig. 182.

Who are guilty of Maintenance.—Not only he who lends out his money to assist another in his cause, but he that by his friendship or interest saves him that expense which he might otherwise be put to, is guilty of maintenance. Bro. Mainten. 7, 14, 17, &c. And if any person officiously gives evidence, or open the evidence without being called upon to do it; speak in the cause, as if of counsel with the party, retain an attorney for him, &c. or shall give any public countenance to another in relation to the suit; as, where one of great power and interest says that he will spend twenty pounds on one side, &c. or such a person comes to the bar with one of the parties, and stands by him while his cause is tried, to intimidate the jury; if a juror solicits a judge to give judgment according to the verdict, after which he hath nothing more to do, &c.; these are acts of maintenance. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83.

It is said that if a man of great power, not learned in the law, tells another who asks his advice, that he hath a good title, it is maintenance. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, § 9. In case any person who is no lawyer, and that hath no interest in the cause, shall take upon him to do the part of a lawyer, this will be unlawful maintenance. And after a suit is begun, no man may encourage either of the parties, or yield them any aid or help, by money or the like, but he hath an interest therein. 22 Hen. 6. c. 6; 19 Edm. 4. c. 3; 2 Shep. Abr. 406.

But counsel may speak as amicus curiæ. A man cannot be guilty of maintenance, in respect of any money given by him to another, before any suit is actually commenced; nor is it such to give another advice, as to what action is proper to be brought, what method to be taken, or what counsellor or attorney to be employed; or for one neighbour to go with another to his counsel, so as he do not give him any money and money may be lawfully given to a poor man, out of charity, to carry on his suit, and be no maintenance. Attorneys may lay out their money for their clients, to be repaid afterwards, but not at their own expense, on condition of no purchase or no pay, if they carry the cause or lose it. Fitz. Mainten. 18. 3 Rot. Abr. 118; 2 Inst. 564.

Whether an attorney's laying out money for his client be maintenance, see Freem. 71, 81.

If a person hath any interest in the thing in dispute, though in contingency only, he may lawfully maintain it.

action relating to it; as if tenant in tail, or for life, be impleaded, he in reversion or remainder, &c. may maintain the defence of the suit with his own money; and a lessor may lawfully maintain his lessee. 2 Rol. Abr. 115. A lord may justly maintain a tenant, in defence of his title; and the tenant may maintain his lord: one bound to warrant lands, may lawfully maintain the tenant impleaded, and a man may maintain those who are enfeoffed of lands in trust for him, concerning those lands, &c. An heir apparent, or the husband of such an heir, may maintain the ancestor in an action concerning the inheritance of the land whereof he is seized in fee; a master may maintain his servant, and assist him with money, but not in a real action, unless he hath some of his wages in his hands; and a servant by a reason of relation may maintain his master in all things, except laying out his own money in the master's suit. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83; 1 Inst. 368.

A landlord may sue in the name of his tenant to try a right, and a mortgagee, not a party in a suit, may, without being guilty of maintenance, advance money to support the title, for maintenance is justifiable from the priority of the parties in the estate. Bac. Abr. tit. Maintenance (B.) 3, 7th ed.

And one who has only an equitable interest in lands or goods, as a cestui que trust, or a vendor of lands, or an assignor of a bond for a good consideration, may lawfully maintain another in a suit concerning the thing in which he has such an equity. 4 T. R. 430. So where a defendant, at the request of another person, defended an action for the recovery of a sum of money, in which the latter claimed an interest, upon his undertaking to indemnify the defendant from the consequences of the action: this agreement was held not to amount to maintenance. 6 Bing. 299.

A father, a son, or an heir apparent to the party, or the husband of an heiress apparent, may lawfully lay out money for the party to prosecute his suit: and whoever is of kin to either of the parties, or related by any kind of affinity still continuing, or the godfather of either, may also lawfully stand by him in court and counsel him, and pay another to be of counsel for him, but cannot lawfully lay out his money in the cause. 1 Hawk. c. 83. s. 20.

By stat. Westm. 1. c. 13 and 1 c. 25 none of the king's officers shall maintain pleas or suits in the king's court for land, &c. under covenant to have part thereof or any profit thereon, and clerks of justices are not to take part in quarrels, nor delay right, on pain of treble damages. By 1 Ldr. s. st. c. 14 further enforced by 20 Edw. 3. c. 4, none of the king's ministers, nor no great man of the realm, by himself nor by any other, by sending of letter or otherwise, nor none other person, great or small, shall take upon them to maintain quarrels, to the let and disturbance of the common law. The king's counsellors, officers, or servants, or any of a person whatsoever, shall not sustain quarrels by any letter, upon pain to lose their offices and services, and of imprisonment and ransom. 1 Rich. 2. c. 1. No person, who ever shall unlawfully maintain any suit concerning lands, or recover any person for maintenance, by letters, reference, or promises, under the penalty of 10 l. for every offence, to be divided between the king and prosecutor. 32 Hen. 8. c. 9.

What rights and titles, &c. are within the purview of the statutes relating to maintenance, Cro. Eliz. 549. But maintenance in a court baron is as much within the purview of the 1 Rich. 2. as maintenance in a court of record. A pretended right to copyhold lands sold is within the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 9; 4 Rep. 26. If A. be owner of land in possession, and another who hath no right granteth the land, &c. the grant upon it be void, yet the grantor and grantee are liable to this statute. 1 Inst. 369. So where he hath a pretended right, and none in truth shall get the possession wrongfully, and then sell the land, &c. But a remainder-man in fee may obtain the pretended title of a stranger. 1 Inst. 369; 3 Inst. 76, 77. And a person who hath good right and title, at the time of the bargain or lease, will not be within the above statute, although neither he nor his ancestors have been in possession thereof, &c. for a year before. Plowd. 47; Dyer, 74.

And although the vendor's title rests merely on an agreement for the purchase of the estate, the statute does not apply. Wood v. Griffiths, Sugd. Vend. & Purch. 488, 7th ed.

If a person make a lease to try a title in ejectment, unless it be to a great man, it is out of the statute 1 Inst. 369; Dyer, 374. A lessor having good right to land, but not in possession, made a lease of it, and did not seal it on the land, it was adjudged within the 32 Hen. 8. c. 9. 1 Leon. 166.

The law will not suffer any thing in action, entry, &c. to be granted over; this is to prevent titles being granted to men of substance, to oppress the meaner sort of people. 1 Inst. 214. Where a bond was given for performance of covenants in a lease, and after the covenants being broken, the lessee assigned both the lease and bond to another, and then the assignee put the bond in suit; this was held maintenance; so it would have been if the lessee had assigned the bond and not the lease, and afterwards the covenants were broken, and the bond put in suit. Godb. 81; 2 Nels. Abr. 1142.

How punishable. By the common law, persons guilty of maintenance may be prosecuted by indictment, and be fined and imprisoned; or be compelled to make satisfaction by action, &c. And a court of record may commit a man for an act of maintenance done in the face of the court. Hill. 79; 1 Inst. 368.

Prosecutions for maintenance are now rarely instituted; where more than one person is implicated in this offence, the practice is to indict them for a conspiracy.

See further on this subject, 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83; Vin. Abr. tit. Maintenance; and tit. Champerty, Embracery, &c.

MAJOR. A mayor, doth not come from the Latin major, but from an old English word maier, i. e. potestas. Concill. See Mayor. Major is also applied to a person of full age, as distinguished from a minor.

MAJORITY. Sometimes used to distinguish the state of being at full age; more usually referred to the only method of determining the acts of many, by a majority in numbers. The major part of members of parliament enact laws, and the majority of electors choose members of parliament; the act of the major part of any corporation is accounted the act of the corporation; and where the majority is, there, by the law, is the whole. By 33 Hen. 8. c. 27, all rules made by founders of colleges, &c. whereby the effect of the assent of the majority is hindered by a minority of negative voices, are declared void.

It is a general rule of law, that where a public trust is to be executed by a definite number of persons, it cannot be executed at any meeting where a majority of the whole number is not present, unless there be a custom to the contrary; therefore where a select vestry of twenty-six were appointed, a rate made at a meeting where fourteen were not present, was declared bad. 9 B. & C. 851.

MAISONADA. A family, quasi mansionata.* Meigne; Mon. Angl. 2. 219.

MAISON DE DIEU. A monastery, hospital, or almshouse. All hospitals, maisons de Dieu, and abiding places, for poor, lame, and impotent persons, erected by the 39 Edw. c. 5, or at any time since founded, according to the intent of that statute, shall be incorporated and have perpetual succession, &c. 21 Jac. 1. c. 1. See Corporation, Hospitals.

MAISURA. A house or mansion; a farm; from the French maison. MS. Antiq.

MAJUS JUS. Is a writ or law proceeding in some customary manors, in order to a trial of right of land; and the entry in the old books is thus: Ad hanc curiam venit A. B. in propriis personis suis et dat Domino, &c. ad vidend. Rotul. Curie. Et petit inquirend. utrum ipse habeat Majus jus in uno messuagio, &c. Et super hoc homag. dicunt, &c. Ex libro MS. Episcop. Heref. temp. Edw. 3.

MAKE, facere.] To perform or execute; as to make his law, is to perform that law which he hath formerly bound himself to; that is, to clear himself of an action commenced against him, by his oath, and the oaths of his neighbours. Old Nat. Brev. 161; Kitchen, 192. This ancient law seems to have been borrowed from the Feudists, who call those that came to swear for another in this case Sacramentales. See Hotoman. The formal words used by him that made his law, were commonly these: Hear, O ye justices, that I do not owe this sum of money demanded, neither in all nor any part thereof, in manner and form declared. So help me God, and the contents of this book. Hence, probably, to make oath, is to take oath.

MAKE SERVICES and CUSTOMS. To perform them. Old Nat. Brev. 14.

MALA. A male or port-mail; a bag to carry letters, &c. Old Nat. Brev. 14.

MALA FIDES. Is opposed to bona fides, and applies to the case of a person who possesses a property not his own, and which he knows, or might on reflection know, not to be his own.

MALANDRINUS. A thief or pirate. Walsing. 388.

MALBERGE. Mons placiti. A hill where the people assembled at a court, like our assizes; which by the Scots and Irish are called parley hills. Du Cange.

MALECEDITUS. One of bad credit, who is suspected, and not to be trusted. Fleta, lib. 1. c. 38.

MALEDICTION, maledictio.] A curse which was anciently annexed to donations of lands made to churches and religious houses, against those who should violate their rights. Si quis autem (quod non optamus) hanc nostram donationem infringere temptaverit, perpassus sit gelidis glacierum flatibus et malignorum spirituum; terribiles tormentorum cruciatibus evasisse non quiescat, nisi prius in regius penitentiae gemitibus, et puræ emendatione emendaverit. Chart. Reg. Athelstani Monast. de Wiltune, anno 933. And we read in a charter of William de Warren, Earl of Surrey, Venientibus contra hæc et destruentibus ea, occurrat Deus in gladio iræ et furoris et vindictæ et Maledictionis æternæ: Servantibus autem hæc et defendentibus ea, occurrat Deus in pace, gratiâ et misericordiâ et salute æternâ. Amen, Amen, Amen.

MALESWORN. More accurately perhaps Malsworn; sometimes more corruptly still, Mainsworn. In the North signifies forsworn. Brownl. 4; Hob. 8.

MALETENT. Is interpreted to be a toll for every sack of wool, by statute. Nothing from henceforth shall be taken for sacks of wool, by colour of maletent, &c. 25 Edw. 1. c. 7.

MALFEASANCE, from the French malfaire, i. e. to offend.] Is a doing of evil, or transgressing. 2 Cro. 266.

MALICE. Is a term of law, importing directly wickedness, and excluding a just cause of excuse: thus Lord Coke, in his comment on the words per malitiam says, "if one be appealed of murder, and it is found that he killed the party æ defendendo, this shall not be said to be per malitiam, because he had a just cause." 2 Inst. 384.

Amongst the Romans and in the civil law, malitia appears to have imported a mixture of fraud and of that which is opposite to simplicity and honesty. Cicero speaks of it in his treatise de Nat. Deor. lib. 3. sect. 10.

In its proper or legal sense, this word is different from that sense which it bears in common speech. In common acceptance, it implies a desire of revenge, a settled anger against a particular person; but this is not the legal sense. Holt, Ch. J. in considering Lomicide said, "some men have been led into mistakes by not well considering what the passion of malice is; they have construed it to be a rancour of mind lodged in the person killing, for some considerable time before the commission of the fact, which is a mistake, arising from the not well distinguishing between hatred and malice; envy, hatred, and malice, are three distinct passions of the mind." Kel. 127.

In the stat. 25 H. 8. c. 3. where mention is made of persons standing mute "of malice or froward mind," the word malice, explained by the accompanying words, seems merely to signify a wickedness or frowardness of mind in refusing to submit to the course of justice. Where the question of malice has arisen in cases of homicide, the matter for consideration has been, whether the act was done with or without just cause or excuse, so that it has been suggested (Chapple, J. MSS. Sum.) that what is usually called malice implied, by the law, would perhaps be expressed more intelligibly to the understanding, if it were called malice in a legal sense. See title Homicide, 3. VII.

Previous to the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. it was necessary, under several of the statutes against malicious injuries to property, to prove express malice in the offender towards the owner, which frequently rendered it difficult to convict the party. But that statute applies, whether the offence be committed from malice to the owner of the property or not. See post Malicious Injuries, IX.

MALICIOUS INJURIES TO PROPERTY. By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. all the former statutes relative to the subject, with a few exceptions hereinafter mentioned, were repealed, with a view to a consolidation of the law with respect to offences of this description, under the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. Many of the provisions of this act have already been given under separate titles. See Cattle, Fence, Fish, Gardens, &c.

The following seems the most convenient arrangement of such of the clauses of the act as are intended to be noticed under the present head:

1. Of injuries to buildings.
2. ——— to manufactures and machinery.
3. ——— to mines.
4. ——— to ships.
5. ——— to sea-banks, canals, bridges, turnpike-gates, fisheries, mill-ponds, &c.
6. ——— to stacks of corn, &c. crops, plantations &c.
7. ——— to hopbinds and trees.
8. ——— to any other property.
9. The general provisions of the statute.

1. Of injuries to buildings.

By § 2. maliciously setting fire to any church or chapel or to any chapel for the religious worship of persons dissenting from the united Church of England and Ireland, not registered or recorded, or to any house, stable, coach-house, outhouse, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malthouse, hop-corn-barn, or granary, or to any building or erection used in carrying on any trade or manufacture, or any branch thereof, whether the same or any of them respectively shall then be in the possession of the offender, or in the possession of any other person, with intent thereby to injure or defraud any person, is a capital offence.

By § 8. if any persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force demolish, pull down, or destroy, or begin to demolish, pull down, or destroy, any church, &c. (as in the above section) or any machinery, whether fixed or moveable, prepared for or employed in any manufacture, or in any branch thereof, or any steam engine, or other engine for sinking, draining, or working any mine, or any stait, building, or erection used in conducting the business of any mine, or any bridge, waggon-way, or truck for conveying minerals from any mine, every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted, shall suffer death.

2. Of injuries to manufactures and machinery.

By § 3. if any person shall maliciously cut, break or destroy, or damage with intent to destroy or to render useless any goods or article of silk, woollen, linen, or cotton, or of any one or more of those materials mixed with each other, or mixed with any other material, or any framework-knitted piece, stocking, hose, or lace respectively, being in the loom or frame, or on any machine or engine, or on the rack or tenters, or in any stage, process, or progress of manufacture; or shall unlawfully and maliciously cut, break, or destroy, or damage with intent to destroy or to render useless, any warp or shute of silk, woollen, linen, or cotton, or of any one or more of those materials mixed with each other, or mixed with any other material, or any loom, frame, machine, engine, rack, tackle, or implement, whether fixed or moveable, prepared for or employed in carding, spinning, throwing, weaving, fulling, shearing, or otherwise manufacturing or preparing any such goods or articles; or shall by force enter into any house, shop, building, or place, with intent to commit any of the offences aforesaid, every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted shall be liable to be transported beyond the seas for life, or for any term not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned not exceeding four years; and if a male, to be whipped, in addition to such imprisonment.

By § 4. if any person shall maliciously cut, break, or destroy, or damage with intent to destroy or to render useless, any threshing machine, or any machine or engine, whether fixed or moveable, prepared for or employed in any manufacture whatsoever (except the manufacture of silk, woollen, linen, or cotton goods, or goods of any one or more of those materials mixed with each other, or mixed with any other material, or any framework-knitted piece, stocking, hose, or lace,) every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted shall be liable to be transported beyond the seas for the term of seven years, or to be imprisoned not exceeding two years; and if a male, to be whipped in addition to such imprisonment.

3. Of injuries to mines.

By § 5. maliciously setting fire to any mine of coal or cannel coal, is a capital offence.

By § 6. maliciously causing any water to be conveyed into any mine, or into any subterraneous passage communicating therewith, with intent thereby to destroy or damage such mine, or to hinder or delay the working thereof, or shall, with the like intent, unlawfully and maliciously pull down, fill up, or obstruct any airway, waterway, drain, pit, level, or shaft of or belonging to any mine, is a felony, and subjects the offender to be transported beyond the seas for seven years, or to be imprisoned not exceeding two years; and if a male, to be whipped, in addition to such imprisonment: provided that this provision shall not extend to any damage committed under ground by any owner of any adjoining mine in working the same, or by any person duly employed in such working.

By § 7. maliciously pulling down or destroying, or damaging with intent to destroy or render useless, any steam engine or other engine for sinking, draining, or working any mine, or any stath, building, or erection used in conducting the business of any mine, or any bridge, waggonway, or trunk for conveying minerals from any mine, whether such engine, stath, building, erection, bridge, waggonway or trunk be completed or in an unfinished state, is a felony, liable to any of the punishments last mentioned.

And see § 8, ante, 1.

4. Of injuries to ships.

By § 9. maliciously setting fire to or in anywise destroying any ship or vessel, whether the same be complete or in an unfinished state, or setting fire to, casting away, or in any-wise destroying any ship or vessel, with intent thereby to prejudice any owner or part owner of such ship or vessel, or of any goods on board the same, or any person that hath underwritten or shall underwrite any policy of insurance upon such ship or vessel, or on the freight thereof, or upon any goods on board the same, is a capital felony.

By § 10. maliciously damaging, otherwise than by fire, any ship or vessel, whether complete or in an unfinished state, with intent to destroy the same, or to render the same useless, is also a felony punishable with transportation for seven years, or imprisoned not exceeding two years; and if the offender be a male, with whipping.

By § 11. if any person shall exhibit any false light or signal, with intent to bring any ship or vessel into danger, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do any thing tending to the immediate loss or destruction of any ship or vessel in distress, or destroy any part of any ship or vessel which shall be in distress, or wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, or any goods, merchandize, or articles of any kind belonging to such ship or vessel, or shall by force prevent or impede any person endeavouring to save his life from such ship or vessel (whether he shall be on board or shall have quitted the same,) every such offender shall be guilty of a capital felony.

And see post as to injuries to the king's ships.

5. Of injuries to sea banks, canals, bridges, turnpike gates, fisheries, mill ponds, &c.

By § 12. maliciously breaking down or cutting down any sea bank or sea wall, or the bank or wall of any river, canal, or marsh, whereby any lands shall be overflowed or damaged, or shall be in danger of being so, or throwing down, levelling, or otherwise destroying any lock, sluice, floodgate, or other work on any navigable river or canal, is a felony, subjecting the offender to be transported for life, or for not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned not exceeding four years; and, if a male, to be whipped, in addition to such imprisonment; and maliciously cutting off, drawing up, or removing any piles, chalk, or other materials fixed in the ground, and used for securing any sea bank or sea wall, or the bank or wall of any river, canal, or marsh, or opening or drawing up any floodgate, or doing any other injury or mischief to any navigable river or canal, with intent and so as thereby to obstruct or prevent the carrying on, completing, or maintaining the navigation thereof, is also a felony punishable with seven years transportation, or imprisonment for two years; and if the offender be a male, whipping.

By § 13. maliciously pulling down or in anywise destroying any public bridge, or doing any injury with intent and so as thereby to render such bridge or any part thereof dangerous or impassable, is a felony, subjecting the offender to be transported for life, or for not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding four years; and if a male, to be whipped, in addition to such imprisonment.

By § 14. if any person shall unlawfully and maliciously throw down, level, or otherwise destroy, in whole or in part, any turnpike gate, or any wall, chain, rail, post, bar, or other fence belonging to any turnpike gate, or set up or erected to prevent passengers passing by without paying any toll directed to be paid by any act or acts of parliament relating thereto, or any house, building, or weighing engine erected for the better collection, ascertainment, or security of any such toll, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted, shall be punished accordingly.

By § 15. maliciously breaking down or otherwise destroying the dam of any fishpond, or of any water which shall be private property, or in which there shall be any private right of fishery, with intent thereby to take or destroy any of the fish in such pond or water, or so as thereby to cause the loss or destruction of any of the fish, or putting any lime or other noxious material in any such pond or water, with intent thereby to destroy any of the fish therein, or breaking down or otherwise destroying the dam of any millpond, is a misdemeanor, and punishable with transportation for seven years, or imprisonment for two years; and if the offender be a male, with whipping.

6. Of injuries to stacks of corn, &c. crops, plantations, &c.

By § 17. maliciously setting fire to any stack of corn, grain, pulse, straw, hay, or wood, is a capital felony; and maliciously setting fire to any crop of corn, grain, or pulse, whether standing or cut down, or to any part of a wood, coppice, or plantation of trees, or to any heath, gorze, furze, or fern, wheresoever the same may be growing, is a felony, subjecting the offender to seven years transportation, or two years imprisonment; and if a male, whipping.

7. Of injuries to hopbinds and trees.

By § 18. maliciously cutting or otherwise destroying any hopbinds growing on poles in any plantation of hops, is a felony, punishable with transportation for life or not less than seven years, or imprisonment for four years, and whipping.

By § 19. maliciously cutting, breaking, barking, rooting up, or otherwise destroying or damaging the whole or any part of any tree, sapling, or shrub, or any underwood, respectively growing in any park, pleasure ground, garden, orchard, or avenue, or in any ground adjoining or belonging to any dwelling-house (in case the amount of the injury done shall exceed the sum of one pound,) is a felony, subjecting the offender to be transported for seven years, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding two years; and if a male, to be whipped; and maliciously cutting, breaking, barking, rooting up, or otherwise destroying or damaging the whole or any part of any tree, sapling, or shrub, or any underwood, respectively growing elsewhere than in any of the situations hereinbefore mentioned, is also a felony (in case the amount of the injury done shall exceed the sum of five pounds,) liable to any of the punishments hereinbefore last mentioned.

By § 20. if any person shall unlawfully and maliciously cut, break, bark, root up, or otherwise destroy or damage the whole or any part of any tree, sapling, or shrub, or any underwood, wheresoever the same may be respectively growing, the injury done being to the amount of one shilling at the least, every such offender, being convicted before a justice of the peace, shall for the first offence forfeit and pay, over and above the amount of the injury done, not exceeding five pounds; and if any person so convicted shall afterwards be guilty of any of the said offences, and shall be convicted thereof in like manner, he shall for such second offence be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for not exceeding twelve calendar months; and if such second conviction shall take place before two justices, they may further order the offender, if a male, to be whipped, after the expiration of four days from the time of such conviction; and if any person so twice convicted shall afterwards commit any of the said offences, such offender shall be deemed guilty of felony, and being convicted, shall be liable to any of the punishments which the court may award for the felony hereinbefore last mentioned.

As to injuries to fruit, &c. see Gardens.

8. Of injuries to any other property.

By § 24. if any person shall wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever, either of a public or private nature, for which no remedy or punishment is hereinbefore provided, every such person, being convicted thereof before a justice of the peace, shall forfeit such sum of money as shall appear to the justice to be a reasonable compensation for the damage, injury, or spoil so committed, not exceeding five pounds; which sum of money shall, in the case of private property, be paid to the party aggrieved, except where such party shall have been examined in proof of the offence. and in such case, or in the case of property of a public nature, or wherein any public right is concerned, the money shall be applied in such manner as every penalty imposed by a justice of the peace under the act is hereinafter directed to be applied; and if such sum of money, together with costs (if ordered,) shall not be paid either immediately after the conviction, or within such period as the justice shall at the time of the conviction appoint, the justice may commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, as the justice shall think fit, for not exceeding two calendar months, unless such sum and costs be sooner paid: provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party trespassing acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of, nor to any trespass, not being wilful and malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or in the pursuit of game, but that every such trespass shall be punishable in the same manner as before the passing of the act.

9. The general provisions of the statute.

By § 25. every punishment and forfeiture by the act imposed on any person maliciously committing any offence whether the same be punishable upon indictment or upon summary conviction, shall equally apply and be enforced whether the offence shall be committed from malice conceived against the owner of the property in respect of which it shall be committed, or otherwise.

By § 26. in the case of every felony punishable under the act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable with death or otherwise, in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this act, shall, on conviction, be liable to be imprisoned for not exceeding two years; and every person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanor punishable under this act, shall be liable to be indicted and punished as a principal offender.

By § 27. where any person shall be convicted of any indictable offence punishable under the act, for which imprisonment may be awarded, the court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, and also direct that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement, for the whole or any portion or portions of such imprisonment, or of such imprisonment with hard labour.

By § 28. for the more effectual apprehension of all offenders against the act, it is enacted, that any person found committing any offence against the act, whether the same be punishable upon indictment or upon summary conviction, may be immediately apprehended without a warrant, by any peace officer, or the owner of the property injured, or his servant, or any person authorized by him, and forthwith taken before some neighbouring justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law.

By § 29. the prosecution for every offence punishable on summary conviction under the act, shall be commenced within three calendar months; and the evidence of the party aggrieved shall be admitted in proof of the offence, and also the evidence of any inhabitant of the county, riding, or division in which the offence shall have been committed, notwithstanding any forfeiture incurred by the offence, may be payable to the general rate of such county, &c.

By § 30. where any person shall be charged on the oath of a credible witness, before any justice of the peace, with any such offence, the justice may summon the person charged to appear at a time and place to be named in such summons; and if he shall not appear accordingly, then (upon proof of the due service of the summons upon such person, by delivering the same to him personally, or by leaving the same at his usual place of abode,) the justice may either proceed to hear and determine the case ex parte, or issue his warrant for apprehending such person and bringing him before himself or some other justice of the peace; or the justice before whom the charge shall be made may (if he shall so think fit) without any previous summons (unless where otherwise specially directed) issue such warrant; and the justice before whom the person charged shall appear or be brought, shall proceed to hear and determine the case.

By § 31. where any offence is by this act punishable on summary conviction, either for every time of its commission, or for the first and second time only, or for the first time only, any person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of such offence, shall, on conviction before a justice of the peace, be liable for every first, second, or subsequent offence of aiding, abetting, counselling, or procuring, to the same forfeiture and punishment to which a person guilty of a first, second, or subsequent offence as a principal offender is by the act made liable.

§ 32. directs the application of forfeitures and penalties upon summary convictions.

By § 33. in every case of a summary conviction, where the sum forfeited for the amount of the injury done, or imposed as a penalty by the justice, shall not be paid, either immediately after the conviction, or within such period as the justice shall, at the time of the conviction, appoint, he may (unless where otherwise specially directed) commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for not exceeding two calendar months, where the amount of the sum forfeited, or of the penalty imposed, or of both as the case may be, together with the costs, shall not exceed five pounds; and for not exceeding four calendar months, where the amount, with costs, shall not exceed ten pounds; and for not exceeding six calendar months in any other case, the commitment to be determinable in each of the cases aforesaid upon payment of the amount and costs.

By § 34. where any person shall be summarily convicted before a justice of the peace of any offence against the act, and it shall be a first conviction, the justice may discharge the offender from his conviction, upon his making satisfaction to the party aggrieved for damages and costs.

By § 35. the king may extend his royal mercy to any person imprisoned by virtue of the act, although he shall be imprisoned for non-payment of money to some party other than the crown.

§ 37. gives a general form of conviction.

By § 38. in all cases where the sum adjudged to be paid on any summary conviction shall exceed five pounds, or the imprisonment adjudged shall exceed one calendar month, or the conviction shall take place before one justice only, any person may appeal to the next court of general or quarter sessions which shall be holden not less than twelve days after the day of such conviction; provided that such person shall give to the complainant a notice in writing of such appeal, and of the cause and matter thereof, within three days after such conviction, and seven clear days at the least before such sessions, and shall also either remain in custody until the sessions, or enter into a recognizance with two sufficient sureties before a justice of the peace, conditioned personally to appear at the said sessions and to try such appeal, and to abide the judgment of the court thereupon, and to pay such costs as shall be by the court awarded; and upon such notice being given, and such recognizance being entered into, the justice before whom the same shall be entered into shall liberate such person if in custody; and the court at such sessions shall hear and determine the matter of the appeal, and shall make such order therein, with or without costs to either party, as to the court shall seem meet; and in case of the dismissal of the appeal, or the affirmance of the conviction, shall order and adjudge the offender to be punished according to the conviction, and to pay such costs as shall be awarded, and shall, if necessary, issue process for enforcing such judgment.

By § 39. no such conviction or adjudication made on appeal therefrom, shall be quashed for want of form, or be removed by certiorari or otherwise into any of his majesty's superior courts of record; and no warrant of commitment shall be held void by reason of any defect therein, provided it be therein alleged that the party has been convicted, and there be a good and valid conviction to sustain the same.

By § 40. every justice of the peace, before whom any person shall be convicted of any offence against this act, shall transmit the conviction to the next court of general or quarter sessions which shall be holden for the county or place wherein the offence shall have been committed, there to be kept by the proper officer among the records of the court; and upon any indictment or information against any person for a subsequent offence, a copy of such conviction, certified by the proper officer of the court, or proved to be a true copy, shall be sufficient evidence to prove a conviction for the former offence, and the conviction shall be presumed to have been unappealed against until the contrary be shown.

By § 41. persons acting in the execution of all actions and prosecutions to be commenced against any person for any thing done in pursuance of this act, shall be laid and tried in the county where the fact was committed, and shall be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not otherwise; and notice in writing of such action, and of the cause thereof, shall be given to the defendant one calendar month at least before the commencement of the action; and in any such action the defendant may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and no plaintiff shall recover in any such action if tender of sufficient amends shall have been made before such action brought, or if a sufficient sum of money shall have been paid into court after such action brought, by or on behalf of the defendant; and if a verdict shall pass for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuit, or discontinue any such action after issue joined, or if, upon demurrer or otherwise, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff, the defendant shall recover his full costs as between attorney and client, and have the like remedy for the same as any defendant hath by law in other cases; and though a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff in any such action, such plaintiff shall not have costs against the defendant, unless the judge before whom the trial shall be shall certify his approbation of the action, and of the verdict obtained thereupon.

By § 42. nothing in the act contained shall extend to Scotland or Ireland.

By § 43. where any felony or misdemeanor punishable under the act shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England, the same shall be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in the same manner as any other felony or misdemeanor committed within that jurisdiction.

The following statutes were not included among those repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. and are still in force.

By the 12 Geo. 3. c. 24. § 1. if any person shall wilfully and maliciously set on fire or burn, or otherwise destroy, or cause to be so done, or aid, procure, abet, or assist in so doing, any of his majesty's ships or vessels of war, whether on float, or building or repairing in any private yards, or any of his majesty's arsenals, magazines, dock-yards, rope-yards, victualling offices, or any of the buildings erected therein, or belonging thereto, or any timber or materials there placed for building, repairing, or fitting out of ships or vessels; or any of his majesty's military, naval, or victualling stores, or other ammunition of war, or any place or places where the same shall be kept, placed, or deposited, he is guilty of a capital felony.

By § 2. any person who shall commit any of such offences out of the realm may be indicted and tried in any county within the realm.

By the 4 Geo. 3. c. 37. for establishing and incorporating the British Linen Company, it is enacted, § 16, "that if any person shall, by day or night, break into any house, shop, cellar, vault, or other place or building, with intent to steal, cut, or destroy any linen belonging to any manufactory, or the looms, tools, or implements used therein, or shall wilfully or maliciously cut in pieces or destroy any such goods, either when exposed to bleach or dry, every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and shall suffer as in cases of felony without benefit of clergy."

By the 13 Geo. 3. c. 38. § 29. for incorporating the British Plate Glass Company (revived by 33 Geo. 3. c. 17. § 21.) it is enacted, "that if any person or persons shall, by day or night, break into any house, shop, cellar, vault, or other place or building belonging to the said manufactory, or wherein the same shall be then carrying on, with intent to steal, cut, break, or otherwise destroy any glass or plate glass, wrought or unwrought, or any materials, tools, or implements, used in, for, or about the making thereof, or any goods and wares belonging to the said manufactory, or shall steal or wilfully or maliciously cut, break, or otherwise destroy any such glass, materials, tools, or implements, every such offender, being lawfully convicted, shall be guilty of felony, and be transported for not exceeding seven years."

By the 54 Geo. 3. c. 42. the destruction of goods in the course of manufacture, and of the machinery employed therein, are felonies punishable with transportation for life or years. Its provisions seem to be embodied in the 3d section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. See ante, 2.

The enactments of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. with respect to destroying records, wills, title-deeds, and other documents, have already been noticed under tit. Larceny, 1.

MALT. By stat. 12 An. st. 1. c. 2. no malt shall be imported on pain of forfeiting the same and the value thereof.

The intercourse of malt between Great Britain and Ireland is now permitted and regulated under stat. 50 Geo. 3. c. 34. 53.

Malt may be exported from any part of the United Kingdom without duty or bounty, 54 Geo. 3. c. 69.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 52. the laws relative to the making of malt, and the revenue of excise thereon, were consolidated and amended; but many of its provisions have been repealed and others substituted by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Will. 4. c. 17.

By the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 55. the laws for suppressing the illicit making of malt, and distillation of spirits in Ireland, were consolidated and amended, and a variety of former acts repealed.

By the 2 Will. 4. c. 29. the allowance in spirits made from malt only, in Scotland and Ireland, was reduced.

By the act for the general regulation of the customs, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 52. § 58. malt is prohibited to be imported under the penalty of forfeiture, but by § 59. it may be warehoused for exportation.

There was formerly not only a direct heavy duty on malt, but another on beer, which together were equivalent to an ad valorem tax of from 140 to 175 per cent. The beer duty was however repealed in 1830.

MAN, ISLE OF. An island off the coast of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire, in the channel that parts Ireland from England.

This island was a distinct territory from England, and out of the power of our chancery, or of original writs which issue from thence. And in the case of the Earl of Derby, it was adjudged, that no man had any inheritance in this island, but the earl and the bishop; and that they are governed by laws of their own, so that no statute made in England did bind there without express words, in the same manner as in Ireland. 1 Inst. 9; 4 Inst. 284; 7 Rep. 21; 2 And. 115.

According to Blackstone, it seems that this distinction is still preserved; he states that it is a distinct territory from England, and is not governed by our laws; neither doth any act of parliament extend to it, unless it be particularly named therein; and then an act of parliament is binding there. Comm. 105; Introd. § 4; cites 4 Inst. 284; 2 And. 116.

It was formerly a subordinate feudatory kingdom subject to the kings of Norway; then to King John and Henry III of England; afterwards to the kings of Scotland; and then again to the crown of England; and at length we find King Henry IV. claiming the island by right of conquest, and disposing of it to the Earl of Northumberland, upon whose attainder it was granted by the name of the Lordship of Man, to Sir John de Stanley, by letters patent, 7 Hen. 4. In his lineal descendants it continued for eight generations, until the death of Ferdinando, Earl of Derby, A. D. 1591, when a controversy arose concerning the inheritance thereof between his daughters and William his surviving brother upon which, and a doubt that was started concerning the validity of the original patent, the island was seized by Queen Elizabeth's hands, and afterwards various grants were made of it by King James I. All which being expired or surrendered, it was granted afresh in 7 Jac. 1. to William Earl of Derby and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to his heirs general: and by a private act of that year, chap. 4. confirmed and assured to the right heirs of James Lord Stanley, seventh Earl of Derby, with the restraint of the power of alienation. On the death of James the late Earl of Derby, A. D. 1735, the male line of Earl William failing, the Duke of Athol succeeded to the island, as heir general by a female branch. In the mean time, though the title of King had long been disused, the Earls of Derby, as Lords of Man, had maintained a sort of royal authority therein, by assenting to or dissenting from laws, and exercising an appellate jurisdiction; yet, though no English writ or process from the Courts of Westminster was of any authority in Man, an appeal lay from a decree of the Lord of the Island, to the King of Great Britain in council. 1 P. Wms. 329. But the distinct jurisdiction of this little subordinate royalty being found inconvenient for the purposes of public justice, and for the revenue, (it affording a commodious asylum for debtors, outlaws, and smugglers,) authority was given to the treasury, by 12 Geo. 1. c. 28. to purchase the interest of the then proprietors for the use of the Crown; which purchase was at length completed in the year 1765, and confirmed by 5 Geo. 3. c. 26. called the Vesting Act; whereby, in consideration of the sum of £70,000, the whole island and all its dependencies so granted as aforesaid, (except the landed property of the Athol family, their memorial rights and emoluments, and the patronage of the bishoprick, and other ecclesiastical benefices,) are unalienably vested in the crown, and subjected to the regulations of the British excise and customs. By 45 Geo. 3. c. 123. a further compensation was made by paying to the Duke of Athol, and the heirs general of the seventh Earl of Derby, an annuity equal to one fourth of the revenue of the customs at that time arising within the Isle of Man: to be paid annually out of the British Consolidated Fund.

The bishoprick of Man, or Sodor, or Sodor and Man, was formerly within the province of Canterbury, but annexed to that of York by 38 H. 8. c. 31.

Stat. 11 Geo. 3. c. 52. (amended by 54 Geo. 3. c. 148.) provides for the repairing its harbours.

No acts (except revenue acts) having as yet been passed which interfere with the private laws or general immunities of the Isle of Man, it still remains as commodious an asylum as ever for debtors and outlaws.

By the 6 G. 1. c. 115. the laws regulating the trade of the Isle of Man and the duties of customs were consolidated and amended, and that statute was followed by several others, all of which were consolidated into one act by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 60.

By § 11 of the last mentioned statute, foreign goods are not to be exported from the Isle of Man to any part of the United Kingdom, under the penalty of forfeiture, together with the ships, &c. used therein, &c. § 12.

There are also many clauses in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 52. (amended by 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 89.) for the general regulation of the customs; in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 53. for the prevention of smuggling; in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 54. for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation; in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 55. for the registering of British vessels; in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 57. for the warehousing of goods; and in the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 58. granting certain bounties of customs; relating to the trade of the Isle of Man, and its intercourse with the United Kingdom.

Of which achatours might take ensample, &c.*

This officer still remains in colleges. Cowell.

MANDAMUS.

A Prerogative Writ, introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of police; and, therefore, ought to be used on all occasions where the law has established no specific remedy; and where in justice and good government there ought to be one. 3 Burr. 1265. See 1 Black. Rep. 552; Comp. 378.

This writ is granted to prevent failure of justice, and for the execution of the common law, or of a statute, or of the king's charter; but not as a private remedy to the party; unless in case of a member or officer of a corporation, if deprived of his office or franchise without sufficient cause, to whom this remedy by mandamus is given, by 9 Anne, c. 20. (see post.) Hardw. 99.

The general jurisdiction and superintendency of the King's Bench over all inferior courts to restrain them within their bounds, and to compel them to execute their jurisdiction, whether such jurisdiction arises from a modern charter, subsists by custom, or is created by act of parliament, yet, being in subsidiu justitiæ, is now exercised in a vast variety of instances. But though these kind of writs are daily awarded to judges of courts to give judgment, or to proceed in the execution of their authority, yet they are never granted to aid a jurisdiction, but only to enforce the execution of it; nor are they ever granted where there is another proper remedy. Dict.

This is a writ of right, which the superior court is obliged to issue, in the ordinary form, without imposing any terms on him who demands it. 3 New Abr. But though it be a writ of right, yet the court seldom grants it, without giving the party to whom it is prayed a day to show cause why it should not issue; also such matter must be laid before the court, by which it may appear that the party is entitled to it. 3 New Abr. And though the Court of King's Bench be entrusted with this jurisdiction of issuing out writs of mandamus, yet they are not obliged to do so in all cases wherein it may seem proper, but herein may exercise a discretionary power, as well in refusing as granting such writ; as where the end of it is merely to try a private right; where the granting it would be attended with manifest hardships and difficulties, &c. So even since the statute 11 Geo. 1. c. 4. (see post.) for obliging corporations to elect officers, it hath been held, that this court hath a discretionary power of refusing a writ for that purpose, but may first receive information about the election, and, if dissatisfied about the right, may send the parties to try it in an information. 2 Str. 1003.

And in the 2 T. R. 385, it was said by Ashurst, J., that an application for a mandamus is an application to the discretion of the court, and that a mandamus is a prerogative writ, and is not a writ of right. See also 12 East, 336; 1 B. & C. 489; 9 B. & C. 456.

According to Blackstone, a writ of mandamus (considered as a remedy for the refusal or neglect of justice) is in general a command, issuing in the king's name from the Court of King's Bench, and directed to any person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature, within the king's dominions; requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified, which appertains to their office and duty, and which the Court of King's Bench has previously determined, or at least supposes to be consonant to right and justice.

It is a high prerogative writ of a most extensive remedial nature, and may be issued in some cases where the injured party has also another more tedious method of redress, as in the case of admission or restitution to an office; but it issues in all cases where the party hath a right to have any thing done, and hath no other specific means of compelling its performance. 3 Comm. c. 7. p. 110.

Where, however, the party has a complete and specific redress at law, it is conceived that the circumstance of its being a more tedious method will not be sufficient to warrant the court in granting a mandamus. For there must be a specific legal right, as well as the want of a specific legal remedy, in order to found an application for a mandamus. Per Lord Ellenborough, 8 East, 219. But where the remedy is inadequate, the writ may issue; thus, where a party refuses to do some act which by law he ought to do, and the nonfeasance of which is injurious to the public, though this be an indictable offence, that will not prevent the issuing of a mandamus, for the indictment will not directly compel the performance of the act; the offender may be fined or imprisoned, but if he be obstinate, the party injured has no complete remedy. 2 B. & A. 646. Neither does the instance put by Mr. Justice Blackstone, of an admission to an office, seem to be in point; for though a mandamus will undoubtedly lie for such a purpose, yet it lies specifically, because the party without it would have no legal remedy by action. It is proper also to add another qualification; if the right in dispute be strictly and wholly private, the court will not interfere: a mandamus is properly a writ to compel the performance of public or, at least, official duties; and therefore the court, considering the Bank of England as a mere corporation of private traders, so far as regarded its internal management of its own concerns, refused to issue a mandamus upon the application of a member to compel the directors to produce their accounts in order to make a dividend of all their profits. 2 B. & A. 620; 5 B. & A. 899. See Coleridge's Note to 3 Comm. 110.

I. In what cases a Mandamus will lie.

II. Of the Writ and Return.

I. A mandamus lies to compel the admission or restoration of the party applying to any office or franchise of a public nature, whether spiritual or temporal, to academical degrees, to the use of a meeting-house, &c. It lies for the production, inspection, or delivery of public books and papers; for the surrender of the regalia of a corporation; to oblige bodies corporate to affix their common seal; to compel the holding of a court; and for an infinite number of other purposes, which it is impossible to recite minutely. But on this part of the subject it is to be particularly remarked, that it issues to the judges of any inferior court, commanding them to do justice according to the powers of their office, wherever the same is delayed. For it is the peculiar business of the Court of King's Bench to superintend all inferior tribunals, and therein to enforce the due exercise of those judicial or ministerial powers with which the crown or legislature have invested them; and this not only by restraining their excesses, but also by quickening their negligence, and obviating their denial of justice. A mandamus may therefore be had to the courts of the city of London to enter up judgment, (Raym. 214,) to the spiritual courts to grant an administration, to swear a churchwarden, and the like. 3 Comm. 110.

This writ of mandamus is also (as has already been hinted) made, by 9 Ann. c. 20. a most full and effectual remedy, in the first place, for refusal of admission where a person is entitled to an office or place in any corporation; and, secondly, for wrongful renewal when a person is legally possessed. There are injuries for which, though redress for the party interested may be had by assise or other means, yet as the franchises concern the public, and may affect the administration of justice, this prerogative writ also issues from the Court of King's Bench, commanding, upon good cause shown to the court, the party complaining to be admitted or restored to his office. And the statute requires that a return be immediately made to the first writ of mandamus; which return may be pleaded to, or traversed by the prosecutor, and his antagonist may reply, take issue or demur, and the same proceedings may be had as if an action on the case had been brought for making a false return; and after judgment obtained for the prosecutor, he shall have a preremptory writ of mandamus to compel his admission or restitution; which latter, in case of an action, is effected by a writ of restitution. 11 Rep. 79. So that now the writ of mandamus, in cases within this statute, is in the nature of an action whereupon the party applying and succeeding may be entitled to costs. 12 Geo. 3. c. 21. Also in general a writ of error may be had thereupon. 1 P. Wms. 351; 3 Comm. c. 17. p. 265.

By 1 W. 4. c. 21. § 3. the enactments of the 9 Ann. c. 20. relating to returns within that statute, are extended to all other writs of mandamus. See post, II.

This writ of mandamus may also be issued in pursuance of 11 Geo. 1. c. 4. in case within the regular time no election shall be made of the mayor or other chief officer of any city, borough, or town corporate, or being made it shall afterwards become void, requiring the electors to proceed to election, and proper courts to be held for admitting and swearing the magistrates so respectively chosen. 3 Comm. 265.

By the common law the Court of King's Bench had authority to grant a mandamus to fill up the vacancy occasioned by the death of a mayor or other chief officer of a borough or corporation within the year; but where the vacancy arose from an omission or neglect to elect such officer on the day fixed by the charter, or upon the removal of one unduly chosen, the court could not compel an election before the day again came round. Consequently, an omission to make an election on the appointed day, whether arising from fraud, inadvertence, or accident, or the removal of an officer improperly elected, might occasion a forfeiture of the charter and a dissolution of the corporation.

It was to remove these inconveniences that the above statute was passed, and being a remedial act it has been very liberally construed; for though three or four years have elapsed since a regular election, the court will grant a mandamus under it. See Bull. N. P. 201 a; Schw. N. P. 1064. And a mandamus has been granted where there was a mayor de facto, it appearing clearly there was no due election. 2 Str. 1003. 1157. And see 3 Burr. 452; 4 Burr. 2006.

Under the statute a mandamus may be granted to proceed to the election of any annual officer, as well as of the mayor or head officer. 2 T. R. 732.

And the statute is not confined to annual officers, but was held to extend to the appointment of burgesses who, under a charter, were elected for life. 8 East, 270.

To enumerate, with any degree of particularity, the various offices and situations to which a person may be admitted or restored by this writ, would take up more space than the nature of our work allows. The following, however, as a summary of so general a nature as, with what has already been said, may give an idea of the extensive use and nature of this remedy.

It has been granted to admit and restore a mayor, alderman, jurat, common council-man, recorder, high steward, town clerk, liveryman, member of the court of assistants, burgess, bailiff, serjeant or freeman of a company or a corporation; and it lies where the persons complaining have the right, though they never had the possession: and to admit one in reversion after the death of another. It lies for any ancient office, being a freehold, and for every public officer who has no other remedy to be restored, as steward of a court leet or court baron, attorney of any court, treasurer of a public company, scavenger, clerk of the peace, master or fellow of a college where no visitor is appointed, chaplain, fellow of the College of Physicians, master, under master, or usher of a school, registrar, or deputy-registrar in the Ecclesiastical court, sexton or parish clerk, clerk to commissioners of land tax, ale-taster, director of a chartered company, prebendary, constable, churchwarden, overseer, surveyor of the highways, dissenting minister, teacher and pastor, curate, &c. See Com. Dig. tit. Mandamus, (A).

A mandamus lies to restore a mayor, alderman, or capital Burgess of a corporation, a recorder, town-clerk, attorney turned out of an inferior court, steward of a court, constable, &c. 11 Rep. 59; Raym. 155; 1 Keb. 549; 2 Nels. 1148, 1149.

A mandamus may be had to restore a freeman; and also to admit one to the freedom of the city, having served an apprenticeship. Sid. 107. To restore a fellow of the College of Physicians, it lies; though not for a fellow of a college in the universities, if there is a visitor. 1 Lev. 19, 23.

Although the cases are so various and numerous in which writs of mandamus have been granted, yet the instances in which they have been refused are almost equal in number; and the cases are sometimes contradictory, particularly as relates to fellows of colleges, and some other contested cases; which, in fact, have frequently been governed by so many private circumstances as scarcely to afford precedents.

One general rule is, that a mandamus does not lie for a private office, as steward of a court baron, proctor in the spiritual court, clerk of a private company in London, on the ground generally of a private jurisdiction over such officers. It does not lie to any of the inns of court to compel them to call a member to the bar; the only appeal in this case being to the twelve judges. See Inns of Court. It lies to a visitor of a college only, under special circumstances, as to hear an appeal and give some judgment. It does not lie for an office not known, unless it be specially described. See Com. Dig. tit. Mandamus, (B).

It hath been resolved, that a mandamus shall not be granted to restore a fellow or member of any college of scholars or physic, because these are private foundations. Carthens's Rep. 92. This writ lieth not for the deputy of an office, &c.; yet he who hath power to make such deputy may have it, Mod. C. 13; 1 Lev. 306; and he may have it to admit his deputy. Stra. 803, 895. It lies not, generally, to elect a man into any office; nor for a clerk of a company, which is a private office; or to restore a barrister expelled a society; a proctor, &c. 2 Lev. 14, 18; 2 Nels. 1150, 1151; nor for a vestry clerk, 5 T.R. K. B. 713. But a mandamus may lie to remove persons as well as restore them, by virtue of any particular statute, or breach thereof. 4 Mod. 233.

A mandamus lies to justices of the peace in a variety of cases connected with the administration of the poor laws; as to appoint overseers in an extra-parochial place, 1 Stra. 512; or in a hamlet where there were not any before, 1 Wils. 138; or to nominate them although the time mentioned in the 43 Eliz. c. 2. § 1. has expired, 2 Stra. 1125. To sign a poor rate, 8 Mod. 335; swear an overseer to his accounts, 1 Wils. 135; to grant a warrant for levying the balance of an old overseer's accounts, 2 Stra. 992; or to receive an appeal against an overseer's accounts, 3 D. & R. 299.

So a mandamus lies to justices in sessions; as to receive and determine an appeal at a subsequent sessions, 1 East, 183; to hear an appeal which they had dismissed, on the ground that they had no authority to try it for want of a sufficient notice to the respondents, 10 East, 404; and see 7 B. & C. 691.

But the court refused to grant a mandamus to the justices at sessions, to rehear an appeal against an order of removal after judgment given by them, and entered by the clerk of the peace, on the ground that the justices were equally divided in opinion, and that the judgment was entered by mistake instead of an adjournment of the appeal. 1 M. & S. 442.

Also a mandamus will lie to justices in order to enforce the execution of the duties imposed upon them by the acts relating to highways; as to appoint surveyors, 4 East, 142; to swear them, 4 Burr. 2452; to make a rate to reimburse them. 1 Stra. 211.

But the court will not issue a mandamus to magistrates to do an act subjecting them to an action, the event of which may be doubtful. 3 N. & M. 68; and see 1 B. & C. 485.

If justices of peace refuse to admit one to take the oaths, to qualify himself for any place, &c. mandamus lies; so to a bishop or archdeacon, to swear a churchwarden; to grant a probate of a will, and to admit an executor to prove a will, or an administrator; to a rector, vicar, or churchwarden, to restore a sexton. Wood's Inst. 568. Also a mandamus will lie to the bishop, to grant a license for a parson to preach, where it is denied, and he is in orders for it: and this writ lies to restore a person to university degrees. 2 Ld. Raym. 1206, 1334. But after a man is restored on a peremptory mandamus, he may be displaced again for the same matters for which he was before removed, and others. Ib. 1283.

A mandamus will be granted to inferior jurisdictions of all kinds, to compel them to do their duty; as to a lord to hold a court baron; to a steward and homage of a manor, to hold courts, to enforce the attendance of tenants of a manor to make a court. See Com. Dig. ubi sup. To a corporation to proceed to election. 1 East, 79.

A mandamus was granted to the ordinary to permit a person to inspect and take extracts from the book of the register touching a living within the diocese, the next presentation of which was claimed both by the ordinary and the person applying for the writ. 8 B. & C. 112, S. C.; 2 M. & R. 127.

But the court will not grant a mandamus to inspect the documents of a corporation on the application of members merely alleging grounds for believing that its affairs were misconducted. It must be shown that the inspection is necessary for some specific object in which the applicant is interested, and the inspection will be limited to that object. 2 B. & Ad. 115.

Where a mayor refused to put a motion moved and seconded with the concurrence of a majority of the burgesses, for the repeal of certain bye laws, the court refused a mandamus to compel him, on the ground that there was no precedent of the court possessing such a power. Ex parte Garrett v. The Mayor of Newcastle, 3 B. & Ad. 258.

The Court of King's Bench refused to grant a mandamus to chapelwardens of a township within a parish, to make a rate to reimburse churchwardens such sums as they had expended, or might expend, upon the parish church. 12 East, 556.

The court refused to grant a mandamus to compel a canal company to proceed to an assessment of the value of land taken for the purposes of the canal, and of the recompense to be made for damages thereby sustained; the parties interested in the land not having made the application within a reasonable time, and there being another remedy by ejectment. 1 M. & S. 32.

The court refused a mandamus to the officers of the customs to register a ship transferred by the survivor of two partners; on the ground that the executors of the deceased partner ought to have joined in the transfer. 2 M. & S. 223.

It does not lie to restore a person where it is confessed he was rightly removed, though he had no notice at the time to appear and defend himself. Comp. 523. Nor to restore to an office, though the party was irregularly suspended; if it appear by his own showing that there was good ground for the suspension if the proceedings had been regular. 2 T. R. 177. See also 8 T. R. 352; and 1 East, 562.

On application for a mandamus to be restored, the party applying must show that he has complied with all the requisites, to give him a prima facie title; because, if properly admitted, he may bring an action for money had and received for the profits. 3 T. R. 578.

If an election is doubtful, it should be tried by information in the nature of a quo warranto, not on mandamus. 3 Burr. 1452.

Where an action will lie for a complete satisfaction equivalent to a specific relief, a mandamus will not lie. It will not therefore be granted against the Bank to transfer stock, because a special action of assumpsit will lie. Dougl. 526, (508); see also 1 T. R. 396, and ante.

A mandamus will not be granted to a ministerial officer, to do an act for the neglect of which he can be otherwise punished. 5 T. R. 364, 546; 6 T. R. 168.

With respect to the issuing of writs of mandamus (which may be done by any of the courts of Westminster), for the examination of witnesses, see Deposition.

II. This writ is grounded on a suggestion, by the oath of the party injured, of his own right, and the denial of justice below; whereupon, in order more fully to satisfy the court that there is a probable ground for such interposition, a rule is made, (except in some general cases where the probable ground is manifest,) directing the party complained of to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue; and if he shows no sufficient cause, the writ itself is issued at first in the alternative either to do thus, or signify some reason to the contrary; to which a return or answer must be made at a certain day; and if the inferior judge, or other person to whom the writ is directed, returns or signifies an insufficient reason, then there issues in the second place a peremptory mandamus to do the thing absolutely, to which no other return will be admitted, but a certificate of perfect obedience and due execution of the writ. If the inferior judge or other person makes no return, or fails in his respect and obedience, he is punishable for his contempt by attachment. But if he at the first returns a sufficient cause, although it should be false in fact, the Court of King's Bench will not try the truth of the fact upon affidavits; but will for the present believe him, and proceed no farther on the mandamus. But then the party injured may have an action against him for his false return; and (if found to be false by the jury) shall recover damages equivalent to the injury sustained; together with a peremptory mandamus to the defendant to do his duty. 3 Comm. 111.

The court will not specify to whom the mandamus shall be directed, for this might be prejudging the right of the electors, but he who applies must at his peril have it properly directed. 2 Burr. 784. See 1 W. 4. c. 21. § 4. post.

A writ of mandamus may not be directed to one person, or to a mayor and alderman, &c. to command another to do any act; it must be directed to those only who are to do the thing required, and obey the writ. 2 Salk. 446, 701.

Two writs of mandamus may be granted on the application of different parties for the same election. Hardm. 178. But the court will not grant cross or concurrent writs without special reasons. 2 Burr. 782.

This writ is not to be tested before granted by the court; and if the corporation to which the mandamus is sent be above forty miles from London, there shall be fifteen days between the day of the teste and the return of the first writ of mandamus, taking both days inclusive; but if but forty miles, or under, eight days only; and the alias and pluries may be made returnable immediate: also, at the return of the pluries, if no return be made, and there is affidavit of the service, attachment shall go forth for the contempt, without hearing counsel to excuse it. 2 Salk. 434; Str. 407.

The return must be made by the person to whom the writ is directed. Skin. 368.

But a return by the mayor alone to a mandamus directed to the mayor and burgesses is good. Comb. 41.

The return to a mandamus should set out all necessary facts precisely, to show the person removed in a legal and proper manner, and for a legal cause: it is not sufficient to set out conclusions only, the facts must be precisely set out, that the court may judge of the matter; so it is the same as to the cause of the motion, which must likewise be set out. 2 Burr. 731.

Where a mandamus to a commissary to swear in M. as churchwarden recited that he had been duly elected, and the defendant returned that M. was not duly elected, the return was held sufficient. 8 B. & C. 681.

The return to a mandamus may contain any number of concurrent and consistent causes to show why the party should not be admitted or restored. 4 Burr. 2044.

After a return has been made to a mandamus, the defendant cannot make any objection to the writ itself. 5 T. R. 66.

A case has happened, and others of the like kind may happen, where an action could not be brought, nor the return pleaded to, or traversed under the statute 9 Ann. c. 20. In such case it may perhaps be advisable to move the court of King's Bench for an information against the person or persons making a false return, or such a return as will lay the party, who moved for the mandamus, under the dilemma mentioned above. 4 Burr. 2452.

If the return consists of several independent matters not inconsistent with each other, but part of them good in law and part bad; the court may quash the return as to such part only as is bad, and put the prosecutor to plead to or traverse the rest. 2 T. R. 456, and see 5 T. R. 66.

It has been held, that several persons cannot have one mandamus; nor can several join in an action on the case for a false return. 2 Salk. 433. But there has been an instance to the contrary, where the circumstances of the case were such, that it required a variety of persons to join in the application, viz. on the highway acts, to compel the justices to nominate a surveyor out of the list returned by the inhabitants. 4 Burr. 2452.

Although by 9 Ann. c. 23. § 2, the prosecutor of a mandamus, to which there is a return, and issue taken on the facts therein, has an option to try the question in the same county, in which he may bring an action for a false return, yet if all the material facts are alleged in one county, and issue taken thereon there, he cannot issue the venire facias into another county, though he might have originally alleged the facts there, and have there brought his action for a false return. 1 East, 114.

There is to be judgment upon the return of the writ, before any action on the case can be brought for a false return of a mandamus. 2 Lev. 238. Returns upon writs of mandamus must be certain for the court to judge upon. 11 Rep. 99. See Com. Dig. tit. Mandamus, (d).

By the 1 W. 4. c. 21. § 3, the enactments contained in the 9 Ann. c. 20, relating to the return to writs of mandamus, and the proceedings on such returns, and to the recovery of damages and costs, are extended and made applicable to all other writs of mandamus, and the proceedings thereon, except so far only as the same are varied or altered by the act.

By § 4, after reciting, that "writs of mandamus, other than such as relate to the offices and franchises mentioned in or provided for by the said act made in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Anne, are sometimes issued to officers and other persons, commanding them to admit to offices, or do or perform other matters, in respect whereof the person to whom such writs are directed claim no right or interest, or whose functions are merely ministerial in relation to such offices or matters, and it may be proper that such officers and persons should in certain cases be protected against the payment of damages or costs to which they may otherwise become liable; it is enacted, that the court to which application may be made for any writ of mandamus (other than such as relate to the said offices and franchises mentioned in or provided for by the said act of the 9 Ann.) may make rules and orders calling, not only upon the person to whom such writ may be required to issue, but also every other person having or claiming any right or interest in or to the matter of such writ, to show cause against the issuing of such writ and payment of costs of the application, and upon the appearance of such other person in compliance with such rules, or in default of appearance after service thereof, to exercise all such powers and authorities, and make all such rules and orders, applicable to the case, as are or may be given by any act (see post) passed or to be passed during the then session of parliament for giving relief against adverse claims made upon persons having no interest in the subject of such claims: Provided that the return to be made to any such writ, and issues joined in fact or in law upon any traverse thereof, or upon any demurrer, shall be made and found by and in the name of the person to whom such writ shall be directed; but the same may, if the court shall think fit so to direct be expressed to be made and joined on the behalf of such other person as may be mentioned in such rules; and in that case such other person shall be permitted to frame the return, and to conduct the subsequent proceedings at his own expense: and in such case, if any judgment shall be given for or against the party suing such writ, such judgment shall be given against or for the person or persons on whose behalf the return shall be expressed to be made, and who shall have the like remedy for the recovery of costs and enforcing the judgment as the person to whom the writ shall have been directed might and would otherwise have had.

By § 5. In case the return to any such writ shall, in pursuance of the authority given by the act, be expressed to be made on behalf of any other person as aforesaid, the further proceedings on such writ shall not abate or be discontinued by the death or resignation of, or removal from office of, the person having made such return, but the same shall be carried on in the name of such person; and if a peremptory writ shall be awarded, the same shall be directed to any successor in office or right to such person.

§ 6. And in all cases of application for any writ of mandamus whatsoever, the costs of such application, whether the writ shall be granted or refused, and also the costs of the writ, if the same shall be issued and obeyed, shall be in the discretion of the court, and it may order by whom and to whom the same shall be paid.

By the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 38. § 8. on applications under the above or that statute, the court may exercise all powers, and make such rules applicable to the case, as are given or mentioned in either act. See Interpleader.

A motion was made for an attachment, for not returning an alias mandamus; and, by Holt, C. J., in case of a mandamus out of chancery, no attachment lies till the pluries, for that is in nature of an action to recover damages for the delay; but upon a mandamus out of B. R. the first writ ought to be returned, though an attachment is not granted without a peremptory rule to return the writ, and then it goes for the contempt, &c. 2 Salk. 429.

By 7 Geo. 4. c. 21. for the better regulation of proceedings on writs of mandamus in Ireland, (§ 1) a return to any mandamus, where the party can be admitted to office without removal of any other person, he may apply to the court by petition to be admitted forthwith; and the court may make order accordingly. By § 2. the court may direct the payment of costs in cases of refusal of admission after notice to mayor, &c. under the Irish act, 33 Geo. 3. c. 38. By § 2. orders of court are subject to alteration by the judgment on the mandamus, but are valid until altered.

For further matter on this subject, see Vin. Abr. and Com. Dig. tit. Mandamus; and post, Quo Warranto.

MANDAMUS was also a writ that lay after the year and day, (where in the meantime the writ, called diem clausit extremum, had not been sent out) to the escheator, on the death of the king's tenant in capite, &c. commanding him to inquire of what lands holden by knight's service the tenant died seised. F. N. B. 561; Dy. 209, pl. 19, 248, pl. 81; Lamb. 36.

Mandamus was likewise a writ or charge to the sheriff, to take into the hands of the king all the lands and tenements of the king's widow, that, against her oath formerly given, married without the king's consent. Reg. fo. 295.

MANDATORY, Mandatorius. He to whom a charge or commandment is given. Also he that obtains a benefice by mandamus.

MANDATE, Mandatum.] A commandment judicial of the king or his justices to have any thing done for despatch of justice; whereof there is a great variety in the table of the Register Judicial, verbo Mandatum. The Bishop of Durham's mandates to the sheriffs are mentioned in 31 Eliz. c. 9. Cowell, ed. 1727.

Mandate is also a contract by which one employs another to act for him in the management of his affairs, or in some particular department of them, of which employment the person accepts and agrees to act; the person giving the employment is termed the mandant, the person receiving it the mandatary. As to particular cases of this contract, or delivery of goods, see tit. Bailment.

MANDATI DIES, Mundie or Maunday Thursday. The day before Good Friday, when they commemorate and practise the commands of our Saviour in washing the feet of the poor, &c. And our kings of England, to show their humility, long executed the ancient custom on that day, of washing the feet of poor men, in number equal to the years of their reign, and giving them shoes, stockings, and money.

MANDATO, PANES DE. Loaves of bread given to the poor upon Maunday Thursday. Chartular Glaston. MS. fol. 29.

MANENTES. Was anciently used for tenentes or tenants; qui in solo alieno manent; and it was not lawful for them, or their children, to depart without leave of the lord. Concil. Synodal. apud Cloversho. Anno 822.

MANGANESE. Stealing, from any bed, mine, or vein, is felony by 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 37. and punishable as simple larceny.

MANGEL WURZELL. By the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 74. licensed distillers may distil spirits from mangel wurzell only, which shall be charged the same duties as spirits made from potatoes.

MANGONARE. To buy in the market. Leg. Ethelred. c. 24.

MANGONELLUS. A warlike instrument made to cast small stones against the walls of a castle. Cowell.

It differs from a petrard as follows, viz.

*Interea grossos petraria mittit ad intus
Assidue lapides mangonellus qui minores.*

Vide Spelm. Gloss. voc. Manga, Manganum.
MANIPULUS. An handkerchief which priests always had in their left hands. Blount.

MANNER, from the Fr. manier, or mainer, i. e. manu tractare.] To be taken with the manner, is where a thief having stolen any thing, is taken with the same about him as it were in his hands; which is called flagrante delicto. S. P. C. 179. See Mamour.

MANNING, manopera.] A day's work of a man; and in ancient deeds there was sometimes reserved so much rent, and so many mannings.

MANNIRE. To cite any one to appear in court, and stand in judgment there; it is different from bannire; for though both of them signify a citation, one is by the adverse party, and the other by the judge. Leg. H. 1. c. 10. Du Cange

MANNOPUS, manopera.] Goods taken in the hands of an apprehended thief. Cowell.

MANNUS. A horse; a pad or saddle horse. In the laws of Alfred, we find mantheof, for a horse stealer. Cowell. See Mantheof.

MANOR, manerium.] Seems to be derived of the Fr. manoir, habitation, or rather from menendo, of abiding there, because the lord did usually reside there. It is called manerium, quasi manurium, because it is laboured by handy work: it is a noble sort of fee, granted partly to tenants for certain services to be performed, and partly reserved to the use of the lord's family, with jurisdiction over his tenants for their farms. That which was granted out to tenants, we call tenementales; those reserved to the lord were dominicales; the whole fee was termed a lordship, of old a barony; from whence the court, that is always an appendant to the manor, is called The Court-baron. See Skene de verb. signif.

Manors, according to Blackstone, are in substance as ancient as the Saxon constitution, though perhaps differing a little in some immaterial circumstance from those that exist at this day. Co. Cop. § 2, 10.

Dugdale says the reign of Edward the Confessor is the first in which they are mentioned. Gloss in voce. A circumstance which is accounted for the fondness of that king for Norman institutions.

Touching the original of manors, it seems that in the beginning there was a circuit of ground, granted by the king to some baron or man of worth, for him and his heirs to dwell upon, and to exercise some jurisdiction more or less within that compass, as he thought good to grant; performing such services, and paying such yearly rent for the same, as he by his grant required; and that afterwards this great man parcelled his land to other meaner men, enjoining such services and rents as he thought good; and so, as he became tenant to the king, the inferiors became tenants to him. See Perkin's Reservation, 670; Horne's Mirror of Justices, lib. 1. cap. de Roy Alfred; Fulbeck, fol. 18. And according to this our custom all lands holden in fee throughout France were divided into feifs and arriere feifs, whereof the former were such as were immediately granted by the king; the second such as the king's feudataries did grant to others. Gregori's Syntagm. lib. 6. c. 5. num. 3.

In these days, a manor rather signifieth the jurisdiction and royalty incorporeal, than the land or site. For a man may have a manor in gross, (as the law termeth it,) that is, the right and interest of a court-baron, with the perquisites thereunto belonging, and another or others have every foot of the land. Kitchin, fol. 4; Broke, hoc titulo per totum; Bracton, lib. 4, cap. 31, n. 3, divideth manerium into capitale et non capitale. See Fee.

Aula, halla, or haua, a hall or chief mansion was the usual appendage of a manor.

A manor may be compounded of divers things, as of a house, arable land, pasture, meadow, wood, rent, advowson, court-baron, and such like; and this ought to be by long continuance of time beyond the memory of man; for at this day a manor cannot be made, because a court-baron cannot now be made; and a manor cannot be without a court-baron, and suitors or freeholders, two at least; for if all the freeholds except one escheat to the lord, or if he purchase all except one, there his manor is gone causd qud supra, although in common speech it may be so called. Cowell. Vide Co. Lit. 58, 108; Lit. 73; 2 Roll. Abr. 121.

By a grant of the demesnes and services, the manor passeth; and by grant and render of the demesnes only the manor is destroyed, because the services and demesnes are thereby severed by the act of the party; though it is otherwise, if by act of law, as by partition. 6 Rep. 63. There are two coparceners of a manor; the demesnes are assigned to one, and the service to the other; the manor is gone, but if one die without issue, and the manor descends to her who had the services, the manor is revived again, for the severance was by act in law. 1 Inst. 122; 8 Rep. 79; 3 Salk. 25, 40.

A new manor may arise and revive by operation of law 1 Leon. 204.

It may contain one or more villages or hamlets, or only great part of a village, &c. And there are capital manors, or honours, which have other manors under them, the lords whereof perform customs and services to the superior lords. 2 Inst. 67; 2 Roll. Abr. 72. See Honour. There may be also customary manors granted by copy of court-roll, and held of other manors. 4 Rep. 26; 11 Rep. 17. But it cannot be a manor in law, if it wanteth freehold tenants; nor be a customary manor without copyhold tenants. 1 Inst. 58; Lit. 73; 2 Roll. Abr. 121. But it is said, if there be but one freehold tenant, the seignior continues between the lord and that one tenant. 1 And. 257; 1 Nels. Abr. 524. The custom remains where tenements are divided from the rest of the manor, the tenants paying their services; and he who hath the freehold of them may keep a court of survey, &c. Cr. Eliz. 103. See Copyhold.

The tenemental lands of ancient manors were, from the different modes of tenure, distinguished by different names. First, book-land, or charter-land, which was held by deed under certain rents and free-services, and in effect differed nothing from free socage lands. Co. Cop. § 3. And from hence have arisen most of the freehold tenants who hold of particular manors, and owe suit and service to the same. The other species was called folk-land, which was held by no assurance in writing, but distributed among the common folk, or people, at the pleasure of the lord, and resumed at his discretion; being indeed land held in the villenage. See tit. Villenage. The residue of the manor being uncultivated, was termed the lord's waste, and served for public roads, and for common of pasture to the lord and his tenants.

Manors were formerly called baronies, as they still are lordships; and each lord or baron was empowered to hold a domestic court, called the court-baron, for redressing misdemeanors and nuisances within the manor, and for settling disputes of property among the tenants. This court is an inseparable ingredient of every manor; and if the number of suitors should so fall as not to leave sufficient to make a jury or homage, that is, two tenants at the least, the manor itself is lost.

In the early times of our legal constitution, the king's greater barons, who had a large extent of territory held under the crown, granted out frequently smaller manors to inferior persons, to be holden of themselves, which do therefore now continue to be held under a superior lord, who is called in such cases the lord paramount over all these manors; and his seignior is frequently termed an honour, not a manor, especially if it hath belonged to an ancient feudal baron, or hath been at any time in the hands of the crown. See tit. Honour. In imitation whereof, these inferior lords began to carve out and grant to others still more minor estates, to be held as of themselves, and were so proceeding downwards in infinitum, till the superior lords observed, that by this method of subinfeudation they lost all their feudal profits, of wardships, marriages, and escheats, which fell into the hands of these mesne or middle lords, who were the immediate superiors of the terre-tenant, or him who occupied the land; and also that the mesne lords themselves were so impoverished thereby, that they were disabled from performing their services to their own superiors. This occasioned, first, that provision in the 32d cap. of Magna Carta, 9 Hen. 3. (which is not to be found in the first charter granted by that prince, nor in the great charter of King John); that no man should either give or sell his land, without reserving sufficient to answer the demands of his lord; and afterwards a statute of Westm. 3. or Quia emptores, 18 Edm. 1. c. 1. which directs that upon all sales or feoffments of lands, the feoffee shall hold the same not of his immediate feoffor, but of the chief lord of the fee of whom such feoffor himself held it. But these provisions not extending to the king's own tenants in capite, the like law concerning them is declared by the statutes of prerogativa regis, 17 Edw. 2. c. 6; 34 Edw. 3. c. 15. by which last all subinfeudations, previous to the reign of King Edward I. were confirmed; but all subsequent to that period were left open to the king's prerogative. See Tenures. From hence it is clear, that all manors existing at this day, must have existed as early as King Edward I. for it is essential to a manor, that there be tenants who hold of the lord; and by the operation of these statutes, no tenant in capite since the accession of that prince, and no tenant of a common lord since the statute of Quia emptores, could create any new tenants to hold of himself. 2 Comm. c. 6. p. 90—92.

If a lord of a manor convey a customary estate to the tenant, he cannot reserve to himself the ancient services; for the tenant by reason of the statute Quia emptores must then hold of the superior lord. 4 T. R. 443.

Where the lord of a customary manor by his deed, made since the statute of Quia emptores, granted to his customary tenant, who then held by the payment of certain customary rents, and other services, that in consideration of a sixty-one penny fine, (being sixty-one years' rent,) he, the lord, ratified and confirmed to the tenant, and his heirs, all his customary and tenant-right estates, with the appurtenances, &c. and granted that the tenant and his heirs should be thenceforth freed, acquitted, exempted, and discharged from the payment of all rents, fines, heriots, &c. dues, customs, services, and demands, at any time thereafter happening to become due in respect of the tenancy; except one penny yearly rent, and also excepting and reserving suit of court, with the service incident thereto; and saving and reserving all royalties, escheats, and forfeitures, and all other advantages and emoluments belonging to the seignior, so as not to prejudice the immunities thereby granted to the tenant; and also granted liberty to cut timber, and to sell or lease, &c. without license; the Court of King's Bench held, that such confirmation to the tenant, of his customary tenant-right estates, (freed &c. from all rents and services, except, &c.) was tantamount to a release of those rents and services not specifically excepted; and that by virtue thereof the customary tenement became frank-free, or held in free and common socage; and that the old customary estate, which before was not devisable, was extinguished, and became devisable by the statute of wills. Such customary estates, which are peculiar to the north of England, are not freehold, but seem to fall under the same general considerations as copyholds; alienable by bargain and sale, and admittance thereon, and not holden at the will of the lord. 4 East, 271. See Copyhold.

MANSE. mansa.] An habitation, or farm and land. Spelm. See Mansus.

In Scotland, the term was originally applied to a portion of ground set apart for the clergyman, but it is now used to designate his house; the ground to which he is entitled being called his glebe, or glebe land.

MANSER. A bastard. Cowell.

MANSION. mansio, a manendi.] Among the ancient Romans was a place appointed for the lodging of the prince, or soldiers in their journey; and in this sense we read primam mansionem, &c. It is with us most commonly used for the lord's chief dwelling-house within his fee; otherwise called the capital messuage, or manor-place. Skene.

Some say it is a dwelling of one or more houses without a neighbour, (see Bract. lib. 5. p. 1); and mansion-house is taken in law for any house or dwelling of another, in cases of committing burglary, &c. 3 Co. Inst. 64.

The Latin word mansia, according to Sir Edward Coke, seems to be a certain quantity of land; hida vel mansia, and mansa, are mentioned in some old writers and charters.

Fleta, lib. 6. And that which in ancient Latin authors was termed hida, was afterwards called mansus.

MANS LAUGHTER. See Homicide, III.

MAN-STEALING. See Kidnapping.

MANSUM CAPITALE. The manor-house or mense, or court of the lord. Kennel's Antiq. 150.

MANSURA and MASURA. Are used in Domesday and other ancient records, for mansiones vel habitacula villicorum. Cowell.

MANSUS. Anciently a farm. Seld. of Tithes. 62.

MANSUS PRESBYTERI. The manse or house of residence of the parish-priest; being the parsonage or vicarage-house. Paroch. Antiq. 431.

MANTHEOF, from the Lat. mannus, a nag, and Sax. thoff, i. e. th. et.] A horse-stealer. Leg. Alfred. See Mannus.

MANTILE. A long robe, from the Fr. word mantea, mentioned in 24 Hen. 8. c. 13.

MAN-TRAP. See Engines.

MANUALIA BENEFICIA. Were the daily distributions of meat and drink to the canons and other members of cathedral churches, for their present subsistence. Lib. Statutor. Eccles. Sancti Pauli London. MS.

MANUALIS OBEDIENTIA. Is used for sworn obedience, or submission upon oath.

MANUCAPTIO. A writ that lies for a man taken on suspicion of felony, &c. who cannot be admitted to bail by the sheriff, or others having power to let to mainprise. F. N. B. 249. See Mainprise.

MANUAL. manualis.] Signifies what is employed or used by the hand, and whereof a present profit may be made; as such a thing in the manual occupation of one, in where it is actually used or employed by him. Staundf. Prerog. 54.

MANUFACTURES and MANUFACTURERS. These are regulated by a vast variety of statutes adapted to the particular nature of each business, to which they are applied, to guard against the frauds and negligence of journeymen and workmen concerned therein. The following contain the most general provisions. For a reference to those relating to particular branches of manufactures, see this Dictionary under the appropriate titles.

By 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 18. made perpetual by 9 Ann. c. 30. if any person employed in the working up the woollen, linen, fustian, cotton, or iron manufactures, shall embezzle or purloin any materials which he shall be intrusted with to work, or if any person shall receive such embezzled materials, the offender shall forfeit double the value to the poor, or be committed to the house of correction, and there whipped and kept to hard labour for fourteen days. This statute was further enforced by 13 Geo. 2. c. 8. which made a second offence liable to a forfeiture of four times the value. These provisions were however found insufficient.

By stats. 22 Geo. 2. c. 27; 17 Geo. 3. c. 56. any person employed in working up any woollen, linen, silk, leather, or iron manufacture, who shall purloin, embezzle, secrete, sell, pawn, exchange, or unlawfully dispose of any of the materials, shall be committed to the house of correction for not less than fourteen days nor more than three months, and whipped; and for a second offence to be committed, for not less than three months, nor more than six, and whipped. The receiver to forfeit from 40*l.* to 20*l.*, or be whipped; and for a second offence from 100*l.* to 50*l.* or be whipped. These statutes also empower justices to grant warrants to search for embezzled materials, and to seize them, giving an opportunity to officers to prove the property, and also to compel workmen entrusted with materials to work up the same within eight days, and to prevent their engaging in more than one service at a time. The said stat. 17 Geo. 3. c. 56. also contains many other provisions against receivers of embezzled manufactures, and prohibits journeymen dyers in particular from receiving goods to dye without the consent of their employers.

By the said stat. 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 18. all wool delivered out to be wrought up shall be delivered with the declaration of the true weight; and all wages, demands, and defaults of labourers in the woollen, linen, fustian, cotton, and iron manufactures, shall be heard and determined by two justices of peace, with an appeal to the quarter sessions.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 16. stealing to the value of 10s. goods of silk, woollen, linen, or cotton, or of such materials mixed, laid or exposed during any stage, process, &c. of manufacture, subjects the offender to transportation for life, &c.

As to the exportation of machinery used in manufactures, see Machinery.

For the offence of destroying machinery and buildings used in the carrying on of any manufacture, see Frames, Malicious Injuries. See further, Labourers, Servants.

MANUMISSION, Manumissio. The freeing a vassal or slave out of bondage; which was formerly done several ways some were manumitted by delivery to the sheriff, and proclamation in the county, &c.; others by charter; one way of manumission was for the lord to take the bondman by the head, and say, I will that this man may be free, and then shoving him forward out of his hands. And there was a manumission implied, when the lord made an obligation for payment of money to the bondman, or sued him where he might enter without suit, &c. The form of manumitting a person in the time of William I. called the Conqueror, is thus set down: Si quis velit servum suum liberum facere. tradat eum vicecomiti per manum dextram in pleno comitatu, et quietum illum clamare debet à jugo servitutis suæ per manumissionem, et ostendat ei liberam portas et vias, et tradat illi libera arma, scilicet lanceam et gladium, et deinde liber homo efficitur. Lamb. Archæi. 126. See title Villeins.

MANU OPERA. Stolen goods taken upon a thief, apprehended in the fact. See Mannopus, Manour.

MANUOPERA. Cattle or any implements used to work in husbandry. Mon. Angl. tom. 1. p. 977. Flea.

MANUPASTUS. A domestic. Spelm. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 66.

MANUPES. A foot of full and legal measure. Cowell.

TO MANURE, Colo, Melioro. To till, plough, or manure land. Lit. Dict.

MANUS. Anciently used for the person taking an oath, as a compurgator. And it often occurs in old records: tertia, quarta, &c. manu, jurare, that is, the party was to bring so many to swear with him, that they believed what he vouched was true: and in a case of a woman accused of adultery, mulieri hoc neganti purgatio sexta manu extitit indicta, i. e. she was to vindicate her reputation upon the testimony of six compurgators. Reg. Eccl. Christ. Cant. If a person swore alone, it was proprâ manu et unâ. The use of this word came probably from laying the hand upon the New Testament, on taking the oath.

MANUS MEDIÆ ET INFIMÆ HOMINES. Men of a mean condition, of the lowest degree. Radulphus de Diceto sub annis, 1112, 1138, 1185.

MANUTENENTIA. The writ used in case of maintenance. Reg. Orig. fol. 182, 189. See Maintenance.

MAN-WORTH. The price or value of a man's life, or head; for of old every man was rated at a certain price, according to his quality, which price was paid to the lord in satisfaction for killing him. Cowell. See Manbote.

MAPS and PRINTS. See Literary Property.

MARA. A mere, lake, or great pond, that cannot be drawn dry. Mon. Angl. tom. 1. p. 666; Par. Antiq. 418.

MARCATUS. The rent of a mark by the year, anciently reserved in leases, &c. Et unum marcatum redditus de, &c. Mon. Angl. tom. 1. p. 341.

MARCH, EARLDOM OF. Grants of its lands are to be under the great seal. 4 Hen. 7. c. 14.

MARCHERS or LORDS MARCHERS. Were those noblemen that lived on the marches of Wales or Scotland; who in times past (according to Camden) had their laws, and potestatem vitae, &c. like petty kings, until they were abolished by the 27 Hen. 8. c. 26. See also 1 Edm. 6. c. 10 and tit. Wales. In old records, the Lords Marchers of Wales were styled Marchianes de Marchia Walliæ.

MARCHES, Marchia, from the German march, i. e. limes, or from the French marque signum: being the notorious distinction between two countries or territories.] The limits between England and Wales or Scotland, when those were considered as enemies' countries; which last are divided into West and Middle Marches. See 4 Hen. 5. c. 7. 22 Edw. 4. c. 8; 24 Hen. 8. c. 9. There was formerly a court called the Court of the Marches of Wales, where pleas of debt or damages, not above the value of fifty pounds, were tried and determined; and if the council of the Marches held plea for debts above that sum, &c. a prohibition might be awarded. Cro. Car. 384.

In Scotland, the term Marches is applied to the boundaries between private properties; the expense of inclosing which is jointly borne by the parties. See Scotch Acts, 1661. c. 41. 1685. c. 39; 1669. c. 17.

MARCIET, Murchetum.] Consuetudo pecuniarum, in mancipiorum filiabus maritandis. Bract. lib. 2. c. 8. The custom, with some variation, is said to have been observed in some parts of England and Wales, and also in Scotland and the Isle of Guernsey. In the manor of Dinevor, in the county of Carmarthen, every tenant, at the marriage of his daughter, paid ten shillings to the lord, which in the British language is called Gwabr Merched, i. e. a maid's fee. The custom for the lord to lie the first night with the bride of his tenant is asserted to have been common in Scotland and the north of England; it was said to be abrogated by Malcolm the Third, at the instance of his queen; and instead thereof a mark was paid to the lord by the bridegroom; from whence it is denominated mercheta mulierum. Sir David Dalrymple Lord Hailes, has annexed to his Annals of Scotland, a short treatise on this mercheta mulierum, to prove that no such custom ever existed in Scotland, nor probably in any other place. He explains the term to mean, 1, a fine paid to the lord by a sokeman or villain, when his unmarried daughter chanced to be debauched. 2, a composition or acknowledgment by the sokeman or villain for the lord's permission to give his daughter in marriage to a stranger or person not subject to the lord's jurisdiction; or the fine for giving her away without such permission. See further, Borough English, Maiden Rents, Merchet.

MARESCALL or MARESHAL. See Marshal.

MARETUM, French maret, a fen or marsh.] Marshy ground, overflowed by the sea or great rivers. Co. Lit. 5.

MARINARIUS. A mariner or seaman: and marinarius capitaneus was the admiral or warden of the ports, which offices were commonly united in the same person: the word admiral not coming into use till the latter end of the reign of King Edward I. before which time the king's letters ran thus—Rex capitaneo marinariorum et eisdem marinariis salutem. Paroch. Antiq. 332. See Admiral, Insurance, Navy. And see further Impressing, Seamen, &c.

MARINE FORCES, While on shore, are regulated and subjected to martial law by annual acts. See Soldiers.

MARINE SOCIETY. The following account of the origin of this society will be found interesting, and is given from authority.

Lord Harry Pawlet, afterwards Duke of Bolton, in the spring, 1756, then commanding his majesty's ship Barfleur, requested John Fielding, esq. afterwards Sir John Fielding the celebrated magistrate, to collect a number of poor boys for the use of his ship, desiring they might be clothed at his lordship's expense. Fowler Walker, esq. of Lincoln's Inn, happening to meet these boys on their journey, and being struck with their appearance, his humanity suggested to him that a greater number of such poor boys might be fitted on by a subscription. On his arrival in town, he proposed to Mr. Fielding to solicit the public for a subscription for this purpose, himself offering to open it by a small donation. This worthy magistrate, in his written answer, expressed his doubts of the event, but acquiesced with Mr. Walker's design, and happily succeeded so far, that he collected sufficient to clothe three or four hundred boys.

A merchant of London, totally unconnected with the noble lord and both the gentlemen above-mentioned, desired a meeting of the merchants and owners of ships, and proposed to them to form themselves into a society to clothe landmen and boys for the sea service. The first part was eagerly embraced, and the design as speedily carried into execution. Many days had not elapsed, when the design relating to the boys fell into their hands.

A regular society was soon formed, from which much temporary benefit resulted.

From the termination of the war in 1763 to May 1769, the operations of the society were suspended. Mr. Hickes, a merchant of Hamburgh, seeing the great utility of the design, bequeathed to this society a sum of money, producing 300*l.* per annum, for fitting out poor boys in time of war, to serve the officers on board the royal navy, in order to be brought up as seamen. In time of peace one half of the produce to be expended in fitting out poor boys as apprentices to owners and masters of ships, in the merchants' service and coasting vessels, the other half in placing out poor girls to trades, whereby they may earn an honest livelihood.

In the year 1772, the society procured an act of parliament, 12*Geo.* 3. c. 67. The preamble of this act recites that the society had clothed and fitted out 5,451 landmen, to serve as seamen on board his majesty's ships; and also clothed, fitted, and placed out as servants or apprentices to officers in the king's ships, and to the merchants' service at sea, 6,306 boys, who had no visible means of support, and who voluntarily offered themselves for the purpose therefore of enabling them to carry into execution their charitable designs (that is to say,) the fitting out and apprenticing or placing out poor distressed boys, to and for the service of the royal navy, and to and for the service of other ships and vessels, the property of and belonging to subjects of the king of Great Britain; the society was incorporated, their funds secured, and they were empowered from time to time to place out boys as servants to the commissioned or warrant officers of his majesty's navy, and to apprentice out boys in the merchants' service, and to other subjects as they might think proper. By § 6 of the act it is provided that boys serving out such their respective apprenticeships at sea, not being for a less time than four years, shall be entitled to the liberty of setting up and exercising trade or business in any place in Great Britain or Ireland. By § 15, two justices of the peace in their respective counties are authorized and empowered to hear and determine all complaints of hard and ill-usage from the respective masters to their apprentices, and respectively to make such orders therein as they may by law do in other cases between masters and servants, or apprentices.

The estate and property of the trustees of Westminster fish-market (see 22*Geo.* 2. c. 19.) vested in the Marine Society. 30*Geo.* 3. c. 51.

MARISCHAL. An officer in Scotland, who with the lord high constable, possessed a supreme criminal jurisdiction in all crimes committed within a certain space of the court, wherever it might happen to be. See Maxims.

MARITAGIO AMISSO PER DEFACTUM. A writ for the termination of frank marriage to recover lands, &c. which he is declared by another. Reg. fol. 171.

MARITAGIUM. That portion which is given with a daughter in marriage. See Glossil, lib. 2. c. 18. Maritagi-um, as a fruit of tenure, strictly taken, is that right which the lord of the fee had to dispose of the daughters of his vassals in marriage. In cap. 7 of Magna Charta, it seems to designate lands holden by a female in frank-marriage. See Tenure, II. 4; and Marchet, Marriage.

MARITAGIUM HABERE. To have the free disposal of an heiress in marriage; a favour granted by the kings of England, while they had the custody of all wards or heirs in minority. Cowell. See Tenure.

MARITIMA ANGLIÆ. The profit and emolument arising to the king from the sea, which anciently was collected by sheriffs; but it was afterwards granted to the lord admiral. Ricardus de Lucy dicitur habere maritmam Angliæ. Pat. 8*H.* 3. m. 4.

MARK, marca, Saxon meare. Of silver, is now thirteen shillings and four pence; though in the reign of Henry I. it was only six shillings and a penny in weight; and some were coined, and some only cut in small pieces; but those that were coined were worth something more than the others. In former times, money was paid, and things valued oftentimes by the mark. We read of a mark of gold of eight ounces; of 6*l.* in silver; or as others write, 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* Stow's Annals, 32; Rot. Mag. Pipæ, Ann. 1*Hen.* 2.

The marka ami and marka argenti are noticed in Domesday Book, as well as the half-mark, both of silver and gold. The mark and the half-mark therein mentioned were however only computations of money, the penny being the sole coin known in England till long after the date of that survey. See Ellis's Introd. to Domesday Book, vol. i. 164.

MARK TO GOODS. Is what ascertains the property or goodness thereof, &c. And if one man shall use the mark of another, to the intent to do him damage, upon injury proved, action upon the case lieth. 2*Cro.* 471. The penalty of counterfeiting the marks on wax, appointed by 23*Eliz.* c. 8. is 5*l.* or pillory (now abolished) and imprisonment.

MARKET, mercatus, from mercando, buying and selling.] The liberty by grant or prescription, whereby a town is enabled to set up and open shops, &c. at a certain place therein, for buying and selling, and better provision of such victuals as the subject wanteth; it is less than a fair, and usually kept once or twice a week. Bract. lib. 2. cap. 24; 1*Inst.* 220.

The establishment of public marts, or places of buying and selling, such as markets and fairs, with the tolls thereunto belonging, is enumerated by Blackstone as one of the king's prerogatives. These can only be set up by virtue of the king's grant, or by long and immemorial usage and prescription, which presupposes such a grant. 2*Inst.* 220.

According to Bracton, one market ought to be distant from another, sex leucas, vel miliar, et dimidium, et tertiam partem dimidiæ. If one hath a market by charter or prescription, and another obtains a market near it, to the nuisance of the former, the owner of the former may avoid it. 1*Inst.* 406; F. N. B. 184; 2*Rot. Abr.* 140. But in order to make this out to be a nuisance, it is necessary, 1, that the prosecutor's market or fair be the elder, otherwise the nuisance lies at his own door; 2, that the second market be erected within the third part of twenty miles from the other (i.e. as above expressed, six miles and a half, and one-third of half a mile,) for the dicta or reasonable day's journey mentioned by Bracton l. 3. c. 16. is constructed by Hale to be twenty miles. See 2*Inst.* 367. So that if the new market be not within the distance above-mentioned of the old one, it is no nuisance; as it is held reasonable that every man should have a market within one-third of a day's journey from his own house; that the day being divided into three parts, he may spend one part in going, another in returning, and the third in transacting his necessary business there. If such market or fair be on the same day with the old one, it is primæ facie a nuisance to that, and there needs no proof of it, but the law will intend it to be so; but if it be on another day, it may be a nuisance, though whether it is so or not cannot be intended or presumed, but must be proved to a jury. 3 Comm. c. 13. p. 218. Also where a man has a fair or market, and one erects another to his prejudice, an action will lie. Rol. 140; 1 Mod. 69.

The fair or market is taken for the place where kept; and formerly it was customary for fairs and markets to be kept on Sundays; but by 27 Hen. 6. c. 5. no fair or market is to be kept upon any Sunday, or upon the feasts of the Ascension, Corpus Christi, Good Friday, All Saints, &c. except for necessary victuals, and in time of harvest: and they shall not be held in church-yards. Stat. Wynton, 13 Edw. 1. c. 6.

The lord of a manor, to whom the grant of a market is made infra villam de W. may hold it any where infra villam de W.; and whether villa extend to the town of W. or the township or parish of W., the lord has a right to remove the market-place from one situation to another within the precinct of his grant. And though he should have holden it for above twenty years within the township of W., where the grant only gave it him within the town properly so called at the time, yet if he afterwards give notice of the removal to another place in the township, the public have no right to go upon his soil and freehold in the old market-place; and any person going there is liable to an action of trespass by the lord. 3 East, 538.

All fairs are markets; and there may be a market without an owner; though where there is an owner, a butcher cannot prescribe to sell meat in his own house upon a market-day; for the market must be in an open place, where the owner may have the benefit of it. 4 Inst. 272. No market shall be held out of the city of London within seven miles; though all butchers, victuallers, &c. may hire stalls and standings in the markets there, and sell meat and provisions, on four days in a week, &c. Cit. lib. 101.

Every one that hath a market, shall have toll for things sold, which is to be paid by the buyer, and by ancient custom may be paid for standing of things in the market, though nothing be sold, but not otherwise. A prescription for toll in respect of goods sold by sample in a market, and afterwards brought into the city to be delivered, cannot be supported; the mode of sale by sample being of very modern invention. 4 Taunt. 520. A piepowder court is incident as well to a market as a fair (see Court of Piepowders); and proprietors of markets ought to have a pillory and tumbrel, &c. to punish offenders. 1 Inst. 281; 2 Inst. 221; 4 Inst. 272. Keeping a fair or market, otherwise than it is granted, as by keeping them upon two days, when only one is granted; or on any other day than appointed; extorting toll or fees where none are due, &c. are causes of forfeiture. Finch. 164. If a person erects stalls in a market, and does not leave room for the people to stand and sell their wares, so that they are thereby forced to hire such stall, the taking money for the use of them, in that case, is extortion. 1 Ld. Raym. 149. And if the grantee of a market, for his own profit, permit part of the space within it to be used for other purposes, so that there is not sufficient space for the public accommodation, he cannot sue an individual for selling articles near his market, and depriving him of toll, even although at that particular time there is room in the market, unless he shows that on the day when the sale takes place he gave notice to the seller that there was room within the market. Prince v. Lewis, 5 B. & C. 369.

The lord of an ancient market may by law have a right to prevent other persons from selling goods in their private houses situate within the limits of the market. 7 B. & C. 40. And so in a recent case, it was held that a claim by immemorial custom to exclude others from selling marketable articles on the market days, except in the market place, is valid in law. 4 B. & Ad. 397. Quære if the grantee of a newly created market can, by virtue of such grant, maintain an action for the disturbance of his franchise against a person for selling such articles in his own shop, within the franchise, but not within the limits of the market-place, on the market day?

Property may in some cases be transferred by sale, though the vendor hath none at all in the goods; for it is expedient that the buyer, by taking proper precautions, may at all events be secure of his purchase; otherwise all commerce between man and man must be soon at an end.

The general rule of law, therefore, is, that all sales and contracts of any thing venible in fairs or markets overt (that is, open,) shall not only be good between the parties, but also binding on all those that have any right or property therein. 2 Inst. 713. And for this purpose the Mirror says tolls were established, viz. to testify the making of contracts for every private contract was discountenanced by law; inasmuch that our Saxon ancestors prohibited the sale of any thing above the value of 20d. unless in open market; and directed every bargain and sale to be made in the presence of credible witnesses. Mirr. c. 1. § 3; Ll. Ethel. 10, 12; Ll. Eadg. Wilk. 80. Market overt in the country is only held on the special days provided for particular towns by charter or prescription; but in London, every day except Sunday is market-day. Cro. Jac. 68. The market-place, or spot of ground set apart by custom for the sale of particular goods, is also in the country the only market overt. Godb. 14. But in London, every shop in which goods are exposed publicly to sale, is market overt for such things only as the owner professes to trade in. 5 Rep. 83; 12 Mod. 521. Though if the sale be in a warehouse, and not publicly in the shop, the property is not altered. 5 Rep. 83; Modr. 80. But if goods are stolen from one, and sold out of market overt, the property is not altered, and the owner may take them wherever he finds them. And it is expressly provided by 1 Jac. 1. c. 21. that the sale of any goods wrongfully taken, to any pawnbroker in London, or within two miles thereof, shall not alter the property; for this being usually a clandestine trade, is therefore made an exception to the general rule. And even in market overt, if the goods be the property of the king, such sale, though regular in all other respects, will in no case bind him; though it binds infants, femes covert, idiots or lunatics, and persons beyond sea, or in prison. 2 Inst. 713. If the goods be stolen from any common person, and then taken by the king's officer from the felon, and sold in open market, still if the owner has used due diligence in prosecuting the thief to conviction, he loses not his property in the goods. Bac. Use of the Law 158. So likewise if the buyer knoweth the property not to be in the seller; or there be any other fraud in the transaction; if he knoweth the seller to be an infant, or feme covert not usually trading for herself; if the sale be not originally and wholly made in the fair or market, or not at the usual hours, the owner's property is not bound thereby. 2 Inst. 713, 714; 5 Rep. 83. If a man buys his own goods in a fair or market, the contract of sale shall not bind him, so that he shall render the price; unless the property had been previously altered by a former sale. Perk. § 93. And notwithstanding any number of intervening sales, if the original vendor, who sold without having the property, comes again into possession of the goods, the original owner may take them, when found in his hands who was guilty of the first breach of justice. 2 Inst. 713. But the owner of goods stolen, who has prosecuted the thief to conviction, cannot recover the value of his goods from any one who has purchased them, and sold them again, even with notice of the theft before the conviction. 2 T. R. 750. By these regulations the common law has secured the right of the proprietor in personal chattels from being divested, so far as is consistent with that other necessary policy, that purchases bona fide, in a fair, open, and regular manner, should not be afterwards put to difficulties by reason of the previous knavery of the seller. 2 Comm. 449, 450. retail in a market town, but in open fairs; but countrymen may sell goods in gross there. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 7.

All contracts for any thing vendible in markets, &c. shall be binding, and sales after the property, if made according to the following rules, viz. 1, the sale is to be in a place that is open, so that any one that passeth by may see it, and be in a proper place for such goods; 2, it must be an actual sale, for a valuable consideration; 3, the buyer is not to know that the seller hath a wrongful possession of the goods sold; 4, the sale must not be fraudulent, betwixt two, to bar a third person of his right; 5, there is to be a sale, and a contract, by persons able to contract; 6, the contract must be originally and wholly in the market overt; 7, toll ought to be paid, where required by statute, &c.; 8, the sale is not to be in the night (or on a Sunday,) but between sun and sun (though if the sale be so made, it may bind the parties.) A sale thus made shall bind the parties, and those that are strangers, who have a right. 5 Rep. 83.

The statutes which ordain that toll takers shall be appointed in markets and fairs, to enter into their books the names of the buyers, sellers, vouchers, and prices of horses sold, and deliver a note thereof to the buyer, &c. secure the property of stolen horses to the owner, although sold in a fair or market, if he repays what was bond fide paid for the horse. 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 7; 31 Eliz. c. 12. MARKPENNY. Was a penny anciently paid at the town of Maldon, by those who had gutters laid or made out of their houses into the streets. H. 15 Edm. 1.

MARLE, marla, from the Saxon margel, i. e. medulla, otherwise called malva. A kind of earth or mineral, which in divers counties of this kingdom is used to fertilize land. See 17 Edw. 4. c. 4.

MARLBURG. Statutes made there, 52 Hen. 3.

MARLERUM or MARLETUM. A marle pit. Chart. Antiq.

MARQUE, from the Saxon mearc, signum.] A mark or sign; but in our ancient statutes it signifies reprisals. See Letters of Marque.

MARQUESS or MARQUIS, marchio.] Is now a title of honour before an earl, and next to a duke; and by the opinion of Hotoman, the name is derived from the German march, signifying originally custos limitis or comes et protector limitis.

In the reign of King Richard II. came up first the title of marquis, when was a governor of the landes, and then called commonly lord marcher, and not marquess, as Judge Doddridge has observed in his Law of Nobility and Peerage. Selden's Mare Claus. lib. 2. c. 19. A marquis is created by patent; and anciently by cincture of sword, mantle of state, &c. See Lords Murchers, Peers, Nobility.

MARRIAGE.

[MATRIMONIUM.] A civil and religious contract, whereby a man is joined and united to a woman, for the purposes of civilized society; matrimonium, in the feudal law, signified the manner of bestowing a ward or widow in marriage by the lord. Mag. Chart. c. 6. See Feudal, II. 1.

Matrimonium is likewise applied to land given in marriage, and is that portion which the husband receives with his wife. Bract lib. 2. c. 34; Glanv. lib. 7. c. 1. In this sense there are given versus de matrimonio, &c. Reg. 171.

There is further a term called duty of marriage, signifying an obligation to marry, imposed on women who formerly had lands, charged with personal services, in order to render them by their husbands. Comell. See Tenure, II. 4.

Marriage is generally the conjunction of man and woman in a constant society and agreement of living together, until the contract is dissolved by death, or breach of faith, or some notorious misbehaviour, destructive of the end for which it was intended. It is one of the rights of human nature, and was instituted in a state of innocence, for preservation thereof; and nothing more is requisite to a complete marriage by the laws of England, than a full, free, and mutual consent between parties, not disabled to enter into that state by their near relation to each other, infancy, pre-contract, or impotency. Dict.

As to the solemnization of marriage, this is regulated by the laws and customs of the nation where we reside; and every state allows such privileges to the parties it deems expedient, and denies legal advantages to those who refuse to solemnize their marriage, in the manner the state requires; but they cannot dissolve a marriage celebrated in another manner, marriage being of divine institution, to which only a full and free consent of the parties is necessary. Before the time of Pope Innocent III. there was no solemnization of marriage in the church; but the man came to the house where the woman inhabited, and led her home to his own house, which was all the ceremony then used. See 1 Roll. Abr. 359; 1 Sid. 64.

Marriages by Romish priests, whose orders are acknowledged by the church of England, are deemed to have the effects of a legal marriage in some instances; but marriages ought to be solemnized according to the rites of the church of England, to entitle the parties to the privileges attending legal marriage, as dower, thirds, &c.

Marriage at common law is either in right or in possession; and marriage de facto, or in reputation, as among Quakers, &c. is allowed to be sufficient to give title to a personal estate. 1 Leon. 53; Wood's Inst. 59. But in the case of a Dissenter, married to a woman by a minister of the congregation who was not in orders, it was held, that when a husband demands a right to himself as husband by the ecclesiastical law, he ought to prove himself a husband by that law, to entitle him to it; and notwithstanding the wife and the children of this marriage may entitle themselves to a temporal right by such marriage, yet the husband shall not, by the reputation of the marriage, unless he hath a substantial right; and this marriage is not a mere nullity, because by the law of nature the contract is binding; for though the positive law of man ordains marriage to be made by a priest, that law only makes this marriage irregular, and not expressly void. 1 Salk. 119. See further Quakers.

The marriages that are made in an ordinary course, are to be by asking in the church, and other ceremonies appointed by the book of Common Prayer. 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 21. By the ordinances of the church, when persons are to be married, the banns of matrimony shall be published in the church where they dwell three several Sundays or holidays, in the time of divine service; and if, at the day appointed for their marriage, any man do allege any impediment, as pre-contract, consanguinity, or affinity, want of parent's consent, infancy, &c. why they should not be married, (and become bound with sufficient sureties to prove his allegation,) then the solemnization must be deferred until the truth is tried. Rubrick. And no minister shall celebrate matrimony between any persons without a faculty of licence, except the banns of marriage have been first published as directed, according to the book of Common Prayer, on pain of suspension for three years; nor shall any minister, under the like penalty, join any persons in marriage, who are so licensed at any unreasonable times, or in any private place, &c. Canon, 62. Also on the granting of licences, oath is made, and bond is to be taken that there are no impediments of pre-contract, consanguinity, &c. nor any suit or controversy depending in any ecclesiastical court, touching any contract of marriage of either of the parties with any other; that neither of them are of better estate than is suggested; and that the marriage be openly solemnized in the parish church where one of the parties dwelleth, or the church mentioned in the licence, between the hours of eight and twelve in the morning. Licences to the contrary shall be void; and the parties marrying are subject to punishment as for clandestine marriages. Can. 102.

But by special licence or dispensation from the Archbishop of Canterbury, marriages, especially of persons of quality, are frequently in their own houses, out of canonical hours, in the evening, and often solemnized by others in other churches than where one of the parties lives, and out of time of divine service, &c.

Marriages are prohibited in Lent, and on fasting days, because the mirth attending them is not suitable to the humiliation and devotion of those times; yet persons may marry with licences in Lent, although the banns of marriage may not then be published. Formerly, during the establishment of the Catholic religion in these kingdoms, priests were restrained from marriage, and their issue accounted bastards, &c. and the 31 Hen. 8. c. 14. made such marriages felonious. But on the Reformation, laws were made, declaring that the marriage of priests should be lawful, and their children legitimate; though the preambles to those statutes set forth, that it would be better for priests to live chaste, and separate from the company of women, that they might with more fervency attend the ministry of the Gospel. See 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 21. But this statute, like all other reforms in the church, was repealed by Queen Mary, and was not revived again till by 1 Jac. 1. c. 25; though the thirty-nine articles had passed in convocation in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth, the thirty-second of which declares, that it is lawful for the bishops, priests, and deacons, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion. The clerks in chancery, though laymen, were not allowed to marry, till 14 & 15 Hen. 8. c. 8. And no lay-doctor of civil law, if he was married, could exercise any ecclesiastical jurisdiction, till 37 Hen. 8. c. 7.

Taking marriage in the light of a civil contract, the law treats it as it does all other contracts; allowing it to be good and valid in all cases where the parties at the time of making it were in the first place willing to contract; secondly, able to contract; and, lastly, actually did contract, in the proper forms and solemnities required by law. 1 Comm. c. 16. p. 433.

First, they must be willing to contract; "Consensus non concubitus facit nuptias," is the maxim of the civil law in this case; and it is also adopted by the common lawyers. 1 Inst. 33.

Secondly, they must be able to contract. In general all persons are able to contract themselves in marriage, unless they labour under some particular disabilities and incapacities. What those are we shall therefore inquire.

These disabilities are of two sorts: first, such as are canonical, and therefore sufficient by the ecclesiastical laws to avoid the marriage in the spiritual court; but these in our law only make the marriage voidable, and not ipso facto void, until sentence of nullity be obtained. Of this nature are pre-contract, consanguinity, or relation by blood; affinity, or relation by marriage; and some particular corporeal infirmities. These canonical disabilities are either grounded upon the express words of the divine laws, or are consequences plainly deducible from thence; it therefore being sinful in the persons who labour under them to attempt to contract matrimony together, they are properly the object of the ecclesiastical magistrates' coercion, in order to separate the offenders and inflict penance for the offence, pro salute animarum. But such marriages not being void ab initio, but voidable only by sentence of separation, they are esteemed valid to all civil purposes, unless such separation is actually made during the life of the parties. For after the death of either of them the courts of common law will not suffer the spiritual court to declare such marriages to have been void; because that declaration cannot now tend to the reformation of the parties. 1 Inst. 33; 2 Inst. 614. Therefore when a man had married his first wife's sister, and after her death the bishop's court was proceeding to annul the marriage, and bastardize the issue, the Court of King's Bench granted a prohibition quod hoc; but permitted them to proceed to punish the husband for incest. 1 Salk. 548.

These canonical disabilities being entirely within the province of the ecclesiastical courts, our books are perfectly silent concerning them. But there are a few statutes which serve as directories to those courts, of which it will be proper to take notice. By 32 Hen. 8. c. 38. it is declared that all persons may lawfully marry but such as are prohibited by God's law; and that all marriages contracted by lawful persons in the face of the church, and consummate with bodily knowledge and fruit of children, shall be indissoluble. And (because in the times of popery a great variety of degrees of kindred were made impediments to marriage, which impediments might, however, be bought off for money,) it is declared by the same statute, that nothing, God's law except, shall impeach any marriage, but within the Levitical degrees, the farthest of which is, that between uncle and niece. 6. Rep. 158.

By the same statute all impediments, arising from pre-contracts to other persons, were abolished, and declared to have no effect, unless they had been consummated with bodily knowledge; in which case the common law holds such contract to be a marriage de facto. But this branch of the statute was repealed by 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 23. A contract per verba de presenti tempore used to be considered in the ecclesiastical courts ipsum matrimonium; and if either party had afterwards married, this, as a second marriage, would have been annulled in the spiritual courts, and the first contract enforced. See as instance, 4 Co. 29. But as this pre-engagement can no longer be carried into effect as a marriage, it seems undoubted that it will never more be an impediment to a subsequent marriage actually solemnized and consummated. Comm. 435, in n.

In the above stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 38. the prohibitions by God's law are not specified; but in 25 Hen. 8. c. 22; 18 Hen. 8. c. 7. the prohibited degrees are particularized. It is doubtful whether these two last statutes are in force. 2 Hen. Eccl. L. 405. But so far they seem to be only declaratory of the Levitical law. The former declared null and void the marriage between Henry VIII. and Catherine of Aragon, widow of his eldest brother, Prince Arthur, for which a dispensation had been obtained from the Pope. 1 Comm. 435, in n.

The prohibited degrees are all which are under the fourth degree of the civil law, except in the ascending and descending line; and by the course of nature it is scarcely a possible case, that any one should ever marry his issue in the fifth degree; but between collaterals it is universally true, that all who are in the fourth or any higher degree are permitted to marry; as, first cousins are in the fourth degree, and therefore may marry; a nephew and great aunt, or niece and great uncle are also in the fourth degree, and may intermarry; and though a man may not marry his grandmother, it is certainly true he may marry her sister. Gibb. Cod. 1. The same degrees by affinity are prohibited. Affinity always arises by the marriage of one of the parties so related as a husband is related by affinity to all the consanguineal of his wife, and vice versa the wife to the husband's consanguineal, for the husband and wife being considered one flesh, those who are related to the one by blood are related to the other by affinity. Gibb. Cod. 412. Therefore a man after his wife's death cannot marry her sister, aunt, or niece. But the consanguineal of the husband are not at all related to the consanguineal of the wife. Hence two brothers may marry two sisters, or father and son a mother and daughter. If a brother and sister marry two persons not related, and the brother and sister die, the widow and widower may intermarry; for though I am related to my wife's brother by affinity, I am not so to my wife's brother's wife, whom it circumstances would admit, it would not be unlawful for me to marry. 1 Comm. 435, in n. See 1 Inst. 235, a. in n.

The son of a father by another wife, and daughter of a mother by another husband, cousins-german, &c. may marry with each other; a man may not marry his brother's wife, or wife's sister, an uncle his niece, an aunt her nephew, &c. But if a man take his sister to wife, they are baron and feme, and the issue are not bastards till a divorce. Levit. c. 18, 20; 2 Inst. 683; 1 Rol. Abr. 340, 357; 5 Mod. 448.

A person may not marry his sister's daughter; and a sister's bastard daughter is said to be within the limited law of affinity; it being morally as unlawful to marry a bastard as one born in wedlock, and it is so in nature; and if a bastard doth not fall under the prohibition ad proximum sanguinis non accedat, a mother may marry her bastard son. 5 Mod. 168; 2 Nels. Abr. 1161.

There are persons within the reason of the prohibition of marriage, though not mentioned, and must be prohibited; as the father from marrying his daughter, the grandson from marrying the grandmother, &c. Vaugh. 321.

The other sorts of disabilities are those which are created, or at least enforced by the municipal laws. And though some of them may be grounded on natural law, yet they are regarded by the laws of the land, not so much in the light of any moral offence, as on account of the civil inconveniences they draw after them. These civil disabilities make the contract void ab initio, and not merely voidable; not that they dissolve a contract already formed, but they render the parties incapable of forming any contract at all; they do not put asunder those who are joined together, but they previously hinder the junction. And if any persons under these legal incapacities come together, it is a meretricious, and not a matrimonial union. 1 Comm. 436.

The first of these legal disabilities is propter aetatem, or having another husband or wife living, in which case, besides the parties' consent, it is a felony, the second marriage is to all intents and purposes void. Br. Ab. tit. Bastard, pl. 3. See 1 Inst. 9.

The next legal disability is etate. If a boy under fifteen or girl under twelve years of age marries, this marriage is only voidable, and not perfect, and when one of them comes to that age, which is for this purpose termed the age of consent, they may disagree and declare the marriage void, without any censure or sentence in the spiritual court. This is founded on the civil law. But the common law pays a greater regard to the constitution than the age of the parties; for if they are habiles ad matrimonium, it is a good marriage, whatever their age may be. And in law it is so far a marriage, that if, at the age of consent they agree to continue together, they need not be married again. Co. Lit. 79. If the husband be of years of discretion, and the wife under twelve, when she comes to years of discretion, he may disagree as well as she may; for in contracts the obligation must be mutual, both must be bound or neither; and so it is, et converso, when the wife is of years of discretion, and the husband under. Co. Lit. 79.

If persons are married before the age of consent, they may at that age disagree and marry again, without any divorce, though if they once give consent when at age, they cannot afterwards disagree, and when they are married before, they need not a new marriage, if they agree at that age. 1 Inst. 93; 2 Inst. 182. A woman cannot disagree within her age of twelve years, till which her marriage continues; and before that time her disagreement is void. 1 Danv. 699. Though if a man marries a woman under that age, and afterwards she, within her age of consent, disagrees to the marriage, and at her age of twelve years marries another; now the first marriage is absolutely dissolved, so that he may take another wife; for although the disagreement within the age of consent was not sufficient, yet her taking another husband at the age of consent and cohabiting with him, affirms the disagreement, and so the first marriage is avoided. Moor, 764. If, after disagreement of the parties, at the age of consent they agree to the marriage, and live together as man and wife, the marriage hath continuance, notwithstanding the former disagreement; but if the disagreement had been before the ordinary, they could not afterwards agree again to make it a good marriage. 1 Danv. Abr. 699.

If either party be under seven years of age, contracts of marriage are absolutely void; but marriages of princes made by the state in their behalf, at any age, are held good; though many of those contracts have been broken through. Swind. Matrimon. Contr. See Ward's Law of Nations.

The above proposition "that in contracts the obligation must be mutual," has been censured as too generally expressed; for there are various contracts between a person of full age and a minor, in which the former is bound and the latter is not. The authorities seem decisive, that it is true with regard to the contract of marriage, referred to the ages of fourteen and twelve; but it has also long been clearly settled, that it is not true with regard to contracts of marriage, referred to the minority under twenty-one. For where there are mutual promises to marry between two persons, one of the age of twenty-one, and the other under that age, the first is bound by the contract, and on the side of the minor it is voidable; or for a breach of the promise on the part of the person of full age, the minor may maintain an action, and recover damages; but no action can be maintained for a similar breach of the contract on the side of the minor. Stra. 937; Fitzgib. 175, 275.

Another incapacity arises from want of consent of parents and guardians. By the common law, if the parties themselves were of the age of consent, there wanted no other concurrence to make the marriage valid; and this was agreeable to the canon law; but by several statutes, viz. 6 & 7 Will. 3. c. 6; 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 35, penalties of 100*l.* are laid on every clergyman who marries a couple either without publications of banns (which may give notice to parents or guardians,) or without a licence, to obtain which the consent of parents or guardians must be sworn to; and the man so married forfeits 10*l.*, and the parish clerk, &c. assisting 5*l.* These statutes are confirmed by 10 Ann. c. 19, and extended to privileged places; so that if a parson so offending be a prisoner in any place, on conviction he shall be removed to the county gaol, there to remain in execution charged with the said penalty of 100*l.*, &c. Before these statutes an information was exhibited against certain persons for combination in procuring a clandestine marriage in the night, without banns or licence, between a maid-servant and a young gentleman who was heir to an estate, the person being in liquor; and they were fined 100 marks, and ordered to be committed till paid; but it doth not appear that the marriage could be made void. Cro. Car. 557.

But the evil of clandestine and improper marriages was more fully restrained by the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33, which enacted that all marriages were to be either in pursuance of banns published, of a licence, or of a special licence; and declared that all marriages by licence, where either of the parties, not being a widower or widow, should be under the age of twenty-one years, which shall be had without the consent of his or her father, if living, or if dead, of his or her guardian, and if no guardian, of his or her mother, if living and unmarried, and if no mother living and unmarried, then of the guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery, should be void. If guardian or mother, or any of them, where consent was made necessary, were non compos mentis, beyond sea, or refused to consent, and the Lord Chancellor should declare it to be a proper marriage, that should be effectual as if the guardian or mother had consented.

By the 3 Geo. 4. c. 75, marriages which had been solemnized by licence obtained without the proper consent, and which were therefore void under the above statute, were rendered valid where the parties had continued to cohabit until the death of one of them, or until the passing of the act, or where they had discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose of or during the pendency of any proceedings touching the validity of such marriage; the act excepted cases where the invalidity of the marriage had been declared by any court of competent jurisdiction, or established upon the trial of any issue, or acted upon by any judgments, decrees, or orders of court, or where either of the parties had during the life of the other lawfully intermarried with another person; and it provided that where any property, either real or personal, had been possessed, or any title of honour enjoyed on the ground of the invalidity of any such marriage, the right and interest in such property or title of honour should not be affected. These retrospective provisions did not include marriages by banns; and therefore marriages invalid under the former law, from the banns not having been duly published, are still void. See 1 Addams, 93.

The 3 Geo. 4. c. 75. also contained provisions with respect to future marriages. These, together with the old marriage act, 26 Geo. 3. c. 33. were repealed by the 4 Geo. 4. c. 76. which comprises the enactments whereby marriages are now regulated in this country.

The 2d section of this statute prescribes the mode of publishing banns, and of performing the ceremony, nearly in the same terms as the old act. § 3, 4, 5, and 6, enable the bishop of the diocese, with the consent of the patron and incumbent, to authorize the publication of banns and the solemnization of marriage in other chapels; and the laws respecting registers are extended to such chapels. The next two sections are borrowed from the old act: § 7 provides that seven days' notice of the names of the parties, their places of abode, and the time of their residence, shall be given to the minister before publication of banns; and § 8 exempts the minister from punishment for marrying minors without the consent of parents or guardians, unless with notice of their dissent: by § 9. if the marriage be not had within three months after the complete publication of banns, they must be republished in the same manner: by § 10. licences are only to be granted for marrying where one of the parties has resided for fifteen days: by § 11. if a caveat be entered against the grant of a licence, it is not to be granted until the matter has been examined by the judge out of whose office it is to issue: § 12 enacts that parishes not having any church or chapel, and extra-parochial places not having chapels in which banns may be published, shall be deemed to belong to any adjoining parish or chapel: § 13 provides that when a church or chapel is disused, from being under repair, or from being taken down to be rebuilt, the banns may be published in any place within the parish or chapel licensed by the bishop for the performance of divine service, or in the church or chapel of any adjoining parish or chapel where no place is so licensed, the marriage may be solemnized in such adjoining church or chapel; and marriages heretofore solemnized in other places within parishes or chapelries, on account of the church or chapel being under repair, or taken down to be rebuilt, are not on that account to be questioned; see 5 Geo. 4. c. 32, &c. post.

§ 14 enacts, that previous to the grant of a licence, one of the parties shall swear to his or her belief that there is no lawful impediment, and to their residence; and also where either of the parties, not being a widow or widower, is under the age of twenty-one, that the consent of the persons whose consent is required by the act has been obtained; but if there shall be no such person or persons having authority to give such consent, then upon oath made to that effect by the party requiring such licence, the licence may be granted notwithstanding the want of any such consent.

By § 15 no bond or other security is to be required on granting licences.

§ 16 declares, that the father, if living, of any minor, not being a widower or widow, or if the father shall be dead, the guardian or guardians of the person of the party lawfully appointed, or one of them; and if none, then the mother of such party, if unmarried; and if there shall be no mother unmarried, then the guardian or guardians of the person appointed by the Court of Chancery, if any, or one of them, shall have authority to give consent to the marriage; and such consent is thereby required, unless there shall be no person authorized to give such consent.

§ 17 provides, that where the father is non compos mentis, or where the guardian or mother whose consent is requisite, is non compos mentis, or beyond the seas, or unreasonably refuses to consent, the Court of Chancery may authorize the marriage. This clause corresponds with that in the old act, but it is extended to the case of the father being lunatic.

§ 18 provides for the oath of office to be taken, and the security to be given by the surrogates deputed to grant licences: by § 19 licences are to be in force for three months only: and by § 20 the power of the Archbishop of Canterbury to grant special licences is preserved.

§ 21 makes it felony, punishable by fourteen years' transportation, knowingly and wilfully to solemnize matrimony in any other place than a church or chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, or at any other time than between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon (unless by special licence,) or without due publication of banns or licence, and the same punishment is enacted for persons falsely pretending to be in holy orders, who shall solemnize matrimony according to the rites of the Church of England; prosecutions on this clause are to be commenced within three years.

§ 22 declares that if any person shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry in any other place than a church or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published (unless by special licence,) or shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns or licence from a person having authority to grant the same, or shall knowingly and wilfully consent to or acquiesce in the solemnization of such marriage by any person not being in holy orders, the marriage of such person shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

By § 23 it is enacted, that where any valid marriage of a minor, by licence, shall be procured by the false oath of either party, as to the matters required to be sworn to, such party wilfully and knowingly so swearing, or if any valid marriage of a minor by banns shall be procured by a party hereto, knowing that the minor had a parent or guardian then living, and that such marriage was had without the consent of such parent or guardian, and knowing that banns had not been duly published, and having knowingly caused or procured the undue publication of banns, the attorney or solicitor-general may file an information in the Court of Chancery or Exchequer, at the relation of a parent or guardian of the minor whose consent has not been given to such marriage, and who shall be responsible for the costs, to sue for a forfeiture of all estate, right, title, and interest in any property which hath accrued or shall accrue to the party so offending by force of such marriage; and such court shall have power in such suit to declare such forfeiture, and thereupon to order and direct that all such estate, &c. in any property as shall then have accrued, or shall thereafter accrue, to such offending party, by such marriage, shall be secured under the direction of such court, for the benefit of the innocent party, or of the issue of the marriage, or of any of them, in such manner as the court shall think fit, for the purpose of preventing the offending party from deriving any interest in real or personal estate, or pecuniary benefit from such marriage; and if both the parties so contracting marriage shall, in the judgment of the court, be guilty of any such offence as aforesaid, the court may settle and secure such property, or any part thereof, immediately for the benefit of the issue of the marriage, subject to provisions for the offending parties, by way of maintenance or otherwise, as the said court, under the particular circumstances of the case, shall think reasonable, regard being had to the benefit of the issue of the marriage during the lives of their parents, and of the issue of the parties respectively by any future marriage, or of the parties themselves in case either of them should survive the other; before filing such information, affidavit must be made of the circumstances, and that the relator had not discovered the marriage more than three months before his application to the attorney or solicitor-general: by § 24 all agreements, settlements, or deeds, upon such marriages, are made void so far as they may be inconsistent with the directions given by such courts: and by § 25 such information must be filed within a year from the solemnization of the marriage.

By § 26 proof of the residence of the parties is not required after the marriage, and evidence to prove non-residence shall not be received in any suit touching the validity of the marriage: § 27 repeats the clause in the old act, providing that no suit shall be had to compel celebration in facie ecclesiae, by reason of any contract, whether per verba de presenti or per verba de futuro.

§ 28 provides that marriages shall be had in the presence of two witnesses, and the register attested by them and by the minister: and § 29 makes it felony to insert in the register-book any false entry relating to a marriage, or to make, alter, forge, or counterfeit any such entry, or any licence of marriage, or to utter them as true, or to destroy any register-book, or any part thereof, with intent to avoid any marriage, or to subject any person to the penalties of the act.

§ 30 excepts the marriages of the royal family: and § 31 excepts the marriages of Quakers and Jews: by the last section the act is only to extend to England.

The consent required to the marriage of a minor by this act, is the same as under the old Marriage Act, except in cases where the minor is without a legal parent or guardian, and where there is therefore no person having authority to consent. In such cases the ecclesiastical judge, or the surrogate, has power to grant the licence of his own authority. But a guardian may nevertheless still be appointed by the Court of Chancery, for the purpose of consenting; and this has been done in some cases which have occurred since the act.

The guardian "lawfully appointed" is considered to mean only a guardian appointed by the father under the 12 Car. 2. c. 24. (see 1 Hag. 453); and consent to a marriage can therefore not be given by a guardian of any of the other kinds known to the law, excepting a guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery; and although the latter would in general supersede the authority of the mother, yet by the act his power with respect to marriage does not arise so long as the mother is living and unmarried.

The most important alteration in the law by the above statute, is the repeal of the clause in the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33. declaring null and void marriages not solemnized in the mode therein prescribed. By § 22 of the former act, the nullity is confined to marriages where the parties are privy to the irregularity; and it appears, as well by the language of this as of § 23, that in order to render it void, both parties must be afflicted with the fraud. If the marriage, though not conformable to the mode prescribed, be bona fide on the part of one or both of the parties, it will be good if solemnized so that it would have been valid before the old Marriage Act. See 1 B. & Ad. 640.

The first cause of nullity is marrying, knowingly and wilfully, in a place not a church or chapel, qualified for the publication of banns.

The law with respect to the place of solemnization has been extended by three subsequent acts. The 5 Geo. 4. c. 3. enacts, that marriages which had been or should be solemnized in any place within the limits of any parish or chapel licensed by the bishop for the performance of divine service during the repair or rebuilding of the church or chapel in which marriages had been usually solemnized; or if no such place should be licensed, then in a church or chapel of any adjoining parish or chapelry in which banns are usually proclaimed, whether by banns lawfully published in such church or chapel, or by licence lawfully granted, should not on that account be questioned.

The 6 Geo. 4. c. 92. confirms all marriages which had been solemnized in any church or public chapel erected and consecrated since the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33. and enacts, that in future marriages may be solemnized in all churches and chapels erected and consecrated since that time, in which it had been customary and usual, before the passing of the act (July 5th, 1825,) to solemnize marriages.

The 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 18. declares valid all marriages, the banns whereof have been published in any place used for divine service within any parish or chapelry during the repairs or rebuilding of the church or chapel thereof, which marriages have been solemnized either in the place so used, or in the church or chapel of the same or some adjoining parish or chapelry.

§ 2. during the time any church, &c. is under repair, &c. the bishop may direct the banns to be published in any consecrated chapel in the parish.

By § 3 all marriages then or thereafter to be solemnized in churches built in pursuance of the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. and 59 Geo. 3. c. 134. are declared good.

§ 4 confirms marriages then had in chapels duly consecrated, but wherein banns and marriages cannot legally be published and solemnized. This clause is to have no prospective operation.

By § 5 the validity of marriages is not to be questioned on account of the uncertainty respecting the consecration of the chapels where they take place. This section seems to be retrospective.

A fourth legal incapacity of contracting marriage is want of reason, without a competent share of which, as no other, so neither can the matrimonial contract be valid. 1 Rot. Abr. 257. See 15 Geo. 2. c. 30. for preventing the marriage of lunatics, under tit. Idiots and Lunatics, V.

A marriage solemnized clandestinely between a person of a weak and deranged mind, and the daughter of his trustee and solicitor (by whom he was treated as of unsound mind,) was declared null and void. 1 Hagg. Ec. Rep. 355.

Lastly. The parties must not only be willing and able to contract, but actually must contract themselves in due form of law, to make it a good civil marriage. Any contract made per verba de presenti, or in words of the present tense, and in case of cohabitation per verba de futuro also, between persons able to contract, was, before the marriage acts, deemed a valid marriage to many purposes, and the parties might be compelled in the spiritual courts to celebrate it in facie ecclesiae. But these verbal contracts are now of no force to compel a future marriage (see 4 Geo. 4. c. 76. § 27, ante.)

It is also essential to a marriage, that it be performed by a person in orders. Salk. 119. See Burr. Ses. Cas. 232; 1 Wils. 74. Though the intervention of a priest to solemnize this contract, is merely juris positivi, and not juris naturalis aut divini; it being said that the Pope Innocent III. was the first who ordained the celebration of marriage in the church, before which it was totally a civil contract. Moor, 170. And in the times of the grand rebellion, all marriages were performed by the justices of the peace; and those marriages were declared valid without any fresh solemnization, by 12 Car. 2. c. 33; 1 Comm. 440.

But under the 4 Geo. 4. c. 76. § 22. a marriage will be valid although celebrated by a person not in holy orders, provided one or both of the parties believed him to be a clergyman. See also 2 Hagg. 280, 288, from which it would appear that by the law of England, previous to the statutory enactments, a marriage by a person ostensibly in holy orders, and not known to the parties to be otherwise, was considered valid.

No marriage is voidable by the ecclesiastical law after the death of either of the parties, nor during their lives, unless for the canonical impediments of pre-contract (if that indeed still exists,) of consanguinity, and of affinity, or corporeal imbecility subsisting previous to the marriage. 1 Comm. 440.

By 4 Geo. 4. c. 91. marriages solemnized by any minister of the Church of England in the chapel or house of any British ambassador abroad, or in the chapel of any British factor abroad, or in the house of any British subject resident in such factory, or solemnized within the British lines by any chaplain or officer, or other person officiating under the orders of the commanding officer of a British army serving abroad, shall be as valid as if solemnized within his majesty's dominions according to forms of law; but the act is not to affect any other marriages solemnized abroad.

Previous to this act the supposed privilege of ambassadors' chapels was considered to extend only to cases where both parties were subjects of the country of the ambassador. 1 Hugg. 136. But the enacting part of the above statute is applicable, whether the parties are or are not British subjects. Marriages in factories and ambassadors' chapels, not performed by clergymen of the Church of England, are left in the same situation as before. See 4 Geo. 4. c. 67. as to marriages solemnized at St. Petersburg.

British subjects residing in British settlements abroad, are governed by the laws of England, except where alterations have been introduced by express enactment: consequently their marriages beyond the seas is the same as before the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 84. marriages solemnized in the British territories in India, by ministers of the Church of Scotland, are declared equally valid with those solemnized by clergy of the Church of England.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 45. marriages of parties, subjects, or one of them a subject of this realm, which have been solemnized at Hamburg since the abolition of the British factory there, by the chaplain appointed by the Bishop of London, or by any ministers of the Church of England officiating instead of such chaplain in the episcopal chapel of the said city, or in any other place, before witnesses, according to the rites of the Church of England, are declared valid. The act is merely retrospective, and contains no provisions for future marriages at that place.

The law regulating marriages in Ireland, with certain exceptions introduced by several statutes hereafter noticed, is the same as that which prevailed in England previous to the passing of the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33.

By the 9 Geo. 2. c. 11. marriages or matrimonial contracts of minors, entered into without due consent, may be annulled by the ecclesiastical courts in any case where either of the parties is entitled to real estate of 100*l.* per annum, or to personal estate worth 500*l.*; or where the father or mother of the minor is in possession of real estate of 100*l.* per annum, or of personal estate worth 2000*l.*

The 19 Geo. 2. c. 13. declares null marriages performed by Popish priests, if the parties, or either of them, be Protestant.

A marriage, however, solemnized by a Roman Catholic priest, is valid in Ireland, if both parties be Roman Catholic. See 2 Addams, 471.

By the 58 Geo. 3. c. 33. the provision in the 26 Geo. 2. c. 33. (repeated in the 4 Geo. 4. c. 76.) prohibiting suits in the ecclesiastical courts to compel the celebration of marriages by reason of any contracts, was extended to Ireland.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 112. so much of several Irish acts as made it felony for Roman Catholic clergymen to celebrate marriages between Protestants, or between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic, or as subjected them to a penalty of 500*l.* for marrying such parties, unless first married by a Protestant clergyman, was repealed. By § 9. the act is not to give validity to any marriage ceremony in Ireland, not now valid, or to repeal any enactments in force for preventing the performance of the marriage ceremony by degraded clergymen.

See the Irish statutes 11 Geo. 2. c. 10. § 3. and 21 & 22 Geo. 3. c. 25. relating to matrimonial contracts by Protestant dissenters, entered into in their own congregations.

In Scotland (although clandestine marriages made without due publication of banns, are punishable by act 1661, c. 34. by banishment of the clergyman, and fine and imprisonment of the parties,) yet consent and copulatio, or cohabitation united, constitute a valid marriage without any ceremony. In no case is the consent of parents or guardians required. The evidence of consent admitted is very general, such as an acknowledgment to the clergyman christening a child, or the like. By the act 1503, c. 77. where parties have lived together at bed and board, the reputed wife is entitled to her terce or dower.

The subject of the Scotch law of marriage was fully discussed and investigated in the celebrated case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, in which the evidence of many learned Scotch lawyers was produced before the court; and Sir William Scott, in a profound and luminous judgment, stated the law on the subject as applicable to the facts of the case. He said that the rule of the Scotch law was, that a contract of marriage per verba de presenti did not require consummation in order to become "very matrimony," and therefore that the marriage in that case was good, although personal intercourse was unproved; but that assuming the law to be otherwise, and that the copula was necessary to render a contract per verba de presenti a marriage, he still thought that fact established by the evidence, and that in this view of the case, according to the current of all legal authorities, the marriage was undoubtedly valid. This judgment was affirmed on appeal by the Court of Delegates. See 2 Hagg. C. R. 59.

Scotland being expressly excepted out of the marriage acts, so much of them as is calculated to defeat the marriages of minors without the consent of parents or guardians, has been frequently evaded, by going into Scotland to be married there, and returning to England immediately afterwards. Indeed the validity of such marriages was once questioned; and though, in general, marriages are governed by the laws of the country in which they are celebrated, yet it was doubted whether the lex loci ought to be applied to a case, accompanied with circumstances so strongly marking the intent to evade the law of England. See the observations of Lord Mansfield on this subject, 2 Burr. 107*v.* But in Bull. N. P. 113. there is a short note of a case, wherein this point was afterwards determined, upon an appeal to the Delegates, viz. Crompton v. Bearcroft, Dec. 1, 1768. The appellant and respondent, both English subjects, and the appellant being under age, ran away without the consent of her guardian, and were married in Scotland; and on a suit brought in the spiritual court to annul the marriage, it was holden that the marriage was good. See this case stated 2 Hagg. C. R. 444. And the same was decided in Chancery on certificates of Scotch law, in Grierson v. Grierson, Lib. Reg. A. 1780. F. 552; Sir W. Scott's judgment in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. C. R. 99. If Grana Green marriages were invalid according to English law, and depended for validity solely on the Scotch law, there would seem ground to doubt the soundness of the decisions holding them valid for it is apprehended, that when parties merely pass into Scotland to make the contract of marriage, and immediately return to England, the law of England properly governs the contract, according to Lord Mansfield's observations in Robinson v. Bland, supra, and according to the rational principle laid down by Huber, de confl. Legum, l. 1. tit. 3. §. 10. "Proinde et locus matrimonii contracti non tam is est ubi contractus nuptialis initus est, quam in quo contrahentes matrimonium exercere voluerunt; ut omni die fit homines in Francia, indigenas; aut incolas ducere uxoris in Hollandia, quas inde said in a Frisian deducant. Jus Frisicæ in hoc casu est jus loci contractus." And see another passage to the same effect, ibid. p. 538; and Co. Lit. 79 a. note 1; and 2 Addams R. 23. But by the law of England, unaffected by the Marriage Act, a marriage in the form used at Gretna Green is a good marriage, and the provisions of the Marriage Act cannot affect such marriage, since they are expressly confined to England; and this according to Sir George Hay, was the ground of decision in Crompton v. Bearcroft, in which nothing appears to have been laid before the court to show that the marriage was valid in Scotland. Vide 2 Hagg. C. R. 430. Sir W. Wynne, however (2 Hagg. 443.) states that the case was determined by the Delegates on the ground that the marriage was good by the law of Scotland. In Iderton v. Iderton, 2 H. Bla. a marriage celebrated in Scotland was held to entitle the woman to dower in England. This was not the case of a marriage by parties going to Scotland to evade the English law. However, the objection to the validity of marriages celebrated according to the laws of a foreign state, to which parties have resorted to avoid the restrictions existing in their own country, has not prevailed either with respect to marriages in Scotland, or in other places out of England (2 Hagg. 443.); and there does not appear to be any exception to the rule "that a foreign marriage valid according to the law of the place where celebrated, is good every where else." 2 Hagg. 390.

By the 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 38, so much of two acts passed in the parliament of Scotland (1 Parl. Car. 2, sess. 1, c. 11, an. 1661, 1 Parl. Wm. sess. 7, c. 9, an. 1678) as prohibited the celebration of marriages in Scotland by Roman Catholic priests in Scotland, is repealed.

§ 2 enacts, that persons in Scotland, after due proclamation of banns there, may be married by priests or ministers not of the established church of Scotland.

Of the Effect of Marriage by operation of law, &c.—With respect to the interest which the husband takes in the real and personal estates of the wife, see Baron and Feme, IV.

The wife doth partake of the name, so of the nature and condition of the husband by the marriage; for if she be an earl's wife, she is a countess; if a knight's wife, a lady; and if he be an alien and made a denizen, the wife is so likewise. 29 H. 6. 45; 4 H. 7. 81; Bro. 499.

Matrimonial causes, or injuries respecting the rights of marriage, are one branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; though if marriages are considered in the light of a civil contract, they do not seem to be very properly of spiritual cognizance. This, however, was collected by the usurpation of the church under the Catholic system; and causes matrimonial are now so peculiarly ecclesiastical, that the temporal courts will never interfere in controversies of this kind, unless in some particular cases. As, if the spiritual court do proceed to call a marriage in question, after the death of either of the parties; this the courts of common law will prohibit, because it tends to bastardize and disinherit the issue, who cannot so well defend the marriage as the parties themselves, who both of them are living, and have done.

Of matrimonial causes one of the first and principal is causa pacti latius matrimonii, where one of the parties boasts or gives out that he or she is married to the other, whereby a common reputation of their matrimony may ensue. On this ground the party injured may libel the other in the spiritual court; and unless the defendant undertakes and makes out a proof of the actual marriage, he or she is enjoined perpetual silence on that head; which is the only remedy ecclesiastical courts can give for this injury. Another species of matrimonial causes was when a party, contracted to another, brought a suit in the ecclesiastical court to compel a celebration of the marriage in pursuance of such contract; but this branch of causes is now cut off entirely by the marriage act above stated. The suit for restitution of conjugal rights is also another species of matrimonial causes; which is brought whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason; in which case the ecclesiastical jurisdiction will compel them to come together again, if either party be weak enough to desire it contrary to the inclination of the other. See 3 Comm. c. 7. p. 93, 94. Divorces and suits for alimony are also subjects of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as to which see Baron and Feme, II.; Divorce.

The temporal courts by the 28 Hen. 8, c. 7. are to determine what marriages are within or without the Levitical degrees; and prohibit the spiritual courts if they impeach any persons from marrying within these degrees. And it is said, were it not for that statute, we should be under no obligation to observe the Levitical degrees. Vaugh. 206; 2 Vent. 9.

Although matrimonial causes have been for a long time determinable in the ecclesiastical courts, they were not so from the beginning; for as well causes of matrimony as testamentary were civil causes, and appertained to the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate, until kings allowed the clergy cognizance of them. Davis's Rep. 51. If persons married are infra annos nubiles, the ecclesiastical judges are to judge as well of the assent, whether sufficient, &c. as of the first contract; and where they have cognizance the common law judges ought to give credit to their sentences, as they do to our judgments. 7 Rep. 23. See the Duchess of Kingston's Ca. 11 St. Tr. 198.

Loyalty or lawfulness of marriage is always to be tried by the bishop's certificate; or inquisition taken before him, on examining of witnesses, &c. Dyer, 303. If the right of marriage comes naturally in question, as in dower, &c. the lawfulness of marriage is to be tried by the bishop's certificate; but in a personal action, where the right of marriage is not in question, it is triable by a jury at common law. 1 Lev. 41. Whether a woman is married, or she is the wife of such a person, is triable by a jury; and in personal actions it is right to lay the matter upon the fact of the marriage, to make it issuable and triable by a jury, and not upon the right of the marriage, as in real actions and appeals. 1 Inst. 112; 3 Salk. 64. If the marriage of the husband is in question, marriage in right ought to be, and that shall be tried by certificate. 1 Leon. 53. But if on covenant to do such a thing to another upon the marriage of a man's daughter, the party alleges that he did marry her, &c. this shall be tried per pais; for the marriage is only in issue, and not whether he was lawfully espoused. Cro. Car. 102.

Conditions against marrying generally are void in law; and if a condition is annexed to a legacy, as where money is given to a woman, on condition that she marries with consent of such a person, &c. such a condition is void by the ecclesiastical law, because the marriage ought to be free without coercion; yet it is said it is not so at the common law. 2 Nels. Abr. 1162; Poph. 58, 59; 2 Lill. 192. See Condition, Legacy.

There being divers advantages by marriage to the man and the woman; therefore, on promise of marriage, damages may be recovered, if either party refuse to marry; but the promise must be mutual on both sides, to ground the action. 1 Salk. 24. And if there be reciprocal promises of marriage, as the woman's promise to the man is a good consideration to make his obligatory; so his promise to her is a sufficient consideration to make hers binding; and though no time for marriage be agreed on, if the plaintiff prove tender, and offer to marry defendant, and refusal by defendant, or if defendant marry another, whereby performance of the promise is, in law, rendered impossible, action lies, and damages are recoverable. Carthem, 467. These promises are not affected by the provisions of the Marriage Act, as relate to actions brought for their non-performance.

If a man and a woman make mutual promises of inter-marriage, and the man gives the woman 100*l.* which she accepts in satisfaction of his promise of marriage, it is a good discharge of the contract. Mod. Cas. 156. By the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. no action shall be brought upon any agreement on consideration of marriage, except it be put in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, &c. And where an agreement relating to marriage must be in writing after a year, and when it need not, vide Skinn. 359. Observe the words, they are upon any agreement on consideration of marriage, which is essentially different from mutual promises of the parties to marry each other. And which latter are not within the statute. See Assumpsit, II.

An administrator cannot maintain an action for a breach of promise of marriage to the intestate, where no special damage is alleged. 2 Mau. & Selw. 408.

An ancient statute, 31 Hen. 6. c. 9. still appears on our statute books to invalidate bonds and securities taken from women under duress of imprisonment by threats of forcible marriage, &c.

Contracts and bonds for money to procure marriage between others are usually called marriage-brochage agreements or bonds. Concerning these see the Treatise of Equity (8vo.) p. 249—254.

Wherever a parent or guardian insist upon a private gain or security for it, and obtain it of the intended husband, it shall be set aside; for the power of a parent or guardian ought not to be made use of to such purposes. And it is now a settled rule that if the father, on the marriage of his son, takes a bond of the son to pay him so much, &c. it is void, being done by coercion while he is under the awe of his father. Nor will the court only decree a marriage-brochage bond to be delivered up, but also a gratuity actually paid to be refunded (2 Vern. 292); for such bond or contract is in no case to be countenanced. A bond to procure marriage, though between persons of equal rank and fortune, is void as being of dangerous consequence. See 3 Lev. 41; 1 Salk. 156.

From the case of Grisley v. Lothor, Hob. 10. it should seem that though the procuring of a marriage is not a consideration in equity, it is a sufficient consideration in law, and of that opinion Holt, C. J. appears to have been in Hale v. Potter, 3 Lev. 411; and the circumstance of the bond in that case having been ultimately cancelled by a decree of the House of Lords, does not affect the rule of law; as that decision was upon an appeal from the decree in equity which had declared the bond to be good; as courts of equity do not in such cases interpose for the benefit of the party, so much as on considerations of public policy. See Law v. Law, Forrest. 142; but query whether the vice of such consideration could not now be pleaded at law. 2 Wils. 347, Collings v. Blantern.

That equity will relieve against bonds to strangers, for procuring of marriage, see 1 Chan. Rep. 47; 3 Ch. Rep. 18; 2 Ch. Ca. 176; 1 Vern. 412; 1 Vez. 503; 3 Atk. 566; and as these contracts are avoided on reasons of public inconvenience, the Court of Exchequer, in Shirley v. Martin, 14 Nov. 1779, held that they would not admit of subsequent confirmation by the party. See also Booth v. Warrington, (E.) Cases in Parl. 8vo. Fraud. Ca. 6.

An obligation procured from an infant by the father of his intended wife, in fraud of marriage articles agreed to by the infant and his friends, is absolutely void. Morison v. Arlathnot (Ld., Parl. Ca. 8vo. viii. pa. 247. Appendix, II. Ca. 1.

If a man before marriage gives bond and judgment to the wife, to leave her worth 1000*l.* at his death, in consideration of a marriage portion, this shall be made good out of the husband's estate, and satisfied before any debts; provided a judgment be not obtained against him with her consent. An intended husband, in consideration of a marriage, covenanted with the intended wife, that if she would marry him, and she should happen to survive him, he would leave her worth 500*l.* The marriage took effect, and the wife survived, and he did not leave her worth that money; she married a second husband, and he brought an action of debt against the administrator of the first husband for the 500*l.* To which it was objected, that this being a personal action, it was suspended by the marriage, which was a release in law, and so extinct; but the plaintiff had judgment, for the action is not suspended, because during the coverture there was no action; nothing in this case is due whilst the coverture takes place, and the debt arises by the death of the husband. Palm. 99; 2 Sid. 58.

A bond was given by a man, reciting, he was to marry A. S. and that if the marriage took effect, and he did survive her, then, within three months after her decease, he would pay to the obligee 300*l.* for such uses as the said A. S. by any writing under her hand and seal, subscribed and published in the presence of two witnesses, should direct and appoint; this marriage bond was adjudged good. 3 Cro. 376; Yelv. 226, 227.

In case articles are entered into before marriage, and afterwards a settlement is made different therefrom, the Court of Chancery will set up the articles against it; but where both are finished before the marriage had, at a time when all parties are at liberty, such settlement will be taken as a new agreement between them; this is the general rule, unless the deed of settlement is expressly mentioned to be made in pursuance of the marriage articles, &c. whereby the intent may still appear to be the same. Talb. 20. Articles of marriage were made for settling lands on the husband and wife, and the heirs male and female of the body of the husband by the wife, &c. and a settlement was drawn contrary to these articles, long after which the husband suffered a recovery, and devised the land to others; it was here held to be no bar to the heirs female, who were decreed to have the land. 2 P. Williams, 349, 355. Yet it is said, where relief is to be given in equity on a settlement, it must be only to the persons who claim as purchasers, as the first and other sons; and all remainders after to the husband's heirs of his body, or his right heirs, are voluntary, and not to be aided. Abr. Cas. Eq. 385.

Though a term to raise daughters' portions, payable at the age of eighteen, or day of marriage, in a marriage settlement is limited in remainder, to commence after the death of the father generally; or if it be in case he die without issue male of his wife, and she dies first without such issue, leaving a daughter, &c. In equity the term is saleable during the lifetime of the father, when the daughter is eighteen years old, or married; because every thing hath happened and is past which is contingent, for it is impossible there should be issue made of the wife when she is dead; and as to the father's death that is not contingent, but certain, by reason all men must die; but if there is a contingency not yet happened, as if the daughters are to be unmarried, or not provided for at the time of the father's death, &c. it is otherwise. 1 Salk. 159.

Upon marriages, the settlements generally made of the estate of the husband, &c. are to the husband for life, after his death to the wife for life for her jointure, and to their issue in remainder, with limitations to trustees to support contingent uses, leases to trustees for terms of years, to raise daughters' portions, &c. And they are made several ways by lease and release, covenant to stand seised to uses, &c.

These settlements the law is ever careful to preserve, especially that part of them which relates to the wife, of which she may not be divested, but by her own fine, (but now she must convey by deed properly acknowledged, see Feme) and if a woman about to marry, to prevent her husband's disposal of her land, conveys it to friends in trust, and they with the husband, after marriage, make sale of the same.

the Court of Chancery will decree the purchaser to reconvey to her. Tottil, 43.

Where a woman on marriage, by the man's consent, makes over her estate, to be at her own disposal, the product or increase thereof she can also dispose of; and if the wife has a separate maintenance settled on her by the husband, she may, by writing in the nature of a will, give away what she saves, if she dies before the husband; and shall have the same herself, in case she outlives him and it shall not be liable to his debts. Preced. Canc. 255, 44. But where a settlement is made on the wife, in consideration of her whole fortune and equivalent to it; here the wife's portion, though it be out on bonds, &c. which upon the death of the husband by law survives to the wife, shall in equity be subject to the husband's bond-debts, after his decease, to ease the real estate of the heir. Ibid. 63. And it has been likewise held, that if after the wife's death, debts of her's appear, the husband shall be answerable for the debts of the wife, so far as he had any money or estate of hers. Ibid. 252.

If a man in mean circumstances marry a woman of fortune, upon suggestion and proof of larceny in the wife by her friends, the court will order her estate to be so settled, that she may not be wrought on by her husband to give it to him from her children, by him or any other husband, &c. Skinn. 110.

As to the forcible carrying off and marrying of women for the sake of their fortunes, see Abduction. See further Baron and Feme, Chancery, Bankrupt, Dower, Jointure, &c.

MARROW. Was a lawyer of great account in Henry VIII's days, whose learned readings are extant, but not in print. Lamb. Eirenarch, lib. 1. cap. 10.

MARSHAL, Marescallus, Fr. Mareschal.] It seems to signify as much as tribunus militum, with the ancient Romans; it has also been derived from the German marschalk, i. e. equitum magister, which Holoman in his Feuds, under verb. marschaleus, derives from the old word march, which signifies a horse; others make it of the Sax. mar, i. e. equus, or scutellus, protectus.

With us there are several officers of this name; the chief whereof is the earl marshal of England, mentioned in 1 Hen. 4. c. 24; 8 Rich. 2. c. 5; 12 Rich. 2. st. 1. c. 2. &c. whose office consists especially in matter of war and arms, as well in this kingdom as in other countries. This office is very ancient, having formerly greater power annexed to it than now; it has been long hereditary in the family of the Duke of Norfolk. Vide Lupanus de Magistratibus Francie, lib. 1. c. Marshallus; and Titus, lib. 2. c. De Constabili Maris, &c.; see also tit. Constable, Court of Chivalry, Court Martial.

The next is the marshal of the king's house, otherwise called knight marshal, his authority is exercised to the king's palace, in hearing and determining all pleas of the crown, and suits between those of the king's house and other persons within the verge, and punishing felons committed there, &c. See 28 Edw. 1. st. 3. c. 3. 18 Edw. 1. c. 7. 1 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 6; 8 Rich. 2. c. 5; 2 Hen. 4. c. 13; Crompt. Jurisd. 192. Fleta mentions a marshal of the king's court, to whom it belongs, when the tables are prepared, to call out those of the household and strangers, according to their rank and quality, and properly place them. Fleta, lib. 1. cap.

There are other inferior officers called marshals, as marshal of the justice in Eyre, anno 13 Edw. 1. c. 10.

MARSHAL OF THE KING'S BENCH. See 5 Edw. 3. cap. 8. who hath the custody of the King's Bench prison in Southwark. This officer gives attendance upon the court, and takes into his custody all prisoners committed by the court; he is fineable for his absence: and non attendance is a forfeiture of his office. Hil. 21 & 22 Car. 2. By 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 27. grants of the King's Bench and Fleet prisons are to be enrolled, and the office of marshal and warden of the King's Bench and Fleet, is to be executed by those who have the inheritance of those prisons. The power of appointing the marshal of the King's Bench, which had been granted in fee by King James I. was reverted in the crown by 27 Geo. 2. c. 17. and the office subjected to the control of the Court of King's Bench.

There is a deputy marshal of the King's Bench appointed by the marshal, who must reside within the prison or its rules, (4 T. R. 716; 5 T. R. 511); as indeed ought also the marshal by R. M. 2 Geo. 4. and according to the fifth section of the above act and his patent.

There is also a marshal of the Exchequer, to whom that court commits the custody of the king's debtors for securing the debts; he likewise formerly assigned to sheriffs, customers, and collectors, their auditors, before whom they should account. 51 Hen. 3. st. 5.

There is likewise a marshal or provost marshal of the admiralty, whose duty it is to act ministerially, under the orders of the Court of Admiralty in securing prizes, executing warrants for these and other purposes, arresting and attending the execution of criminals, &c. See 45 Geo. 3. c. 72. § 117; and other Prize Acts.

MARSHAL AND STEWARD OF THE KING'S HOUSEHOLD AND MARSHALSEA. Of what things they should hold plea. Art. super Cartas, 28 Edw. 1. st. 3. c. 3; 8 Rich. 2. c. 5.

MARSHALSEA, Marescallia.] The court or seat of the marshal; of whom see Crompt. Jur. 120. It is also used for the prison in Southwark; the reason whereof may be, because the marshal of the king's house was wont perhaps to sit there in judgment, or keep his prison. See 9 Rich. 2. c. 5; 2 Hen. 4. c. 23. King Charles the First erected a court by letters patent under the great seal, by the name of curia hospitii domini regis, &c. which takes cognizance more at large of all causes than the Marshalsea could; of which the knight marshal or his deputy are judges. Cowell. See Court of Marshalsea, King's Bench Prison.

MART. A great fair for buying and selling goods, holden every year. 2 Inst. 221. See Fair, Market.

MARTIAL LAW. The law of war, that depends upon the just but arbitrary power and pleasure of the king, or his lieutenant; for though the king doth not make any laws but by common consent in parliament, yet in time of war, by reason of the necessity of it, to guard against dangers that often arise, he useth absolute power, so that his word is a law. Smith de Repub. Angl. lib. 2. c. 4. This power, however, is now regulated by act of parliament. See Court Martial.

MARTYROLOGY, Martyrologium.] A book of martyrs, containing the lives, &c. of those men who died for their religion. Also a calendar or register kept in religious houses, wherein were set down the names and donations of their benefactors, and the days of their death, that upon every anniversary they might commemorate and pray for them: such benefactors usually made it a condition of their benefice to be inserted in the martyrology. Paroch. Antiq. 189.

MASAGIUM. Anciently used for messuagium, a messuage. Pat. 16 Rich. 2.

MASKS. The penalty of selling or keeping visor masks, see the ancient stat. 3 Hen. 3. c. 9.

MASONS. To plot confederacies amongst masons, was, by an obsolete stat. 3 Hen. 6. c. 1. declared felony. Vide tit. Conspiracy.

MASS-PRIEST. In former times secular priests, to distinguish them from the regulars, were called mass-priests, and they were to officiate at the mass, or in the ordinary service of the church; hence messe prest, in many of our Saxon canons, for the parochial minister; who was likewise sometimes called messe thegne, because the dignity of a priest in many cases was thought equal to that of a thein, or lay lord. But afterwards the word mass-priest was restrained to stipendiaries retained in chantries, or at particular altars, to say many masses for the souls of the dead.

MAST, Glaus Pessona. The acorns and nuts of the oak, or other large tree.—Glandi, nomine continentur glans, castanea, fagina, ficus et mices, et alia quæque quæ edi et pasci poterunt præter herbam. Bract. lib. 4. Tempus pessone often occurs for mast-time, or the season when mast is ripe; which in Norfolk they call shacking-time.—Quod habeat decem porcos in tempore de pessona in bosco meo. Mon. Angl. ii. 113, 231.

MASTER, Magister. Signifies in general a governor, teacher, &c. and also in many cases an officer. See Servant.

MASTER AND SERVANT. The relation between a master and a servant, from the superiority and power which it creates on the one hand, and duty, subjection, and, as it were, allegiance on the other, is in many instances applicable to other relations, which are in a superior and subordinate degree; such as lord and bailiff, principal and attorney, owners and masters of ships, merchants and factors, and all others having authority to enforce obedience to their orders, from those whose duty it is to obey them, and whose acts, being conformable to their duty and office, are esteemed the acts of their principals. See Apprentice, Labourer, Servant.

MASTER OF THE ARMORY, Magister Armorum et Armaturæ Regis. An officer who hath the care of his majesty's arms and armory, mentioned in the ancient stat. 39 Eliz. c. 7.

MASTER OF THE CEREMONIES, Magister Admissionum. One who receives and conducts ambassadors and other great persons to audience of the king, &c. This office was instituted by King James I. for the more magnificent reception of ambassadors and strangers of the greatest quality.

MASTER OF, OR IN CHANCERY, Magister Cancellariæ. In the chancery there are masters, who are assistants to the lord chancellor or lord keeper, and master of the rolls; of these there are some ordinary, and some extraordinary. The masters in ordinary are twelve in number, of whom the master of the rolls is chief; and some sit in court every day during term, and have referred to them interlocutory orders for stating accounts, computing damages, and the like; they also administer oaths, take affidavits, and acknowledgments of deeds and recognizances; they also examine on reference the propriety of bills in chancery, which if they report to be scandalous or impertinent, such matter must be struck out, and the defendant shall have his costs. The extraordinary masters are appointed to act in the country, in the several counties of England, beyond twenty miles' distance from London, by taking affidavits, recognizances, acknowledgments of deeds, &c. for the ease of the suitors of the court.

The masters in ordinary have also the custody of such title-deeds and original instruments as the court thinks fit to place under their care, for the security and benefit of the parties interested therein.

They attend the lord chancellor and master of the rolls at the sitting of the court, according to an ascertained rotation, take their seats upon the bench and remain there until they are permitted to retire, which is usually soon after the sitting, that they may attend to the business of their respective offices.

In order to provide for the indisposition or unavoidable absence of the chancellor or the master of the rolls, there is a commission addressed to the then puisne judges and the then masters, authorizing any three of them, of whom a judge is to be one, to transact the business of the court. When the business of the court is despatched under the authority of this commission, it has been done by one judge and two masters, who sit with the judge, join in making the orders, and constitute a necessary part of the court.

Two masters attend the House of Peers every day it sits, and are employed by that House in carrying their messages to the House of Commons, except such as relate to the royal family, which are usually carried by the judges; such masters as are members of the House of Commons do not join in executing this duty. On the trial of a peer, or of any person impeached by the Commons, all the masters attend every day. The masters also attend coronations and processions of state.

By the 13 Car. 2. st. 1, in the Appendix, a public office was ordained to be kept near the rolls for the masters in chancery; in which they, or some of them, are constantly to attend for administering oaths, caption of deeds, and despatch of other business; and their fees for taking affidavits, acknowledgment of deeds, exemplifications, reports of certificates, &c. are ascertained by that act; and to take more incurrs disability for such master to execute his office, and a forfeiture of 100*l.* &c.

The practice now is for one master to attend every day at the public office established by the above act. When any person is unable, from sickness or any other cause, to go to the public office, the master waits upon him at any distance not exceeding twenty miles from London.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 94. § 16. the appointment of all masters in ordinary of the Court of Chancery, other than the accountant-general, is vested in the crown, and such masters are to be appointed by letters-patent under the great seal, and to take the usual oaths before the lord chancellor in like manner as such oaths have been heretofore administered.

The above act contains various provisions relating to the duties of the masters in chancery.

There are attached to each master's office two clerks one is the chief clerk and the other a copying clerk.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 94. § 18. the chief clerk of any master must have been admitted on the roll of solicitors or attorneys in one of the courts of Westminster Hall five years, or have been a junior clerk in a master's office for ten years.

See further Chancellor, Chancery.

MASTER OF THE COURT OF WARDS AND LIVERIES. The chief officer of that court, assigned by the king; to whose custody the seal of the court was delivered, &c. as appears by the 33 Hen. 8. c. 33. But as this court was abolished by 12 Car. 2. c. 24. this office of course dropped with it.

MASTER OF THE FACULTIES, Magister facultatum. An officer under the Archbishop of Canterbury, who grants licenses and dispensations, &c.

MASTER OF THE HORSE. He who hath the ordering and government of the king's stables; and of all horses, racers, and breeds of horses belonging to his majesty; he has the charge of all revenues appropriated for defraying the expense of the king's breed of horses, of the stable, litters, sumpter-horses, coaches, &c. and has power over the equerries and pages, grooms, coachmen, farriers, smiths, saddlers, and all other artificers working for the king's stables, to whom he administers an oath to be true and faithful; but the accounts of the stables, of liveries, wages, &c. are kept by the averner; and by him brought to be passed and allowed by the court of green cloth.

The office of master of the horse is of high account, and always bestowed upon some great nobleman; and this officer only has the privilege of making use of any horses, footmen or pages belonging to the king's stables; at any solemn cavalcade he rides next to the king, with a led horse of state. He is the third great officer of the king's household, being next to the lord steward and lord chamberlain, and is mentioned in 39 Eliz. c. 7.

MASTER OF THE JEWEL OFFICE. An officer of the king's household, having the charge of all plate used for the king or queen's table, or by any great officer at court; and also of the royal plate remaining in the Tower of London, and of chains and jewels not fixed to any garment. See 39 Eliz. c. 7.

MASTER OF THE HOUSEHOLD, Magister Hospitii Regis. Otherwise called grand master of the king's household, now styled lord steward of the household, which title this officer hath borne ever since ann. 32 H. 8. But under him there is a principal officer still called master of the household, who surveys the accounts, and has great authority.

MASTER OF THE KING'S MUSTERS. A martial officer in the king's armies, to see that the forces are complete, well-armed, and trained; and to prevent frauds, which would otherwise waste the prince's treasure, and weaken the forces, &c.

MASTER OF THE MINT. An officer who receives the silver of the gold-smiths, and pays them for it, and oversees every thing belonging to the mint; he is at this day called warden of the mint. See further Mint.

MASTER OF THE ORDNANCE. A great officer to whose care all the king's ordnance and artillery is committed. See 39 Eliz. c. 7.

MASTER OF THE POSTS. Was an officer of the king's court, who had the appointing, placing, and displacing of all such through England as provided post-horses for the speedy passing of the king's messages, letters, packets, and other business; and was to see that they kept a certain number of good horses of their own, upon occasion that they provided others for furnishing those persons who had a warrant from him to take and use post-horses, either from or to the seas, or other places within the realm; he likewise paid their wages, settled their allowances, &c. See 2 Edw. 6. c. 3.

This office is now superseded by the establishment of a regular Post-office; see that title.

MASTER OF THE REVELS. An officer to regulate the diversions of dancing and masking, used in the palaces of the king, inns of court, &c. and in the king's court, is under the lord chamberlain. His power is very much abridged since the time of Charles II. when patents were granted for public theatres in London, &c.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS, Magister Rotulorum. An assistant to the lord chancellor in the high court of chancery, who, in his absence, hears causes there, and also at the chapel of the rolls, and makes orders and decrees. Crompt. Jurisd. 41. His title in his patent is, Clericus parvæ Bagæ, Custos Rotulorum, &c. And he has the keeping of the rolls of all patents and grants which pass the great seal, and the records of the chancery. He is called clerk of the rolls, 12 Rich. 2. c. 2. and in Fortescue, c. 24; and nowhere master of the rolls, until the 11 Hen. 7. c. 18. In which respect, Sir Thomas Smith says, he may not unfitly be styled Custos Archivorum. In his disposition are the offices of the six clerks, and the clerks of the petty bag, examiners of the court, and clerks of the chapel.

The office of the master of the rolls is as ancient as the court itself. 2 Com. Dig. 208.

Unlike that of the vice-chancellor it partakes in its nature of a distinct jurisdiction, and the suitor may elect whether he will have his cause heard and decided before the lord chancellor or the master of the rolls.

The master of the rolls hears and makes decrees and orders in all causes and matters belonging to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery, which the suitors think proper to bring before him, with the exception (specified in the 3 Geo. 2. c. 30. of "orders and decrees of such nature and kind as according to the course of the said court, ought only to be made by the lord chancellor, lord keeper, or lords commissioners of the great seal for the time being."

Previous to the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 94. the master of the rolls did not hear motions, pleas, or demurrers in his court, and whatever was presented for his decision other than the hearing of causes, was brought before him by petition. Now by § 24 of that statute, he is required "to hear and determine all such motions arising in causes depending in the high court of chancery, as shall be duly made before him according to the usage and practice of making motions in causes before the lord chancellor, and to hear and determine all such pleas and demurrers filed in causes depending in the high court of chancery as shall be duly set down for hearing before him." All orders so made are declared valid, subject nevertheless to be discharged, reversed, or altered by the lord chancellor.

By the 1 Geo. 4. c. 107. the rents, issues, and profits of the Rolls' estate (see 12 Car. 2. c. 26; 3 Geo. 2. c. 33.) are granted to the master of the rolls for the time being, and the dividends of 4031*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*, (remaining as a fund for repairing the above estate,) are directed to be paid to him by the accountant-general as they accrue, subject nevertheless to any order of the court. See further, Chancery.

MASTER OF A SHIP. See Insurance.

MASTER OF THE TEMPLE. The founder of the order of knight templars, and his successors, were called Magni Templi Magistri; and probably from hence he was the spiritual guide and director of the Temple. The master of the Temple here was summoned to parliament anno 49 Hen. 3. The chief minister of the Temple church in London is now called master of the Temple. Dugd. War. 706.

MASTER OF THE WARDROBE, Magister Garderobe. A considerable officer at court, who has the charge and custody of all former kings' and queens' ancient robes remaining in the Tower of London; and all hangings, bedding, &c. for the king's houses; he hath also the charge and delivery out of all velvet or scarlet cloth allowed for liveries, &c. Of this officer mention is made in 39 Eliz. c. 7. The lord chamberlain has the oversight of the officers of the wardrobe.

MASTIVUS. A great dog; a mastiff. Knight, lib. 2. c. 15.

MASURA TERRÆ, Fr. mesure de terre. A quantity of ground, containing about four oxgangs. Domicilium cum fundo; or fundus cum domicilio competentis. See Domesday.

MATRICULA. A register; as in the ancient church there was matricula clericorum, which was a catalogue of the officiating clergy; and matricula pauperum, a list of the poor to be relieved; hence to be entered in the register of the universities, is to be matriculated, &c.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. Or injuries respecting the rights of marriage, are a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. See Marriage.

MATRIMONIUM. Is sometimes taken for the inheritance descending to a man ex parti matris. Blount.

MATRIX ECCLESIA. The mother church; and is either a cathedral, in respect of the parochial churches within the same diocese; or a parochial church, with respect to the chapels depending on it, and to which the people resort for sacraments and burials. Leg. H. 1. c. 19.

MATRONS, Jury of. When a widow feigns herself with child, in order to exclude the next heir, and a supposition birth is suspected to be intended, then upon the writ de ventre inspiciendo, a jury of women is to be impanelled to try the question, whether with child or not. Cro. Eliz. 566. So if a woman is convicted of a capital offence, and being condemned to suffer death, pleads in stay of execution, that she is pregnant, a jury of matrons is impanelled to inquire into the truth of the allegation; and if they find it true, the convict is respited until after her delivery. See Ventre inspiciendo, Execution of Criminals.

MATTER IN DEED, AND MATTER OF RECORD. Are often mentioned in law proceedings, and differ thus: the first seems to be nothing else but some truth or matter of fact to be proved by some specialty, and not by any record; and the latter is that which may be proved by some record. For example, if a man be sued to an exigent during the time he was abroad in the service of the king, &c. this is matter in deed, and he that will allege it for himself, must come before the scire facias for execution be awarded against him; but after that, nothing will serve but matter of record, that is, some error in the process appearing upon the record. There is also a difference between matter of record and matter in deed, and nude matter; the last being a naked allegation of a thing done, to be proved only by witnesses, and not either by record or specialty. Old. Nat. Br. 19; Kitch. 216.

MAUGRE, from the Fr. mal and gre, i. e. animo iniquo.] Signifies as much as to say with an unwilling mind, or in despite of another; as where it is said, that the wife shall be remitted, maugre the husband, that is, whether the husband will or not. Lit. § 672; see Malo Grato.

MAUM. A soft brittle stone in some parts of Oxfordshire; and in Northumberland they use the word maum for soft and mellow. Plot's Nat. Hist. Oxfordsh. p. 63.

MAUND. A kind of great basket or hamper, containing eight bales, or two fats; it is commonly a quantity of eight bales of unbound books, each bale having one thousand pounds' weight. Old Book of Rates, p. 3.

MAUNDY THURSDAY. The Thursday before Easter. See Mandati Dies.

MAUPIGYRNUM. An old sort of broth or pottage. Comell.

MAXIMS IN LAW. Positions and theses, being conclusions of reason, and universal propositions, so perfect, that they may not be impugned or disputed. Comell; Co. Lit. 343.

A maxim in law is said to be a proposition of all men confessed and granted, without argument or discourse. Maxims of the law are holden for law; and all other cases that may be applied to them shall be taken for granted. 1 Inst. 11, 67; 4 Rep. See 1 Comm. c. 68.

A maxim is a sure foundation or ground of art, and a conclusion of reason; so called quia maxima est ejus dignitas et certissima autoritas, atque quid maximè probetur, so sure and uncontrollable as that it ought not to be questioned; and what is elsewhere called a principle, and is all one with a rule, a common ground, postulatum or axiom. Co. Lit. 10. b; 11. a.

Maxims are the foundations of the law, and conclusions of reason; therefore ought not be impugned, but always to be admitted; but they may by reason be conferred and compared the one with the other, though they do not vary; or it may be discussed by reason, which thing is nearest the maxim, and the mean between the maxims, and which is not; but the maxims can never be impeached or impugned, but ought always to be observed, and held as firm principles and authorities of themselves. Plond. 27. b.

Maxims are principles and authorities, and part of the general customs or common law of the land; and are of the same strength as acts of parliament, when the judges have determined what is a maxim; which belongs to the judges, and not a jury. Terms de Ley; Doct. & Stud. Dial. 1. c. 8.

The alterations of any of the maxims of the common law are dangerous. 2 Inst. 210.

The maxims in our books, which are many and various, are such as the following, viz., it is a maxim, that freehold land shall descend from the father to the eldest son, &c. It is a maxim, that as no estate can be vested in the king without matter of record, so none can be divested out of him but by matter of record; for things are dissolved as they are contracted. Rep. 1, Cholmeys case. Another, that an obligation, or other matter in writing, cannot be discharged by an agreement by word. Co. Lit. 141.

The maxim that allegiance is due more by reason of the crown than of the person of the king, condemned. Exch. Hug. le Despenser, 15 Edm. 2. st. 3.

It was also a maxim, that if a man have issue two sons by divers venters, and the one of them purchase lands in fee, and die without issue, the other brother shall never be his heir, &c.; but this is now altered. See Descent.

MAYHEM. See Maitem.

MAYOR, Præfectus urbis, anciently meyr; comes from the Brit. miret, i. e. custodire; or from the old English word maier, viz. potestas; and not from the Lat. major.] The chief governor or magistrate of a city or town-corporate, as the mayor of London, the mayor of Southampton, &c. King Richard I. anno 1189, changed the bailiffs of London into a mayor; and from that example king John made the bailiff of King's Lynn a mayor, anno 1204. Though the famous city of Norwich obtained not this title for its chief magistrate, till the seventh year of king Henry V. anno 1419, since when there are few towns of note, but have had a mayor appointed for government. Spelm. Gloss.

Mayors of corporations are justices of peace pro tempore and they are mentioned in several statutes. By the 13 Car. 2. st. 1. c. 1. no person should bear any office of magistracy concerning the government of any town, corporation, &c. who had not received the sacrament according to the church of England within one year before his election, and who should not take the oaths of supremacy, &c. But by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 17. a declaration is now to be made in lieu of the sacramental test. See Dissenters, Oaths.

If any one intrudes into, and thereupon executes, the office of mayor, a quo warranto information may be brought against him; and he shall be ousted and fined, &c. See Quo Warranto.

A distinction is made in cases relative to corporations between a mere usurper and an officer de facto, though not de jure. An usurper is a man who, without any colour of election, gets possession of the office, and acts in it; and the mere circumstance of being sworn into the office makes no difference; but to make an officer de facto, at least the form of an election is necessary, though on legal objections it may afterwards be overturned. Notwithstanding this distinction, however, if in point of form, it is doubtful whether there be any in the effect. Some acts, it is admitted, may be good if done by a mayor de facto, or under his authority; but it does not appear whether the same acts would be good if done by a mere usurper; some acts are certainly void if done by an usurper; and probably so, if done by a mayor de facto. Those acts which are good if done by a mayor de facto, or under his authority, are such as he may be compelled to do in favour of a person who has a precedent right to have done them. All voluntary acts not necessary to carry on the business of the corporation seem to be void, whether done by an usurper, or a mayor de facto, or under the authority of either; some necessary acts are also void in both cases. See Andr. 116, 117, 163, 388; Hardw. 147—152; Lutw. 514; 2 Str. 1090, 1109; 5 Burr. 2601, and Kyd's Law of Corporations, c. 3. § 7. But the above does not apply to acts in which strangers are interested. See Kyd.

Where an infant is actually mayor, or other chief officer of a corporation, this shall not void the acts of the corporation with respect to strangers, because these acts are not the acts of the particular persons, but of the body-corporate. But it seems that where neither the provisions of the charter, nor the usage of the corporation, expressly authorize the election of an infant into this or any other corporate office.

an infant is not capable of being elected; because, as Lord Hardwicke observed, "if an infant is not fit to manage for himself, he is improper to be a mayor for the public." See Hardw. 8; Comp. 220.

The powers and duties of a mayor, or other head officer of a corporation, depend in general on the provisions of the charters, or prescriptive usage of the corporation, or the express provisions of an act of parliament. It is commonly one of his duties, as well as of his particular privileges, to preside at the corporate assemblies; but whether in a corporation by charter this be necessarily incident to his office, where no express provision is made for that purpose, has been made a question, but never solemnly decided, and indeed all cases of such nature must chiefly depend on their own particular circumstances. See 3 Mod. 14; 2 Ld. Raym. 1237; 2 Burr. 370. In the case of a corporation by prescription, it is a question can hardly ever arise; because there must necessarily be some usage one way or the other, to show what is the power and duty of the mayor in this respect, in every such particular corporation, independently of any general principle. In every other respect it may be safely asserted, that the mayor as well as the aldermen, and other select bodies, have no other powers, authorities, or privileges, than those which they possess by charter, prescription, or act of parliament.

Where the mayor's presence is necessary at a corporate assembly, his departure before a business regularly begun be concluded, will not invalidate that particular business; but the assembly can proceed to nothing else. 1 Barnard. 35. And on the death of the mayor, or during the vacation of the office, the corporation can do no corporate act, but that of electing a new mayor. 1 Ldbr. 1, 78.

The office of the mayor or other head officer is annual, and expires on the determination of the year next after the annual charter-day on which he ought to be elected. The effect of which is, that if a mayor be chosen but a few months before the charter-day, his office only endures for that interval; and though where a mayor is improperly removed, he may be restored at any time previous to the next charter-day, yet his office then ceases and is not prolonged by reason of his amotion; and if he be not restored before such day he cannot be reinstated afterwards.

But by the provisions of some charters, the mayor or other chief officer is elected for a year, and till another be chosen; in which case, if no successor be chosen at the end of the year, the mayor of the preceding year is said to hold over. Where, however, a particular day is appointed for the election of a successor, which is generally the case, and a power of holding over is not expressly given, it does not exist by implication. Str. 394. And the preamble of the 11 Geo. 1. c. 4. (see post,) manifestly shows, that the legislature thought it was not implied; for it proceeds on the supposition, that, for want of a declaration of a new mayor on the charter day, the corporation was dissolved; which could not have been the case, if the mayor of the preceding year had a right of holding over.

Where there was a clause of holding over, it had become a practice with the mayor and other head officers of the corporations to avoid holding an election on the charter-day; by which means they continued in office for several years together. In order to put an end to this practice, the 9 Ann. c. 20, § 8. after reciting the inconvenience which had arisen from head officers of corporations, to whom it belonged to preside at the election, and make return of members to serve in parliament, being elected for two years successively, enacted, "that no person or persons who had been, or should be in such annual office for one whole year, should be capable of being chosen into the same office for the year immediately ensuing; and that where any such annual officer or officers was or were to continue for a year, and until some other person or persons should be chosen and sworn into such office, if any such officer or officers should voluntarily and unlawfully obstruct and prevent the choosing of another person to succeed into such office, at the time appointed for making another choice, he should forfeit 100*l*." See 8 Mod. 111, 127, 132.

By the 11 Geo. 1. c. 4. if no mayor or other chief officer be elected in a corporation on the day appointed by charter, by the proper officers, or such election being made, it shall afterwards become void; the next in place is to hold a court, and elect one the day following, &c. or, in default thereof, the Court of King's Bench may compel the electors to choose one, &c. by writ of mandamus, requiring the members, who have a right to vote, to assemble themselves on a day prefixed, and proceed to election, or show cause to the contrary; and mayors, &c. voluntarily absenting on the day of election, shall be imprisoned six months, and be disabled to hold any office in the corporation.

By the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 31. to avoid the profanation of the Lord's day, elections of officers of corporations and other public companies required to be held on that day, shall take place on the Saturday preceding or the Monday following. When the elections are not made on the Saturday, persons in office are to continue until the Monday. By § 2. elections not held on the Saturday or Monday as above prescribed, or becoming void, are declared to be within the provisions of the 11 Geo. 1. See further Mandamus, Quo Warranto.

The authority of mayors, as to matters not relating to their corporation, extends (among others) to the following particulars:—The 2 Edw. 3. c. 3, gives power to mayors to arrest persons carrying offensive weapons in fairs, markets, &c. to make affrays, and the disturbance of the peace.

Mayors, bailiffs, and lords of leets, are to regulate the assise of bread, and examine into the goodness thereof; and if bakers make unlawful bread, they may give it to the poor, and pillory (now abolished) the offenders, &c. 5 Hen. 3. st. 6. See Bread, Beer.

Head officers and justices of peace in corporations may inquire of forcible entries, commit the offenders, and cause the tenements to be seized, &c. within their franchises, in like manner as justices of peace in the county, 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. See Forcible Entry, II.

Mayors, &c. shall inquire into unlawful gaming, against the 33 Hen. 8. c. 9. They are to search places suspected to be gaming-houses, and levy penalties, &c. and they have power to commit persons playing at unlawful games. See Gaming.

Mayors, &c. are empowered to make inquiry into offences committed against 1 Eliz. c. 2, which requires that the common prayer be read in churches; and that the churchwardens do their duty in presenting the names of such persons as absent themselves from church on Sunday, &c.

Horses stolen, found in a corporation, may be redeemed by the owner making proof before the head officer of the corporation of the property, &c. 31 Eliz. c. 12. See Horses.

Mayors may determine whether coin offered in payment be counterfeited or not; and tender an oath to determine any question relating to it. 9 & 10 Wm. 3. c. 21.

Under various statutes, mayor and head officers of corporations are to punish drunkenness. See Drunkenness.

Mayors, &c. on receipt of precepts from sheriffs, (when writs are issued for elections,) requiring them to choose burgesses or members of parliament, by the citizens, &c. are to proceed to election, and make returns by indenture between them and the electors; and making a false return shall forfeit 40*l*. to the king, and the like sum to the party chosen, not returned, &c. 23 Hen. 6. c. 14. See 2 Geo. 2. c. 24; and tit. Parliament.

In time of sickness, a tax may be laid on inhabitants of corporations, for relieving such persons as have the plague, by mayors, &c. who are to appoint searchers and buriers of the dead; and if any infected persons shall go abroad with sores upon them, after an head officer hath commanded them to keep at home, it is felony; and if they have no sores about them, they are punishable as vagrants. 1 Jac. 1. c. 31. See Plague.

The 43 Eliz. c. 2. which directs that the father, grandfather, mother, grandmother, and children of every poor person shall be assessed towards their relief by justices, and which impowers justices of peace to order a poor's rate or tax, and overseers of the poor, &c. to place forth apprentices, and sets forth the office of overseers, gives the like authority to the head officers in corporate towns, as justices of peace have in their counties; which said justices are not to intermeddle in corporations for the execution of this law. See Poor, Justices of the Peace.

Mayors, bailiffs, and other head officers of corporate towns, &c. are to make proclamation for rioters to disperse as follows: Our sovereign lord the king charges and commands all persons assembled immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably depart to their habitations, upon pain of imprisonment, &c. And if the rioters, being twelve in number, do not disperse within an hour after, it is felony without benefit of clergy, &c. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 5. See Riots.

Matters relating to servants and apprentices may be determined by mayors, who have power to compel persons to go to service, &c. 5 Eliz. c. 4. See Apprentices, Labourers, Servants. Mayors may arrest soldiers departing without license; and they are to be present at musters; quarter and billet soldiers, &c. See Soldiers; 18 Hen. 6. c. 18; 1 Geo. 1. c. 47. &c. Persons using games on a Sunday forfeit three shillings and fourpence to the use of the poor; carriers, &c. travelling on that day twenty shillings; and persons doing any worldly labour thereon five shillings; all leviable by warrant from mayors and head officers of corporations, as well as other justices. See 1 Car. 1. c. 1; 3 Car. 1. c. 2; 29 Car. 2. c. 7; and tit. Sundays.

And mayors, &c. are to provide a mark for the sealing of weights and measures, being allowed one penny for sealing every bushel and hundred weight; and a halfpenny for every other measure and half-hundred weight, &c. Mayors and head officers of corporations, &c. shall view all weights and measures once a year, and punish offenders using false weights; and they may break or burn such weights and measures, and inflict penalties, &c. If they permit persons to sell by measures not sealed, they shall forfeit five pounds. Sealing weights not agreeable to the standard, is liable to the same penalty; and refusing to seal weights and measures subjects them to a forfeiture of forty shillings. See 31 Geo. 2. c. 17. § 9; and further tit. Measure.

For the various offences which mayors, justices, &c. have jurisdiction to punish, part of which are above enumerated, see the titles of the offences in this Dictionary, passim. See also tits. Corporation, Justices of Peace, Officers, Oaths, Mandamus, Quo Warranto, &c.

MEAL RENTS. Certain rents heretofore paid in meal by the tenants of the honour of Clun, to make meat for the lord's hounds; they are now payable in money.

MEALS. The shelves of land or banks on the sea coasts of Norfolk, are called the meals and the males. Cornell.

MEAN, or MESNE, medius.] The middle between two extremes; and that either in time or dignity. In time it is the interim betwixt one act and another, and is applied to mean profits of lands between a disseisin and recovery, &c. See Ejectment. As to dignity, there is a lord mean or mesne, that holds of another lord, and mean tenant, &c. All the land in the kingdom is, by a fiction arising from the feudal origin of the English tenures, supposed to be holden mediately or immediately of the king, who is styled the lord paramount, or above all. Such tenants as held under the king immediately, when they granted out portions of their lands to inferior persons, became also lords with respect to those inferior persons, as they were still tenants with respect to the king; and thus partaking of a middle nature were called mesne, or middle lords. So that if the king granted a manor to A., and he granted a portion of the lands to B., now B. was said to hold of A., and A. of the king; or in other words, B. held his lands immediately of A. and mediately of the king. The king was therefore styled lord paramount. A. was both tenant and lord, or was a mesne lord, and B. was called tenant paravail, or the lowest tenant being he who was supposed to make avail or profit of the land. 1 Inst. 296; 2 Comm. c. 5. p. 39. See Tenures.

The writ of mesne was in the nature of a writ of right, and lay when, upon any subinfeudation, the mean or middle lord suffered his under-tenant, or tenant paravail, to be distrained upon by the lord paramount, (whether the king or another.) for the rent due to him from the mesne lord. Booth, 136. F. N. B. 135.

In such case the tenant should have judgment to be acquitted or indemnified by the mesne lord; and if he made default therein, or did not appear originally to the tenant's writ, he should be forejudged of his mesnality, and the tenant should hold immediately of the lord paramount himself. 2 Inst. 374.

FORM OF A WRIT OF MESNE.

WILLIAM the Fourth, &c. To the Sheriff of S. Command A. B. that justly, &c. he acquit C. D. of the service which E. F. exacts from him of his freehold that he holds of the said A. B. in W. whereof the said A. who is mesne betwixt the said E. and C. ought to acquit him; and whereupon he complains that for his default he is distrained; and unless, &c.

If a man brought a writ of mesne where he was not distrained, yet it was maintainable, but then he should not have damages; for it was brought only to be acquitted, &c. And tenant for life, where the remainder was over in fee, should have this writ against the mesne. 7 Hen. 4. c. 12; 15 Hen. 6. New Nat. Br. 330. One brought a writ of mesne against a man, because he did not acquit the plaintiff of a rent-charge demanded, &c. when he by his deed bound himself and his heirs to warrant and acquit him, and it was held good; and if a man had judgment to recover in this writ, if he were not afterwards acquitted, he might have had a distringas ad acquitandum against the mesne; and seiri facias against the lord. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 9; 14 Edw. 3.

The writ of mesne is among the real actions abolished by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. See Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

MEAN PROCESS. See Mesne Process.

MEASE, messuagium.] A message or dwelling-house. Kitchen, 139; F. N. B. 2; Stat. Hibernicæ, 14 Hen. 3. 21 Hen. 8. c. 13. Also a measure of herrings, containing five hundred; the half of a thousand is called mease or meur. Merch. Dict.

MEASON-DUE, in Fr. Maison de Dieu, Domus Dei.] A house of God, a monastery, religious house, or hospital. The word is mentioned in 39 Eliz. c. 5. See Hospital.

MEASURE, mensura.] A certain quantity or proportion of any thing sold; and in many parts of England it is synonymous with a bushel.

The regulation of weights and measures, for the advantage of the public, ought to be universally the same throughout the kingdom, as they are the general criterions which reduce all things to the same or an equivalent value. But as weight and measure are things in their nature arbitrary and uncertain, it is expedient that they be reduced to some fixed rule or standard; which standard it is impossible to fix by any written law, or oral proclamation; for no man can by words only give another an adequate idea of a foot rule or a pound weight. It is therefore necessary to have recourse to some visible, palpable, material standard; by forming a comparison with which all weights and measures may be reduced to one uniform size; and the prerogative of fixing this standard our ancient law vested in the crown; as in Normandy it belonged to the duke. This standard was originally kept at Winchester; and we find in the laws of King Edgar, c. 8. near a century before the Conquest, an injunction that the one measure, which was kept at Winchester, should be observed throughout the realm. Most nations have regulated the standard of measures of length by comparison with the parts of the human body; as the palm, the hand, the span, the foot, the cubit, the ulna, (or arm ell,) the pace, and the fathom. But as these are of different dimensions in men of different proportions, our ancient historians inform us, that a new standard of longitudinal measure was ascertained by King Henry the First, who commanded that the ulna, or ancient ell, which answers to the modern yard, should be made of the exact length of his own arm. And one standard of measures of length being gained, all others are easily derived from thence; those of greater length by multiplying, those of less by subdividing, that original standard. Thus, by the statute called compositio ulnarum et perticarum, five yards and a half made a perch; and the yard was subdivided into three feet, and each foot into twelve inches; each inch being of the length of three grains of barley.

Superficial measures are derived by squaring those of length; and measures of capacity by cubing them. The standard of weights was originally taken from corns of wheat, whence the lowest denomination of weights we have is still called a grain; thirty-two of which were directed, by the statute called compositio mensurarum, to compose a pennyweight, whereof twenty make an ounce, twelve ounces a pound, and so upwards. And upon these principles the first standards were formed, which, being originally so fixed by the crown, their subsequent regulations have been generally made by the king in parliament. Thus, under King Richard I., in his parliament holden at Westminster, A. D. 1177, it was ordained that there should be only one weight and one measure throughout the kingdom, and that the custody of the assize or standard of weights and measures should be committed to certain persons in every city and borough, from whence the ancient office of the king's aubager seems to have been derived, whose duty it was, for a certain fee, to measure all cloths made for sale, till the office was abolished by the 11 & 12 Will. 3. c. 20.

In King John's time this ordinance of King Richard was frequently dispensed with for money, which occasioned a provision to be made for enforcing it in the great charters of King John and his son. 9 Hen. 3. c. 25. These original standards were called pondus regis, and mensura domini regis; and were directed by a variety of subsequent statutes to be kept in the Exchequer, and all weights and measures to be conformable thereto. But, as Sir Edward Coke observed, though this had so often by authority of parliament been enacted, yet it could never be effected; so forcible is custom with the multitude. 1 Comm. 274, &c.

Magna Carta, c. 25. ordains, "that there shall be but one measure throughout England, according to the standard in the Exchequer;" which standard was formerly kept in the king's palace, and in all cities, market towns, and villages, it was kept in the churches. 4 Inst. 273.

Selling by false measures, being an offence by the common law, may be punished by fine, &c. upon an indictment at common law, as well as by statute. The easier and more usual way of punishment is, by levying, on a summary conviction by distress and sale, the forfeiture imposed by the several acts of parliament adapted to particular frauds.

By the 5 Geo. 4. c. 74. entitled "An act for ascertaining and establishing uniformity of weights and measures," all former statutes and ordinances on the subject were repealed, and the various standard weights and measures to be used throughout the united kingdom defined.

By § 1. it is enacted, that from and after the 1st of May, 1825, the straight line or distance between the centres of the two points in the gold studs in the straight brass rod, now in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, whereon the words and figures "standard yard, 1760," are engraved, shall be the original and genuine standard of that measure of length or lineal extension called a yard; and the same straight line or distance between the centres of the said two points in the said gold studs in the said brass rod, the brass being at the temperature of sixty-two degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer, shall be denominated the "imperial standard yard," and shall be the unit or only standard measure of extension, wherefrom or whereby all other measures of extension whatsoever, whether the same be lineal, superficial, or solid, shall be derived, computed, and ascertained; and all measures of length shall be taken in parts or multiples, or certain proportions of the said standard yard; and one-third part of the said standard yard shall be a foot; and the twelfth part of such foot shall be an inch; and the pole or perch in length shall contain five such yards and a half, the furlong two hundred and twenty such yards, and the mile one thousand seven hundred and sixty such yards.

§ 2. That all superficial measures shall be computed and ascertained by the said standard yard, or by certain parts, multiples, or proportions thereof; and the rood of land shall contain one thousand two hundred and ten square yards, according to the said standard yard; and the acre of land shall contain four thousand eight hundred and forty such square yards, being one hundred and sixty square perches, poles, or rods.

§ 3. Provides for the restoration of the yard in case of its being lost or injured.

§ 4. From and after the first of May, 1828, the standard brass weight of one pound troy weight, made in the year 1758, now in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, shall be the original and genuine standard measure of weight, and that such brass weight shall be denominated the imperial standard troy pound, and shall be the unit or only standard measure of weight from which all other weights shall be derived, computed, and ascertained; and one-twelfth part of the said troy pound shall be an ounce; and one-twentieth part of such ounce shall be a pennyweight; and one-twenty-fourth part of such pennyweight shall be a grain; so that five thousand seven hundred and sixty such grains shall be a troy pound; and seven thousand such grains shall be and they are hereby declared to be a pound avoirdupois, and one-sixteenth part of the said pound avoirdupois shall be an ounce avoirdupois, and one-sixteenth part of such ounce shall be a dram.

§ 5. The pound, if lost, &c. may be restored in the manner therein mentioned.

§ 6. The standard measure of capacity, as well for liquids as for dry goods not measured by heaped measure, shall be the gallon, containing ten pounds avoirdupois weight of distilled water weighed in air at the temperature of sixty-two degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, the barometer being at thirty inches; and a measure shall be forthwith made of brass, of such contents as aforesaid, under the directions of the lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of his majesty's treasury of the united kingdom, or any three or more of them for the time being; and such brass measure shall be the imperial standard gallon, and shall be the unit and only standard measure of capacity, from which all other measures of capacity to be used, as well for wine, beer, ale, spirits, and all sorts of liquids, as for dry goods not measured by heap measure, shall be derived, computed, and ascertained; and all measures shall be taken in parts or multiples, or certain proportions of the said imperial standard gallon; and the quart shall be the fourth part of such standard gallon, and the pint shall be one-eighth of such standard gallon, and two such gallons shall be a peck, and eight such gallons a bushel, and eight such bushels a quarter of corn or other dry goods, not measured by heaped measure.

§ 7. The standard measure of capacity for coals, culm, lime, fish, potatoes, or fruit, and all other goods and things commonly sold by heaped measure, shall be the aforesaid bushel, containing eighty pounds avoirdupois of water as aforesaid, the same being made round with a plain and even bottom, and being nineteen inches and a half from outside to outside of such standard measure as aforesaid.

§ 8. In making use of such bushel, all coals and other goods and things commonly sold by heaped measure, shall be duly heaped up in such bushel, in the form of a cone, such cone to be of the height of at least six inches, and the outside of the bushel to be the extremity of the base of such cone; and three bushels shall be a sack, and twelve such sacks shall be a chaldron.

§ 9. Contracts, bargains, sales, and dealings, made with respect to any coals, culm, lime, fish, potatoes, or fruit, and all other goods and things commonly sold by heaped measure, sold, delivered, done or agreed for, or to be sold, delivered, done, or agreed for by weight or measure, may be either according to the said standard of weight, or the said standard for heaped measure; but all contracts, &c. made or had for any other goods, wares, or merchandize, or other thing done or agreed for, or to be sold, delivered, done, or agreed for by weight or measure, shall be made and had according to the said standard of weight, or to the said gallon, or the parts, multiples, or proportions thereof; and in using the same the measures shall not be heaped, but shall be stricken with a round stick or roller, straight, and of the same diameter from end to end. But see 6 Geo. 4. c. 12. and 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 49. § 4. post, by which latter act the heaped measure is abolished.

§ 10. Nothing herein contained shall authorize the selling in Ireland, by measure, of any articles, matters, or things which by any law in force in Ireland are required to be sold by weight only.

§ 11. Copies and models of each of the said standard yard, the said standard pound, the said standard gallon, and the said standard for heaped measure, and of such parts and multiples thereof respectively, as the lord high treasurer of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the said commissioners of his majesty's treasury, or any three of them for the time being, shall judge expedient, shall within three calendar months after the passing of the act be made and verified under the direction of the treasury, and be deposited in the office of the chamberlains of the exchequer at Westminster, and copies thereof, verified as aforesaid, shall be sent to the lord mayor of London and the chief magistrate of Edinburgh and Dublin, and of such other cities and places, and to such other places and persons in his majesty's dominions or elsewhere, as the lord high treasurer or commissioners of the treasury may from time to time direct. See 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 49. post.

§ 12. His majesty's justices of the peace in every county, riding, or division in England or Ireland, or shire or stewartry in Scotland, and the magistrate in every city, town, or place (being a county within itself) in England or Ireland, and in every city or royal burgh in Scotland, shall, within six calendar months after the passing of the act, purchase for their respective counties, &c. a model and copy of each of the aforesaid standards of length, weight, measure, and of each of the parts and multiples thereof; which models and copies, when so purchased, shall be compared and verified with the models and copies deposited with the chamberlains of the exchequer as aforesaid, in such manner as aforesaid, and upon payment of such fees as are at present payable to the said chamberlains upon the comparison and verification of weights and measures with the standards thereof; and such models and copies, when so compared and verified, shall be placed for custody and inspection with such person or persons, and in such place or places, as the said justices and magistrates, in their respective counties, &c. shall appoint, and the same shall be produced by the keeper or keepers thereof upon reasonable notice, at such time or times, and place or places, within each such county, &c. as any person or persons shall by writing under his or their hand or hands require; the person requiring such production paying the reasonable charges of the same.

§ 14. In all cases of dispute respecting the correctness of any measure of capacity, arising in a place where recourse cannot be conveniently had to any of the aforesaid verified copies or models of the standard measures of capacity, parts or multiples of the same, any justice of the peace may ascertain the content of such measure of capacity by direct reference to the weight of pure or rain water which such measure is capable of containing; ten pounds avoirdupois weight of such water, at the temperature of sixty-two degrees Fahrenheit's thermometer, being the standard gallon ascertained by the act, the same being in bulk equal to two hundred and seventy-seven cubic inches, and two hundred and seventy-four one thousandth parts of a cubic inch, and so in proportion for all parts or multiples of a gallon.

§ 15. From and after the first of May, 1825, all contracts, bargains, sales, and dealings, which shall be made or had with any part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for any work to be done, or for any goods, wares, merchandize, or other thing to be sold, delivered, done, or agreed for by weight or measure, where no special agreement shall be made to the contrary, shall be deemed to be made according to the standard weights and measures ascertained by the act, and in all cases where any special agreement shall be made with reference to any weight or measure established by custom, the ratio or proportion which every such local weight or measure shall bear to any of the said standard weights or measures, shall be expressed, declared, and specified in such agreement, or otherwise such agreement shall be void. But see now 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 49. post.

§ 16. Persons may buy and sell goods and merchandize by any weights or measures established either by local custom, or founded on special agreement: Provided that in order to the ratio or proportion which all such measures and weights shall bear to the standard weights and measures established by the act, shall be a matter of common notoriety, the ratio or proportion which all such customary measures and weights shall bear to the said standard weights and measures, shall be painted or marked upon all such customary weights and measures respectively; and nothing herein contained shall extend to permit any weight or measure to be made after the 1st May, 1825, except in conformity with the standard weights and measures established under the provisions of the act. But see 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 49. post.

§ 17. For the purpose of ascertaining and fixing the payments to be made in consequence of all existing contracts or rents in England and Ireland, payable in grain or malt, or in any other commodity or thing, and in consequence of any toll or rate heretofore payable according to the weights and measures heretofore in use, enacts, that at the general quarter sessions of the peace to be holden in every county, riding, or division, and in every city, town, or place, (being a county of itself,) in England or Ireland, next after the expiration of six calendar months after the passing of the act, or at any general quarter sessions of the peace to be holden thereafter, an inquisition shall be taken before the justices assembled at such sessions, by the oaths of twelve substantial freeholders of the said respective counties, &c. having lands or tenements to the value of one hundred pounds per annum or upwards, to be summoned by the sheriff or proper officer of every such county, &c. to inquire into and ascertain the amount, according to the standard of weight or measure by the act established, of all contracts or rents payable in grain or malt, or any other commodity or thing, or with reference to the measure or weight of any such grain, malt, or other commodity or thing, and the amount of any toll or rate heretofore payable according to any weights and measures heretofore in use within such counties, &c. respectively, and such inquisitions, when taken, shall be transmitted by the respective clerks of the peace of the said counties respectively, or by the mayor, bailiff, or other head officer of every such city, town, or place, being a county of itself, into his majesty's Courts of Exchequer at Westminster and Dublin respectively, and shall there be enrolled of record, and shall and may be given in evidence in any action or suit at law or in equity; and the amount so to be ascertained shall be the rule of payment in regard to all such contracts, rents, tolls, or rates, in all time coming.

§ 18. For the purpose of ascertaining and fixing the payments to be made of all stipends, feu duties, rents, tolls, customs, casualties, and other demands whatsoever, payable in grain, malt, or meal, or any other commodity or thing, in that part of the united kingdom called Scotland, or in any place or district of the same; it is enacted, that the sheriff depute or sheriff substitute in each shire, and the steward depute, or steward substitute in each stewartry, within Scotland, shall, as soon as conveniently may be after the expiration of six calendar months from the passing of the act, summon and impanel a jury of the same number, and with the same qualifications required in the jury who strike the fair prices of grain within the same shire or stewartry, which jury shall inquire into and ascertain the amount, according to the standards by the act established, of all such stipends, feu duties, rents, tolls, customs, casualties, and other demands whatsoever, payable in grain, malt, meal, or any other commodity or thing, according to the weights and measures heretofore in use within the same shires or stewartries; and such inquisitions, when taken, shall be transmitted by the respective sheriff clerks or steward clerks of such shires or stewartries, into his majesty's Court of Exchequer at Edinburgh, and there enrolled of record, and may be given in evidence in any action or suit at law or in equity; and the amount so to be ascertained shall, when converted into the standard weights and measures, be the rule of payment in regard to all such stipends, &c. And see 1 & 2 H. 4. c. 19. § 1. post.

§ 19. After such inquisitions shall have been made and enrolled in England, Ireland, and Scotland respectively, accurate tables shall be prepared and published under the authority of the said commissioners of his majesty's treasury, showing the proportions between the weights and measures heretofore in use, as mentioned in such inquisitions, and the weights and measures hereby established, with such other conversions of weights or measures as the said commissioners of his majesty's treasury may deem to be necessary; and after the publication of such tables, all future payments to be made shall be regulated according to such tables.

By § 20. Tables are to be constructed for the collection of the customs and excise, &c.

§ 21. The regulations and penalties contained in the 29 Geo. 2. c. 25; 1 Geo. 3. c. 17; 25 Geo. 3. c. 102, and 1 Geo. 4. c. 13, for the ascertaining, examining, seizing, breaking, and destroying of any weights, balances, or measures, shall be applied and put in execution in Great Britain for the ascertaining and examining, and for the seizing, &c. of any weights or measures not conformable to the standard weights and measures ascertained and authorized by the act.

§ 22. The regulations and penalties of the following Irish acts, viz. 4 Ann. (1.); 11 Geo. 2. (1.); 25 Geo. 2. (1.); 27 Geo. 3. (1.); 28 Geo. 3. (1.) shall be applied to the act.

By § 23. All former statutes, ordinances, or acts relating to weights or measures, are repealed.

§ 24. Act not to extend to repeal 31 Geo. 2. c. 17. which empowers the dean and high steward of Westminster, &c. to appoint a proper officer to size and seal weights and measures.

§ 25. Tuns, pipes, or other vessels of wine, oil, honey, and other gaugeable liquors imported into London shall be liable to be gauged as heretofore by the lord mayor or his deputies, but the contents shall be ascertained by the standard measure directed by the act.

§ 26. Act not to affect the privileges of the city of London, as to the office of gauger of wine, &c.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 74. the above act is not to take effect before the 1st Jan. 1826.

§ 2. After reciting that by such act the figure of the standard bushel measure for the sale of coals, culm, fish, potatoes, and fruit was fixed, and that it was expedient that the figure of all other measures used for the sale of coals, and all other goods and things commonly sold by heaped measure, should also be determined, enacts, that after the 1st Jan. 1826, all such measures shall be made cylindrical, and the diameter of such measures shall be at least double the depth thereof and the height of the cone or heap shall be equal to three-fourths of the depth of the said measure, the outside of the measure being the extremity or base of such cone.

By the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 49. so much of the 5 G. 4. c. 74. and 6 G. 4. c. 12. as require that all weights and measure shall be models and copies in shape or form of the standards deposited in the Exchequer, and also so much of the said recited acts as allow the use of weights and measures not in conformity with the imperial standard weights and measures established by the said acts, or allow goods or merchandize to be bought or sold by any weights or measures established by local custom or founded on special agreement, are repealed.

§ 2. All weights and measures which have been verified and stamped at the Exchequer as copies of the standard weights and measures, corresponding in weight and capacity with those established by the said recited acts, shall be deemed and taken to be legal weights and measures, and may be legally used for comparison as copies of the imperial standard weights and measures, although not similar in shape to those required under the provisions of the said recited acts.

§ 3. Superintending officer of Exchequer may verify and stamp weights and measures of other form than those prescribed by the act 5 Geo. 4. c. 74.

§ 4. After reciting that the heaped measure is liable to considerable variation, and the use of weights made of soft materials affords facilities to fraud, enacts, that after the 1st January, 1835, so much of the said recited acts as relate to the heaped measure shall be repealed, and the use of the heaped measure abolished, and all bargains, sales, and contracts made by the heaped measure shall be void, and thereafter no weight made of lead or of pewter shall be stamped or used.

§ 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, contain additional regulations for providing copies of the standards for counties, &c.

By § 12. After reciting that "by local customs in the markets, towns, and other places throughout the united kingdom, the denomination of the stone weight varies, being in the country generally deemed to contain fourteen pounds avoirdupois, and in London commonly eight of such pounds, or otherwise, as may be," it is enacted, that from and after the 1st January, 1835, the weight denominated a stone shall in all cases consist of fourteen standard pounds avoirdupois, and the weight denominated an hundred weight shall consist of eight such stones, and the weight denominated a ton shall consist of twenty such hundred weight; and all contracts made by any other stone, hundred weight, or ton, shall be void.

§ 13. From and after the 1st January, 1835, all articles sold by weight shall be sold by avoirdupois weight, excepting gold, silver, platina, diamonds, or other precious stones, and drugs when sold by retail; and that such excepted articles, and none others, may be sold by troy weight.

§ 14. In England and Wales the magistrates at quarter sessions assembled, and in Scotland the justices of the peace at a meeting called by the sheriff, and in Ireland the grand jury of each county and county of a city or town, shall procure for the use of the inspectors good and sufficient stamps for the stamping or sealing all weights and measures used or to be used in such county, which stamp, so procured, shall be taken to be the stamp for such county, and none others shall be considered legal stamps; and all weights and measures used for buying and selling, or for the collecting of any tolls or duties, or for the making of any charges on the conveyance of any goods or merchandize, shall be examined and compared with one of the copies of the imperial standard weights and measures provided under the authority of the act for the purpose of comparison by such inspectors appointed as aforesaid, who shall stamp, in such manner as best to prevent fraud, such weights and measures when so examined and compared as aforesaid, if found to correspond with the said copy, the fees for which examination, comparison, and stamping shall be according to the scale contained in the schedule to the act annexed; and all persons who, after the 1st January, 1835, in England and Wales and in Scotland, or after the 1st July, 1835, in Ireland, shall make any weights or measures other than those authorized by the act, or shall sell, expose to sale, or use any weights or measures which have not been so stamped as aforesaid, or which shall be found light or otherwise unjust, shall on conviction forfeit not exceeding five pounds; and any contract, bargain, or sale made by any such weights or measures shall be wholly void, and all such light or unjust weights and measures so used shall be seized, forfeited, and condemned.

§ 15. In Scotland, after the 1st Jan. 1835, the fair prices of all grain in every county shall be struck by the imperial quarter, and all other returns of the prices of grain shall be set forth by the same, without any reference to any other measure whatsoever; and any sheriff clerk, clerk of a market, or other person, who shall offend against this provision shall forfeit not exceeding five pounds or less than twenty shillings.

§ 16. Inspectors to enter into recognizances for the discharge of their duties.

§ 17. Any two or more magistrates of any county, or of any city or town being a county within itself, or for any sheriff or magistrates of any burgh or town corporate in Scotland, within their respective districts, may enter any shop, store, warehouse, stall, yard, or place whatsoever, wherein goods shall be exposed or kept for sale, or shall be weighed for conveyance or carriage, and examine all weights and measures, beams and scales, or other weighing machines, and compare and try the same with the copies of the imperial standard weights and measures required to be provided under the act, and cause the same to be detained until they shall have been examined by the nearest inspector; and if upon such examination the said weights, &c. are light or otherwise unjust, the same shall be forfeited and destroyed, and the person or persons in whose possession the same were found shall be liable in a penalty not exceeding five pounds: Provided that any person who shall neglect or refuse to produce for the inspection of such magistrates, when thereto required, all weights, &c. in his possession, or shall otherwise obstruct or hinder such magistrates, shall be liable to a like penalty, and also that no such pecuniary penalty shall be incurred if he, she, or they shall prove to the satisfaction of such magistrates that such weights, &c. found in his possession, have not been in use since the passing of the act.

§ 18. If any person or persons shall make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be made, &c. or knowingly act or assist in the making, &c. any stamp or mark now used or which may hereafter from time to time be used for the stamping or marking of any weights or measures, to denote that any such weight or measure has been compared, adjusted, and approved to be of the due weight or measure required by law, he shall for every such offence forfeit not exceeding fifty pounds or less than ten pounds; and if any person shall knowingly sell, utter, dispose of, or expose to sale any weight or measure with such forged or counterfeited stamp or mark thereon, every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit not exceeding ten pounds or less than forty shillings, to be recovered in a summary way as after provided; and all weights and measures with such forged or counterfeited marks shall be seized, forfeited, and condemned.

§ 19. All copies of the imperial standard weights and measures which may have been worn by time, and mended in consequence of any wear or accident, shall forthwith be sent to the Exchequer for the purpose of being again compared and verified, and shall be stamped as mended copies of the imperial standard weights and measures.

§ 20. Officer at Exchequer to keep a register of copies verified.

§ 22. Gives a form of conviction for offences under the act.

§ 23. Any person convicted of any penalty under this act in England and Wales or in Ireland may appeal to the next general quarter sessions of the peace for the county, or city or town being a county within itself, against such conviction, on giving security in double the amount of such penalty within forty-eight hours after the conviction shall have been made; and the decision thereupon made shall be final.

By § 25 an appeal is given in Scotland to commissioners of judiciary at circuit court.

By § 26, 4 Ann. (Irish act) and 5 Geo. 4. c. 110, relating to Ireland, repealed, except so far as relates to duties, &c. of weigh-masters.

§ 27. Nothing in the act contained shall interfere with the powers of the ward inquests in respect to weights and measures within the city of London and liberties thereof and the borough of Southwark, nor to prohibit, defeat, injure, or lessen the right of the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London, or of the lord mayor of the said city for the time being, with respect to the stamping or sealing weights and measures, or concerning the office of gauger of wines, the honey, and other gaugeable liquors imported and landed within the city of London and liberties thereof.

§ 28. Nothing in the act contained shall extend to prohibit, defeat, injure, or lessen the rights granted by charter to the master, wardens, and commonalty of the mystery of founders of the city of London.

§ 29. In all actions brought against any magistrate for anything he shall do under this act, such magistrate may plead the general issue, and to give the special matter in evidence, and if a verdict shall be given for the defendant therein he shall have double costs.

MEASURER or METER of woollen cloth, and of coals &c. An officer in the city of London: the latter of general account. Chart. Jac. 1. See Alnage, Coals.

MEASURING-MONEY. The letters patent, whereby some persons exacted for every cloth made certain money besides alnage, called measuring-money, revoked. Rot. Pat. 11 Hen. 4.

MEDERIA. A mead house, or place where mead or metheglin is made. Cartular. Abb. Glouc. MS. 29.

MEDFEE. A bribe or reward: and used for a composition where things exchanged are not of equal value. It is said to come from the word meed, merit. Cowell.

MEDIÆ ET INFIMÆ MANUS HOMINES. Men of a mean and base condition, of the lower sort. Blount.

MEDIANUS. Middle size; medianus homo, a man of middle fortune.

MEDIATORS OF QUESTIONS. Were six persons authorized by statute, who, upon any question arising among merchants, relating to unmerchable wares, or undue packing, &c. might before the mayor and officers of the staple upon their oath certify and settle the same; to whose order and determination therein, the parties concerned were to give entire credence, and submit. Stat. Antiq. 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 2.

MEDICINES. Various statutes have been passed from time to time subjecting what are generally called patent medicines and other preparations and compositions to certain duties, and requiring a license to be taken out for vending the same. The acts are the 25 Geo. 3. c. 79; 42 Geo. 3. c. 56; 43 Geo. 3. c. 73; 44 Geo. 3. c. 98; and the 52 Geo. 3. c. 150. The articles subjected to such duties are enumerated in the schedule appended to the last-mentioned statute.

MEDIETAS LINGUE. A jury de medietate lingue, signifies a jury or inquest impannelled, whereof the one half consists of natives, and the other of foreigners. This manner of trial was first given by the 28 Edw. 3. c. 13; before which it was obtained by the king's grant. Staundf. P. C. lib. 3. c. 7.

It was formerly used in pleas wherein the one party was a foreigner, the other a denizen. We read that Solomon de Stafford, a Jew, had a cause tried before the sheriff of Norwich, by a jury which were sex probes et legales homines, et sex legales Judæos de civitate Norwiche. Parsch. Edw. 1.

In petit treason (now abolished), murder and felony, medietas lingue is allowed; but for high treason, an alien shall be tried by the common law, and not per medietatem lingue, H. P. C. 261. And a grand jury ought not to be de medietate lingue in any case. Wood's Inst. 203. It was thought necessary to exclude Egyptians expressly by statute from the benefit of this trial. See 22 Hen. 8. c. 10; 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 4 (repealed); and tit. Egyptians.

The 8 Geo. 4. c. 50. by which all former acts relating to juries were repealed, and the law consolidated, provides (§ 47), for the trial of aliens by a jury de medietate lingue, in cases of felonies or misdemeanors; but it contains no re-enactment of the old statutes, which allowed such a jury in civil cases between an alien and a British subject.

He that will have the advantage of trial per medietatem lingue must pray it; for it is said he cannot have the benefit of it by way of challenge. S. P. C. 158; 3 Inst. 127.

A jury de medietate is also allowed in some other cases, by analogy to this rule de medietate lingue. As on a procuratoris, the jury must be of six clergymen and six laymen. See that title. So on a criminal trial in the university courts, the jury must be half freeholders of the county, and half matriculated laymen of the university. See 4 Comm. 278. See further, Jury, II. So also under the (repealed) statute of the 8 Hen. 6. c. 12. against embezzling records, the jury were to consist of six persons officers of any of the superior courts, and six common jurors. See Records.

MEDIO ACQUILITANDO. A judicial writ to restrain a lord for the acquitting of a man, lord from a rent, which he formerly acknowledged in court not to belong to him. Reg. Jan. 129. See Mort.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. In Scotland, where arrest for debt does not take place as in England, where there is real ground to apprehend that a debtor means to withdraw himself, the creditor appears before a judge, and swears that he believes his debtor to be in meditatione fugæ; on which a warrant for imprisoning the debtor is granted, which is taken off on his finding caution or bail, judicio sisti. In practice this is equivalent to the arrest and bail in the English law.

MEDITERRANEAN. Passing through the midst of the earth; applied to the sea which stretcheth itself from West to East, dividing Europe, Asia, and Africa, which is hence called the Mediterranean Sea. The counterfeiting of Mediterranean passes for ships to the coast of Barbary, &c. or the seal of the admiralty office to such passes, is a capital felony (now punishable with transportation for life, &c.) 4 Geo. 2. c. 18. See Navigation Acts.

MEDLEFE, MEDLETA, MEDLETUM, Fr. Mesler, to meddle.] A sudden scolding at and beating one another. Bract. l. 3. c. 35.

MEDSYPP. A harvest supper or entertainment given to labourers at harvest home. Plac. 9 Edw. 1. Cov.

MEDWAY RIVER, called Vaga by the Britons; the Saxons added Med.] Pilots thereon, how to be licensed, 5 Geo. 2. c. 20. See also 3 Geo. 1. c. 13; and 7 Geo. 1. c. 21.

MEER, merus.] Though an adjective, is used as a substantive to signify Meer right. Old Nat. Brev. 2. In these words, "this writ hath but two issues, viz. joining mise upon the meere, and that is to put himself in the great assise of our sovereign lord the king, or to join battle." Cowell. See Misc.

MEIGNE. See Maisnada.

MEINY, French Mesnie.] As the king's meiny, the king's family or household servants. See 1 Rich. 2. c. 1.

MELDFEOH, from Saxon meld, indictum delaturæ; and feoh, premiun pecuniæ. Specim.] Was the recompense due and given to him who made discovery of any breach of penal laws committed by another person, called the promoter's or informer's fee. Leg. Incæ, c. 20.

MELIUS INQUIRENDUM, A writ that lieth for a second inquiry, where partial denling is suspected; and particularly of what lands or tenements a man died seised on finding an office for the king. F. N. B. 255. It has been held, that where an office is found against the king, and a melius inquirendum is awarded, and upon that melius, &c. it is found for the king; if the writ be void for repugnancy, or otherwise, a new melius inquirendum shall be had; but if upon the first melius it had been found against the king, in such case he could not have a new melius, &c., for then there would be no end of these writs: and if an office be found for the king, the party grieved may traverse it; and if the traverse be found against him, there is an end of that cause; and if for him, it is conclusive. 8 Rep. 169; 2 Nels. 1008. If there is any defect in the points which are found in an inquiry, there may not be a melius inquirendum; but if the inquiry finds some parts well, and nothing is found as to others, that may be supplied by melius inquirendum. 2 Salk. 469. A melius inquirendum shall be awarded out of B. R., where a coroner is guilty of corrupt practices, directed to special commissioners. 1 Vent. 181. See 15 Vin. Abr. tit. Melius Inquirendum; and ante, tit. Inquest.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT. The members of the House of Commons are usually so styled, though in fact the peers are, strictly speaking, members of parliament, which consists of lords, and commons. See Parliament.

MEMORIES. Some kind of remembrances or obsequies for the dead, mentioned in injunctions to the clergy, anno 1 Edw. 6.

MEMORY, TIME OF. Ascertained by the law to commence from the reign of Richard the First; and until recently any custom might have been destroyed by evidence of its non-existence in any part of the long period from his days to the present. 2 Com. 31, and note.

The law with respect to the commencement of prescriptions and customs has been materially altered by the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 71. for which see Prescription.

MENACES. By menaces or force demanding any chattel, money, or valuable security, with intent to steal the same, is felony by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 6. and the offender transportable for life, &c.; by § 8. sending or delivering any letter demanding, with menaces, any chattel, &c., or accusing, or threatening to accuse of any crime, is also felony, and punishable in like manner. See further Threats.

MENAGIUM. A family. Trivet's Chronicle, 677; Wal-singham, 66.

MENDLEFE. Mentioned in Crompt. Justice of Peace, 193, is that which Bracton calleth medietum; quarrels, scuffling, or brawling. Cowell. See Medlefe.

MENIALS, from menae, the walls of a castle, house, or other place.] Household servants who live under their lord or master's roof; mentioned in the ancient stat. 2 Hen. 4. c. 21.

MENSA. Comprehends all patrimony, or goods and necessities for livelihood.

MENSALIA. Such parsonages or spiritual livings as were united to the tables of religious houses, and called mensal benefices among the Canonists; and in this sense it is taken where mention is made of appropriations ad mensam suam. Blount.

MENSURA REGALIS. Was the king's standard measure, kept in the Exchequer, according to which all others were to be made. See 16 Car. 1. c. 19 (repealed). The standard measure is now in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons. See Measure.

MER or ERE. Words which begin or end with those syllables, signify fenny places. Cowell. See Mara or Mere, a lake or great pond.

MERA NOCTIS. Midnight. Cowell.

MERCENARIUS. A hireling or servant. Cartular Abbat. Glaston. 115.

MERCENLAGE. See Merchenlage.

MERCHANT, Mercator.] One who buys and trades in any thing; and as merchandize includes all goods and wares exposed to sale in fairs or markets, so the word merchant formerly extended to all sorts of traders, buyers, and sellers. But every one who buys and sells is not at this day under the denomination of a merchant, only those who traffic in the way of commerce, by importation or exportation, or carry on business by way of emption, vendition, barter, permutation, or exchange, and who make it their living to buy and sell, by a continued assiduity, or frequent negotiation, in the mystery of merchandizing, are esteemed merchants. Those who buy goods, to reduce them by their own art or industry into other forms, and then to sell them, are artificers, not merchants. Bankers and such as deal by exchange, are properly called merchants. Lex Mercat. 23.

Merchants were always particularly regarded by the common law; though the municipal laws of England, or indeed of any one realm, are not sufficient for the ordering and determining the affairs of traffic and matters relating to commerce; merchandize being so universal and extensive, that it is impossible; therefore of the law merchant (so called from its universal concern) all nations take special knowledge; and the common and statute laws of this kingdom leave the causes of merchants in many cases to their own peculiar law. Lex Mercat. See 1 Comm. 75; see Bill of Exchange, Custom of Merchants, Insurance.

The custom of merchants is part of the common law of this kingdom, of which the judges ought to take notice; and if any doubt arise about the custom, they may send for merchants to know the custom. Per Hobart, C. J.; Winch. 24.

The lex mercatoria is allowed, for the benefit of trade, to be of the utmost validity in all commercial transactions; for it is a maxim of law, that "cuiuslibet in sua arte credendum est." See 1 Comm. 75.

For various instances in which the custom of merchants has been proved at Nisi Prius, see Willes, 559; Dougl. 653; 10 B. & C. 4.

The law of England, as a commercial country, pays a very particular regard to foreign merchants in innumerable instances. By Magna Carta, c. 80, it is provided, that all merchants (unless publicly prohibited beforehand) shall have safe conduct to depart from, to come into, to tarry in, and to go through, England, for the exercise of merchandize, without any unreasonable imposts, except in time of war; and if a war breaks out between us and their country, they shall be attached (if in England) without harm of body or goods, till the king or his chief justiciary be informed how our merchants are treated in the land with which we are at war; and if ours be secure in that land, they shall be secure in ours. This seems to have been a common rule of equity among all the northern nations; but it is somewhat extraordinary, that it should have found a place in Magna Carta a mere inter-treaty between the king and his natural born subjects, which occasions the learned Montesquieu to remark, with a degree of admiration, "that the English have made the protection of foreign merchants one of the articles of the national liberty." But indeed it well justifies another observation which he has made, that the English know better than any other people upon earth, how to value at the same time these three great advantages, religion, liberty, and commerce. 1 Comm. 260. See also 2 Edm. 3. c. 9; 25 Edw. 3. st. 4. c. 2; 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 13, 17, 19, 20; 28 Edw. 3. c. 13; 36 Edw. 3. c. 7; 2 Rich. 2. c. 1; 11 Rich. 2. c. 7; 14 Rich. 2. c. 9; 5 Hen. 4. c. 9; 7 Hen. 4. c. 9; in all which provisions were contained for the accommodation of merchants strangers, which by long use became the known law of the land, allowing for the variations inevitably introduced by time and commerce. Many of these regulations, however, are now repealed by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 41, and other acts.

In the reign of King Edward IV. a merchant stranger made suit before the king's privy council for several bales of silk feloniously taken from him, wherein it was moved that this matter should be determined at common law; but was answered by the Lord Chancellor, that as this suit was brought by a merchant, he was not bound to sue according to the law of the land. 13 Edw. 4. In former times it was conceived that those laws that were prohibitory against foreign goods, did not bind a merchant stranger; but it has been a long time since ruled otherwise; for in the leagues that are now established between nation and nation, the laws of all kingdoms are excepted; so that as the English in France or any other foreign country in amity, are subject to the laws of that country where they reside, so must the people of France, or any other kingdom, be subject to the laws of England, when resident here. 19 Hen. 7.

English merchants are not restrained to depart the kingdom without license, as all other subjects are; they may depart and live out of the realm, and the king's obedience and the same is no contempt, they being excepted out of the statute 5 Rich. 2. st. 2. And by the common law they might pass the seas without license, though not to merchandize. Dyer, 206.

If a difference arise between the king and any foreign state, alien merchants are to have forty days' notice or longer time, to sell their effects and leave the kingdom. 27 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 17.

If a person who is otherwise no merchant, being beyond sea, takes up money, and draws a bill upon a merchant, he cannot, in an action brought upon this bill against him as the drawer thereof, plead that he was no merchant; for the very taking up the money and drawing the bill, makes him a merchant to this purpose. Comb. 152. See Bill of Exchange.

Merchant includes all sorts of traders as well and as properly as merchant adventurers. Dyer, 279 b, cites Spelman Guilda. A merchant tailor is a common term. Per Hobart, C. J., 2 Salk. 445.

There are companies of merchants in London for carrying on considerable joint trades to foreign parts, viz. the Merchant Adventurers (see Hamburgh Company); the company established in England for the improvement of commerce, which was erected by patent by King Edward I. merely for the exportation of wool, &c. before we knew the value of that commodity, and at a time when we were in a great measure strangers to trade. The next company was that of the Barbary Merchants, incorporated in the reign of King Henry

VII. A company of merchants trading to the North, called the Muscovy or Russia Company, was established by King Edward VI., and encouraged, with additional privileges, by Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, &c. See Russia Company. The Barbary Merchants decaying towards the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, out of their ruins arose the Levant or Turkey Company, who, first trading with Venice and then with Turkey, furnished England that way with the East India commodities; this company had very considerable factories at Constantinople, Smyrna, Aleppo, &c. See Turkey Company. From the flourishing state of the Levant or Turkey Company, in the reign likewise of Queen Elizabeth, sprung the old East India Company, who having fitted out ships of force, brought from thence, at the best hand, the Indian commodities formerly sold to England by distant Europeans; and they, having obtained many charters and grants from the crown in their favour, were sole masters of that advantageous traffic; until at last a new company was incorporated by King William, anno 9 Hm. 3. on their lending government two millions of money, and both these companies, after the expiration of a certain term, were by articles united. For the recent act, suspending the trading of this important company, see East India Company.

In the 21st year of Queen Elizabeth, the Eastland Company of Merchants was erected, and in King Charles the Second's time, that company was confirmed, with full power to trade in Norway, Sweden, Poland, and other Eastland countries. See Eastland Company. The Royal African Company had their charter granted to them in the 14th year of King Charles II. And by 9 & 10 Hm. 3. c. 26. they were to maintain all forts, &c.; but by the 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 28. the company was abolished, and their forts and possessions vested in the crown. See African Company. King Charles II. also, by commission under the great seal of England, constituted his royal highness James Duke of York (afterwards King James II.) Edward Earl of Clarendon, and others, to be a council for the royal fishery of England, and declared himself to be the protector of it; and in the 29th year of his reign he incorporated them into a company. King William III. in the fourth year of his reign, established a Greenland Company. See that title.

By 9 Ann. c. 21. to pay the debts of the army, navy, &c. amounting to near ten millions, the South Sea Company of Merchants was erected, who having advanced that money, the duties upon wines, vinegar, tobacco, &c. were appropriated as a fund for payment of the interest, after the rate of 4l. per cent., &c. The company was granted the sole trade to the South Seas; but by the 47 Geo. 3. st. 1. c. 23. and the 55 Geo. 3. c. 57. § 141. so much of the above act as gave it the exclusive privilege of trading within the limits of its charter was repealed.

This company had their capital stock very much enlarged in the reign of King George I.; and to raise money lent, were empowered to make calls or take in subscriptions, &c. as they thought fit; and on this foundation the South Sea scheme was executed in 1720; but to retrieve credit afterwards, part of the stock of the South Sea Company was ingrafted into the capital stock of the East India Company and the Bank of England; and after that, half the stock was converted into annuities at 4l. per cent., since which, a farther reduction thereof has been made. See National Debt, South Sea Company.

The West India Dock Company established under the 39 Geo. 3. c. lxxix), and the London Dock Company (under 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. xlvii), are among the most extensive of the modern associations of this nature.

The short history of some of our companies of merchants, which have ever had many and great privileges, and are at length become of double use to enlarge commerce and supply the necessities of the state, in some measure shows the progress and increase of our trade, and the wealth of the nation, though it must nevertheless be observed that they are a kind of monopolies erected by law, which, if they become prejudicial, are generally restrained by parliament, as has been the case with many of the companies already specified; and if the power granted them is abused, it becomes of fatal consequence; for which we need only instance the ever memorable year 1720, when the sub-governor and directors of the South Sea Company incurred a forfeiture of their estates by statute, and were disabled to hold any offices, &c. for their vile conduct, which tended to the ruin of the public. Over and above these companies, there are the Dutch Merchants; those who trade to the West Indies; the Canary Merchants; Italian Merchants, who trade to Leghorn, Venice, Sicily, &c.; the French and Spanish Merchants, &c. For the regulations relating to the importation and exportation of commodities by merchants, see Navigation Acts.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 49. merchants, bankers, and other agents, converting to their use money or securities entrusted to them, are guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be transported for fourteen years, &c. See further, Agent, Attorney, Banker, Broker, Factor.

MERCHENLAGE, Merciorum Lex. The law of the ancient kingdom of Mercia. Camden, in his Britannia, says, that in the year 1016, this kingdom was divided into three parts, whereof the West Saxons had one, governing it by the laws called West Saxon-lage, which contained Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Berks, Hampshire, Wilts, Somerset, Dorset, and Devon. The Danes had the second, containing York, Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, Lincoln, Northampton, Bedford, Bucks, Hertford, Essex, Middlesex, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, which was governed by the laws called Dane-lage. And the third part was in the possession of the Mercians, whose law was called Merchenlage; and contained Gloucester, Worcester, Hereford, Warwick, Oxford, Chester, Salop, and Stafford; from which three, King William I. chose the best, and with other laws ordained them to be the laws of the kingdom. Cambd. Brit. 94. See Molmutian Laws.

MERCHET, merchetum, mercheta, mulierum.] A fine or composition paid by inferior tenants to the lord, for liberty to dispose of their daughters in marriage. No baron or military tenant could marry his sole daughter and heir, without such leave purchased from the king, pro meretanda fide. And many of our servile tenants could neither send their sons to school, nor give their daughters in marriage, without express licence from the superior lord. See Kennet's Glossary in Marriage and see Marchet, Borough English.

MERCIA. Used in the Monasticon for amerciamment.

MERCIMONIATUS ANGLIÆ. Was of old time used for the impost of England upon merchandize.

MERCURIES, or vendors of printed books or papers.

MERGER, is where a greater estate and a less coincide and meet in one and the same persons, without any intermediate estate, in which case the less is immediately annihilated, or, in the law phrase, is said to be merged, that is, sunk or drowned in the greater; as, if the fee comes to tenant for years or life, the particular estates are merged in the fee. 2 Rep. 60, 61; 3 Lev. 437.

The two estates must be held in the same right, otherwise there will be no merger.

Thus if a lessor who hath the fee, marries with the lessee for years, this is no merger, because he hath the inheritance in his own, and the lease in right of his wife. 2 Plowd. 418. And where a man hath a term in his own right, and the inheritance descends to his wife, as he hath a freehold in her right, the term is not merged or drowned. Cro. Car. 275. So if tenant for years dies and makes him who hath the reversion in fee his executor, whereby the term of years vests also in him, the term shall not merge; for he hath the fee in his own right, and the term of years in right of the testator, and subject to his debts and legacies. See Plowd. 418; Cro. Jac. 275; Co. Lit. 338.

In these cases the accession of the one estate to the other is the act of the law; but where the two estates meet in the same party by his own act, merger will take place, even although they are held in different rights.

Therefore where a husband, possessed of a term in right of his wife, purchases the reversion or remainder (Moor, 171,) or where an executor having a term in right of his testator, buys the reversion (see 4 Leon, 38), there will be a merger.

An estate-tail is an exception to the rule, for a man may have in his own right both an estate-tail and a reversion in fee; and the estate-tail, though a less estate, shall not merge in the fee. 2 Rep. 61; 8 Rep. 74. For estates-tail are protected and preserved from merger by the operation and construction, though not by the express words of the statute de donis; which operation and construction have probably arisen upon this consideration, that in the common cases of merger of estates for life or years, by uniting with the inheritance, the particular tenant hath the sole interest in them, and hath full power at any time to defeat, destroy, or surrender them to him that hath the reversion; therefore when such an estate unites with the reversion in fee, the law considers it in the light of a virtual surrender of the inferior estate. Cro. Eliz. 302. But in an estate-tail the case is otherwise: the tenant for a long time had no power to bar or destroy it, and now can only do so by a certain special mode. It would therefore have been strangely improvident to have permitted the tenant in tail, by purchasing the reversion in fee, to merge his particular estate, and defeat the inheritance of his issue; and hence it has become a maxim, that a tenancy in tail, which cannot be surrendered, cannot also be merged in the fee. 2 Comm. c. 11. p. 178.

When, however, an estate-tail was barred by means of a fine, the base fee thereby created would, previous to the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 74. have merged in the reversion, so as to let in the incumbrances charged upon the latter; but by that statute (§ 39) base fees, when united with the immediate reversions, are to be enlarged instead of merged. See further, Tail.

There is also another exception to the doctrine of merger, arising out of the saving in the Statute of Uses (27 Hen. 8. c. 10.) of the rights of feoffees of uses where they are seised of lands to their own proper use. See 3 Pres. on Conv. 368.

The doctrine of merger is not confined to estates of freehold, or to an estate of freehold and one of leasehold; for where two terms for years meet in the same individual, the same right there will be a merger of the older in the more recent term, although the former may be a term for a thousand years, and the latter for a single year.

To effect a merger, there must be no intervening estate; for if there be such an estate, whether for life or years, vested in another party, merger will not take place.

An interesse termini is not such an interest as will prevent a merger (4 Mod. 1,) for it gives no actual vested estate, as it is not a term, but merely a contract for a term.

When the legal and equitable estate meet in the same person or persons, the trust or equitable estate is merged in the legal estate; as if a wife should have the legal estate, and a husband the equitable, and they have an only child to whom these estates descend, who dies intestate without issue, the two estates having united, the descent will follow the legal estate, and the estate will go to the heir on the part of the mother. Dougl. 771.

One of the means adopted by the common law for promoting the simplicity of the different interests existing at the same time in an estate, was the rule of merger, which provides that when an estate in remainder or reversion, and the preceding estate upon which it depends, become vested in the same person, the two interests shall unite without any reference to the wishes of the owner of them. The mode of union is of a singular description, and frequently occasions great injustice. The person entitled to the two estates does not acquire an interest equal to their aggregate extent, but the preceding estate is supposed to have been surrendered by law, and to be merged or drowned in the remainder or reversion, and consequently all powers and privileges belonging to it are lost. The remainder becomes the estate in possession, in the same manner as if the time of the expiration of the preceding estate had arrived, and the rights of strangers who may have charges upon the remainder or reversion are accelerated and rendered more valuable. Terms of one thousand or more years are frequently created as mere securities, mortgages, or for raising charges upon the estate, and the person entitled to the remainder or reversion remains in possession, and every variety of interest is carved out of the remainder or reversion. The first interest in remainder or reversion is therefore frequently of shorter duration than the term to which it is subject, and yet the larger term will merge in the lesser interest. If a person be entitled for the residue of a term of one thousand years (which not unfrequently happens by the foreclosure of a mortgage), and the first interest in the remainder or reversion, subject to the term, is an estate for life or a term of one year, or even a shorter term, and such life estate or short term become vested in the owner of the longer term, the long term being the preceding estate, is merged, and the owner of it is entitled only to the estate for life or short term. If a tenant for life with valuable powers appendant, acquires the next estate in remainder or reversion, although it might determine before his death, his life estate, and all powers belonging to it, are extinguished. If the owner of a building lease, subject to several under-leases at improved rents, purchases the freehold or the first estate in remainder or reversion, subject to the building lease, or if the owner of such estate in remainder or reversion, acquires the building lease, the building lease is merged, and all the remedies for the improved rents, and the benefit of the covenants in the under-leases, which were carved out of and are dependant upon the estate created by the building lease, are entirely lost.

The rule of extinguishment differs only from that of merger in being applicable to a charge or right instead of a preceding estate, and it is in many cases equally unjust; for instance: if the owner of a rent purchase a small part of the land upon which it is charged, the whole rent is extinguished notwithstanding its value may greatly exceed that of the land included in the purchase. See Rent.

The same rules are followed in several cases in equity. If an estate be mortgaged, and the purchaser take his conveyance from both the mortgagee and the person entitled to the equity of redemption, the mortgage is extinguished in the equity of redemption; and if there be a second mortgage of which the purchaser or his agent have notice (and it is difficult to ascertain what slight circumstances may be considered to amount to notice) the purchaser notwithstanding he may have paid the value of the estate to the first mortgagee, may be obliged to give up the estate to the second mortgagee, because the mortgage which he paid off has been extinguished.

The inconveniences occasioned by the principles of merger and extinguishment, are usually prevented upon a parcel by the machinery of a conveyance to a trustee of the estate or charge which would otherwise be destroyed, for the purpose of preserving its existence; but when this precaution is neglected, or the second estate or right is acquired otherwise than by purchase, the law occasions a manifest injustice. There are several exceptions to the rules of merger and extinguishment, and few branches of the law abound with more intricate or technical distinctions. Tyrrel's Suggestions, &c.

MERSUM. A lake; from the Saxon mere, lacus. "Ma-neria, molendina, mersca, et merisca." Inglulph. p. 861.

MERS-WARE, Saxon, locus paludum.] The inhabitants of Romney Marsh, in Kent, were anciently so called.
Conell.

MERTLAGE. Seems to be a corruption of or a law French word for martyrlogy. See Hil. 9 Hen. 7. 14 b. where it seems to mean a church calendar or rubric. Cowell.

MERTON. Statutes made there, 20 Hen. 3.

MESNALTY, medietas. The right of the mesne, as "the mesnalty is extinct." Old Nat. Brev. 44.

MESNE, medius. He who is lord of a manor, and so hath tenants holding of him, yet himself holds of a superior lord. Cowell. See Mean.

MESNE PROCESS. Such process as issues pending the suit upon some collateral interlocutory matter, as to summon juries, witnesses, and the like, distinguished from original process, which is founded on the writ. Finch J. 316.—Mesne process is, however, more commonly put in contradistinction to final process or process of execution; and then it signifies all such process as intervenes between the beginning and end of a suit. 3 Comm. c. 19. p. 279.

MESNE PROFITS, Action of. See Ejectment, I.

MESSARIUS, from messis. The chief servant in husbandry or harvest-time, now called a bailiff in some places. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 832. This word is also used for a mower or reaper; one that works harvest-work. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 75.

MESSINGER. Is a carrier of messages, particularly employed by the secretaries of state, &c. and to these commitments may be made of state prisoners, for though regularly no one can justify the detaining a person in custody out of the common gaol, unless there be some particular reason for it; as if the party be so dangerously sick that it would hazard his life to send him thither, &c. yet it is the constant practice to make commitments to messengers; but it is said it shall be intended only in order to carrying the offenders to gaol. 1 Salk. 317; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 9. An offender may be committed to a messenger, in order to be examined before he is committed to prison; and though such commitment to a messenger is irregular, it is not void; and a person charged with treason, escaping from the messenger, is guilty of treason, &c. Skin. 599. See Arrest, Bankrupt, Commitment, Treason.

MESSINGERS OF THE EXCHEQUER. Officers attending that court; they are four in number, and in nature of pursuivants to the lord treasurer.

MESSE THANE. Signifies a priest. The Saxons called every man thane who was above the common rank; so messe thane was he who said mass; and worules thane was a secular man of quality. Cowell.

MESSINA. Reaping time; harvest. Cowell.

MESSIS SEMENTEM SEQUITUR. A maxim in Scotch laws; the crop belongs to the sower, is a principle received in regard to bond fide possession. See Emblements, Executor, &c.

MESSAGE, messagium. Properly a dwelling-house, with some adjacent land assigned to the use thereof. West. Symb. tit. Fines, § 26; Bract. lib. 5. c. 28. See Plowd. 169, 170, where it is said, that by the name of a message may pass also a curtilage, a garden and orchard, a dove-house, a shop, a mill, a cottage, a toft, a chamber, a cellar, &c. yet they may be demanded by their single names. Messagium, in Scotland, signifies the principal place or dwelling house within a barony, which we call a manor-house. Skene de verborum signif. verb. messagium. In some places it is called the site of a manor.

MESTILO, mestina, or rather miscellane, that is, wheat and rye mingled together. Pat. 1 Edw. 3. p. 1. m. 6.

METAL. The exportation of iron, brass, copper, latten, bell, and other metal, was restrained by the ancient statutes 28 Edw. 3. c. 5; 33 Hen. 8. c. 7; 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 37; but was permitted by 5 W. & M. c. 17.

With respect to the stealing of metal, see Larceny.

METECORN. A measure or portion of corn, given out by the lord to customary tenants, as a reward and encouragement for their duties of labour. Stipendia et metecorn ac cetera debita servitia in monasterio predicto solvantur. Ryley's Plac. Parl. 391.

METEGAVEL, Saxon, cibi gablum, seu vectigal. A tribute or rent paid in victuals, which was a thing usual in this kingdom, as well with the king's tenants as others, till the reign of King Henry I.

METER of coals in London, &c., from metior, to mete or measure a thing. See Measurer.

METHEGLIN, Brit. Meddiglyn. An old British drink made of honey, &c.; it is mentioned in the 15 Car. 2. c. 9. See Mead.

METTESHEP, METTENSCHEP. Was an acknowledgment paid in a certain measure of corn; or a fine or penalty imposed on tenants, for their defaults in not doing their customary services, of cutting the lord's corn. Paroch. Ant. 495.

MEYA. A mey or mow of corn, as anciently used; and in some parts of England they still say mey the corn, i. e. put it on an heap in the barn. Blount. Ten. 130.

MICEL-GEMOTES, MICEL-SYNODS. The great councils in the Saxon times of king and noblemen, were called Wittena-gemotes, and afterwards Micel-synods or Michel-synoth, and Micel-gemotes, i. e. great and general assemblies. Cowell. See 1 Comm. 147; and tit. Parliament.

MICHAELMAS HEAD COURT. A meeting of the heritors in Scotland, when the roll of freeholders is revised; anciently the presence of all freeholders was required there under a fine; but by 20 Geo. 2. c. 50, abolishing heritable jurisdictions, no such fine is incurred, except when the heritor is specially summoned as a juryman, &c.

MIDDLESEX. But one county rate to be made for Middlesex, 12 Geo. 2. c. 29. § 15. A registry of deeds and wills in that county established. 7 Ann. c. 20. See Deeds, Enrolment, Register.

MILDERNIX. A kind of canvass, of which sailcloths of ships were made. See 1 Jac. c. 11.

MILE, Miliaire. In the measure of England, is the distance or length of a thousand paces; otherwise described to contain eight furlongs, every furlong being forty poles, and every pole sixteen feet and a half. See 35 Eliz. c. 6; and tit. Measure. It is 1760 yards, or 5280 feet.

MILES. A knight. Mat. West. p. 118.

MILITARE, To be knighted, viz. Rex per Angliam fecit proclamari, &c. ut qui haberent unde militarent adessent apud Westmonasterium, &c. Mat. West. p. 118.

MILITARY CAUSES. Are, by 18 Rich. 2. c. 2, declared to be such as relate to contracts touching deeds of arms and of war, as well out of the realm as within it, which cannot be determined or discussed by the common law; together with other usages and customs to the same appertaining.

The only military court known to, and established by, the permanent laws of the land, is the court of chivalry, formerly held before the lord high constable, and earl marshal of England jointly; but since the attainder of Stafford, duke of Buckingham, under Henry VIII. and the consequent extinguishment of the office of lord high constable, it hath usually, with respect to civil matters, been holden before the earl marshal only. See Court of Chivalry.

MILITARY EVOLUTIONS AND EXERCISE. The 60 Geo. 3. c. 1. punishes the unlawful assemblies of persons for the purpose of being trained to, or of practising, military exercise, movements, and evolutions, with transportation for seven years.

MILITARY FEUDS. See Tenures, I.

MILITARY OFFENCES. Independent of the annual acts for the punishment of mutiny, &c., desertion from the king's armies in time of war, whether by land or sea, in England, or in parts beyond the seas, by the standing laws of the land, and particularly by 18 Hen. C. 19. (extended by 5 Eliz. c. 5. § 27.) was made felony, but with benefit of clergy. But by the 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 2., clergy was taken away from soldiers deserting, and the offence made triable by the justices of every shire. (See also 1 M. sess. 1. c. 1. and 4 P. & M. c. 3. § 9.) The same statutes punished inferior military offences with fines, imprisonment, and other penalties. See further, Courts Martial, Soldiers.

MILITARY POWER OF THE CROWN. See King, V. 3.

MILITARY STATE, or Military Force of the Kingdom. Includes the whole of the soldiery; or, such persons as are peculiarly appointed among the rest of the people, for the safeguard and defence of the realm. See King, V. 3., Soldiers.

MILITARY TENURES. See Tenures, I.

MILITARY TESTAMENT. By the exception in the statute of frauds 29 Car. 2. c. 3. § 23., and 5 Wm. 3. c. 21. § 6., soldiers in actual military service may make nuncupative wills, and dispose of their goods, wages, and other personal chattels, without those forms, solemnities, and expenses, which the law requires in other cases. See Wills.

MILITIA.

The NATIONAL SOLDIERY.

It seems universally agreed by all historians, that king Alfred first settled a national militia in this kingdom, and by his prudent discipline made all the subjects of his dominions soldiers; but we are unfortunately left in the dark as to the particulars of this celebrated regulation.

The feudal military tenures were established for the purpose of protection, and sometimes of attack against foreign enemies; (see Tenures.) For the further defence in cases of domestic insurrections or foreign invasions, various other plans have been adopted, all of them tending to unite the character of a citizen and soldier in one. First, the assise of arms, enacted 27 Hen. 2., and afterwards the statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. 1. c. 6., obliged every man, according to his state and degree, to provide a certain quantity of such arms as were then in use; and it was part of the duty of constables under the latter statute to see such arms provided. These weapons were changed by 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2., into more modern ones; but both these provisions were repealed by 1 Jac. 1. c. 25. 21 Jac. 1. c. 28. While these continued in force, it was usual, from time to time, for our princes to issue commissions of array; and send into every county officers in whom they could confide, to muster and array (or to set in military order) the inhabitants of every district; and the form of the commission of array was settled in parliament, anno 5 Hen. 4., so as to prevent the insertion therein of any new penal clauses. Rushw. pt. 3. p. 662, 7. See 8 Rep. 375., &c. But it was also provided by 1 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 5, 7. 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 8., that no man should be compelled to go out of the kingdom at any rate, nor out of his shire, but in cases of urgent necessity; nor should provide soldiers, unless by consent of parliament. About the reign of king Henry VIII., or his children, lieutenants began to be introduced, as standing representatives of the crown, to keep the counties in military order; for we find them mentioned as known officers in the 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 3., though they had then not been long in use, for Camden speaks of them in the time of queen Elizabeth, as extraordinary magistrates constituted only in times of difficulty and danger. But the introduction of these commissions of lieutenancy, which contained in substance the same powers as the old commissions of array, caused the latter to fall into disuse.

In this state, things continued till the repeal of the statutes of armour in the reign of king James I.; after which, when king Charles I. had, during his northern expeditions, issued commissions of lieutenancy, and exerted some military powers, which, having been long exercised, were thought to belong to the crown, it became a question in the long parliament, how far the power of the militia did inherently reside in the king; being now unsupported by any statute, and founded only upon immemorial usage. This question, long agitated with great heat and resentment on both sides, became at length the immediate cause of the fatal rupture between the king and his parliament; the two houses not only denying this prerogative of the crown, the legality of which might, perhaps, be somewhat doubtful; but also seizing into their own hands the entire power of the militia; the illegality of which step could never be any doubt at all.

Soon after the restoration of king Charles II., when the military tenures were abolished, it was thought proper to ascertain the power of the militia, to recognise the sole right of the crown to govern and command them, and to put the whole into a more regular method of military subordination. And the order in which the militia now stands by law, is principally built upon the 13 Car. 2. c. 6. 14 Car. 2. c. 3. 15 Car. 2. c. 4., which were then enacted. It is true, the two last of them are apparently repealed; but many of their provisions are re-enacted with the addition of some new regulations by subsequent militia laws; the general scheme of which is to discipline a certain number of the inhabitants of every county chosen by lot formerly for three, but now for five years, (liable to be prolonged by the circumstance of the militia being called out and embodied,) and officered by a lord lieutenant, the deputy lieutenants, and other principal landholders, under a commission from the crown. They are not compellable to march out of their counties unless in case of invasion or actual rebellion within the realm, (or any of majesty's dominions or territories, 16 Geo. 3. c. 3.) nor in any case compellable to march out of the kingdom. They are to be exercised at stated times; and their discipline in general is liberal and easy; but when drawn out into actual service, they are subject to the rigours of martial law, as necessary to keep them in order. This is the constitutional security which our laws have provided for the public peace, and for protecting the realm against foreign or domestic violence. See 1 Comm. 410., &c.

The last general acts passed for reducing into one all the laws relating to the militia are, 42 Geo. 3. c. 90., for England, and c. 91 for Scotland; these ascertain the particular militia to be raised in each county and district; but which has from time to time been augmented and altered by subsequent acts. It is provided, that in cases of actual invasion or imminent danger thereof, and in cases of rebellion and insurrection, his majesty may embody and increase the militia; and if parliament is not then sitting, they are to meet by proclamation in fourteen days.

The militia of Ireland is regulated on principles nearly similar, by 49 Geo. 3. c. 120., amended by 53 Geo. 3. c. 48. 54 Geo. 3. c. 179., &c.

The interchange of the British and Irish militia, so that each may serve in any part of the united kingdom, is allowed and regulated under 51 Geo. 3. c. 118. 128; 54 Geo. 3. c. 18. (a temporary act.)

The wives and families of militia men are provided for when requiring parish relief, under the 43 Geo. 3. c. 47., for England; 49 Geo. 3. c. 89., for Scotland; and 51 Geo. 3. c. 78. 52 Geo. 3. c. 28., for Ireland.

The pay and clothing of all the militia is provided for in acts which pass annually.

The militia having, under various temporary acts, volunteered into the regular army, from time to time, and at length considered as peculiarly applicable to that purpose, it was found expedient "that a local militia should be established, trained, and permanently maintained, to be called forth and employed in case of invasion in aid of the regular forces for the defence of the realm." This was accordingly effected, first as to England by 48 Geo. 3. c. 111., and afterwards for Scotland by 48 Geo. 3. c. 150. These statutes were amended by several subsequent acts; but the system has never been extended to Ireland.

The rank of officers of the corps of Fencibles in Scotland, and of those in the English militia, where serving together, is settled by 38 Geo. 3. c. 36. § 2.

The militia of the city of London is regulated by the 1 Geo. 4. c. 100; and that of the Tower Hamlets, by 37 Geo. 3. c. 25, 75; 42 Geo. 3. c. 90. § 153; 53 Geo. 3. c. 132. See Trophy-money.

As to the militia of the cinque ports, see 42 Geo. 3. c. 90. § 155, referring to 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 3; and 15 Car. 2. c. 4. See also 43 Geo. 3. c. 100. For raising a body of miners in Cornwall and Devon, see 42 Geo. 3. c. 72.

MILL, Mol utrum. A house or engine to grind corn, and is either a water-mill, wind-mill, horse-mill, hand-mill, &c. And besides corn and grist-mills, there are paper-mills, fulling or tucking-mills, iron-mills, oil-mills, &c. 2 Inst. 621.

The toll shall be taken according to the strength of the water, Ordin. pro pistor inest temp. Prohibition shall not go in suit for title of a new mill. Art. cler. 9 Edw. 2. st. 1. c. 5.

With respect to actions against individuals for not grinding their corn at particular mills, &c. see Sci. ad Modum. See further Malicious Injuries and Millers.

MILL-BANK PENITENTIARY. The acts for the establishment and regulation of this prison are the 52 Geo. 3. c. 44; 56 Geo. 3. c. 69; 59 Geo. 3. c. 136; 4 Geo. 4. c. 82; 5 Geo. 4. c. 19; and 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 33.

The 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 86. instituting the new central criminal court for the metropolis and the adjacent parts, provides, (§ 6.) that the Penitentiary at Mill-bank shall be one of the prisons under the act.

MILLEATE, or MILL-LEAT. (Mentioned in 7 Jac. 1. c. 19.) A trench to convey water to or from a mill; the word is most peculiar to Devonshire. Cowell.

MILLERS. Ought not to be common buyers of any corn, to sell the same again either in corn or meal, but ought only to serve for the grinding of corn that is brought to their mills. Dalt. 259.

A miller is indictable for changing corn delivered to him to be ground, and giving bad corn instead of it. 1 Sess. Ca. 217. But the indictment should allege, either that the meal or corn delivered back by the miller was an article for the food of man, or that the miller was the owner or occupier of a soke man, to which the inhabitants of the parish or town were bound to come to have their corn ground. 4 M. & S. 1.

By 31 Geo. 2. c. 29. § 29. On information given on oath to any magistrate, that there is reasonable cause to suspect any miller, or other person who manufactures meal or flour for sale, of mixing up with the same any ingredients, not the genuine produce of the grain such meal or flour shall impure and ought to be, or whereby the purity of any meal or flour shall be in anywise adulated, such magistrate, or any peace officer authorized by a warrant, may at all seasonable times in the day enter into any house, mill, or other place of the party suspected, to search whether the fact be so.

Meal or flour deemed on such search to have been adulterated, and all ingredients used for such adulteration, may be seized; and such as shall be seized by any officer shall be carried to a magistrate. If the magistrate shall adjudge, that ingredients, not the genuine produce of the grain, have been put in such meal or flour, or that the purity of it was thereby adulterated, he may dispose of the same as he thinks proper.

§ 30. Every miller, mealman, or other person, on whose premises any mixture or ingredient shall be found, which shall be adjudged by any magistrate to have been lodged there with intent to adulterate the purity of any meal or flour, shall on conviction before a justice forfeit not exceeding 10*l.*, nor less than 10*s.*, unless he shall make it appear that the mixture was there for some lawful purpose; and the convicting magistrate may, out of the money forfeited, cause the offender's name, place of abode, and offence to be published in a newspaper.

By § 31. wilfully obstructing or opposing such search, or carrying away the mixture or ingredients, renders the party liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* or less than 20*s.*

§ 32. Prohibits a miller from acting as a magistrate, under the penalty of 50*l.*

§ 34. Provides for the proceeding by summons, warrant, distress, and commitment, and directs all penalties to go to the informer.

By 36 Geo. 3. c. 85. § 1. every miller must have in his mill a true and equal balance with proper weights, under the penalty of 20*s.* And if any weights not according to the legal standard, or any false balance, shall be found in his mill, he is liable to the penalties imposed by the 35 Geo. 3. c. 102.

By § 2. millers must weigh the corn brought to them to grind, both before and after it is ground, if required, under the penalty of 40*s.* And by § 3. they are required to deliver the whole produce of the corn when ground, allowing for waste and toll, under the penalty of 1*s.* per bushel for the deficiency, and treble the value. And see Measure.

§ 5. No corn is to be taken for toll, but only money, under the penalty of 5*l.* except where the party has no money. The act does not extend to soke mills where a right to take exists by custom and law.

§ 6. Every miller must put up in some conspicuous part of his mill a table of his prices, or amount of toll, under 20*s.* penalty.

MILLET, Milium. A small grain; so termed from its multitude. Lit. Dict.

MINA. A corn measure of different quantity, according to the things measured by it; and minage was a toll or duty paid for selling corn by this measure. Cowell. According to Littleton, it is a measure of ground, containing one hundred and twenty feet in length, and as many in breadth. Also it is taken both for a coin and a weight. Lit. Dict.

MINARE. To mine or dig mines. Minator, a miner. Record, 10 Edw. 1.

MINATOR CARUCÆ. A ploughman. Cowell.

MINE-ADVENTURERS. A company established by 9 Ann. c. 21.

MINERAL. Any thing that grows in mines, and contains metals. Shep. Epit. See Metals, Mines.

MINERAL COURTS, Curie minerales. Are peculiar courts for regulating the concerns of lead mines; as stannary courts are for tin. See Berghmote.

MINES, Minere. [Quarries or places whereof any thing is dug; this term is likewise applied to hidden treasure dug out of the earth.]

The king by his prerogative hath all mines of gold and silver to make money; and where in mines the gold and silver is of the greater value, they are called royal mines. Plowd. 336. But by the 1 W. & M. c. 30, no mine of copper or tin shall be adjudged a royal mine, though silver be extracted. And by the 5 W. & M. c. 6, persons having mines of copper, tin, lead, &c. shall enjoy the same, although claimed to be royal mines; but the king may have the ore, (except in Devon and Cornwall,) paying to the owners of the mines within thirty days after it shall be raised, and before removed, 16*l.* per ton for copper ore washed and made merchantable; for lead ore, 9*l.* per ton (increased to 25*l.* by 55 Geo. 3. c. 134); tin or iron, 40*s.* &c. See 1 Comm. 295.

Alum mines belong of course to the persons in whose grounds they are; and, therefore, no privilege concerning them can be granted but in the king's own ground. 3 Inst. 185; see 21 Jac. 1. c. 3. § 11, 12.

Where the crown has only a bare reservation of royal mines without any right of entry, it cannot by prerogative grant a license to dig up the soil and search for mines; but if the mines are open, it can restrain the owner of the soil

This term may be considered as, and in fact is, a genus, which contains under it a great number of species, almost as various in their nature as human actions. See Hale's and Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown; and tit. Misprision.

So long as an act rests on bare intention, it is not punishable, but immediately when an act is done, the law judges not only of the act done, but of the intent with which it is done; and if accompanied with an unlawful and malicious intent, though the act itself would otherwise have been innocent, the intent being criminal, the act becomes criminal and punishable. Cald. 397; 3 Inst. 4; Forst. 103. Thus an attempt to commit a felony is in many cases a misdemeanor. 2 East, 21; 1 Str. 196; and see 1 Hawk. c. 25. § 3. v. c. 55. And an attempt to commit even a misdemeanor has been decided in many cases to be itself a misdemeanor. 2 East, 8; 6 East, 464. And it should seem, that an attempt to commit a statutable misdemeanor is as much indictable as an attempt to commit a common law misdemeanor. Russ. & Ry. 107. An attempt to suborn a person to commit perjury was by all the judges held to be a misdemeanor. Anon. cited in Cald. 400; and 2 East, 14, 17, 28.

Where a statute makes that felony which before was a misdemeanor only, the misdemeanor is merged, and there can be no prosecution afterwards for the misdemeanor. 3 B. & A. 161, 164; 1 Russ. on Crimes, 48.

By 60 Geo. 3. c. 4. it is enacted, that where any person shall be prosecuted in the Court of King's Bench at Westminster or Dublin, for any misdemeanor, either by information or indictment, found in or removed to such courts, and shall appear in person, in term-time, to answer thereto, such defendant shall not be allowed to imparl till the following term, but shall plead or demur within four days; or, in default thereof, judgment shall be entered against him. Where the defendant appears by attorney, a rule of court shall be made to require such plea or demurrer. The court may, on sufficient cause, allow further time to plead or demur. Persons prosecuted for misdemeanors, by indictment at any sessions of the peace, &c. having been committed or bailed twenty days at least before the sessions, shall plead to such indictment; and the trial shall proceed at such same sessions, unless a certiorari be delivered before the jury is sworn for the trial. Such certiorari may be issued before indictment found as well as after. Persons committed or bailed at any period less than twenty days before any session, or having twenty days' notice of an indictment found against them, at a session subsequent to their being committed or bailed, shall plead, and be tried at such subsequent session. Indictments removed from cities or towns corporate into counties, under 38 Geo. 3. c. 52. shall be tried according to this act, with power to the court to extend the time of pleading. In all prosecutions for misdemeanors by the attorney-general, the court, if applied to for that purpose, shall order a copy of the information or indictment to be delivered to the defendant, after his appearance, free of expense; and if any such prosecution shall not be brought to trial within twelve months after the plea of not guilty pleaded on application by the defendant, giving twelve days' notice to the attorney general, the court may, by order, authorize the defendant to bring on his trial; unless a nolle prosequi be entered. The act is not to extend to informations of quo warranto, or for non-repair of bridges or highways.

By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 32. offenders convicted of any misdemeanor, (except perjury and subornation thereof,) enduring the punishment adjudged therefore, shall not, by reason of such conviction, be deemed incompetent witnesses in any court or proceeding civil or criminal.

With respect to the pronouncing of judgment in misdemeanors upon records of the King's Bench, see Judgments in Criminal Cases.

MISE, Fr.; Lat. missum, misa.] Is a law term signifying expenses, and it is commonly so used in the entries of judgments in personal actions; as when the plaintiff recovers, the judgment is quod recuperet damna sua to such a value, and pro misis et custagiis, for costs and charges, so much, &c.

This word hath also another signification in law; which is, where it is taken for a word of art, appropriated to a writ of right, so called because both parties put themselves upon the mere right, to be tried upon the grand assize, so that what in all other actions is called an issue, in a writ of right was termed a mise; but if in the writ of right a collateral point were tried, there it was called an issue. To join the mise upon the mere right was as much as to say, to join the mise upon the clear right, i. e. to join upon the point, which had the more right, the tenant or demandant. 1 Inst. 294; 37 Edw. 3. c. 16. See 3 Comm. App. § 6.

MISES, Taxes or tallages, &c. An honorary gift or customary present, from the people of Wales to every new king and Prince of Wales, anciently given in cattle, wine, and corn, but now in money, being 5000*l.* or more, is denominated a mise; so was the usual tribute or fine of 3000 marks, paid by the inhabitants of the county palatine of Chester, at the change of every owner of the said earldoms, for enjoying their liberties. And at Chester they have a mise-book wherein every town and village in the county is rated what to pay towards the mise. The 27 Hen. 8. c. 26. ordains that "lords shall have all such mises and profits of their lands as they had in times past," &c.

Mise is sometimes corruptly used for mease, in law French mees, a messuage; thus a mise-place in some manors is such a messuage or tenement as answers the lord a heriot, at the death of its owner. 2 Inst. 528.

MISELLI, Leprous persons. Cowell.

MISE-MONEY. Money given by way of contract or composition to purchase any liberty, &c. Blount. Ten. 102.

MISERERE. The name and first word of one of the penitential Psalms, and most commonly that which the ordinary gave to such guilty malefactors as were admitted to the benefit of clergy; being therefore called the Psalm of Mercy. See Clergy, Benefit of.

MISERICORDIA. An arbitrary or discretionary amerancement. See Amercement.

Sometimes misericordia is to be quit and discharged of all manner of amerancements that a man may fall into in the forest. See Crompt. Jur. 196. See Moderata Misericordia.

MISERICORDIA in cibis et potu. Exceedings, or overcommons, or any gratuitous portion of meat and drink given to the religious above their ordinary allowance. Mat. Par. Vit. Abb. S. Albani, 71. In some convents they had a stated allowance of these overcommons upon extraordinary days, which were called Misericordia regulares. Monast. Angl. 149, b.

MISERICORDIA COMMUNIS. Is when a fine is set on the whole county or hundred. Mon. Angl. i. 967.

MISEVENIRE. To succeed ill; as where a man is accused of a crime, and fails in his defence or purgation. Lex Canut. 78 apud Brompton.

MISFEASANCE. A misdeed or trespass. Jury to inquire of all purprestures and misfeasance. Cro. Car. 418. It is commonly used as signifying a positive act of tort in contradistinction to nonfeasance. See that title.

MISFEASOR. A trespasser. 2 Inst. 200.

MISKENNING, miskenninga; from mis, and Sax. cenan i. e. citare, Leg. H. 1. c. 12. Iniqua vel injusta in jus vocatio; inconstanter loqui in curia, vel invariare. It is mentioned among the privileges granted and confirmed to the monasteries of Ramsey by S. Edward the Confessor. Mon. Angl. i. 237. Et in civitate London in nullo placito miskennagium. Chart. H. 2.

MISNOMER, of the Fr. mes, amies; and nomer, nominare.] The using one name for another; a misnaming, name, nomen, est quasi rei notamen, and was invented to make a distinction between person and person; and where a person is described, so that he may be certainly distinguished and known from other persons, the omission, or, in some cases, the mistake of the name, shall not avoid the grant. 11 Rep.

40, 21. A grant to a man by a wrong name may be good, si constat de personâ, but the demonstratio personæ must appear upon the face of the grant. Ld. Raym. 304. Yet a grant to a knight, by the name of esquire, is void. Tb. 303. And if the name of a party is mistaken, the judges ought to mould a small mistake therein, to make good a contract, &c. and so as to support the act of the party by the law. Hob. 125. But the Christian name ought always to be perfect; and the law is not so precise as to surnames as it is of Christian names. Poph. 57; 2 Lit. Abr. 199. Misprisions of clerks in names are amendable; Peter and Piers have been adjudged one and the same name. Samuel and Alexander and Gin et al and Gerald are but one name; but Randolph and Randolph, Isabel and Sybil, &c. are several names, and must be named right. 1 Rob. Abr. 135; 1 And. 211.

Where a Christian name is quite mistaken, as John for Thomas, &c. it may be pleaded that there was no such man in rerum natura. Dyer, 349. Or he may plead his having been christened by the name of Thomas, and always called and known by that name; and traverse his being called or known by the name of John. If a person pleads that he never was called by such a name, it is ill; for this may be true, and yet he might be of that name of baptism. 1 Salk. 6. One whose name is Edmund is bound in a bond by the name of Edward; though he subscribes his true name, that is no part of the bond. 2 Cro. 610; Dyer, 273. If a person be bound by the name of W. R. he may be sued by the name of W. R. alias dictus W. B. his true name, not W. B. alias dictus W. R. 5 Salk. 288. If a person be named by two Christian and surnames, it will be quashed, for he cannot have two such names. 1 Ld. Raym. 362. A lady, wife to a private person, might be named according to the name of her husband, or the writ shall abate, so if the son of an earl, &c. be sued as a lord, and not as a private person by the name of his family. Dyer, 70; 2 Salk. 151.

Misnomer of corporations may be pleaded in abatement. 1 Leon. 152; 5 Mod. 327; 2 Salk. 451. And if there be any mistake in the name of a corporation, that is material in their leases and grants, they will be void. 2 Bridl. 1; Anders. 196. Judgment against a corporation by a wrong name is void. Ld. Raym. 119. A defendant may avoid an outlawry by pleading a misnomer of name of baptism or surname; or misnomer as to additions of estate, of the town, &c. See Outlawry.

A misnomer must be pleaded by the party himself who is misnamed. 1 Lutw. 35. Plea of misnomer by attorney may be refused; but it is no cause of demurrer. Ld. Raym. 609. If defendant omits to plead a misnomer, he may be taken in execution by the wrong Christian name. 2 Str. 1218. What words in a plea of misnomer shall be considered as a special imparlance, see 1 Wils. 261.

If issue is joined on a plea in abatement for a misnomer, in an action upon the case on promises, and found against the defendant, the judgment shall be peremptory, therefore the jury ought to assess the damages. 2 Wils. 367.

If a defendant after having given bail on his arrest, and been afterwards served with notice of declaration, do not plead misnomer in abatement within the first four days, the court will not afterwards (though before pleading in chief) set aside the proceedings, on the ground that he had been arrested and declared against by a wrong Christian name. 15 East. 153.

If a person enter into a bond by a wrong Christian name, he must be sued thereon by such name. A declaration against him by his right name, stating that he by the wrong name executed the bond, is bad. 3 Taunt. 504. See Lutw. 894. Ld. Raym. 301, 304.—Note, names of persons not christened are surnames only. Ib. 305.

For the addition or omission of a letter or two, not making any material alteration in the sound, it is not proper to plead a misnomer. The courts of law discourage (and that justly) dilatory pleas, as much as they can, as tending to the delay of justice.

And now by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. § 11. "no plea in abatement for a misnomer shall be allowed in any personal action, but that in all cases in which a misnomer would but for this act have been by law pleadable in abatement in such actions, the defendant shall be at liberty to cause the declaration to be amended at the cost of the plaintiff, by inserting the right name upon a judge's summons founded on an affidavit of the right name; and in case such summons shall be discharged, the costs of such application shall be paid by the party applying, if the judge shall think fit."

In criminal cases also no indictment can now be abated by a plea of misnomer. See Indictment, VI.

MISPLEADING. If, in pleading, any thing be omitted, essential to the action or defence, as if the plaintiff does not merely state his title in a defective manner, but sets forth a title wholly defective in itself, or if to an action of debt (i. e. on bond, contract, &c.) the defendant pleads not guilty instead of nil debet (now abolished), these cannot be cured by a verdict for the plaintiff in the first case, or for the defendant in the second. Salk. 365; Cro. Eliz. 778. When an issue is joined on an immaterial point, or such a point, as, after trial, the court cannot give judgment, the court regularly awards a repleader. See Pleading, Repleader.

MISPRISION,

[Mispriso, from the Fr. mespris, contemptus.] A neglect, oversight, or contempt; as, for example, misprision of treason is a negligence in not revealing treason to the king, his council, or a magistrate, where a person knows it to be committed; so of felony. Standf. P. C. lib. 1. c. 19. If a man knoweth of any treason or felony, and conceals the same, it is a misprision. In a larger sense misprision is taken for many great offences, which are neither treason nor felony, or capital, but very near them; and every great misdemeanor, which hath no certain term appointed by the law, is sometimes called misprision. 3 Inst. 36; H. P. C. 127; Wood, 406, 408.

Misprisions are, in the acceptance of our law, generally understood to be all such high offences as are under the degree of capital, but nearly bordering thereon; and it is said that a misprision is contained in every treason and felony whatsoever; and that, if the king so please, the offender may be proceeded against for the misprision only. Year B. 2 Rich. 3. 10; Standf. P. C. 32, 37; Kel. 71; 1 Hal. P. C. 374; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 20. § 1.

Misprisions are generally divided into two sorts: 1. Negative, which consists in the concealment of something which ought to be revealed; and, 2. Positive, which consists in the commission of something which ought not to be done, 4 Comm. c. 9.

Of the first or negative kind, is what is called misprision of treason; consisting in the bare knowledge and concealment of treason, without any degree of assent thereto; for any assent makes the party a principal traitor; as indeed the concealment, which was construed aiding and abetting, did at the common law. Thus it is laid down, that when one knows another hath committed treason, and doth not reveal it to the king, or his privy council, or some magistrate, that the offender may be secured and brought to justice, it is high treason by the ancient common law; for delay in discovering treason, was deemed an assent to it, and consequently high treason. Bract. 118; S. P. C. 37; 3 Inst. 138, 140.

But it is enacted, by the 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10. that a bare concealment of treason shall be only held a misprision. This concealment becomes criminal if the party apprised of the treason does not, as soon as conveniently may be, reveal it to some judge of assize, or justice of the peace. 1 Hal. P. C. 372. But if there be any probable circumstances of assent, as if a man goes to a treasonable meeting, knowing beforehand that a conspiracy is intended against the king; or being in such company once by accident, and having heard such treasonable conspiracy, meets the same company again, and hears more of it, but conceals it; this is an implied assent in law, and makes the concealer guilty of actual high treason. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 20. § 4.

A person having notice of a meeting of conspirators against the government, goes into their company and hears their treasonable consultation, and conceals it, this is treason; so where one has been accidentally in such company, and heard such discourse, if he meets such a company a second time; for, in these cases, the concealment is attended with circumstances which show an approbation thereof. H. P. C. 127; Kel. 17, 21.

A man who hath knowledge of a treason cannot secure himself by discovering generally that there will be a rising, without disclosing the persons intending to rise; nor can he do it by discovering these to a private person, who is no magistrate. S. P. C.; H. P. C. 127. But where one is told in general, that there will be a rising or rebellion, and doth not know the persons concerned in it, or the place where, &c. this uncertain knowledge may be concealed, and it shall not be treason or misprision. Kel. 22; 1 H. P. C. 36. If high treason is discovered to a clergyman in confession, he ought to reveal it; but not in case of felony. 2 Inst. 629. This was law when the Roman Catholic religion was professed here as the religion of the land; the same may be still law. Dict.

If a person is indicted of misprision, as for treason; though he be found guilty, the judges shall not give judgment thereon, he not being indicted of the misprision. Jenk. Cent. 217. Information will not lie for misprision of treason, &c. but indictment, as for capital crimes. There must be two witnesses upon indictments as well as trials of misprision of treason, by 7 Will. 3. c. 8. See Treason.

There is a negative misprision of treason, created by act of parliament. By 18 Eliz. c. 2. concealers of bulls of absolution from Rome are declared guilty of misprision of treason. A positive misprision of treason was also created by 14 Eliz. c. 3. which enacted that those who forged foreign coin, not current in this kingdom, their aiders, abettors, and procurers, should all be guilty of misprision of treason; but that statute was repealed by the 2 Will. 4. c. 34.

The punishment of misprision of treason is, loss of the profits of land during life, forfeiture of goods, and imprisonment during life; 1 Hal. P. C. 374; 3 Inst. 36, 218; which total forfeiture of the goods was inflicted while the offence amounted to principal treason, and of course included in it a felony by the common law; and therefore is no exception to the general rule, that whenever an offence is punished by such total forfeiture, it is felony at the common law. 4 Comm. c. 9. 120, 121.

Misprision of felony is the concealment of a felony which a man knows, but never assented to; for if he assented, this makes him either principal or accessory.

To observe the commission of a felony without giving any alarm, or using any endeavours to apprehend the offender, is a misprision; for a man is bound to apprehend a felon, and to disclose the felony to a magistrate with all possible expedition. 1 Hawk. c. 59; 3 Inst. 189.

The punishment of misprision of felony in a public officer, by Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 9. is imprisonment for a year and a day; in a common person, for a less discretionary time; and in both, fine and ransom at the king's pleasure, as declared by the judges in a court of justice. 1 Hal. P. C. 375.

The stats. Westm. 1. 3 Edw. 1. c. 9; 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. provide against concealments of felonies by sheriffs, coroners, and bailiffs, &c.

Under this title of misprision, that of theftbote may be reduced; which is, where one, knowing of a felony, takes his goods again, or amends for the same. 8 Inst. 154, 159;

H. P. C. 130. Though the bare taking goods again which have been stolen is no offence, unless some favour be shown the thief. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 59. § 7.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 58. corruptly to take money or reward under pretence or on account of helping any person to any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property, which by felony or misdemeanor has been stolen, obtained, or converted, is felony, (unless the party cause the offender to be apprehended and brought to trial,) and the offender transportable for life, &c.; and by § 59, publicly to advertise a reward for property stolen or lost, without making inquiry after the party producing the property, or by means of any advertisement offering to return money advanced on such property, or printing or publishing such advertisement, incurs a penalty of 50*l.*

There is also another species of negative misprision, namely, the concealing of treasure-trove, which belongs to the king or his grantees by prerogative royal; this concealment was formerly punishable by death, but now only by fine and imprisonment. Glanv. lib. 1. c. 2; 3 Inst. 133.

2. Misprisions which are merely positive, are generally denominated contempts or high misdemeanors; of which the first and principal is the mal-administration of such high officers as are in public trust and employment. This is usually punished by the method of parliamentary impeachment, wherein such penalties, short of death, are inflicted, as to the wisdom of the House of Peers shall seem proper, consisting usually of banishment, imprisonment, fines or perpetual disability. Hitherto also may be referred the offence of embezzling the public money, which is not a capital crime, but subjects the offender to a discretionary fine and imprisonment. 4 Comm. 122.

Other misprisions are in general such contempts of the executive magistrate, as demonstrate themselves by so much arrogant and undutiful behaviour towards the king and government; these are either against the king's prerogative, the king's person and government; the king's title; his palaces, or courts of justice. With respect to the two first of these, see Contempt, Government.

Contempts against the king's title, not amounting to treason or præmunire, are, the denial of his right to the crown in common and unadvised discourse; for if it be by advised speaking, it amounts to a præmunire; see that title. This heedless species of contempt is punished with fine and imprisonment. Likewise if any person shall in anywise hold, affirm, or maintain, that the common laws of this realm, not altered by parliament, ought not to direct the right of the crown of England; this is a misdemeanor by 13 Eliz. c. 1. and punishable with forfeiture of goods and chattels. A contempt may also arise from refusing or neglecting to take the oaths appointed by statute for the better securing the government, and yet acting in a public office, place of trust, or other capacity for which the said oaths are required to be taken, viz. those of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration which must be taken within six calendar months after admission. The penalties for this contempt, inflicted by 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 13. are very little, if any thing, short of those of a præmunire; being an incapacity to hold the said offices, or any other; to prosecute any suit; to be guardian or executor; to take any legacy or deed of gift; or to vote at an election for members of parliament; and after conviction the offender shall forfeit 500*l.* to any that will sue for the same. Members on the foundation of any colleges in the two universities, who by this statute are bound to take the oaths, must also register a certificate thereof in the college register within one month after; otherwise, if the electors do not remove him and elect another within twelve months, or after the king may nominate a person to succeed him, by his great seal or sign manual. Besides thus taking the oaths for offices, any two justices of the peace may by the same statute summon and tender the oaths to any person whom they shall suspect to be disaffected. 4 Comm. 124. See further Dis-senters, Oaths, Præmunire, Roman Catholics.

Contempts against the king's palaces or courts of justice have been always looked upon as high misprisions; and by the ancient law, before the Conquest, fighting in the king's palace, or before the king's judges, was punished with death. 3 Inst. 140; Ll. Alured. c. 7, 34. By the 33 Hen. 8. c. 12. malicious striking in the king's palace, wherein his royal person resided, whereby blood was drawn, was punishable by perpetual imprisonment, and fine at the king's pleasure; and also with loss of the offender's right hand; the solemn execution of which sentence was prescribed in the statute at length. See Sir E. Knevett's Ca. in Stone, 11 St. Tr. 16; and the Earl of Devonshire's, 11 St. Tr. 183.

That act was repealed by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 81. which, however, does not notice the penalty attached by the common law to the offence of striking in the royal presence; which, it is conceived, still subjects the offender to the loss of his hand. 1 Hawk. c. 21. § 3; 2 Inst. 549; 3 Inst. 140.

But striking in the king's superior courts of justice in Westminster Hall, or at the assizes, is made still more penal than even in the king's palace; the reason seems to be, that those courts being anciently held in the king's palace, and before the king himself, striking there included the former contempt against the king's palace, and something more, viz. the disturbance of public justice. For this reason, by the ancient common law before the Conquest, striking in the king's courts of justice, or drawing a sword therein, was a capital felony; Ll. Inæ. c. 6; Ll. Canut. c. 56; Ll. Alured. c. 7; and our modern law retains so much of the ancient severity, as only to exchange the loss of life for the loss of the offending limb. Therefore a stroke or blow in such a court of justice, whether blood be drawn or not, or even assaulting a judge sitting in the court, by drawing a weapon, without any blow struck, is punishable with the loss of the right hand, imprisonment for life, and forfeiture of goods and chattels, and of the profits of the offender's lands during life. Statute. P. C. 38; 3 Inst. 140, 141. A rescue also of a prisoner from any of the said courts, without striking a blow, is punished with perpetual imprisonment, and forfeiture of goods, and the profits of lands during life; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 21. § 5; being looked upon as an offence of the same nature with the last; but only as no blow is actually given, the amputation of the hand is excused. For the like reason, an affray or riot near the said courts, but out of their actual view, is punished only with fine and imprisonment. Cro. Car. 373.

Not only such as are guilty of any actual violence, but of threatening or reproachful words to any judge sitting in the courts, are guilty of a high misprision, and have been punished with large fines, imprisonment, and corporal punishment. Cro. Car. 503. And even in the inferior courts of the king, an ill or contemptuous behaviour is punishable with a fine by the judges there sitting; as by the steward in a court of record, or the like. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 21. § 10, 11.

Like case all such as are guilty of any improper treatment to those who are immediately under the protection of a court of justice, are punishable by fine and imprisonment, as if a man assaults or threatens his adversary for suing him a counsellor or attorney for being employed against him, a factor for a verdict, or a gaoler or other ministerial officer, for keeping a man in custody, and properly executing his duty. 1 Inst. 141, 142.

Lastly, to endeavour to dissuade a witness from giving evidence; to disclose an examination before the privy council, or to advise a prisoner to stand mute (all of which are impediments of justice), are high misprisions, and contempts of the king's courts, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. And anciently it was held, that if one of the grand jury disclosed to any person indicated the evidence that appeared against him, he was thereby made accessory to the offence, if felony; and in treason a principal. And at this day it is agreed that he is guilty of a high misprision, and liable to be fined and imprisoned. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 21. § 15.

MISPRISIONS OF CLERKS, &c. Relate to their neglects in writing or keeping records; and here misprision signifies a mistaking. See 14 Edm. 3. c. 6; and see Amendment.

MISRECITAL. Of deeds or conveyances will sometimes hurt a deed, and sometimes not. Hob. 18, 19, 129.

If a thing is referred to time, place, and number, and that is mistaken, all is void. Arg. Pl. C. 392 b. Trin. 18 Elix. in the case of the Earl of Leicester v. Heydon.

Misrecital in an immaterial point, and where it is only an additional flourish in things circumstantial, shall not avoid a grant; as where the husband has a term in right of his wife, and this term is recited as made to the husband. A misrecital in the beginning of a deed, which goes not to the end of a deed, shall not hurt; but if it goes to the end of a sentence, so that the deed is limited by it, it is vicious. Carth. 149. See Amendment, Deed, Lease.

MISSA, the Mass. At first used for the dismissal or sending away of the people; and hence it came to signify the whole church service or common prayer, but more particularly the communion service, and the office of the sacrament, after those who did not receive it were dismissed. Lit. Dict.

MISSAL, missale.] The mass-book, containing all things to be daily said in the mass. Lindw. Provincial. l. 3. c. 2.

MISSATICUS. A messenger. Cowell. Domesday in Chent.

MISSÆ PRESBYTER. A priest in orders. Blount.

MISSURA. Singing the nunc dimittis, and performing other ceremonies to recommend and dismiss a dying person. And in the statutes of the church of St. Paul, in London, (collected by Ralph Baldock, dean, about the year 1295, in the chapter de Frateria, of the fraternity or brotherhood, who were obliged to a mutual communication of all religious offices), it is ordained, Ut fiat commendatio et missura et sepultura omnibus sociis coadjuvantibus et astantibus. Liber Stat. Eccles. Pauline. MS. fol. 25.

MISSURIUM. A dish for serving up meat to a table. Thorn's Chron. p. 1762.

MISTAKE. A negligent error in any deed, record, process, &c. As to which see Amendment, Deed, &c.

Ignorance or mistake is classed by Blackstone among defects of the will; as when a man intending to do a lawful act does that which is unlawful; for here the deed and the will acting separately, there is not that conjunction between them which is necessary to form a criminal act. But this must be an ignorance or mistake of fact, and not an error in point of law. Thus, if a man intending to kill a thief or housebreaker in his own house, by mistake kills one of his own family, this is no criminal action; but if a man thinks he has a right to kill a person excommunicated or outlawed, wherever he meets him, and does so, this is wilful murder; for a mistake in point of law, which every person of discretion not only may, but is bound and presumed to know, is in criminal cases no sort of defence. 4 Comm. c. 2. p. 27. See Ignorance.

MISTERIUM for MINISTERIUM. Mon. Angl. tom. 3. p. 102.

MIS-TRIAL. A false or erroneous trial, where it is in a wrong county, &c. 3 Cro. 284. Consent of parties cannot help such a trial, when past. Hob. 5. See Trial.

MISUSER. Is an abuse of any liberty or benefit; as "he shall make a fine for his misuser." Old Nat. Brev. 149. By misuser, a charter of a corporation may be forfeited; so also an office, &c. See Condition, l. 1, Office.

MITRED ABBOTS. Were those governors of religious houses who obtained from the pope the privilege of wearing the mitre, ring, gloves, and crosier of a bishop. The mitred abbots, says Cowell, were not the same with the conventual prelates, who were summoned to parliament as spiritual lords, though it hath been commonly so held; for their summons to parliament did not any way depend on their mitres, but on their receiving their temporals from the hands of the king. See Abbot.

MITTA, from the Saxon mitten, mensura.] An ancient Saxon measure; its quantity doth not certainly appear, but it is said to be a measure of ten bushels. Domesday, tit. Wirecscire, Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 262. And mitta or mitcha, besides being a sort of measure for salt and corn, is used for the place where the cauldrons were put to boil salt. Gale's Hist. Brit. 767.

MITTENDO MANUSCRIPTUM PEDIS FINIS. Was a judicial writ directed to the treasurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer, to search for and transmit the foot of a fine, acknowledged before justices in eyre, into the Common Pleas, &c. Reg. Orig. 14.

MITTIMUS. A writ for removing and transferring of records from one court to another; as out of the King's Bench into the Exchequer, and sometimes by certiorari into the Chancery, and from thence into another court; but the Lord Chancellor may deliver such record with his own hand. 5 Rich. 2. st. 1. c. 15; 28 & 29 Hen. 8; Dyer, 29, 32.

Mittimus is also a precept in writing, under the hand and seal of a justice of peace, directed to the gaoler, for the receiving and safe keeping of an offender until he is delivered by law. 2 Inst. 590. See Commitment.

MITTRE A LARGE. Is generally to set or put at liberty. Lam Fr. Dict. And there is a mittre le estate and de droit mentioned by Littleton, in case of releases of lands by joint-tenants, &c. which may sometimes pass a fee, without words of inheritance. 1 Inst. 273, 274. See Release.

MIXED ACTIONS. Suits partaking of the nature of real and personal, wherein some real property is demanded, and also personal damages for a wrong sustained. They are now abolished. See further Action, Limitation of Actions, III.

MIXED or COMPOUND LARCENY. Is such as has all the properties of simple larceny, but is accompanied with one or both of the aggravations of violence to the person, or taking from a house. See Burglary, House, Larceny.

MIXED TITHES. Are those of cheese, milk, and young beasts, &c. 2 Inst. 649. See Tithes.

MIXTILIO. See Mestilo.

MIXTUM. This word is often mentioned by our monkish historians; it sometimes signifies a breakfast, but always a certain quantity of bread and wine. Covell.

MOBBING. The assembly of a number of people, to the terror of the subject, and disturbance of the public peace. Scotch Dict. See Riot.

MOCKADOES. Stuffs made in England and other countries; mentioned in 23 Eliz. c. 9.

MODERATA MISERICORDIA. A writ founded on Magna Carta, which lies for him who is amerced in a court not of record, for any transgression beyond the quality or quantity of the offence; it is directed to the lord of the court, or his bailiff, commanding him to take a moderate amercement of the parties. If a man be amerced in a court baron, on presentment by the jury, where he did not any trespass, he shall not have this writ, unless the amercement be excessive and outrageous; and if the steward of the court, of his own head, will amerce any tenant or other person without cause, the party ought not to sue for his writ of moderata misericordia, if he be distrained for that amercement; but he shall have action of trespass. New Nat. Br. 167. When the amercement which is set on a person is affected by his peers, this writ of moderata misericordia doth not lie; for then it is according to the statutes. See F. N. B. 76, 4to edit. 176.

MODIATIO. Was a certain duty paid for every tierce of wine. Mon. Angl. tom. 2. p. 994.

MODIFICATION. The term used in Scotland to express the ascertaining, by the commission of teinds (tithes), the amount of the stipend to the minister of the parish.

MODIUS. A measure, usually a bushel; but various according to the customs of several countries.

MODIUS TERRÆ VEL AGRI. This phrase was much used in the ancient charters of the British kings, and probably signified the same quantity of ground as with the Romans, viz. one hundred feet long, and as many broad. Mon. Angl. iii. 200.

MODO ET FORMA. Words of art in law pleading, &c. and particularly used in the answer of a defendant, whereby he denies to have done the thing laid to his charge modo et formâ declaratâ, in manner and form as declared by the plaintiff. Kitch. 232.

Where modo et formâ are of the substance of the issue, and where but words of form, this diversity is to be observed, where the issue taken goeth to the point of the writ or action, there modo et formâ are but words of form, as in the case of the writ of entry in casu proviso. But otherwise it is when a collateral point in pleading is traversed; as if a feoffment be alleged by two, and this is traversed modo et formâ, and it is found the feoffment of one, there modo et formâ is material. So if a feoffment be pleaded by deed and it is traversed absque hoc quod feoffavit modo et formâ upon this collateral issue modo et formâ are so essential as the jury cannot find a feoffment without deed. Co. 1d. 281 b. See Br. Labourers, pl. 46. cites 38 Hen. 6. 22. In breach of covenant, as for ploughing meadow land, a licence in writing, by several, entitled at the time to the reversion with the appurtenant (or lands pro tempore), may be traversed modo et formâ, and a licence by parol, or by one or two, &c. and not by all, will not support the issue.

Modo et formâ do not put the day nor place in issue, but only the matter and substance of the plea. Reg. Plac. 188 a 5; Hob. 72; 1 B. & B. 536.

Where a traverse is with a modo et formâ, &c. that will put the manner as well as the matter in issue, where the matter is material, as the time, the fact, and other circumstances, when they are the effect of the issue. Reg. Plac. 189. c. 5.

As to the effect of these words with respect to covering the whole matter of the allegation traversed, see 3 Bng. 139. See further tit. Pleading.

MODUS DECIMANDI. Is when lands, tenements, or some certain annual sum or other profit hath been given time out of mind to a parson and his successors, in full satisfaction and discharge of all tithes in kind in such a place. 2 Rep. 47; 2 Inst. 100.

A modus decimandi, commonly called by the simple name of a modus only, is where there is by custom a particular manner of tithing allowed, different from the general law of taking tithes in kind, which are the actual tenth part of the annual increase. This is sometimes a pecuniary compensation, as 2d. an acre for the tithe of land; sometimes it is a compensation in work and labour, as that the parson shall have only the twelfth cock of hay, and not the tenth, in consideration of the owner's making it for him; sometimes in lieu of a large quantity of crude or imperfect tithe, the parson shall have a less quantity, when arrived to greater maturity, as a couple of fowls in lieu of tithe eggs, and the like. Any means, in short, whereby the law of tithing is altered, and a new method of taking them is introduced, is called a modus decimandi, or special manner of tithing. 2 Comm. c. 3. p. 1.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 100. the time required for establishing a modus or other exemption from the payment of tithes, has been shortened. See further Tithes.

MOHAIR YARN. See Manufactures, Silk.

MOIETY, medietas, Fr. moitié, i. e. cœqua vel mediâ pars.] The half of any thing, and to hold by moieties, mentioned in our books, in case of joint-tenants, &c. 1d. 125. See Joint-tenants.

MOLENDINUM. A mill of divers kinds. See Mill

MOLENDUM. Corn sent to a mill; a grist. Chart. Abbat. de Rading, MS. fol. 116.

MOLITURA Was commonly taken for the toll or multure paid for grinding corn at a mill; sometimes called molta, Fr. moulta. Molitura libera, free grinding or liberty of a mill, without paying toll; a privilege which the lord generally reserved to his own family. Paroch. Antiq. 236.

MOLLITER MANUS IMPOSUIT. Several justifications in trespass, i. e. actions of assault, are called by this name, from the words "gently laid his hands upon him," used in the plea; as where the defendant justifies an assault, by showing that the plaintiff was unlawfully in the house of defendant, making a disturbance, and being requested to cease such disturbance and depart, he refused, and continued therein, making such disturbance, he, the defendant, gently laid his hands on the plaintiff, and removed him out of the house. So in various other instances, as separating two persons fighting, in order to preserve the peace; so in the legal excuse of an office, &c. See Assault, Pleading, Trespass.

MOLMAN. A man subject to do service: applied to the servants of a monastery. Prior. Lewes, p. 21. Spelm. Gloss.

MOLMUTIAN or MOLMUTIN LAWS. The laws of Dunvallo Molmuths, seventh king of the Britons, who began his reign above four hundred years before the birth of our Saviour; these were famous in this land till the time of William the Conqueror. This king was the first who published laws in Britain; and his laws (with those of Queen Mercia) were translated by Gildas out of the British into the Latin tongue. Usher's Primord. 126.

MOLNEDA, MULNEDA. A mill-pool or pond. Paroch. Antiq. 135.

MOLTA. The duty or toll paid to the lord by his vassals, to grind corn at his mill. Monastic. ii. 97. See Molitura.

MONARCHY. That form of government where the sovereign power is entrusted in the hands of a single person. See Government.

MONASTERIES and ABBEYS. See Abbot.

MONETAGIUM. A certain tribute paid by tenants to their lord every third year, that he should not change the money which he had coined, formerly when it was lawful for great men to coin money current in their territories, but not of silver and gold. It was abrogated by the 1 Hen. 1. c. 2. The word monetarium is likewise used for a mintage, and the right of coining or minting money. Jus et artificum conditionum monetas.

MONEY, moneta.] That metal, be it gold or silver, which receives authority by the prince's impress to be current; for as wax is not a seal without a print, so metal is not money without impression. Co. Litt. 207. Money is said to be the common measure of all commerce through the world, and consists principally of three parts; the material whereof it is made, being silver or gold; the denomination or intrinsic value, given by the king, by virtue of his prerogative; and the king's stamp thereon. 1 Hale's Hist. P. H. 188.

It belongs to the king only to put a value, as well as the impression, on money, which being done, the money is current for so much as the king hath limited. 2 Inst. 575.

Gold and silver coin, &c. was not to be exported without license, on pain of forfeiture. 9 Edw. 3. st. 2. c. 1. And never money melted down was to be forfeited, and double value. 13 & 14 Car. 1. c. 31. But by old statutes, foreign money might have been melted down. See 27 Edw. 3. c. 14; 17 Rich. 2. c. 1.

Now, by the 59 Geo. 3. c. 49. § 10. the gold and silver coin of the realm may be exported, or melted down, and the bullion produced thereby manufactured or exported. See also Corn.

As a distress for rent was at common law only in the nature of a pledge, whatever can not be identified, so as to be returned in specie, can not be taken. Thus loose money cannot be distrained; but where it is in a bag sealed, it may. Co. Lit. 47; 1 Lutw. 214.

Formerly it was not an offence to receive money, knowing it to have been stolen; and the like as to choses in action. The former rule might have obtained by the difficulty which must always have been experienced in following and identifying (when found) the metal: and as to the latter, they were clearly not chattels. These defects have been supplied by a recent statute, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 54. which punishes the receivers of stolen chattels, money, or valuable securities, with transportation, &c. See Receivers.

MONEY, LENDING IT ABROAD. By a temporary statute, 3 Geo. 2. c. 5. the king by proclamation might, for one year, prohibit all his subjects from lending or advancing money to any foreign prince or state, without license under the great or privy seal; and if any person knowingly offended in the premises, he should forfeit treble the value of the money lent, &c., two-thirds to the king, and the other to the informer: but persons might deal in foreign stocks, or be interested in any bank abroad, established before the issuing of his majesty's proclamation. See Alien.

MONEY, PAYMENT OF, INTO COURT. In law proceedings, money demanded is oftentimes brought into court, either by a rule of court, or by pleading a proferet in curiam of the money on a tender.

The practice of bringing money into court was first introduced in the time of Kelyng, Ch. J., to avoid the hazard and difficulty of pleading a tender: and until recently it was only allowed in cases where an action was brought upon contract for the recovery of a debt, which was either certain, or capable of being ascertained by mere computation, without leaving any other sort of discretion to be exercised by a jury. 2 Burr. 1120.

Thus in assumpsit or covenant for the payment of money, the defendant might have brought money into court; and in covenant to find diet and lodging, or pay 10*l.*, the court allowed a defendant to bring in the 10*l.* In debt for rent, the defendant was formerly allowed to bring money into court, as is done in the Common Pleas and the Exchequer; but the Court of King's Bench refused it, and said they never did it in debt. But there was a distinction between those actions of debt wherein the plaintiff could not recover less than the sum demanded, as on a record, specialty, or statute, giving a sum certain by way of penalty: and those actions wherein the plaintiff might recover less, as in debt for rent, or on a simple contract. In the former the defendant could not bring money into court, though he might have moved to stay the proceedings, on payment of the whole debt and costs; as was the practice in cases of debt on bond, conditioned for payment of a lesser sum than the penalty, previous to st. 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16. which allows the defendant, pending an action on such bond, to bring the principal, interest, and costs into court, and declares that such payment shall be a full satisfaction and discharge of the bond. But in the latter, the defendant was allowed to bring money into court, because the plaintiff did not recover according to his demand, but according to the verdict of the jury. By the 19 Geo. 2. c. 37. the defendant might bring money into court, in debt, covenant, or other action, on a policy of assurance. See 3 Burr. 1773. In an action by an executor or administrator, the plaintiff not being until very recently liable to costs, the defendant was not formerly allowed to bring money into court; but he was afterwards permitted to do so. See 2 Salk. 596; 2 Stra. 796.

In trover, the defendant could not bring the goods and costs into court. 1 Wils. 23. Nor in an action for the mesne profits after a recovery in ejectment. 2 Wils. 115.

And as a tender could not be pleaded, so the defendant could not bring money into court, in an action for general damages upon a contract, or for a tort or trespass. But in action on assumpsit against a carrier, for not delivering goods, the defendant having advertised that he would not be answerable for any goods beyond the value of 20*l.* unless they were entered and paid for accordingly, the court of King's Bench allowed him to bring the 20*l.* into court. And where, in an action for general damages, the bringing of money into court was irregular, if the plaintiff took it out, he thereby waived the irregularity, and could not afterwards have a verdict, unless he recovered more than the sum brought in.

By 24 Geo. 2. c. 44. § 4. (which seems to be the first statute allowing money to be brought into court in an action for general damages); 20 Geo. 3. c. 70. § 33; 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 75; c. 30. § 41. and several subsequent statutes, in actions against justices of the peace, or officers of the excise or customs, for any thing done in the execution of their offices, the defendants are permitted to tender amends before action brought, or to pay money into court after proceedings have been commenced.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 68. § 10. in all actions brought against any mail contractor, stage-coach proprietor, or other common carrier for hire, for the loss of or injury to any goods delivered to be carried, whether the value of such goods shall have been declared or not, the defendant may pay money into court in the same manner and with the same effect as money may be paid into court in any other action.

And now by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 21. the defendant in all personal actions (except actions for assault and battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious arrest or prosecution, criminal conversation, or debauching of the plaintiff's daughter or servant,) by leave of the superior courts where such action is pending, or of a judge of any of the said courts, may pay into court a sum of money, by way of compensation or amends, in such manner and under such regulations, as to the payment of costs and the form of pleading, as the said judges or eight or more of them shall, by any rules or orders by them to be from time to time made, order and direct.

Under the old practice, the motion for leave to bring money into court was a motion of course, and should regularly be made before plea pleaded; but it was frequently made, and in some cases expressly authorized by statute, after plea, on obtaining a judge's order for that purpose. And if there had been no delay, the court would give the defendant leave to withdraw the general issue, in order to bring money into court, and plead it on payment of costs. Tidd's Pract.

By the rules of H. T. 2 Wm. 4. r. 55. it was ordered that "in all cases in which money may be paid into court, leave to pay it in may be obtained by a side bar rule."

By r. 56, "on payment of money into court the defendant shall undertake by the rule to pay the costs; and in case of non-payment, to suffer the plaintiff either to move for an attachment on a proper demand and service of the rule, or to sign final judgment for nominal damages."

And by r. 104, "where money is paid into court in several actions which are consolidated, and the plaintiff, without taxing costs, proceeds to trial on one, and fails, he shall be entitled to costs on the others up to the time of paying money into court."

Now by the rules of H. T. 4 Wm. 4. r. 17. when money is paid into court, such payment shall be pleaded in all cases, and as near as may be in the form therein given.

By r. 18, no rule or judge's order shall be necessary, except under the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 21, (see ante); but the money shall be paid to the proper officer of the court, who shall give a receipt for the amount in the margin of the plea; and the said sum shall be paid out to the plaintiff on demand.

And by r. 19. "the plaintiff, after the delivery of a plea of payment of money into court, shall be at liberty to reply to the same by accepting the sum so paid into court in full satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action in respect of which it has been paid in; and he shall be at liberty in that case to tax his costs of suit; and in case of non-payment thereof within forty-eight hours, to sign judgment for his costs of suit so taxed; or the plaintiff may reply, 'that he has sustained damages (or 'that the defendant is indebted to him,' as the case may be,) to a greater amount than the said sum;' and in the event of an issue thereon being found for the defendant, the defendant shall be entitled to judgment and his costs of suit."

The court will not order money, paid into court through a mistake, to be repaid to the defendant; but perhaps they would in case of fraud. 2 B. & P. 392; and see 3 B. & P. 536.

With respect to the payment of money into court under a plea of tender, see that title.

MONGER. A little sea vessel which fishermen used. See 13 Eliz. c. 11.

When a word ends in monger, as ironmonger, &c. it signifies merchant, from the Sax. manger, i. e. mercator.

MONIERS or MONEYERS, monetarii.] Are ministers of the mint, who make and coin the king's money. Reg. Orig. 262; 1 Edw. 6. 15; see Mint. It appears in ancient authors that the kings of England had mints in several counties, and those who had the conduct of them appear to have been called monetarii, moniers. In the tract in the Exchequer written by Oakham, it is said, that whereas sheriffs were usually obliged to pay into the king's exchequer the king's sterling money for such debts as they were to answer; those of Cumberland and Northumberland were admitted to pay in any sort of money, so it were silver: and the reason there given is, because those two shires monetarios de antiqua institutione non habent; quod abbas et monachi predicti habent unum monetarium et unum cuneum apud Rading ad monetandum ibidem, tam ad obolos et sterlingos quam ad sterlingos prolemoris est fabricand' et faciend'. Memorand. Stat. de Anno 20 Edw. 3. inter record. de Trin. Rot. Of later days the title of moniers hath been given to bankers, that is, such as make it their trade to deal in monies upon returns. Cowell. Brit. Mint.

MONK, monachus, from the Gr. Monac, solus quia soli, &c. separati ab aliorum consortio vivant, because the first Monks lived alone in the wilderness.] They were after divided into three ranks; Cenobitarium, i. e. a society living in common in a monastery, &c. under the government of a single person, and these were under certain rules, and afterwards called Regulars; Anachoretæ, or Eremitæ, those Monks who lived in the wilderness on bread and water; and Sarabiteæ, Monks living under no rule, that wandered in the world.

The several orders of regular monks in England and Wales were the Benedictines; the Cluniacs, and the Grandmontians, both branches of the former; the Carthusians, who followed the rule of St. Benedict, but with the addition of many austerities; the Cistercians, also a branch of the Benedictines, who were called white monks from the colour of their habits; and the Savignians, or Fratres Grisei, so termed from their grey dress, another shoot from the Benedictine tree. The Premonstranses, who were reformed Benedictines, had no house in England, but possessed an abbey in Wales. The above were all the orders in England and Wales except the Culdees, or Cultores Dei, who were Scotch monks, and of the same rule with the Irish, and who were only to be met with at St. Peter's in York. See 2 Burn's Eccl. Law, 517.

MONKERY. The profession of a Monk, mentioned in Black's reading upon st. 21 Hen. 8. c. 13.

MONKS' CLOTHES. Made of a certain kind of coarse cloth. See 20 Hen. 6.

MONOPOLY, from Monoc, solus, and πωλεω, vendo.] A license or privilege allowed by the king, by his grant, commission, or otherwise, to any person or persons, for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of any thing, in which other persons are restrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade. 3 Inst. 181; 4 Comm. 159. It is defined to be where the power of selling any thing is in one man alone, or when one shall ingross and get into his hands such a merchandise, &c. as none may sell or gain by them but himself. 11 Rep. 50.

A monopoly, it is said, hath three incidents mischievous to the public: 1. The raising of the price. 2. The impoverishing of artificers. 11 Rep. 86.

All monopolies are against the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm. A bye-law, which makes a monopoly, is void; so is a prescription for a sole trade to any one person or persons, exclusive of all others. Moor, 591. Monopolies by the common law are void, as being against the freedom of trade, and discouraging labour and industry, and putting it in the power of particular persons to set what prices they please on a commodity. 1 Hawk. P. C.

Upon this ground it hath been held, that the king's grant to any corporation of the sole importation of any merchandise, is void. 2 Rot. Abr. 214; 3 Inst. 182. The grant of the sole making, importing, and selling of playing-cards, was adjudged void. 11 Rep. 84; Moor, 671. And the king's grant of the sole making and writing of bills, pleas, and writs in a court of law, to any particular person, hath been resolved to be void. 1 Jones, 281; 3 Mod. 75.

As to the king's prerogative copyright in the holy scriptures, &c. see Literary Property.

All matters of this nature ought to be tried by the common law, and not at the council-table, or any other court of that kind; and the making use of or procuring any unlawful monopoly, is punishable by fine and imprisonment at common law. 3 Inst. 181, 182.

These monopolies had been carried to an enormous height during the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but were in a great measure remedied by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 8. by which all monopolies, grants, letters-patent, and licenses, for the sole buying, selling, and making of goods and manufactures, are declared void, except in some particular cases; and persons grieved by putting them in use, shall recover treble damages and double costs, by action on the statute; and delaying such action before judgment, by colour of any order, warrant, &c. or delaying execution after, incurs a premunire; but this does not extend to any grant or privilege granted by act of parliament; or to any grant or charter to corporations or cities, &c.; or to grants to companies or societies of merchants, for enlargement of trade; or to inventors of new manufactures, who have patents for the term of fourteen years; grants or privileges for printing; or making gunpowder, casting ordnance, &c.

As to inventors of new manufactures, &c. it has been adjudged on this statute, that a manufacture must be substantially new, and not barely an additional improvement of any old one, to be within the statute; it must be such as none other used at the granting of the letters-patent; and an old manufacture in use before, cannot be prohibited in any grant of the sole use of any such new invention. 3 Inst. 184. Yet a grant of monopoly may be to the first inventor, by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 8; notwithstanding the same thing was practised before beyond sea; because the statute mentions new manufactures within the realm, and intended to encourage new devices useful here; and it is the same thing, whether acquired by experience or travel abroad, or by study at home. 2 Salk. 447. It is said, a new invention to do as much work in a day by an engine, as formerly used to employ in any hands, is contrary to the statute; by reason it is inconvenient, in turning so many men into idleness. 3 Inst. 184. But experience seems in favour of such inventions, as they tend to lessen the price of manufactures, and enable us to undersell foreigners, both at home and abroad.

The statute of Jamas is only declaratory of the common law. The monopoly which can be created by the crown arises from the grant conferring on an individual the privilege of the sole making and selling of some article or thing. It can only be made when thereby no other person is restrained in what he had before, or prevented from following his lawful trade. 1 Hawk. 470. And therefore such a grant, at the present day, is confined to a new invention. When it is contemplated to constitute a new monopoly, recourse must be had to parliament. See Patent.

Monopolies among the people consist of forestalling, engrossing, and regrating, which were punishable by several statutes now repealed, but they are still offences at common law. See Forestalling.

MONSTER. One who hath not human shape, and yet is born in lawful wedlock; and such may not purchase or retain lands; but a person may be an heir to his ancestor's lands, though he be deformed in some part of his body. Co. Lit. 7.

Showing a monster for money is a misdemeanor. See Indecency.

MONSTRANS DE DROIT, a showing a right.] A writ out of Chancery to be restored to lands and tenements that are a man's, in right, though by some office found to be in the possession of one lately dead; by which office the king would be entitled to the said lands, &c. Staundf. P. C. c. 21; 4 Rep. 54.

The common-law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the crown, of either real or personal property, are, 1. By petition de droit, or petition of right, which is said to owe its original to King Edward I. 2. By monstrans de droit, manifestation or plea of right; both which may be preferred or prosecuted either in the Chancery or Exchequer. Skin. 609.

The former is of use where the king is in full possession of any hereditaments or chattels, and the petitioner suggests such a right as controverts the title of the crown, grounded on facts disclosed in the petition itself; in which case he must be careful to state truly the whole title of the crown, otherwise the petition shall abate. Each. 1. 256. And then, upon this answer being indorsed or underwritten by the king, "non droit fait al partie—let right be done to the party;" a commission shall issue to inquire the truth of this suggestion: after the return of which the king's attorney is at liberty to plead in bar, and the merits shall be determined upon issue or demurrer, as in suits between subject and subject. Skin. 608; Rast. Entr. 461. Thus if a disseisor of lands which were holden of the crown died seized without any heir, whereby the king was primâ facie entitled to the lands, and the possession was cast on him either by inquest of office, or by act of law without any office found; the disseisee should have remedy by petition of right, suggesting the title of the crown, and his own superior right before the disseisin made. Bro. Ab. Petition, 20; 4 Rep. 58.

But where the right of the party, as well as the right of the crown, appears upon record, there the party shall have monstrans de droit, which is putting in a claim of right grounded on facts already acknowledged and established; and praying the judgment of the court, whether upon those facts, the king or the subject hath the right. As if, in the case before supposed, the whole special matter is found by an inquest of office, (as well the disseisin as the dying without any heir,) the party grieved shall have monstrans de droit at the common law. 4 Rep. 55. But as this seldom happens, and the remedy by petition was extremely tedious and expensive, that by monstrans was much enlarged, and rendered almost universal by several statutes; particularly 36 Edw. 3. c. 13; 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 8; which also allow inquisition of office to be traversed or denied, wherever the right of a subject is concerned, except in a very few cases. Skin. 608.

By the common law, whenever the king was in possession by virtue of an inquisition, the subject was put to his petition of right, unless the right of the party appeared in the inquisition, and then at the common law he might have had a monstrans de droit; but when the inquisition only entitled the king, and he was obliged to bring a scire facias against the party to recover possession, there at common law the party might have traversed the king's title; for in that case, the king being in nature of a plaintiff, the party in possession might, by pleading, have put him to prove the title upon which he would recover. But when the king was in possession by virtue of the inquisition, there the party who would get that possession from him was in nature of a plaintiff, and therefore had no method of proceeding but by way of petition; for no action could lie against the king, because no writ could issue, as he could not command himself. This remedy by petition however being attended with great delay and charge to the party grieved, the statutes of 34 Edw. 3. c. 14; 36 Edw. 3. c. 13; and 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 8. were made to enable the subject to traverse inquisitions, or otherwise to show his right. Thus were traverses and monstrans de droit introduced in lieu of petitions, the only difference between them being, that in a traverse the title set up by the party is inconsistent with the king's title found by the inquisition, which he therefore must traverse; in a monstrans de droit he confesses and avoids the king's title: but in both cases he must make a title in himself; and if he cannot prove his title to be true, although he be able to prove that the king's title is not good, it will not serve him. In traverses at common law, however, the party is in nature of a defendant, and therefore need not set up any title in himself.

The method of proceeding at common law by petition, was, that the king's title being found by inquisition, the party petitioned to have an inquest of office, to inquire into his title: if his title was found by such office, then he came into court and traversed the king's title. So that the record began by setting out the first inquisition found for the king, and after that the return of the inquisition taken upon the petition, and then went on with "Et modo ad hunc diem venit," and so traversed the king's title. In conformity to these proceedings at common law, the traverse and monstrans de droit given by the statutes, begin by stating the inquisition, and then go on, "Et modo ad hunc diem venit," &c. And from this manner of pleading some have considered the party traversing as defendant: but when it is considered that this traverse comes in lieu of the petition at common law, and that it does not suspend the vesting in the king by the inquisition,—and that the judgment for the party is an amoveus manus, and the judgment against him a nil capiat,—it seems clear he ought to be deemed a plaintiff, and, as such, is capable of being nonsuited. Tidd's Pract.

These proceedings are had in the Petty-bag Office, in the Court of Chancery; and if upon either of them the right be determined against the crown, the judgment is quod manus Domini Regis amoveantur, et possessio restitatur petenti, salvo jure Domini Regis; which last clause is always added to judgments against the king, to whom no laches is ever imputed, and whose right, till it was otherwise provided by statute, was never defeated by limitation or length of time.

By the above judgment the crown is instantly out of possession, so that there needs not the indecorous interposition of his own officers to transfer the seisin from the king to the party aggrieved. Finch. L. 459; see 3 Comm. c. 17. p. 256, 257.

The lessee of an outlaw cannot maintain trespass, but must be relieved by monstrans de droit. Ld. Raym. 307.

MONSTRANS DE FAITS or RECORDS. Showing of deeds or records is thus: upon an action of debt brought upon an obligation, after the plaintiff hath declared, he ought to show his obligation, and so it is of records. And the difference between monstrans de faits and oyer de faits is this: he that pleads the deed or record, or declares upon it, ought to show the same; and the other against whom such deed or record is pleaded, may demand oyer of the same. Cowell.

Where a man pleads a deed, which is the substance of his plea or declaration, if he does not plead it with a profert in curia, his plea or declaration is bad upon a special demurrer showing it for cause; and if he plead it with a profert in curia, and the other party demand a sight of it, he cannot proceed till he hath shown it; and when the defendant has had a sight of it, if he demands a copy of the same, the plaintiff may not proceed until a copy is delivered to him. See 4 & 5 Ann. c. 16; 2 Lil. Abr. 201, 202; and tits. Oyer, Pleading, Profert in Curia.

MONSTRAVERUNT. Is a writ which lies for tenants in ancient demesne, who hold land by free charter, when they are distrained to do unto their lords other services and customs than they or their ancestors used to do. Also in lieth where such tenants are distrained for the payment of toll, &c. contrary to their liberty, which they do or should enjoy. F. N. B. 11; 4 Inst. 269. This writ is directed to the sheriff, to charge the lord that he do not distrain them for such unusual services, &c. And if the lord nevertheless distrains his tenants for other services than of right they ought to do, the sheriff may command the neighbours who dwell next the manor, or take the power of the county to resist the lord, &c. And the tenants in such case may likewise sue an attachment against the lord, returnable in C. B. or B. R. to answer the contempt and recover damages. New Nat. Br. 32.

But the lord shall not be put to answer the writ of attachment sued against him upon the monstraverunt, before the court is certified by the treasurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer, from the book of Domesday, whether the manor be ancient demesne; so that it is requisite that the plaintiff in the monstraverunt do sue forth a special writ for the certifying of the same. Ib. 35. The writ of monstraverunt may be sued for many of the tenants, without naming any of them by their proper names, but generally monstraverunt nobis homines de, &c. But in the attachment against the lord, the tenants ought to be named; though one tenant may sue it in his own name, and the name of the other tenants by general words, Et homines, &c. 2 Hen. 6. c. 20. See Ancient Demesne, Ne injuste vexas.

MONSTRUM. Is sometimes taken for the box in which relics are kept. Item unum monstrum cum ossibus St. Petri, &c. Monast. iii. 173. Monstrum is also taken for what we call corruptly a muster of soldiers. Cowell.

MONTH, or MONETH, Sax. monath, mensis, a mensione lune cursus.] Signifies the time the sun goes through one sign of the zodiac, and the moon through all twelve properly the time from the new moon to its change, or the course or period of the moon, whence it is called month from the moon. Lit. Dict. A month is a space of time containing by the week twenty-eight days; by the calendar sometimes thirty, and sometimes thirty-one days; Julius Caesar divided the year into twelve months, each month into four weeks, and each week into seven days.

The space of a year is a determinate period, consisting commonly of 365 days; for though in Bissextile or Leap years it consists properly of 366, yet by 21 Hen. 8. c. 6. anno Bissextili, the increasing day in the Leap-year, together with the preceding day, shall be accounted for one day only. That of a month is more ambiguous; there being in common use two ways of calculating months, either as lunar consisting of twenty-eight days, the supposed revolution of the moon, thirteen of which make a year; or as calendar months of unequal lengths, according to the Julian division in our common almanacs, commencing at the calends of each month, whereof in a year there are only 12. A month in law is a lunar month, or 28 days; unless otherwise expressed; not only because it is always one uniform period, but because it falls naturally into a quarterly division by weeks. Therefore a lease for 12 months is only for 33 weeks; but if it be for a twelvemonth in the singular number, it is good for the whole year. 6 Rep. 61. For here the law recedes from its usual calculation, because the ambiguity between the two methods of computation ceases, being generally understood that by the space of time called thus, in the singular number, a twelvemonth, is meant a whole year, consisting of one solar revolution. 2 Comm. 13.

The month by the common law is but twenty-eight days and in case of a condition for rent, the month shall be computed at twenty-eight days; so in the case of inrolment of deeds, and generally in all cases where a statute speaks of months; but where the statute accounteth by the year, half-year, or quarter of a year, then it is to be reckoned according to the calendar. 1 Inst. 135; 6 Rep. 62; Cro. Jac. 167; 6 T. R. 224.

When the word month occurs in any statute, it must be taken to mean a lunar month, unless calendar months are specified. Cro. Eliz. 135; Yel. 100.

A twelvemonth in the singular number includes the whole year, according to the calendar; but twelve months, six months, &c. in the plural number, shall be accounted after twenty-eight days to every month; except in case of presentation to benefices, to avoid lapse, &c., which shall be in six calendar months. 6 Rep. 61; Cro. Jac. 141. But if an agreement is to pay fifty shillings for the interest of one hundred pounds at the end of six months, the computation must be by calendar months, because, if it was by lunar months, the interest would exceed the rate allowed by the statute. So in bills of exchange and promissory notes, a month is always a calendar month; as if a bill or note is dated on the 10th of January, and made payable one month after date, it is due (the three days of grace being added) on the 13th of February.

The word month may in fact mean lunar or calendar, according to the intention of the contracting parties, therefore, when upon a sale of land upon the 24th of January it was agreed by the conditions of sale that an abstract of the title should be delivered to the purchaser within a fortnight from the date thereof, to be returned by him at the end of two months from the said date, and that a draft of the conveyance should be delivered within three months from the said date, to be re-delivered within four months from said date, and the purchase to be completed on the 24th of June; making a period of precisely five calendar months from the date of the sale and conditions; the word month was held to mean calendar, and not lunar months, by reference to the whole period fixed for the completion of the contract. 1 M. & S. 111.

It is somewhat remarkable that the difference between six calendar months and half a year, does not seem to have been considered by legal writers. Coke says, half a year consists of 182 days. 1 Inst. 135. But six calendar months will be two or three days less or more than such a half year, accordingly as February is reckoned or not one of the six. Coke, in his report of Catesby's case, clearly considers the tempus aestivum to be six calendar months; 6 Co. 61; yet Croke, in his report of that case, states it as confidently to consist of 182 days: Cro. Jac. 141, 166; and in neither report is the difference taken notice of. 2 Comm. 141, in n.

A notice to a tenant from year to year to quit the premises, must be half a year, and not six calendar months. 3 Wils. 21; 1 T. R. 159; 7 B. & C. 64.

MONUMENT. An heir may bring an action against one that injures the monument, &c. of his ancestor; and the coffin and shroud of a deceased person belong to the executors or administrators; but the dead body belongeth to none. 3 Inst. 202, 203. See Heir, III. 3.

It has been decided by the Court of C. P. that although the freehold of the churchyard is in the parson, yet trespass may be maintained by the executor of a tombstone against one who wrongfully removes it from the churchyard, and erases the inscription. 3 Bing. 136.

MOORS, in the Isle of Man, who summon the courts for the several shreadings, are the lords bailiffs, called by that name; and every moor has the like office with our bailiff of the hundred. King's Descript. Isle of Man.

MOOT, from the Sax. motian, placitare, to treat or handle. A term in the Inns of Court, signifying the exercise of arguing of cases; which young barristers and students used to perform at certain times the better to enable them for the practice and defence of clients' causes.

The place where moot-cases were argued was anciently called the Moot-Hall; and in the Inns of Court there is a bailiff of the moot yearly chosen by the benchers to appoint the mootmen for the Inns of Chancery, and keep accounts of the performances of exercises, both there and in the house. *Orig. MORTGAGE.

MORTGAGIUM, vel MORTUUM VADUM; from mort, mortuus, and gage, pignus.] A pawn of land or tenement, or any thing immoveable, laid or bound for money borrowed, to be the creditor's for ever, if the money be not paid at the day agreed upon; and the creditor holding land and tenement upon this bargain, is called Tenant in Mortgage. Of this we read in the Grand Customary of Normandy, c. 313, which see. Glanvil, likewise, lib. 10. c. 6. defineth it thus: Mortuum vadum dicitur illud, cujus fructus vel redditus in- nent restrictions, to elude the justice of the court. 1 Vern. 383, 190; 2 Ch. Ca. 147; 1 Eden, 55.

But if a man borrows money of his brother, and agrees to make him a mortgage, and that if he has no issue male, his brother should have the land; such an agreement, made out by proof, will be decreed in equity. 1 Vern. 193.

A. in consideration of 1000*l.* made an absolute conveyance to B. of the reversion of certain lands after two lives, which, at the time, were worth little more; and by another deed, of the same date, the lands were made redeemable any time during the life of the grantor only, on payment of 1000*l.* and interest; A. died, not having paid the money; and it was held by Lord K. Nottingham, that his heir might redeem, notwithstanding this restrictive clause, and that it was a rule, once a mortgage, and always a mortgage; and that B. might have compelled A. to redeem in his life-time, or have foreclosed him. But on a rehearing, Lord North reversed the decree on the circumstances of this case; for it appeared by proof, that A. had a kindness for B., and that he married his kinswoman, which made it in the nature of a marriage-settlement; he likewise held, that B. could not have compelled A. to redeem during his life, which made it more strong. 1 Vern. 7, 192, 214, 232; 2 Vent. 364. S. C. where it is said, that Lord North's decree was affirmed in the House of Lords. See also Hard. 511.

If A. mortgage lands to B. worth 15*l.* per ann. for securing 200*l.*, and at the same time B. enters into a bond, conditioned, that if the 200*l.* and interest is not paid within a year, then he to pay A. his executors or administrators, the further sum of 78*l.* in full for the purchase of the premises, &c. and A. dies within the year, and the money is paid the next day after, the mortgage is forfeited to his administrator; yet A.'s heir may redeem, paying the 200*l.* and likewise the 78*l.* that was paid to the administrator. 1 Vern. 488.

So where A. for 550*l.* made an absolute assignment of a church lease for three lives to B., and B. by writing under his hand, agreed, that if A. paid 600*l.* at the end of the year, B. would convey; B. died, leaving C. his son and heir; two of the lives died, and the lease was twice renewed by C. and his father; and though it was near twenty years since the conveyance was made, yet the master of the rolls decreed a redemption on payment of 550*l.* and the two fines. 2 Vern. 84.

A. lends money to B. to carry on certain buildings and takes a mortgage from him to secure 1600*l.* with interest; and by another deed, executed at the same time, takes a covenant from B. that he should convey to him, if he thought fit, ground-rents to the value of 1600*l.* at the rate of twenty years' purchase; and on a bill brought to redeem, the master of the rolls decreed a redemption on payment of principal, interest, and costs, without regard to that agreement, but set aside the same as unconscionable; for a man shall not have interest for his money, and a collateral advantage besides for the loan of it, or clog the redemption with any by-agreement. 2 Vern. 520.

But though these and such like restrictions are relieved against, to make them answer the primary intention of the parties; yet if A. on a mortgage lends money at 5*l.* per cent. but agrees in the deed, that if the money were paid within three months after it became due, that he would accept of 4*l.* per cent. and the mortgagor neglects to pay the interest within the time, equity will not relieve him, but he must pay 5*l.* per cent.; for though the court relieves against unreasonable penalties, yet this is not so, for the mortgagee might have refused to lend his money under 5*l.* per cent. Preced. Chanc. 150; 1 P. Wms. 653. See post, III. ad finem.

So if the mortgagee devises that the mortgagor should be remitted part of his mortgage-money, provided he pays the principal and interest within three days after his decease; if the condition be not performed, the remittance is lost; because, being a voluntary bounty, and not ex debito justitiae the party must take it as it is limited, for cujus est dare, ejus est disponere; and the court cannot relieve in this case, after the day. 1 Ch. Ca. 52.

But where in a mortgage there was a proviso, that if the interest was behind six months, that then the interest should be accounted principal, and carry interest; this, by Lord Comper, was decreed to be a vain clause, and of no use; and he said, that no precedent had ever carried the advance of interest so far, and that an agreement made at the time of the mortgage will not be sufficient to make future interest principal; but, to make interest principal, it is requisite that interest be first grown due, and then an agreement concerning it may make it principal. 2 Salk. 499.

A distinction is made in chancery between an agreement that the interest shall be raised, if not punctually paid, and for abatement thereof upon punctual payment. For in the former case it is considered as a penalty which the courts of equity will relieve against; but in the latter as a condition, which must be strictly adhered to; in which case the debtor cannot have relief in equity after the day of payment elapsed, because the abatement is to be upon a condition which is not performed. 3 Burr. 1374, 5.

But though the condition on which the interest is to be abated must be strictly performed on the part of the mortgagor, yet the agreement for abatement is not considered strictly in the light of a condition as to be utterly defeated by a single breach. See 2 Eden's R. 197; 1 M. & S. 706.

The mortgagor, before forfeiture, and whilst it remains uncertain whether he will perform the condition at the time limited or not, hath the legal estate in him; also after forfeiture he hath an equity of redemption; so that he is still considered as owner and proprietor of the estate, until the equity of redemption he foreclosed; therefore may make leases or any settlement thereof, which will bind his equity of redemption. (But they will not bind the mortgagee, unless he is a party to the lease, &c.)

The legal interest of the mortgagor after default is that of a tenant at sufferance, not a tenant at will, since he may be ejected without notice. 8 B. & C. 767; whereas a tenant at will cannot be ejected on a demise laid previous to the determination of the will. 4 T. R. 680. And he is not, like a tenant at will, entitled to his growing crops after the will is determined. 1 T. R. 383; and see Doughl. 266, (270) Id. 21; 9 B. & C. 245. So where a mortgage was made with power to sell, if the money was not paid on a certain day, the mortgagor continuing in possession, it was held on an ejectment brought after the time was passed, that it might be maintained without giving notice to quit or demand of possession. 5 Bing. 421.

And by the recent statute of limitations, (3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27.) no mortgagor is to be deemed a tenant at will, if his mortgagee within the meaning of the seventh section relating to tenancies at will.

As to the nature of the estates of the mortgagor and mortgagee; it seems to be at length settled, that as the mortgagee is considered as holding the estate, merely in the nature of a pledge or security for payment of his money, a mortgagee, though in fee, (the legal estate in which descends to the heir at law,) is considered in equity only as personal estate. Foster's Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 1. § 3 & 13 in n.

Hence as the mortgagor, till the equity of redemption is foreclosed, is considered as owner of the land, it was held, where a bill for redemption was brought against a mortgagee in possession, and a decree accordingly, that the mortgagee, before the account taken, having presented to a church, which became void, should revoke his presentation, and present another person as the mortgagor or his vendee (he having contracted to sell) should appoint. Preced. Chanc. 71; 2 Vern. 401. So even though nothing but the advowson is mortgaged, and the deed contain a covenant that on any avoidance the mortgagee should present. 3 Atk. 559. For, in such case, though the presentation is not deemed the subject of value, and therefore cannot be brought into the account, it might be a benefit beyond the securing of the principal debt and lawful interest thereon; which decision overrules that in 2 P. Wms. 403. The mortgagee may however grant leases of the premises, and avoid such leases as have, since his mortgage, been granted without his consent by the mortgagor. Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 1. § 3.

As to the estate of the mortgagee, though formerly debted whether he had more than a right of redemption, it is now established that he hath an actual estate in equity, which may be devised, granted, and entailed, and of which there might have been a possessio fratris, and may be a tenancy by the entirety. 1 Atk. 603.

It is said that a tenant in tail of an equity of redemption, may devise it for the payment of debts. 11 M. 11.

As to mortgages by tenants in tail under the recent statute for the abolition of fines and recoveries, see Tail.

The mortgagee of a lease has the same title to relief against an ejectment for non-payment of rent, and upon the same terms, as the lessee against whom the recovery is had. 3 Aust. 42.

By 7 H. H. 1. c. 25, "no person or persons shall be allowed to vote in election of members to serve in parliament, either by reason of any trust-estate or mortgages, unless such trust-estate mortgage be in actual possession, or receipt of profits of the same; but that the mortgagor, or tenant in fee simple, or tenant in possession, shall and may vote for the same as if standing such mortgage or trust." And see the Reform Act, 1 H. 4. c. 15, to the same effect.

And by Ann. c. 5, which requires that knights of the shire should pay 100*l.* per annum, and every other member 300*l.* per annum, it is enacted, "that no person shall be qualified to sit in the House of Commons, within the meaning of the act, by virtue of any mortgage whereof the equity of redemption is in any other person; unless the mortgagee shall have been in possession of the mortgaged premises for seven years before the time of election."

III. On an appeal to the House of Lords it was settled, that if there be several mortgages or other incumbrances upon the same estate, the first incumbrancer who has the legal estate shall be preferred to the second, and so on, according to the periods at which their respective securities bear date. 1 Bro. P. C. 66.

It is a rule in equity, that where several persons have equal equity, he amongst them that has possession of the legal estate, may make all the advantages of it which the law allows, and thereby protect his title, although it be subsequent in point of time; and his adversaries shall have no help in equity, for it will not disarm a possessor, but where equity stands, it will leave the law to prevail. Therefore, where there are several mortgages, the last mortgagee having no legal estate, is to be considered as a subsequent mortgagee, and the intervening charges, (3 Atk. 24, 2 Ch. C. 100) by purchasing the precedent mortgage, which carries with it the legal estate, protect himself against any subsequent mortgagee, and the first and prior to the last, for he will have both law and equity upon his side. 1 Ch. C. 211; 1 P. Wms. 187, 188; 2 Ves. 73.

But where the interests affecting an estate are all equitable, they will attach upon it according to the times at which they were created; for it is a maxim in equity as well as at law, that qui prior est tempore potior est jure. 1 Atk. 52, 1 Bro. P. C. 28, 11 Ves. 50, 15 Ves. 52. It was at one time considered that the party who had the most equity to call for a conveyance of the legal estate was to be considered in the same situation as if he had the legal estate (see 10 Ves. 246; 11 Ves. 618), but it has since been decided that the person having the best right to call for the legal estate obtains no priority, unless he actually procures an assignment of such legal estate. 8 Prue. 475.

It has been said to be an established rule of equity, that a second mortgagee, who has the title-deeds without notice of any prior incumbrance, shall in all cases be preferred; because if a mortgagee lend money upon real property without taking the title-deeds, he enables the mortgagor to commit a fraud. 1 Term Rep. 762. But Lord Thurlow, C., afterwards observed upon this, that he did not conceive that the not taking the deeds was alone sufficient to postpone the first mortgagee; if it were so, there could be no such thing as a mortgage of the reversion; and he held, that a second mortgagee in possession of the title-deeds was preferred only in cases where the first had been guilty of fraud or gross negligence. 2 Bro. C. R. 652. It seems, however, that fraud or gross negligence would be presumed, unless the mortgagee could show that it was impossible for him to obtain possession of the title-deeds, or that he had used the due and necessary diligence for that purpose. 2 Comm. 160, in n. See Treat. Eq. lib. 1. c. 3. § 4; where the rule of equity is thus stated on the ground of a solemn judgment in the Court of Exchequer; "that nothing but a voluntary, distinct, and unjustifiable concurrence on the part of the first mortgagee, to the mortgagor's retaining the title-deeds, shall be a reason for postponing his priority."

Whatever may be the value of the estate, it is of great importance to those who lend money upon real security, to be certain that there is no prior mortgage upon the estate; for it has been long settled, that if a third mortgagee, who at the time of his mortgage, had no notice of the second, purchases the first mortgage, even pending a bill filed by the second to redeem the first, both the first and third mortgages shall be paid out of the estate before any share of it can be appropriated to the second. The reason assigned is, that the third by thus obtaining the legal estate, has both law and equity on his side, which supersede the mere equity of the second. And Lord Hobbs held it right that the third should thus seize what he called tabula in naufragio, a plank in the shipwreck, and so leave the second to perish. See 2 Vent. 337; 1 C. C. 162, 36, 149. But among mortgagees, where none has the legal estate, the rule in equity, as has been already observed, is qui prior est tempore potior est jure. 2 P. Wms. 491; 1 Bro. C. R. 63; see also 2 Vern. 81, 29, 525; 2 Atk. 52, 347. If, however, the second or mesne incumbrancer has obtained a decree for an account, a subsequent incumbrancer cannot, by buying in the first incumbrance, defeat the effect of such decree. 3 Atk. 809. See Ponblanque's Treatise of Equity, lib. 1. c. 4. § 25. Some reflections have been made by Mr. Christian on the above doctrine, 2 Comm. 160, in n.; but it seems perfectly consistent with the maxim of law, vigilantibus non dormientibus servit lex. See Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 3. § 1.

2. As a puisne mortgagee, by purchasing a prior incumbrance that brings with it the legal estate, may unite it with his own, and thereby protect himself from intervening charges on the property, so a first mortgagee having the legal estate may tack a subsequent sum advanced by him upon the former security to his prior mortgage, and thereby protect himself against mesne incumbrances. 2 Cha. Ca. 20.

So if there be first and second mortgagee, and the first lend money after the latter mortgage has been made, taking a judgment as security, he may tack this to his mortgage to protect himself against the second mortgagee, for he has the legal estate and the judgment, which, though it passes no interest presently in the land, operates as a lien. 2 Atk. 352; 2 P. Wms. 494; 2 Ves. 663.

But such subsequent advances must be without notice of the intervening incumbrances. Pre. Ch. 226; and they must be made to one who has a right to charge the estate. Nels. Rep. 153.

As to what is considered a sufficient notice in equity, see 2 Powell on Mortgages, by Coventry, 1.

3. It is well observed by Blackstone, that in Glannil's time, when the universal method of conveyance was by livery of seisin, or corporal tradition of the lands, no gage or pledge of lands was good, unless possession was also delivered to the creditor, for which the reason given is, to prevent subsequent and fraudulent pledges of the same land. Glann. lib. 10. c. 8. And the frauds which have arisen, since the exchange of those public and notorious conveyances for more private and secret bargains, has well evinced the wisdom of our ancient law. 2 Comm. c. 10. p. 160.

There is one case in which the legislature has thought proper to take from the mortgagor the equity of redemption, and to give the mortgagee an absolute estate in the land, that is, where the former is guilty of a fraud upon the latter by concealing prior incumbrances. For by the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 16. it is enacted, that if any person shall borrow any money, and for payment thereof, or for any other valuable consideration, shall voluntarily give a judgment, statute, or recognizance, and shall afterwards borrow any other sum of another, or for other valuable consideration become indebted to such other, and for securing the repayment and discharge thereof shall mortgage lands, or any part thereof, to the second lender, &c. or to any other in trust for or to the use of such second lender, &c. and shall not give notice to the said mortgagee, of such previous judgment, &c. in writing, under his hand, before the execution of the said mortgage or mortgages; unless such mortgagor or his heirs, upon notice given by the mortgagee, his heirs, &c. in writing, &c. attested by two witnesses, of any such former judgment, &c. shall within six months pay off the said judgment, &c. and all interest and charges, and procure the same to be vacated, &c., then the mortgagor or his heirs, &c. shall have no benefit or remedy against the said mortgages or his heirs, &c. in equity or elsewhere, for redemption; but the mortgagee shall hold the lands, &c. for such estate and term as was granted to the mortgagee, against the mortgagor, and all persons claiming under him, freed from equity of redemption, &c.

And if any person who shall once mortgage lands for valuable consideration, shall again mortgage the same lands, or any part thereof, to any other person for valuable consideration, (the former mortgage being in force,) and shall not discover to the second mortgagee the former mortgage, in writing under his hand, such mortgagor, his heirs, &c. shall have no relief or equity or redemption against the second or after mortgagee, &c. And such second or third mortgagees may redeem any former mortgage, upon payment of the principal debt, interest, and costs of suit, to the proper mortgagee, &c.

But the statute does not bar any widow of any mortgagor from her dower, who did not legally join with her husband in such mortgage, or otherwise lawfully exclude herself.

It hath been held, that this statute extends to assignees of a mortgagee; and that if a man mortgages certain lands to one man, and mortgages those lands with some others to another; though this seems to be a case omitted out of the above statute against clandestine mortgages, yet if it appears to be a contrivance to evade it, as if an acre or two of land were only added, this will not exempt it; also a person, who will take advantage of the statute, must be an honest mortgagee; therefore, if a man has used any fraud or practice in obtaining a second mortgage, he shall not have the benefit of the statute. 2 Vern. 589, 590; 1 Eq. Ca. Ab. 320, pl. 5.

IV. As soon as the estate is created, the mortgagee may immediately enter on the lands; but is liable to be dispossessed, upon performance of the condition by payment of the mortgage-money at the day limited. And therefore the usual way is to agree that the mortgagor shall hold the land till the day assigned for payment; when, in case of failure whereby the estate becomes absolute, the mortgagee may enter upon it, and take possession without any possibility at law of being afterwards evicted by the mortgagor, to whom the land is now for ever dead. But here the courts of equity interpose; and though a mortgage be thus forfeited, and the estate absolutely vested in the mortgagee, at the common law, yet they will consider the real value of the tenements, compared with the sum borrowed; and if the estate be of greater value than the sum lent thereon, they will allow the mortgagor, at any reasonable time, to recall or redeem his estate, paying to the mortgagee his principal, interest, and expences. And by the 7 Geo. 2. c. 20. after payment or tender by the mortgagor of principal, interests, and costs, the mortgagee can maintain no ejectment, but may be compelled to re-assign his securities. See the statute at length, post, at the end of this division.

This reasonable advantage, allowed to mortgagors, is called the equity of redemption; and this enables a mortgagor to call on the mortgagee, who has possession of his estate, to deliver it back, and account for the rents and profits received on payment of his whole debt and interest; thereby turning the mortuum into a kind of vivum vadium. But, on the other hand, the mortgagee may either compel the sale of the estate in order to get the whole of his money immediately; or else call upon the mortgagor to redeem his estate presently; or in default thereof to be for ever foreclosed from redeeming the same; that is, to lose his equity of redemption without possibility of recall. It is not, however, usual for mortgagees to take possession of the mortgaged estate, unless where the security is precarious or small, or where the mortgagor neglects even the payment of interest; when the mortgagee was frequently obliged to bring an ejectment and take the lands into his own hands, in the nature of a pledge, or pignus of the Roman law already alluded to; ante, I. But it has now been determined that the mortgagee is not obliged to bring an ejectment to recover the rents and profits of his estate; for where there is a tenant in possession by a lease prior to the mortgage, the mortgagee may at any time give him notice to pay the rent to him, and he may distrain for the rent which is due at the time of the notice, and also for all that accrues afterwards. Moss v. Gallimore, Doug. 260. (279). See Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 1. § 8. in n.

A mortgagee, however, is entitled only to such rents as accrue due while he is in possession of the premises; he is therefore no claim for rents paid to a receiver appointed in a suit for establishing the will of the mortgagor, notwithstanding, after such appointment, he gave notice to the tenant to pay the rents to himself. He should have moved the court to discharge the receiver. 4 Russ. 464.

Prior to the recent statute of limitations, if the mortgagor had been twenty years in possession, the Court of Chancery, in conformity to the time of bringing an ejectment, would not permit a mortgagor to redeem; unless during part of that time such mortgagor has been an infant or a married woman; or unless the mortgages admitted he held the estate by a special mortgage, or there was some other special circumstance which formed an exception to the general rule. 1 Eq. R. 1. 68 & Walk. 63; 2 Jac. & Walk. 183. For the provisions of the statute, see Limitation of Actions, II. 1.

Where two different estates are mortgaged by the owner to the same person, one cannot be redeemed without the other. Ambt. 733. So of other securities given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee. See Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 1. § 9. See 2 Russ. 275.

Although, after breach of the condition, an absolute fee simple is vested at common law in the mortgagee; yet a right of redemption being still inherent in the land, till the equity of redemption be foreclosed, the same right shall descend to the heirs and is vested in such persons as have a right to the land in case there had been no mortgage or incumbrance whatsoever; and as an equitable performance as effectually defeats the interest of the mortgagee, as the legal performance doth at common law, the condition still hanging over the estate till the equity is totally foreclosed, on this foundation, it hath been held, that a person who comes in under a voluntary conveyance, may redeem a mortgage; and though such right of redemption be inherent in the land, yet the party claiming the benefit of it, must not only set forth such right, but also show that he is the person entitled to it. Hard. 465; 1 Vern. 182, 193.

The right of redemption is not confined to the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, assignees, or subsequent incumbrances; but extends to all persons claiming any interest whatsoever in the premises as against the mortgagor; therefore a person claiming under a deed void as being voluntary against a subsequent mortgagee, may redeem; for the deed, though void as to the mortgagee, is binding on the mortgagor. 1 Ch. Ca. 59; 1 Vern. 193. A feoffee may any person who has acquired for valuable consideration an interest in the land; as a tenant under the mortgagor; or a judgment creditor having previously sued out a writ of execution; or a tenant by chattel, share, or jointure; or tenant by the curtesy, or in law, or a jointress; the crown may also redeem estates mortgaged, and afterwards forfeited by the treason, &c. of the mortgagor. Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 1. § 8. n. and the author has there cited. And see 1 Id. n. R. 117.

As the heir at law is regularly entitled to the benefit of redemption, he is also entitled to the assistance of the personal estate of the mortgagor for that purpose; according to the doctrine established in the courts of equity, that the personal estate, in the hands of the executor, shall be employed in discharge of the heir, by whatever means the heir becomes indebted as heir; for the personal estate having received the benefit by contracting the debt, the real is considered only as a pledge for it; according to the common rule, quis scilicet communi sentire debet et onus. Preced. Chanc. 477. See Treat. Eq. lib. 3. c. 2. § 1; and ante, tit. Executor, V. 6.

And on this foundation it hath been frequently held, that if a man mortgage lands, and covenants to pay the money, and dies, the personal estate of the mortgagor shall, in favour of the heir, be applied in exoneration of the mortgage. 2 Salk. 449.

Also it is held by some opinions, that this benefit shall not only extend to the heir at law, or heres natus, but also to an heres factus; from a presumption, that it is the intention of the testator, that he should have all the privileges of the heres natus; and it has been even held, that an ordinary devisee shall have this benefit. 1 Vern. 37. But as to this last point it hath been held otherwise; and that if a man mortgage his land, and devises it to J. S. or A. B. in fee, the remainder to B. that there the heres factus doth press with the estate, there appearing no intention of the testator that he should have it discharged. 2 Chan. Ca. 84; 1 Chan. Ca. 27.

This distinction, however, between an heres factus and a particular devisee, has been long since overruled, and the opinion in 1 Vern. 37. is now established law. 2 Atk. 43. And the devisee of a particular estate shall not only have his devised estate exonerated out of the personal estate, but if there be another estate expressly devised for payment of debt, and the personal estate be excepted or exhausted, though the particular estate devised to him be covered subject to the incumbrances thereon. 2 P. Wms. 385. So if the personal estate be exempt or exhausted, and there be no other estate expressly devised for payment of debts, but there be a devised estate, the devisee of a particular estate shall be exonerated out of the devised estate. 2 Bl. 109.

And if the mortgagor conveys away the equity of redemption, the purchaser shall not have the benefit of the personal estate, but must take it cum onere. 2 Salk. 450; 1 Vern. 193.

It has likewise been held, that the heir of the mortgagor shall have the benefit of the personal estate to pay off the mortgage, though there be no covenant in the mortgage-deed for the payment thereof; because the mortgage-money is a debt whether there be any express covenant for its payment or not, and the personal estate has had the benefit of it. 2 Salk. 449; 1 Vern. 436; Preced. Chanc. 61.

But where a mortgage in fee was made redeemable at Michaelmas, 1702, or any other Michaelmas day following, on six months' notice; and there was no covenant for payment of the mortgage-money; it was held by lord chancellor Comper, that the mortgagor having devised his personal estate to his wife and daughter, and having during his life paid the interest of the mortgage, the personal estate should not be applied in ease and exoneration of the real estate for the benefit of the heir at law; for, being no covenant for paying of the money, there was no contract at all between them, neither express nor implied; nor would any action lie against the mortgagor to subject his person, to compel him to pay this money. But this was in nature of a conditional purchase, subject to be defeated on payment by the mortgagor, or his heirs, of the sum stipulated between them, at any Michaelmas day, at election of the mortgagor or his heirs; for here was an everlasting subsisting right of redemption, descendible to the heirs of the mortgagor, which could not be forfeited at law like other mortgages; therefore there could be no equity of redemption, or any occasion for the assistance of this court; but the plaintiffs might, even at law, defeat the conveyance, by performing the terms and conditions of it; which were not limited to any particular time, but might be performed on any Michaelmas day, to the end of the world; and since there was no covenant or contract, either express or implied, to charge the personal estate of the mortgagor, he thought there was no reason to lay the load of this debt upon that which was given to other persons. Preced. Chanc. 423; 2 Vern. 701.

If an estate descends, subject to a mortgage, and the heir creates a new mortgage for securing the old debt and one contracted by himself, and fixes a new day of payment, he makes himself liable to both debts, notwithstanding he exempts his person and his property, except what is comprised in the new mortgage, from liability in respect of the same debts; and there is no equity for separating the aggregate debt and throwing any part of it on the estate which descended. 1 Sim. 435, 478.

The 7 Geo. 2. c. 20. before alluded to, enacts, that where any action shall be brought on any bond for the payment of the money secured by mortgage, or performance of the covenants therein contained; or where any action of ejectment shall be brought by any mortgagee, &c. for the recovery of the possession, and no suit shall be then depending in equity, for foreclosing or redeeming such mortgaged lands, if the person having right to redeem shall appear and become defendant in such action, and shall, at any time pending such action, pay unto such mortgagee, or in case of his, her, or their refusal, shall bring into court where such action shall be depending, all the principal money and interest due on such mortgage, and also all such costs as have been expended in any suit at law or in equity upon such mortgage (such money for principal, interest, and costs, to be ascertained and computed by the court where such action is or shall be depending), the monies so paid, &c. shall be deemed and taken to be in full satisfaction and discharge of such mortgage; and the court shall discharge every such mortgagor or defendant of and from the same accordingly, and shall, by rule of the same court, compel such mortgagee, at the costs of such mortgagor, to assign, surrender, or reconvey such mortgaged lands, and deliver up all deeds, &c. relating to the title.

And that where any bill or suits shall be filed or brought in equity by any person having or claiming any estate, right, or interest in any lands, &c., by virtue of any mortgage, to compel the defendant to pay the plaintiff the principal money and interest, together with any sum due on any incumbrance or specialty, charged or chargeable on the equity of redemption; and in default of payment to foreclose such defendant's right of equity of redeeming such mortgaged lands, &c. upon his admitting the right and title of the plaintiff, such court of equity shall at any time before such suit shall be brought to hearing, make such order or decree therein as it might or could have made therein, in case the same had been regularly brought to hearing; and all parties to such suit shall be bound by such order or decree, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been made at or subsequent to the hearing of the cause.

This act not to extend to any case where the person against whom the redemption shall be prayed, shall (by writing under his hand, or the hand of his attorney, &c. to be delivered, before the money shall be brought into court at law, to the attorney or solicitor for the other side) insist either that the party praying a redemption has not a right to redeem, or that the premises are chargeable with other or different principal sums than what appear on the face of the mortgage, or shall be admitted on the other side; nor to any cause where the right of redemption to the mortgaged lands shall be controverted or questioned by or between different defendants in the same cause; nor shall be any prejudice to any subsequent mortgagee or subsequent incumbrancer.

If a mortgagee recovers possession of the mortgaged premises under a judgment in an undefended ejectment, the court has no jurisdiction to restore, on payment of the debt, interest, and costs, the possession to the mortgagor who has not appeared. 4 Taunt. 887.

But if the recovery is had against a tenant of the mortgagor, the court will set aside the judgment, and let in the mortgagor to defend as landlord, that he may be in a condition to apply to the court to stay proceedings. See the terms of the statute. Ibid.

In an ejectment on a forfeiture for not paying mortgage money, the defendant is entitled to have the proceedings stayed under the above statute, on payment of principal and interest, with the costs incurred at law and in equity, without paying any bygone interest or the expense of preparing the mortgage deed or any assignment of it. 1 Dougl. P. C. 579; and see 2 C. & J. 619.

It was heretofore held, that if a contract were made in England for a mortgage of a plantation in the West Indies, no more than legal interest might be paid; and that a covenant in such mortgage for payment of 8 per cent. interest would be within the statute of usury, notwithstanding this were the rate of interest where the lands lay. But now this point is settled by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 47. § 2, which enacts that all mortgages made in Great Britain of lands, &c. in Ireland or the West Indies, and all collateral securities for the same, and for the interest thereon, shall be as good and effectual as if made and entered into in the country, island, &c. where the lands, &c. mortgaged, lie; and no person shall be liable to the penalties of the statute of Anne, for recovering interest on the same lent, so as the interest do not exceed the rate of interest in the country, island, &c. where the lands lie.

If the mortgagee assign the mortgage, with the concurrence of the mortgagor, all money really and bona fide paid by the assignee, that was due to the mortgagee, shall be considered as principal, and the assignee shall have interest upon the interest then due, and paid by him, as well as upon the principal originally lent. 2 Ch. Ca. 67, 68, 258; 1 Vern. 169; 2 Vern. 135. As to the other cases in which interest shall become principal, see 2 Powell on Mortgages, c. 5.

A remainder-man can force the tenant for life to keep the interest down if the land be charged; but cannot directly compel him to redeem, though indirectly he may, by purchasing in the mortgage; when the tenant for life must pay one-third, or part with the possession. Rep. Eq. 69. See 5 Ves. 99; 9 Ves. 560.

Arrears of interest are only recoverable for six years. See Limitation of Actions, II.

By the 1 Wm. 4. c. 60. § 3. the Lord Chancellor may direct the committees of mortgagees, who are lunatics, to convey the mortgaged estates to such persons as he shall think proper. See further Lunatic.

By § 6. infant mortgagees are empowered, by the direction of the Court of Chancery, to convey lands vested in them to such persons as the court shall think proper.

And by § 7. infant mortgagees of land within the jurisdiction of the courts of Lancaster and Durham, may convey the same by the direction of those courts.

§ 14. Mortgage money belonging to infants is to be paid into the Bank, or as the court shall direct.

§ 19. The husbands of female mortgagees are to be deemed trustees within the act.

MORTIFICATION. See Mortmain.

MORTITIVUS. Dead of the rot, applied to sheep and lambs. Mon. Angl. ii. 114.

MORTMAIN, manus mortua, from the French mort, mortu, and main, manus. Cowell, Skene, Hottoman. An alienation of lands and tenements to any guild, corporation, or fraternity, and their successors, as bishops, parsons, vicars, &c. which could never be done without the king's licence, and that of the lord of the manor, or of the king alone, if it be immediately holden of him. The reason of the name may be deduced from hence, because the services and other profits due, for such lands, as escheats, &c. should not with such licence come into a dead hand, or into such a hand as were dead, and so dedicated unto God, or pious uses, as to be abstractedly different from other lands, tenements, or hereditaments, and never to revert to the donor, or any temporal or common use. Magna Carta, c. 36.

Polydore Virgil, in the seventeenth book of his Chronicon, mentions this law, and gives this reason of the name: *Legem hanc manum mortuam vocarunt, quod res sancte de collegiis succedendum, non utique rursus venderentur velut in ritibus hoc est, usui aliorum mortalium in perpetuum adeptae essent. Lex diligenter servatur, sic, ut nihil possessionum ordini ecclesiastici a quoquam detur, nisi regis permisso; but the statutes of mortmain are in some manner abridged by 39 Ed. c. 2, by which the gift of lands, &c. to hospitals is permitted, without obtaining licences in mortmain. But see post.*

Hottoman, in his Commentaries, De verbis Feudalibus, verbo Manus mortua, hath these words: *Manus mortua locatio quae usurpatur de re, quoniam possessio eius non deest manibus est, quae nunquam hereditem habere desinit. quod de re res nunquam ad priorem dominum revertitur, nam manus possessione dicitur mortua per antiphrasin pro immortalitate. Petrus bullaga de specul. Principum, fol. 76. Jus immortalitatis est licentia capiendi ad manum mortuam: to the same read Cassan. de Consuet. Burgund. p. 348, 387, 1184. 1201, &c. Skene de verb. signif. Dimittere is to give to manum mortuam est idem atque dimittere ad multitudinem universitatem, quae nunquam moritur, idque per antiphrasin a contrario sensu, because commonalties never die.*

William the Conqueror, demanding the cause why he conquered the realm by one battle, which the Danes could not do by many, Frederick, abbot of St. Albans, answered, that

MORTMAIN.

And notwithstanding this, previous to the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36,

But as this prohibition extended only to religious houses, bishops and other sole corporations were not included therein ; and the aggregate ecclesiastical bodies found many means to creep out of this statute, by buying in lands that were bond fide holden of themselves as lords of the fee, and thereby evading the forfeiture; or by taking long leases for years, which first introduced those extensive terms for one thousand or more years, which are now so frequent in conveyances. This produced the statute de religiosis, 7 Edw. 1, which provided that no person, religious or other, whatsoever, should buy, or sell, or receive, under pretence of a gift or term of years, or any other title whatsoever, nor should by any art or ingenuity appropriate to himself any lands or tenements in mortmain; upon pain that the immediate lord of the fee, or on his default for one year, the lords paramount, and in default of all of them, the king might enter thereon as a forfeiture.

This seemed to be a sufficient security against all alienations in mortmain; but as these statutes extended only to gifts and conveyances between the parties, the religious houses now began to set up a fictitious title to the land, which it was intended they should have, and to bring an action to recover it against the tenant, who by fraud and collusion made no defence; and thereby judgment was given for the religious house, which then recovered the land by sentence of law, upon a supposed prior title; and thus they had the honour of inventing those fictitious adjudications of right which afterwards became the great assurance of the kingdom, under the title of common recoveries. But upon this the stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 32. enacted that in such cases a jury shall try the true right of the demandants or plaintiffs to the land, and if the religious house or corporation be found to have it, they shall still recover seisin, otherwise it shall be forfeited to the immediate lord of the fee, or else to the next lord, and finally to the king, upon the immediate or other lord's default. And the like provision was made by the succeeding chapter, 33, of the same statute, in case the tenants set up crosses on their lands (the badges of knights templars and hospitaliers,) in order to protect them from the feudal demands of their lords, by virtue of the privileges of those religious and military orders. So careful indeed was this prince to prevent any future evasions, that when the statute of quia emptores, 18 Edw. 1. abolished all sub-infeudations, and gave liberty for all men to alienate their lands, to be holden of their next immediate lord, a proviso was inserted that this should not extend to authorize any kind of alienation in mortmain. See 18 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 3; 2 Inst. 501. And when afterwards the method of obtaining the king's licence by writ of ad quod damnum, was marked out by 27 Edw. 1. st. 2. it was further provided by 34 Edw. 1. st. 3. that no such licence should be effectual without the consent of the mesne or intermediate lords.

Yet still it was found difficult to set bounds to ecclesiastical ingenuity; for when they were driven out of all their former holds, they devised a new method of conveyance, by which the lands were granted, not to themselves directly, but to nominal feoffees to the use of the religious houses; thus distinguishing between the possession and the use, and receiving the actual profits, while the seisin of the lands remained in the nominal feoffee, who was held by the courts of equity (then under the direction of the clergy) to be bound in conscience to account to his cestui que use for the rents and emoluments of the estate; and it is to these inventions that our practisers are indebted for the introduction of uses and trusts, the foundation of modern conveyancing. But they did not long enjoy the advantage of their new device, for the 15 R. 2. c. 5. enacts, that the lands which had been so purchased to uses, should be amortised by licence from the crown, or else be sold to private persons; and that for the future, uses shall be subject to the statute of mortmain, and forfeitable like the lands themselves. And whereas the statutes had been eluded by purchasing large tracts of land adjoining to churches, and consecrating them by the name of church-yards, such subtle imagination is also declared to be within the compass of the statutes of mortmain. And civil or lay corporations, as well as ecclesiastical, are also declared to be within the mischief, and of course within the remedy provided by those salutary laws: and lastly, as during the times of popery, lands were frequently given to superstitious uses, though not to any corporate bodies, or were made liable in the hands of heirs and devisees, to the charge of obits, chauntries, and the like, which were equally pernicious in a well-governed state, as actual alienations in mortmain; therefore at the dawn of the Reformation, the 23 Hen. 8. c. 10. declares, that all future grants of lands for any of the purposes aforesaid, for a longer term than twenty years, shall be void.

During all this time, however, it was in the power of the crown, by granting a licence of mortmain, to remit the forfeiture, so far as related to its own rights, and to enable any spiritual or other corporation to purchase and hold any lands or tenements in perpetuity; which prerogative is declared and confirmed by the 18 Edw. 3. st. 3. c. 5. But as doabts were conceived at the time of the Revolution, how far such licence was valid, since under the Bill of Rights, the king had no power to dispense with the statutes of mortmain, by a clause of non obstante, which was the usual course, though it seems to have been unnecessary (see Co. Lit. 99); and as by the gradual declension of mesne seigniories, through the long operation of the statute of quia emptores, the rights of intermediate lords were reduced to a very small compass; it was therefore provided by 7 & 8 Wm. 3. c. 37. that the crown for the future, at its own discretion, may grant licences to alienate or take in mortmain, of whomsoever the tenements may be holden.

After the dissolution of monasteries under Henry VIII though the policy of the next Popish successor affected to grant a security to the possessors of abbey lands, yet in order to regain so much of them as either the zeal or timidity of their owners might induce them to part with, the statutes of mortmain were suspended for twenty years by 1 S. 2. P. & M. c. 8; and during that time, any lands or tenements were allowed to be granted to any spiritual corporation without any licence whatsoever.

By the 39 Eliz. c. 5. the gift of lands, &c. to hospitals is permitted without obtaining licences of mortmain. See the Hospitals.

Afterwards, for the augmentation of poor livings, it was enacted by 17 Car. 2. c. 3. that appropriators may annex the great tithes to the vicarages, and that all benefices in the gift of the crown, or of any bishop or other ecclesiastical superior, 100*l.* per annum may be augmented by the purchase of land, without licence of mortmain in either case; and the like provision hath been since made in favour of the governors of Queen Anne's bounty. 2 & 3 Anne, c. 11. § 4. See also 15 Car. 2. c. 17. as to the incorporation of commissioners for Bedford Level; and 22 Car. 2. c. 6. and other statutes for the sale of the fee-farms rents of the crown.

It hath also been held, that the 23 Hen. 8. c. 10. before mentioned did not extend to any thing but superstitious uses, and that therefore a man may give lands for the maintenance of a school, an hospital, or any other charitable use. 1 R. 2. c. 24. But as it was apprehended from recent experience, that persons on their death-beds might make large and impudent dispositions, even for these good purposes, and defeat the political end of the statutes of mortmain; it is therefore enacted by 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. that no lands or tenements, or money to be laid out thereon, shall be given for or enlarged with any charitable uses whatsoever, unless by deed indented, executed in the presence of two witnesses, twelve calendar months before the death of the donor, and enrolled in the Court of Chancery, within six months after its execution except stocks in the public funds, which may be transferred within six months previous to the donor's death; and no such gift be made to take effect immediately, and be without power of revocation; and that all other gifts shall be void

The two universities, their colleges, and the scholars upon the foundation of the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, are excepted out of this act; but such exemption was granted with a proviso that no college should be at liberty to purchase more advowsons than were equal in number to one moiety of the fellows; or where there were no fellows, one moiety of the students upon the respective foundations. This restriction has, however, since been repealed. See Post.

The words of the above statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. are "that no man, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, or other hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, whatsoever, nor any sum or sums of money, goods, chattels, stocks in the public funds, securities for money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be given, granted, aliened, limited, released, transferred, assigned, or appointed, or any ways conveyed or settled to or upon any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered by any person or persons whatsoever, in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever, ~~and~~ such gift, appointment, conveyance, or settlement of any such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, sum or sums of money, or personal estate (other than stocks in the public funds), be and are made by deed indented, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, twelve calendar months at least before the death of such donor or grantor (including the days of the execution and death), and be enrolled in his majesty's High Court of Chancery, within six calendar months next after the execution thereof; and unless such stocks be transferred in the public books usually kept for the transfer of stocks, six calendar months at least before the death of such donor or grantor (including the days of the transfer and death), and unless the same be made to take effect in possession for the charitable use intended immediately from the making thereof, and be without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, clause, or agreement whatsoever for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or any person or persons claiming under him." § 1. And the 2d section declares all gifts and dispositions, settlements, incumbrances, &c. otherwise made, void.

The said st. 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. has been uniformly construed by our courts of law and equity, so as to give it its full force and effect, and by no means to give way to the subtleties which, by devices, overthrown the law in many respects, at the same time that all proper encouragement has been given to such gifts and bequests to charities, as did not manifestly appear to contravene the policy of the statute.

The statute was not meant solely to restrain devises of land, or money to be laid out in lands, to charities, but has also been construed to the prohibition of any devise of lands to trusts, so as to all them and convert the profits of the same to such purposes, for this mode, though it does not seem directly within the mischief intended to be prevented by the act, might be a device to evade the law. See 1 Yes. 187; 2 Yes. 52; and Attorney-Gen. v. Ingham, A. D. 1704, cited in Highmore's Charitable Uses.

A devise of a mortgage, or of a term of years, or of a rent-charge on lands, to a charity, is not good. It has been urged that the words of the statute, "that the lands shall not be conveyed or settled for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered," relate merely to the case of a person charging his own lands for the benefit of a charity, and not to prevent the bequeathing a mortgage made to secure a personal debt; but it has been always said that the devise of a mortgage passeth the land so mortgaged, for the equity of redemption may ultimately vest in the mortgagee; but a charity is precluded from a right of foreclosure; and therefore the bequest of a real security to a charity is in its nature void. See Cro. Car. 37; Atk. 605; 2 Ves. 44, 547;

1 Bro. C. R. 271; and Highmore's Char. Uses; as to the indirect way in which this may be in some manner affected, by marshalling the assets, so as to pay the debts out of the mortgage, and leave the personal estate free to answer the legacy to the charity; a matter in which the courts of equity are very nice and careful.

A testatrix, after charging her estate with the payment of an annuity, devised the same to G. S., his heirs and assigns for ever; expressing her wish and desire to be, that G. S. in his lifetime should convey the estate to some charitable uses, the choice of which was left entirely to his discretion; and, subject to this, G. S. was to enjoy the estate to his own use for his life. This was held to be void as to the devise in fee under the st. 9 Geo. 2. Under § 4. of that act, the estate given, and not merely the trust, is to be void, and the legal estate, upon the death of the devisee for life, descended on the heir at law. By codicils to the will, certain legacies were bequeathed, charged upon the estate; and a power was given to G. S. (who was also named executor) to cut down timber to pay them; and interest was directed to be paid by him to legatees after the expiration of two years; but these personal charges were not construed to raise by implication the express estate for life given to G. S. into an estate in fee. 2 B. & A. 710.

Money for which there is a lien on real estate cannot be given in mortmain; therefore, where a testator had contracted to sell his real estate, and he bequeathed the purchase-money, which was unpaid, to a charitable use, it was determined that the bequest was void. 1 Russ. & M. 71.

Money left to repair parsonage-houses, or to build upon land already in mortmain, is held not to be within the statute. 1 Bro. C. R. 444; Ambl. 373, 651; and see 4 Russ. 342. But where a testator directed a sum of money to be laid out in building a chapel, the bequest was declared void; the settled rule of construction being, that a direction to build is to be considered as including a direction to purchase land for the purpose of building, unless the testator distinctly points to land already in mortmain. 3 Russ. 456. So a legacy to the corporation of Queen Anne's bounty is void, as by the rules of the corporation it must be laid out in land. 1 Bro. C. R. 13, in note.

Although, however, the statute prohibits the gift of money or personal estate, to be laid out in lands, for charitable uses, yet, as has been already hinted, money, &c. given generally, is not forbidden: so also the residue of a personal estate hath been decreed not to be within the act; and if money be given to be laid out "in lands or otherwise" to a charitable use, such devise is good; by reason of the option thereby given to lay it out in personal securities, which are not restrained by the statute, unless they are converted into land. See St. v. H. v. H., A. D. 1740. Grundy v. Grundy, A. D. 1754; cited in Highmore's Charitable Uses.

The statute had the effect of making void many devises and bequests to the governors of Queen Anne's bounty; but this was remedied by the 43 Geo. 3. c. 107, which in substance exempted the 2 & 3 Anne, c. 11, from its operation.

By the exemption in the 4th section of the statute, in favour of the universities, any land, or personal estate to be laid out in land, may still be disposed of in trust for their benefit, or for any colleges thereof, as it might have been before the making of the act. But the extension to the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, seems confined to any disposition for the better support and maintenance of the scholars only upon those foundations, so that a devise to those colleges for any other purpose would apparently be declared void. Highm. Char. Uses.

Section 5. of the statute was made to prevent successions in colleges from happening so rapidly, as that fit members might not be left either to govern the college or to succeed to the vacant benefices. By 45 Geo. 3. c. 101. reciting "that the said restriction had been found by experience to operate to the prejudice of such colleges, by rendering the succession too slow," the said section of the said statute 9 Geo. 2. was repealed.

The concluding section of the statute exempts all estate real or personal in Scotland from the restraints imposed on those in England. A case has occurred where an estate in Ireland was devised to charitable uses in Ireland. 1 Bro. C. R. 27. There does not appear any case where estates either in Scotland or Ireland were devised to charities in England; though it may be concluded, if the charities were incorporated, and so became capable of taking, such a devise would not be void. Upon the same principles a devise of lands, or of a rent-charge on lands, in the West Indies, to a charity in England, is good. Instances of the latter have actually occurred, and the executors or heirs at law never thought of contesting the devise against the charity. Highmore, Char. Uses.

In the case of a legacy in South Sea annuities bequeathed for the maintenance of poor labourers in Edinburgh and towns adjacent, the Court of Chancery was of opinion, that no directions could be given there as to the distribution of the money; that belonging to another jurisdiction, viz. to some of the courts in Scotland; and therefore directed that the annuities should be transferred to such persons as the plaintiffs should appoint, to be applied to the uses of the will. See Ambl. 286.

A Scotchman, who resided in Montrose, made a journey to London to transact some business, and being suddenly taken ill, he there made his will, whereby he gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees (of whom some, but not all, were resident in Scotland) on trust to lay out the same in purchase of lands, or rents of inheritance, in fee simple, for the intent expressed in an instrument of same date with his will; by which instrument he directed the said trustees to pay the rents annually to certain other trustees, who were at all times to be persons residing within twenty miles of Montrose, to be by them applied to the relief of indigent ladies in Montrose, or within twenty miles of the town.—Held, that the bequest was void (under the Mortmain Act), on the ground that the will was made in England, in the English form, and said nothing as to laying out the money in Scotch purchases. Attorney-Gen. v. Mill, 3 Russ. 328; and see Dom. & C. 394. S. C.

Courts of equity have by several decisions favoured devises if made for intended charities, though they were not in esse at the time of the making the will. See Highmore.

An opinion prevailed, that where a full and valuable consideration was given for lands purchased for charitable uses, it was unnecessary to comply with the requisitions of the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, with respect to the sealing, attesting, and enrolling of the conveyance; whereas the provision in the statute on which the misapprehension arose, was only intended to prevent deeds from being avoided by the death of the grantor within twelve months afterwards. Many purchases were made under this belief, which are rendered valid by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 85; but the act does not dispense with the prescribed formalities in deeds subsequently executed.

It is incident to every corporation to have a capacity to purchase lands for themselves and successors; and this is regularly true at common law. 10 Rep. 50. But they are excepted out of the statute of Wills, 34 Hen. 8. c. 5.; so that no devise of lands to a corporation, except for charitable uses, by 43 Eliz. c. 4, which exception is again greatly narrowed by the above st. 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. So that now a corporation, whether ecclesiastical or lay, cannot purchase without licence from the crown, though that capacity seems to be vested in them by the common law. And such charities which have not this licence, which is now granted by act of parliament, charter of incorporation, or letters-patent, are reduced to the necessity of choosing from among themselves certain persons to be trustees, and to purchase in their names, and to take the lands in trust for the charity; for if they were bought in the name of the institution, not being incorporated, they would instantly vest in the crown, as a forfeiture in mortmain. Highmore on Charitable Uses.

It frequently happens that a donor or testator is not readily furnished with the correct title of the hospital or institution to whose charitable designs he wishes to contribute: to obviate this difficulty, it appears that a statute was passed, 14 Hen. c. 14, evidently made for the benefit of Christ's Hospital, St. Thomas's, and St. Bartholomew's, but including also all other hospitals, declaring "that all gifts and legacies, by will, feoffment, or otherwise, for relief of the poor in any hospital, then remaining and being in esse, shall be as valid, according to the true meaning of the donor, as if the said corporation had been rightly named." The same act then recites one preceding, and explains "that the words Master or Guardian of any hospital mentioned therein, were intended and meant of all hospitals, Masons-houses, bead-houses, and other houses ordained for the sustentation or relief of the poor; and shall be so expounded and taken for ever." It has been decided that the 13 Eliz. c. 10, to which this refers, extends to all manner of hospitals, whether incorporated by name of master or warden, or any other name; or whether a sole corporation, or aggregate of many. 5 Co. 14, b.; 11 Co. 76, a.; Palmer, 216. See Highmore on Charitable Uses.

By 43 Geo. 3. c. 108. for promoting the building and providing churches and chapels, and houses for ministers, and churchyards and glebes (in England and Ireland), proprietors of land may, by deed inrolled, or by will executed three months before death, give land not exceeding five acres, or personally not exceeding 500*l.*, for the purposes of the act. By 51 Geo. 3. c. 115. the king may vest lands in any person for building any church, chapel, parsonage house, &c. And by § 2. of the same act, rectors or vicars may (with consent of the bishop) grant part of their glebe land (not exceeding one acre) for the site of a new church or churchyard. By 54 Geo. 3. c. 117. rectors and vicars in Ireland, are empowered (with consent of the bishop) to grant an acre of their glebe land for the site of a new church or churchyard. By 55 Geo. 3. c. 147. (which does not appear to extend to Ireland,) spiritual persons are enabled to exchange the parsonage or glebe houses, or glebe lands belonging to them, for benefices, for others of greater value, or more conveniently situated; and also to purchase and annex lands to become glebe. By 56 Geo. 3. c. 141. (which also appears to be confined to England,) ecclesiastical corporations, or spiritual persons being a corporation sole, are empowered to sell lands adjoining to churchyards, for the purpose of enlarging them. By 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. (amended and rendered more effectual by 59 Geo. 3. c. 134. and 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 61.) for building and promoting the building of additional churches in parishes (in England and Wales), the commissioners of the said act may accept sites for churches, churchyards, residences of the clergy; and all persons and corporations are empowered to convey accordingly. See § 33—39. &c. of the act. See further 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 72. and acts therein recited; also 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 38; and tit. Churches, Churchyards.

By an act of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 9. for incorporating "the Seamen's Hospital Society," that corporation may purchase or accept by way of gift, or devise, if landed property to the amount of 12,000*l.* per annum.

MORTUARY, mortuarium, mortarium. A gift left by a man at his death to his parish church for the redemption of his personal tithes and offerings not duly paid in his lifetime. A mortuary is not properly and originally due to ecclesiastical incumbents from any but those only of his own parish to whom he ministers spiritual instruction, and hath right to their tithes. But by custom in some places of this kind they are paid to the parsons of other parishes, as the custom passes through them.

Mortuarium (says Lindene) sic dictum est quia retribuitur ecclesie pro anima defuncti. Custom did so prevail, that mortuaries being held as due debts, the payment of them was enjoined as well by the statute De circumspecte agatis, 13 Edw. 1. st. 4. as by several constitutions, &c.

The 13 Edw. 1. c. 4. enacts, That a prohibition shall not lie for mortuaries in places where mortuaries used to be paid.

A mortuary was anciently called sank secal, which signifies pecunia sepulchralis, or symbolic annua. After the Conquest it was called a corse present, because the least was presented with the body at the funeral, and sometimes a principal; of which see a learned discourse in the Antiquities of Warwickshire, fol. 679, and Selden's Use of Tithes, p. 287; Lb. Canuti, c. 13.

A mortuary seems to have been originally an oblation made at the time of a person's death. In the Saxon times there was a funeral duty to be paid, which was called pretium sepulchralis, and syndrum annua, or the soul shot, which was required by the council of Altham, and enforced by the laws of King Canute, and this was due to the church which the party deceased belonged to, whether he was buried there or not. 1 Stult. 171.

There is no mortuary due by law, but by custom. 2 Inst. 491; see Spehm. de Concil. tom. 2. 390; Fleta, lib. 2. c. 600. par. 30. See Nonagium, Principal. In the Irish canons it is called Pretium sepulchri, and Sedatium; viz. Omne corpus sepulchrum habet in jure suo vaccam et equum et vestimentum et ornamentum loci sui, &c. Canon. Hibern. lib. 19. c. 6. And another place, Rogat principem loci, (i. e. the bishop,) ut bene faciat, si fuerit, &c. et reddat amicus pretium ejus et sedatium, &c.

The word mortuarium was sometimes used in a civil as well as an ecclesiastical sense, and was payable to the lord of the fee as well as to the priest of the parish. Debentur domino (i. e. manerii de Wrechwyke) nominibus herioti et mortuarii duæ vacce pret. xii. sol.—Paroch. Antiq. 470. Co. H.

Seld. says that the usage anciently was, bringing the mortuary along with the corpse when it came to be buried, and offer it to the church as a satisfaction for the suppression, negligence and omissions the defunct had been guilty of, in not paying his personal tithes; and from thence it was called a corse-present; a term which bespeaks it to have been once a voluntary donation. Selden's History of Tithes, 287. c. 10.

Dr. Stillingfleet makes a distinction between mortuaries and corse-presents; the mortuary, he says, was a right settled on the church upon the decease of a member of it; and a corse-present was a voluntary oblation usually made at funerals. 1 Stult. 172, 173.

Mortuaries are, in fact, a sort of ecclesiastical heriots, being a certain gift claimed by, and due to, the minister in very many parishes on the death of his parishioners. 2 Comm. c. 28. p. 425. They seem originally to have been, like lay-heriots, only a voluntary bequest to the church; being intended, as above mentioned, and as Lindewode states from a constitution of Archbishop Langham, as a kind of expiation and amends to the clergy for the personal tithes and other ecclesiastical duties which the laity in their lifetime might have neglected or forgotten to pay. For this purpose, after the lord's heriot or best good was taken out, the second-best chattel was reserved to the church as a mortuary. Co. Litt. 180; Lindew. Provinc. l. 1. tit. 3.

In Bracton's time, so early as Henry III., this was riveted into an established custom, inasmuch that the bequests of heriots and mortuaries were held to be necessary ingredients in every testament of chattels, and that the lord should have the best good left him as an heriot, and the church the second best as a mortuary. See Bracton, l. 2. c. 26; Fleta, l. 2. c. 57. See Herald.

The custom still varies in different places, not only as to the mortuary to be paid, but the person to whom it is payable. In Wales a mortuary or corse-present was due upon the death of every clergyman to the bishop of the diocese, till abolished upon a recompense given to the bishop by 12 Ann. st. 2. c. 6. And in the archdeaconry of Chester a custom also prevailed that the bishop, who is also archdeacon, should have, at the death of every clergyman dying therein, his best horse or mare, bridle, saddle, and spurs; his best gown or cloak, hat, upper garment under his gown, and tippet; and also his best signet or ring. Cro. Car. 237. But by 28 Geo. 2. c. 6. this mortuary is directed to cease, and an equivalent is settled upon the bishop in its room.

The king's claim to many goods on the death of all prelates in England, seems to be of the same nature; though Coke apprehends that this is a duty due upon death, and not a mortuary; a distinction seemingly without a difference. For not only the king's ecclesiastical character, as supreme ordinary, but also the species of the goods claimed, which bear so near a resemblance to those in the archdeaconry of Chester, which was an acknowledged mortuary, puts the matter out of dispute. The king, according to the record vouched by Sir Edward Coke, is entitled to six things: the bishop's best horse or palfrey, with his furniture; his cloak or gown and tippet; his cup and cover; his bason and ewer; his gold ring; and lastly, his mota canum, his mew or kennel of hounds. See 2 Inst. 491; 2 Comm. 426, 427.

This variety of customs, with regard to mortuaries, giving frequently a handle to exactions on the one side, and frauds or expensive litigations on the other, it was thought proper, by 21 Hen. 8. c. 6. to reduce them to some kind of certainty. For this purpose it is enacted, "That all mortuaries, or corse-presents, to parsons of any parish, shall be taken in the following manner: viz. for every person who does not leave goods to the value of ten marks (6l. 13s. 4d.) nothing; for every person who leaves goods to the value of ten marks, and under 30l., 3s. 4d.; if above 30l. and under 40l., 6s. 8d.; if above 40l., of what value soever they may be, 10s. and no more. And no mortuary shall throughout the kingdom be paid for the death of any feme covert; nor for any child; nor for any one of full age that is not a housekeeper; nor for any way-faring man, but such way-faring man's mortuary shall be paid in the parish to which he belongs.

"No person shall pay mortuaries in more places than one, or more than one mortuary; and no mortuary shall be demanded of any but in such places where mortuaries are due by custom, and have used to have been paid: also in places where mortuaries have been of less value than as aforesaid, no person shall pay any more than has been accustomed.

"If a parson, vicar, &c. take or demand more than is allowed by the statute for a mortuary, he shall forfeit all he takes beyond it, and 40s. more, to the party grieved, to be recovered by action of debt," &c.

Since this statute, whereby mortuaries are reduced to a certainty, and on which stands the law of mortuaries to this day, an action of debt will lie upon the said statute in the courts of common law for recovery of the sum due for a mortuary, being by custom as aforesaid, although before that statute they were recoverable only in the spiritual court; but as such actions have never been brought, it is said they are still recoverable in that court only. Wats. Clergym. Law, 475.

Where by custom a mortuary hath not been usually paid, if a person be libelled in the spiritual court, he shall have a prohibition by virtue of the statute 21 Hen. 8. c. 6. And upon a prohibition the custom may be tried, &c. 2 Lutw. 1066; 3 Mod. 268.

No suit in equity lies for a mortuary. 2 Strange, 715.

MORTUARIUM. A mortuary hath been sometimes used in a civil as well as ecclesiastical sense, being payable to the lord of the fee. Paroch. Antiq. 470.

MOSS-TROOPERS. A rebellious sort of people in the North of England, that lived by robbery and pilage, not unlike the tories in Ireland, the buccaneers in Jamaica, or banditti of Italy. The counties of Northumberland and Cumberland were charged with a yearly sum, and a command of men to be appointed by justices of the peace, to apprehend and suppress them. See 4 Jac. 1. c. 1; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 22; 30 Car. 2. c. 2; 6 Geo. 2. c. 37. (all repealed.)

MOTE, mota, Sax. gemote.] Curia, placitum, conventus; as mota de Hereford, i. e. curia vel placita comitatûs de Hereford. In the charter of Maud the Empress, daughter of King Henry the First, we read thus: Sciatis me fecisse Milonem de Gloucester Comitem de Hereford, et dedisse ei motam Herefordiæ cum toto castello, &c. Hence burgmote, curia vel conventus burgi; swainmote, curia vel conventus ministrorum, scil. forestæ, &c. From this also we draw our word mote and moot, to plead. The Scots say, to mute, as the Mute-hill at Scone, i. e. Mons placiti de Scona. See Fole-mote.

The word moot was usually applied to that arguing of cases used by young students in the Inns of Court and Chancery. In the charter of peace between King Stephen and Duke Henry, afterwards king, it is taken to signify a fortress, as turris de London, mota de Windsor; the tower of London and fortress of Windsor. Mote also signifies a standing pool of water to keep fish in.

It likewise signifies a great ditch encompassing a castle or dwelling-house. Chart. Antiq.

MOTE-BELL, or Mot-bell. The bell so called which was used by the English Saxons to call people together to the court. Leg. Ed. Confess. c. 35.

MOTEER. A customary service or payment at the mote or court of the lord, from which some persons were exempted by charter of privilege. Rot. Chart. 4 Joh. m. 9.

MOTHERING. A custom of visiting parents on Mid-lent-Sunday. See Lætare, Jerusalem.

MOTIBILIS. One that may be removed or displaced, or rather a vagrant. Flota, l. 6. c. 6.

MOTION IN COURT. An occasional application to the court by the parties or their counsel, in order to obtain some rule or order of court which becomes necessary in the progress of a cause. 3 Comm. 304.

There are also other motions not necessarily connected with any action; as to set aside an annuity, and deliver up the securities to be cancelled, &c.

All rules moved for in court are denominated special rules, and they are either absolute in the first instance, or only nisi, to show cause, or, as they are commonly called, rules nisi, i. e. unless cause be shown to the contrary, which are afterwards moved to be made absolute.

Motions are of a civil or criminal nature. Of the latter kind is the motion for an attachment, which may be moved for on account of contemptuous words spoken of the court or its process; for a rescue; or disobedience to a subpoena or other process; against a sheriff for not returning the writ or bringing in the body; against an attorney for not performing his undertaking, or otherwise misbehaving himself; against other persons for non-payment of costs on the master's allocatur; for the non-payment of money generally; or not performing an award, &c.

An attachment for misbehaviour is commonly preceded by a motion for a rule to answer the matters of the affidavit; and the party being taken on the attachment, either remains in custody or puts in bail before a judge, (for he is not bailable before the sheriff,) to answer interrogatories to be exhibited against him; which interrogatories must be signed by counsel; and if judgment be not given the same term, the name of the cause should be inserted in the list of motions appointed to come on peremptorily in the ensuing term. R. M. 34 Geo. 3; 5 T. R. 474; Tidd's Pract.

It is not consistent with the nature of this work to give more than a general outline of the cases in which motions are made for the obtaining of rules of court during the progress of a suit, or in other proceedings unconnected with any action; neither will any attempt be here made to specify what rules are absolute in the first instance and what are rules nisi; but the reader is referred to the various books of practice connected with the subject. See also tit. Rule of Court.

Motions of a civil nature are made on behalf of the plaintiff or of the defendant. On behalf of the plaintiff, they are either, 1. for something to be done in the common and ordinary course of the suit, as to increase issues; for a concilium; or judgment on demurrer, special verdict, or writ of error; for leave to enter up judgment on an old warrant of attorney; or nunc pro tunc; to enter up judgment and take out execution after an award, where a verdict has been taken for the plaintiff's security; or after a verdict for the plaintiff against one of several underwriters, where the rest have agreed to be bound by it; or to take out execution pending a writ of error; to amend the pleadings or other proceedings in the course of a suit; or to set aside a judgment of non-pros or of nonsuit; or a verdict or inquisition. Or, 2. they are for something to be done out of the common and ordinary course of the suit; as for the defendant to abide by his plea to refer it to the master to assess the damages, without a writ of inquiry; for the execution of a writ of inquiry before a judge; for a trial at bar, or in an adjoining county; for a view in trespass or in other cases; for a special jury; to have witnesses examined on interrogatories; or for leave to inspect and take copies of books, court-rolls, &c. or to have them produced at the trial.

On behalf of the defendant motions may be considered as they arise and succeed one another in the course of the suit. Before declaration;—they are to quash the writ; justify bail; reverse an outlawry; or after several rules for time to declare, that the plaintiff declare peremptorily. After declaration;—they are, to set aside an interlocutory judgment for irregularity; as being signed contrary to good faith, or upon an affidavit of merits; to set aside or stay proceedings in actions upon bail-bonds, or in other actions if irregular or unfounded; and if the defendant is a prisoner, to discharge him out of custody upon common bail; or if the proceedings are regular, to stay them upon terms; to compound penal actions; change the venue; consolidate actions; for time to plead or reply, &c. under special circumstances; to plead several matters, or pay money into court, (see Money into Court, payment of); to withdraw the general issue and plead it de novo, with a notice of set-off; or upon paying money into court; to add or withdraw special pleas—all these are generally; but sometimes, to pay the issue money into court in a qui tam action, (see Penal Action); to put off a trial if the defendant is not ready, or if the plaintiff will not proceed to trial; or inquiry; or for judgment as in case of a nonsuit; or arrest of judgment; or for a suggestion after verdict to entitle the defendant to costs; to set aside an execution, and discharge the defendant; or restore to him the money levied, or to retain it in the sheriff's hands.

The defendant also as well as the plaintiff may move for a concilium or judgment on a demurrer, special verdict, or writ of error; to amend; for a trial at bar, or in an adjoining county; for a view or special jury; to have witnesses examined on interrogatories; or for leave to inspect and take copies of books, court-rolls, &c. or have them produced at the trial; to set aside a verdict or inquisition; either party may likewise move to make a judge's order, submit, or to arbitration, or order of nisi prius, a rule of court; to enlarge the time for making an award; to set aside an award, or judge's order; for the master to make his report; or review his taxation.

There are some motions peculiar to the action of ejectment such as for judgment against the casual ejector generally, but where there is any thing peculiar in the service of the declaration it should be mentioned to the court; and when the affidavit of service is defective, they will give leave to file a supplemental one;—that service on the tenant's son.

daughter, &c. may be deemed good service; for the landlord to be admitted defendant instead of the tenant, or for leave to take out execution in such case against the casual ejector after the landlord has failed in his defence. See Ejectment.

An attachment for non-payment of costs, and against the sheriff for not returning the writ, may be moved for the last day of term. 1 Burr. 651; 5 Burr. 2686. But a motion to answer the matters of an affidavit cannot be made on that day; 4 Burr. 2502; or any motion which would operate as a stay of proceedings, unless it appear to the court that, under the circumstances, it could not have been made earlier.

By the general rules, H. T. 2 Wm. 4. (r. 6.) side-bar rules may be obtained on the last as well as on other days in term.

A motion is in general accompanied with an affidavit, and sometimes preceded by a notice. The affidavit should be properly attested, and contain a full statement of all the circumstances necessary to support the application; and the rat or as it is a rule not to receive any supplementary affidavit on showing cause. 2 T. R. 641. Motions and affidavits for attachments in civil suits, are proceedings on the civil side of the court, until the attachments issue, and are to be attested with the names of the parties. 3 T. R. 253. But as soon as the attachments issue, the proceedings are on the crown side; and from that time the king is to be named as the prosecutor. 3 T. R. 133, 253. And where a submission to an award is made a rule of court under the statute, there being no action, the affidavits on which to apply for an attachment for disobeying the award, need not be intitled in any cause, but the affidavit in answer must. 3 T. R. 601. An affidavit sworn before the attorney in the cause cannot be read, except for the purpose of holding the defendant to special bail. Tidd. And where an affidavit is made before a commissioner by a person who from his signature appears to be illiterate, the commissioner taking the affidavit shall certify or state in the jurat, that it was read, in his presence, to the party making the same, who seemed perfectly to understand it, and wrote his signature in the presence of the commissioner. R. E. 31 Geo. 3. 4 T. R. 284.

The notice of motion though seldom necessary, is frequently given, in order to save time and expense; by affording the adverse party an opportunity of showing cause in the first instance, or by inducing the court to disallow the costs of proceedings taken after the notice, and before the motion.

The 14 Geo. 2. c. 17. required notice of motion for judgment as in case of a nonsuit; but in the Court of King's Bench the rule to show cause was deemed a sufficient notice. Lofft. 65. It was otherwise in C. B. See 1 H. Blud. 197.

Now by Reg. Gen. H. T. 2 Wm. 4. a rule nisi for judgment as in case of a nonsuit may be obtained on motion without previous notice; but in that case it shall not operate as a stay of proceedings.

The rule to show cause is drawn up for a particular day in term, previous to which it should be duly served. To bring a party into contempt, a copy of the rule must be personally served, and the original at the same time showed to him; in other cases the same degree of strictness is not required in the service of the rule, but it is sufficient, without showing the original, to leave a copy of it with any person representing the party at his dwelling house or place of abode. 3 T. R. 1. And when a rule is obtained for a stay of proceedings for irregularity, and to stay proceedings in the mean time, the proceedings are suspended for all purposes till the rule is discharged. 1 T. R. 1.

For the time when notices of rules and rules must be served, see tit. Rule of Court.

On the day appointed for that purpose the counsel for the party called upon by the rule, may show cause against it, either upon or without an affidavit as circumstances require. But the copy must be first taken of the rule, and of the affidavit on which it was granted; or otherwise counsel cannot be heard. Previous to showing cause, it is usual to deliver over the affidavit against the rule to the counsel for the rule, who has a right to make any objection appearing on the face of it; and if a doubt arises upon the statement of the facts contained in the affidavit, it is inspected by the judges, or read by the officer of the court; when an affidavit has been made use of, but not before, it may be filed, in order that, if it be not true, the party may be indicted for perjury. Tidd's Pract.

If cause be not shown on the day appointed, the counsel for the party obtaining the rule may move, the next day, to make it absolute; which is done as a matter of course if no cause be shown on an affidavit of service. But it frequently stands over by consent of the parties, or for the accommodation of counsel, till a subsequent day, when the counsel on either side may bring it on by moving to make the rule absolute, or to discharge it; though if not brought on, or enlarged during the same term, it falls to the ground. When the counsel for the party obtaining the rule is not ready to support it, he may move to enlarge the rule till a future day in the same or next term, which is pretty much of course, when it is in his own delay; but otherwise the court will not enlarge the rule without consent, or some evident necessity; and they will never enlarge the plaintiff's rule when it would have the effect of continuing the defendant in custody. In like manner when the counsel for the party called upon by the rule is not prepared to show cause against it, he may apply to enlarge the rule till a future day, which is a matter of right if the rule was not served in time, so as to give the party an opportunity of answering it; but otherwise the court may impose upon him what terms they think proper, and they commonly require him to file his affidavits, so as to give the adverse party an opportunity of inspecting them, previous to the day appointed for showing cause. In cases of urgency, the court towards the end of the term will sometimes enlarge the rule till a day in the vacation, when it is to be brought on before a judge at chambers. Tidd's Pract.

And by the general rules, H. T. 2 Wm. 4. (r. 97.) a rule may be enlarged if the court think fit without notice.

On showing cause against the rule, the court either make it absolute or discharge it, and that either with or without the costs of the application; or such costs are directed to abide the event of the suit; according to the discretion of the court under all the circumstances of the case.

In hearing motions, the course formerly was, to begin every day with the senior counsel within the bar, and then to call to the next senior, in order, and so on as long as it was convenient to the court to sit, and to proceed again in the same manner upon the next and every subsequent day, although the bar had not been half, or perhaps a quarter gone through, upon any one of the former days; so that the juniors were very often obliged to attend in vain, without being able to bring on their motions for many successive days. 1 Burr. 57. This practice bearing hard upon junior counsel, Lord Mansfield introduced a different rule, which has ever since been adhered to; of going quite through the bar, even to the youngest counsel, before he would begin again with the seniors, even though it should happen to take up two or more days before all the motions which were ready at the bar upon the first day could be heard. 1 Burr. 57.

Particular days are appointed for certain business, as Tuesday and Friday, which are called paper days, for going through the paper of causes, wherein counsels have been moved for on the civil side; and Wednesday and Saturday for transacting business on the crown side. All motions or rules, in matters of length or consequence, are appointed for particular days, and called on first. Special causes are to be argued in the same order they are entered in the paper, and not to be entered anew or put off without a special application to the court; and all enlarged rules must come on peremptorily during the first week of the term.

If a rule be made absolute or discharged by surprise, the court will open it; and if by mistake it be drawn up wrong, they will order it to be set right. See Tidd's Pract. and the various authorities there cited.

Monday is a special day for motions in B. R. by the ancient course; but they are made upon any day, as the business of the court will permit. 2 Lal. 208, 210.

After motion in arrest of judgment, no motion shall be for a new trial; but after motion for a new trial, one may move in arrest of judgment. 2 Salk. 617. See Arrest of Judgment, Trial.

In B. R. one ought not to move the court for a rule for a thing to be done, which by the common rules of practice may be done without moving the court; nor shall the court be moved for doing what is against the practice of the court; one ought not to move for several things in one motion; and where a motion hath been denied, the same matter may not be moved again by another counsel without acquainting the court thereof, and having their leave for the same. Every person who makes a solemn argument at the bar is allowed by the court a motion for his argument. 2 Lil. Abr. 209, 210. But counsel cannot move for his argument in a matter of course in the paper, in B. R. 1 Wils. 76.

If there be divers rules of court made in a cause, and the party intends to move thereon, he must produce the rule last made in the cause, and move upon that; but it is necessary to have all the rules and copies of the affidavits, to satisfy the court how the cause hath been proceeded in and how it stands in court; though the last rule is the most material; and where a motion is made to set aside a rule grounded on an affidavit, a copy of the affidavit must be produced, that the court may be informed upon what grounds the rule was made, and judge whether there be cause shown upon the motion sufficient to set aside the rule. Pasch. 13 Car. B. R. Hk. 1649.

If any thing be moved to the court upon a record, the record is to be in court, or the court will make no rule upon such motion. Hil. 22 Car. B. R.

For the reasons of the several motions as arising from the progress of a cause through the courts from the commencement of the action to execution; which motions form the greatest part of the visible practice of courts of law; see Eunomus, Dial. 2. § 26—40. See Practice, Rule of Court.

In Chancery, during term, every Thursday is a day for hearing special motions before the chancellor (unless it happen to be the second day of the beginning, or the last day but one of the end of the term), as are the first and last days of the term; in vacation, only the general seal days appointed by the lord chancellor are days of motion.

Previous to the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 94. motions were only to be made before the lord chancellor, but by that act the master of the rolls is to hear motions. See further, Orders.

MOVEABLES. All sorts of things moveable are included under the name of things personal, or are personal estate, i. e. all those things which may attend a man's person wherever he goes. See 2 Comm. c. 24.

MOULT. An old English word for a mow of corn or hay; mullo feni, &c. Paroch. Antiq. 401.

MUFFLE. Winter gloves made of ram-skins. In Leg. Hen. 1. c. 70. they are called musfluc, and sometimes musflu.

MULCT, Mulcta.] A fine of money set upon one for some fault or misdemeanor; fines laid on ships or goods by a company of trade, to raise money for the maintenance of consuls, &c. are called mulcts. Merch. Dict.

MULIER. As used in our law, seems to be a word corrupted from melior, or the Fr. meilleur; and signifies the lawful issue, born in wedlock, preferred before an elder brother born out of matrimony. See 9 Hen. 6. c. 11; Smith's Repub. Angl. lib. 3. c. 6. But by Glanvil, lawful issue are said to be Mulier, not from melior, but because begotten of muliere, and not ex concubina; for he calls such issue filius mulieratos, opposing them to bastards. Glanv. lib. 7. c. 1. It appears to be thus used in Scotland also; Skene saying, mulieratus filius is a lawful son, begotten of a lawful wife.

If a man hath a son by a woman before marriage, which is a bastard and unlawful, and after he marries the mother of the bastard, and they have another son, this second son is mulier and lawful, and shall be heir to his father, but the other cannot be heir to any man; and they are distinguished in our old books with this addition. Bastard eigné, and mulier puisné. Co. Lit. 170, 243.

Where a man has issue by a woman, if he afterwards marries her, the issue is mulier by the civil law, though not by the laws of England. 2 Inst. 99; 5 Rep. 416. Of ancient time, mulier was taken for a wife, as it is commonly used for a woman, particularly one not a maid; and sometimes for a widow; but it has been held, that a virgin is included under the name mulier. See Co. Lit. 170, 243; 2 Inst. 434, 2 Comm. 248; and tit. Bastard.

MULIERTY. The being or condition of a mulier, or lawful issue. Co. Lit. 352, h.

MULLONES FCENI. Cocks or ricks of hay. Paroch. Antiq. p. 401. Hence in old English a moult, now a mow, of hay or corn. Cowell. See Moult.

MULMUTIN LAWS. See Molmutian Laws.

MULNEDA. A place to build a water-mill. Mon. ii. 28.

MULTE, or MULTURA EPISCOPI. Is derived from the Latin word mulcta, for that it was a fine given to the king, that the bishop might have power to make his last will and testament, and to have the probate of other men's, and the granting administrations. 2 Inst. 401.

MULTIPLE POINDING. In Scotch law means a double distress, and gives name to an action which may be brought by a person possessed of money or effects liable to claims from different claimants. Thus, where the rents of an estate are claimed by different persons, the tenant may raise an action of multiple poinding, calling the different parties to dispute their preferences, and to have it proved that the tenant is liable once, and in a single payment only. Scotch Dict.

MULTIPLICATION OF GOLD AND SILVER. Was prohibited and declared to be felony by 5 Hen. 4. c. 4. When a statute was made on a presumption that persons skilled in chemistry could multiply or augment these metals by changing other metals into gold or silver; and the endeavours of some persons in making use of extraordinary methods for the producing of gold and silver, and finding out the philosopher's stone, were found to be so prejudicial to the public, from the lavish waste of many valuable materials, and the ruin of many families by such useless expenses, that they occasioned the above statute. But the restraint thereby having no other effect, from the unaccountable vanity of those who followed those attempts practicable, than to send them beyond seas to try their experiments with impunity in other countries; 5 Hen. 4. c. 4. was at last repealed by 1 W. & M. c. 30. See Dyer, 88; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 18. § 12.

This repeal, it is said, was obtained by the learned and celebrated Robert Boyle: who was himself an excellent chemist, and in some measure a favourer of what is called chymy, or the art of obtaining the Philosophers' Stone, for the transmutation of metals.

MULTITUDE, Multitudo.] According to some authors must be ten persons or more; but Sir Edm. Coke says he could never find it restrained by the common law to any certain number. Co. Lit. 257. See Riot.

MULTO TIORIORI, or A MINORI AD MAJUS. Is an argument often used by Littleton, and is framed thus: "If it be so in a feoffment passing a new right, much more it is for the restitution of an ancient right," &c. See Ch. Lit. 253. See 260, a.

MULTO, MUTILO, MOLTO, MUTO, MUTTO.

mutton or sheep, or rather a wether, quia testiculis mutilati. Cowell.

MULTONES AURI. Pieces of gold money imprest with an Agnus Dei, a sheep or lamb on the one side, and from that figure called Multones. This coin was more common in France, and sometimes current in England, as appears by a patent, 33 Ldw. 1, cited by Spelman; though he had not then considered the meaning of it. Cowell.

MULTURE, molitura, vel multura.] The toll that the miller takes for grinding corn. Cowell.

MULTURERS. In the Scotch law, are the persons grinding at a mill; and, as the tenants and proprietors of some lands are bound by tenure, to use a particular mill, the lands so bound or restricted to the mill are termed the thirl or soken, (soken), and the tenants, &c. so bound, are called the in-soken multurers; while those who use the mill without being bound by tenure so to do, are termed the out-town, or out-soken multurers.

MUM. A sort of beer or strong liquor brewed from wheat, oats, and ground beans. It was one of the articles subject to the regulation of the excise-laws. Brunswick is the most celebrated place for brewing this liquor.

MUMMING, from Teuton. Mummien, to mimic. Antic diversions in the Christmas holidays, to get money and good cheer. Mummers to be imprisoned, 3 Ann. 8. c. 9.

MUNDBRECH, from Sax. mund, munitio, defensio, and brech, fractio. This is mentioned among divers crimes as quæ facta, læsio majestatis, &c. Spelm. Gloss.

Some would have mundbrech to signify an infringement of privilege; though of later times it is expounded clausurarum fractio, a breach of inclosures, by which many duchies and manors are called in many parts of England; and we say, when lands are fenced in and hedged, that they are mounded. See the next article.

MUNDE. Peace, hence Mundebrece, a breach of it. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 37.

MUNDEBURDE, Mundeburdum, from Sax. mund, i. e. tela, and burd = brech, i. e. publ. fractio.] A receiving to avoid and protection. Cowell.

MUNDICK. See Metal.

MUNICIPAL LAW. Is defined by Ida Estius, 1 Comm. Introductio a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the superior power, a statute, and for this definition he gives his reasons at large, to which we refer the reader. See Idem.

MUNIMENT-HOUSE, Munimenta. In cathedral and collegiate churches, castles, colleges, or public buildings, is a house or little room or storeroom, purposely made for keeping the seal, evidences, deeds, charters, writings, &c. of such church, college, &c. See evidences of title to estates, whether of public bodies or private persons, being called Munimenta, commonly muniments, or Muniments, to record, &c. See Munimenta and possessions are defended by them. Test. 176. Law Terms; 5 Rich. 2. c. 8; 35 Hen. 6. c. 37.

MUNIMENTS, Munimenta.] See the preceding article.

MUNUS ECCLESIASTICUM. The consecrated bread, out of which a little piece is taken for a communicant. Mon. Angl. ii. 838.

MURAGE. Murage. A reasonable tax, to be taken of every cart and horse coming upon the walls of a city or town, for the lading or repairing of the public walls, &c. levied by grant or prescription, it seems to be a duty levied on a town by a king for collecting of money towards the repair of the walls. See Idem 1. c. 30. 2 H. 1. c. 2. The sum of money for labour done by inhabitants and adjoining tenants for building or repairing the walls of a city or castle, was called murorum operatio; and when this personal duty was commuted into money, the tax so gathered was called Murage. Paroch. Antiq. 114. In the city of Chester, there are two ancient officers called Murengers, being two of the principal aldermen, yearly chosen to see the walls kept in good repair; for the maintenance of which they receive certain tolls and customs.

MURALE. The city wall. Huntind. lib. 8. p. 392.

MURATIO. A town or borough, surrounded with walls. Bromp. Vit. K. Steph.

MURDER. See Homicide, III. 3.

MURORUM OPERATIO. The service of work and labour done by inhabitants and adjoining tenants in building or repairing the walls of a city or castle. From which duty some were exempted by special privilege. So King Henry II. granted to the tenants within the honour of Wallingford, Ut quieti sint de operationibus castelorum et murorum. Paroch. Antiq. 114. When this personal duty was commuted into money, the tax so gathered was called Murage. Cowell. See Murage.

MUSCOVY COMPANY. See Russia Company.

MUSICIANS. The musicians of England were incorporated by King Charles II. anno, 1670. See Minstrels.

MUSLINS. See Linen.

MUSSA, Lat.] A moss or marsh ground; also a place where sedge grows; a place over-run with moss. Cowell, Mon. i. 426.

To MUSTER, from Fr. Monstre.] To show men, and their arms, that are soldiers, and enrol them in a book. Terms de Ley. See Courts Martial, Soldiers.

MUSTER-MASTER GENERAL. See Master of the King's Musters.

MUTA CANUM, Fr. Meute de chiens.] A kennel of hounds, one of the mortuaries to which the king was entitled at a bishop's and abbot's decease. See Mortuary.

MUTARE. To mew up hawks in the time of their molting or casting their plumes. In the reign of King Edward II. the manor of Broughton in Com. Oxon. was held—Per serjeantiam mutandi unum hostricum domini regis, &c. Paroch. Antiq. 500.

The Mews (Muta Regia) near Charing Cross, London, was formerly the falconry or place for the king's hawks.

MUTATORIUS. Change of apparel. Mat. Par. Ann. 1207.

MUTATUS ACCIPITER. A mewed hawk. Cowell.

MUTE, Mutus.] One dumb, who cannot or refuses to speak. And by our law a prisoner may stand mute two ways:

1. When he speaks not at all; in which it shall be inquired whether he stand mute out of malice, or by the act of God? and if by the latter, then the judge ought to inquire whether he be the same person, and of all pleas which he might have pleaded in his defence, if he had not been mute.
2. When the prisoner does not plead directly, or will not put himself upon the inquest to be tried; and a person feigning himself mad, and refusing to answer, shall be taken as one who stands mute. 2 Inst. H. P. C. 226.

If a prisoner on his trial peremptorily challenged above the number of jurors allowed by law, this being an implied refusal of a legal trial, he was formerly dealt with as one who stood mute. H. P. C. 259; Kel. 36; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30.

And it was, indeed, long since clearly settled, that a prisoner thus perversely and obstinately offending, was, in high treason, ipso facto attainted. 2 Hale, 268; 4 Comm. c. 25. p. 325; c. 27. p. 354. And in felony the challenge was overruled. 2 Hale, 576.

Now by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 3. if any person indicted for treason, felony, or piracy, challenge peremptorily above the number allowed by law, every such challenge beyond the number allowed by law shall be void, and the trial proceed as if no such challenge had been made.

Regularly a prisoner was said to stand mute, when being arraigned for treason, or felony, he either, 1. made no answer at all; or, 2. answered foreign to the purpose, or with such matter as was not allowable, and would not answer otherwise; or, 3. upon having pleaded not guilty, refused to put himself upon the country. 2 Hal. P. C. 316. If he said nothing, it was the duty of the court ex officio to impanel a jury to inquire whether he stood obstinately mute, or whether he was dumb ex visitatione Dei. If the latter appeared to be the case, the judges of the court (who were to be of counsel for the prisoner, and to see that he had law and justice,) should proceed to the trial, and examine all points as if he pleaded not guilty. But whether judgment of death could be given against such a prisoner, who had never pleaded, and could say nothing in arrest of judgment, was a point (says Blackstone) undetermined. See 2 Hal. P. C. 317; 9 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 7.

If he were obstinately mute (which a prisoner was held to be who cut out his own tongue. 3 Inst. 178.) then, if it were in an indictment for high treason, it was clearly settled that standing mute was equivalent to a conviction, and he should receive the same judgment and execution. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 9; 2 Hale, P. C. 317, 332. And as in the highest crime, so in the lowest species of felony, vis. in petit larceny, and in all misdemeanors, standing mute was always equivalent to conviction.

But in other felonies, or petit treason, the prisoner was not by the ancient law looked upon as convicted, so as to receive judgment for the felony, but should for his obstinacy have received the terrible sentence of penance or peine (probably a corrupted abbreviation of prisone) forte et dure.

Before this was pronounced, the prisoner had not only trina admonitio, but also a respite of a few hours, and the sentence was distinctly read to him, that he might know his danger; and after all, if he continued obstinate, and his offence was clergyable, he had the benefit of his clergy allowed, even though he was too stubborn to pray it. 2 Hal. P. C. 320, 321; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 24. Thus tender was the law of inflicting this dreadful punishment; but if no other means could prevail, and the prisoner (when charged with a capital felony) continued stubbornly mute, the judgment was then given against him without any distinction of sex or degree. A judgment which was purposely ordained to be exquisitely severe, that by that very means it might rarely be put in execution.

The judgment of penance for standing mute was as follows:—that the prisoner be remanded to the prison from whence he came, and put into a low, dark chamber, and there be laid on his back, on the bare floor, naked, unless where decency forbids; that there be placed upon his body as great a weight of iron as he could bear; and more, that he have no sustenance, save only on the first day three morsels of the worst bread; and on the second day three draughts of standing water, that should be nearest to the prison door; and in this situation this should be alternately his daily diet, till he died, or (as anciently the judgment ran) till he answered. Brit. c. 4, 22; Flet. lib. 1, c. 34. § 33.

It has been doubted, whether this punishment subsisted at the common law, or was introduced in consequence of West. 1. 3 Edm. 1. c. 12; which latter seems to be the better opinion. 2 Inst. 179; 2 Hal. P. C. 322; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 19; Staundf. P. C. 149; Barr. 82. For not a word of it is mentioned in Glanvil or Bracton, or in any ancient author, case, or record (that hath yet been produced) previous to the reign of Edward I.; but there are instances on record in the reign of Henry III. where persons accused of felony, and standing mute, were tried in a particular manner, by two successive juries, and convicted; and it is asserted by the judges in 8 Hen. 4. that by the common law, before the statute, standing mute on an appeal, amounted to a conviction of the felony. This statute of Edward I. directs such persons "as will not put themselves upon inquests of felonies, before the judges at the suit of the king, to be put into (or rather shall be sent back to) hard and strong prison, (soient mys 2 (the best copies read remys) en la prisone forte et dure) as those which refuse to be at the common law of the land."

And immediately after this statute, the form of the judgment appears in Fleta and Britton to have been only a very strait confinement in prison, with hardly any degree of sustenance, but no weight is directed to be laid upon the body, so as to hasten the death of the sufferer; and indeed any surcharge of punishment on persons adjudged to penance, so as to shorten their lives, is reckoned by Horne, in the Mirror, as a species of criminal homicide. Mirr. c. 1. § 9. It appears by a record of 31 Edm. 3. that the prisoner might then possibly subsist for forty days under this lingering punishment. It seems, therefore, that the practice of loading him with weights, or, as it was usually called, pressing him to death, was gradually introduced between 31 Edm. 3. and 8 Hen. 4. at which last period it first appears upon our books; being intended as a species of mercy to the delinquent, by delivering him the sooner from his torment; and hence it seems also that the duration of the penance was then first altered; and instead of continuing till he answered, it was directed to continue till he died, which must very soon happen under an enormous pressing. Year B. 8 Hen. 4. 1, 2.

The uncertainty of its original, the doubts that were conceived of its legality, and the repugnance of its theory (for it rarely was carried into practice) to the humanity of the laws of England, all concurred to require a legislative abolition of this process, and a restitution of the ancient common law; whereby the standing mute in felony, as well as in treason and in trespass, amounted to a confession of the charge. Or, if the corruption of the blood, and the consequent escheat in felony had been removed, the judgment of peine forte et dure might perhaps have still innocently remained, as a monument of the rapacity with which the tyrants of feudal antiquity hunted after escheats and forfeitures; since no one would ever have been tempted to undergo such a horrid alternative. For the law was, that by standing mute, and suffering this heavy penance, the judgment, and of course the corruption of the blood and escheat of the lands, were saved in felony, and petit treason, though not the forfeiture of the goods; and, therefore, this lingering punishment was probably introduced in order to extort a plea, without which it was held that no judgment of death could be given, and so the lord lost his escheat. But in high treason, as standing mute is equivalent to a conviction, the same judgment, the same corruption of blood, and the same forfeitures, always attended it as in other cases of conviction. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 9. It was enacted by the 12 Geo. 3. c. 20. that every person who, being arraigned for felony or piracy, stood mute or not answer directly to the offence, should be convicted of the same; and the same judgment and execution (with all their consequences in every respect) should be thereupon awarded, as if the person had been convicted by verdict or confession of the crime.

Two instances occurred after the passing of the act, of persons who refused to plead, and who were in consequence condemned and executed: one at the Old Bailey for murder in 1778, the other for burglary at the summer assizes at Wells in 1792. See 4 Comm. c. 25, p. 324—329, and n.

Now by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 2. if any person arraigned upon, or charged with, any indictment or information for treason, felony, piracy, or misdemeanor, shall stand mute or malice, or will not answer directly, the court may order the officer to enter a plea of "not guilty" on behalf of such person; and the plea so entered shall have the same effect as if such person had actually pleaded the same.

The trial and safe custody of insane offenders not capable of pleading or being mute by the visitation of God, are regulated by the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 94, and 58 Geo. 3. c. 7. See further Idiots and Lunatics, VI.

Although this subject is now become matter of curiosity rather than of instruction, the following further particulars as to this terrible punishment, are preserved for the satisfaction of the inquiring student.

Hawk as, in his description of the peine forte et dure, says, that the manner of inflicting this punishment may be best found from the books of entries and other law books; all of which generally agree, that the prisoner shall be remanded to the place from whence he came, and put into some low dark room, and there laid on his back without any manner of covering, except for the privy parts, and that as many weights be laid upon him as he can bear, and more, and that he shall have no manner of sustenance but the worst bread and water, and that he shall not eat the same day on which he drinks, nor drink the same day on which he eats, and that he shall so continue till he die. But that it is said that anciently the judgment was not, that he should continue until he should die, but until he should answer; and that he might save himself from the penance by putting himself upon his trial, which he cannot do at this day after judgment of penance once given. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30. § 16.

And as to the words in some low dark room, he says that this clause is omitted in Keilw. 70. a; 1 Edm. 4. 11. pl. 18. but is mentioned in all the other books above cited, but with this difference, that 14 Edm. 4. 11. pl. 17. says only he shall be put in a chamber, without adding that it shall be low or dark.

And as to the words there laid on his back, &c. he says, that in this all the books above cited seem to agree. And 14 Edm. 4. 8. pl. 17; and S. P. C. 150. (E); and 2 Inst. 178; add, that he shall lie without any litter or other thing under him, and that one arm shall be drawn to one quarter of the room with a cord, and the other to another, and that his feet shall be used in the same manner. But that these clauses are wholly omitted in all the other books above cited, except H. P. C. which takes notice of the latter of them only. And Ra. Ent. 385. pl. 2. adds, that an hole shall be made for the head. And Keilw. 70. a. says, that the head shall not touch the earth.

And as to the words, that as many weights shall be laid upon him as he can bear, and more, &c. he says, that in this all the books above cited agree.

And as to the word bread, he says that 14 Edm. 4. 8. pl. 17; S. P. C. 150. (E); and 2 Inst. 178; are, that he shall have three morsels of barley bread a day; Keilw. 70. a. that he shall have only rye bread; and Ra. Ent. 385. pl. 2. and 2 Hen. 4. 1. pl. 2. generally that he shall have the worst bread.

And as to the word water, he says, that in 14 Edm. 4. 8. pl. 17; S. P. C. 150. (E); 2 Inst. 178; and 8 Hen. 4. 1. pl. 2. and Keilw. 70. a; are, that he shall have the water next the prison, so that it be not current; but Ra. Ent. 385. pl. 5. is general that he shall have the worst water.

And as to the words, not eat the same day on which he drinks, nor drink the same day on which he eats, &c. he says, that is omitted in Keilw. 70. a. and in Hen. 4. 1. pl. 2.

And as to the words till he die, he says, this is omitted in none of the books above cited, except 14 Edm. 4. 11. and H. P. C. 227. But that neither of these books give the whole judgment at large. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 30.

The rack or question, to extort a confession from criminals, was a practice of a different nature: this having been only used to compel a man to put himself upon his trial, that being a species of trial in itself. See Torture.

To advise a prisoner to stand mute, is a high misprison, a contempt of the king's court, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. See Misprison.

MUTUUM. The contract by which things are given in loan, which cannot be used without their extinction or alienation, and which, therefore, imposes an obligation on the borrower to restore as much of the article borrowed of the same kind and value as he received. See Bailment.

MYSTERY, Misterium, from the Fr. meister, métier, ars, artificium.] An art, trade, or occupation.

Among the additions required to be given to defendants in an indictment by the 1 H. 5. c. 5. are the addition of their "estate, or degree, or mystery."

Mystery means the defendant's trade, art, or occupation, such as merchant, mercer, tailor, parish clerk, schoolmaster, husbandman, labourer, or the like. 2 Hawk. c. 23. § 11.

N.

NATIONAL DEBT.

NACELLA. A skiff or boat. Mat. Paris.
NACKA, NACTA. A small ship, yacht, or transport vessel. Chartular Abbat. Rading. MS. fol. 51.

NAM, or NAAM, namium; from the Sax. niman, capere. The taking or distraining another man's moveable goods. Lawful Naam, which is a reasonable distress, proportionable to the value of the thing distrained for, was anciently called either vif or mort, quick or dead, as it consisted of dead or quick chattels; and it is when one takes another man's beasts damage-feasant in his ground; or by reason of some contract made, as for default of payment of an annuity, it shall be lawful to distrain in such or such lands, &c. There is also a Naam unlawful mentioned in our books. Horn's Mirror, lib. 2; Leg. Canut. c. 18; Spelm. Gloss.; this Dict. tit. Namium, Replevin.

NAMATION, namatio. A taking or distraining; and in Scotland it is used for impounding: Namatus, distrained. Charta Hen. 2. See Namium, Velitum, Withernam.

NAME, nomen, Fr. nosme or nom. By which any person is known or called. There is a name of persons, bodies politic, and places; and of baptism and surname; also names of dignity, &c. In some cases a name by reputation is sufficient; but it is not so of a thing, if the matter and substance be not right. 11 Rep. 21; 4 Rep. 65; 4 Rep. 170. What foundation will support a name by reputation, see Ld. Raym. 301, 304; and tit. Misnomer.

NAMIVM VETITUM. An unjust taking the cattle of another, and driving them to an unlawful place, pretending damage done by them. In which case the owner of the cattle may demand satisfaction for the injury, which is called placitum de namio vetito. 2 Inst. 140; 3 Com. 140. See Replevin, Withernam.

NARR. An abbreviation of narratio; a declaration in a cause.

NARRATOR, Lat. A pleader or reporter. Serviens narrator, a serjeant at law; a serjeant-counter. Fleta, lib. 2. cap. 37.

NASSE or NESSE. From Sax. Næse, Promontorium. The name of the port or haven of Orford, in Suffolk, mentioned in 4 Hen. 7. c. 21. Hence also Sheerness.

NATALE. The state and condition of a man.

NATHWYTE. Seems to be derived from the Sax. nath, i. e. lewdness; and so to signify the same with Lairnute. See that title.

NATIONAL DEBT. The money owing by Government, for which it pays interest, part to our own people, part to foreigners, and which forms our National Funds. After the Revolution, when our new connections with Europe introduced a new system of foreign politics, the expenses of the nation, not only in settling the new establishment, but in maintaining long wars, as principals, on the continent, for the security of the Dutch barrier, reducing the French monarchy, settling the Spanish succession, supporting the house of Austria, maintaining the liberties of the Germanic body, and other purposes, increased to an unusual degree; insomuch that it was not thought advisable to raise all the expenses of any one year by taxes to be levied within that year, lest the unaccustomed weight of them should create murmurs among the people. It was therefore the policy of the times to anticipate the revenues of their posterity, by borrowing immense sums for the current service of the state, and to lay no more taxes upon the subject than would suffice to pay the annual interest of the sums so borrowed; by this means converting the principal debt into a new species of property, transferable from one man to another, at any time and in any quantity. A system which seems to have had its original in the state of Florence, A.D. 1344, which government then owed about 60,000*l.* sterling; and being unable to pay it, formed the principal into an aggregate sum, called, metaphorically, a mount of bank, the shares whereof were transferable, like our stock, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., the prices varying according to the exigencies of the state. This laid the foundation of what is called the national debt; for a few long annuities created in the reign of Charles II. will hardly deserve that name. And the example then set was so closely followed during the long wars in the reign of Queen Anne, and hitherto, that the capital of the national debt has by degrees increased to a wonderful sum of between 650 and 700 millions sterling. (For its present amount, see post), to pay the interest of which and the charges for management, the extraordinary revenues of the kingdom (excepting only the land-tax and an income-tax) are in the first place mortgaged, and made perpetual by parliament; redeemable, however, by the authority that imposed them; which, if at any time they pay off the capital, will abolish those taxes which are raised to discharge the interest. See 1 Comm. c. 8.

The following account and origin of the national debt is principally taken from McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary.

The practice of borrowing money, in order to defray a part of the war expenditure, began, in this country, in the reign of William III. In the infancy of the practice it was customary to borrow upon the security of some tax, or portion of a tax, set apart as a fund for discharging the principal and interest of the sum borrowed. This discharge was, however, very rarely effected. The public exigencies continuing, the loans were, in most cases, either continued, or the taxes were again mortgaged for fresh ones. At first the practice of borrowing for a fixed period, or, as it is commonly termed, upon terminable annuities, was almost exclusively abandoned, and most loans were made upon interest annuities, or until such time as it might be convenient for the government to pay off the principal.

In the beginning of the funding system, the term meant the taxes or funds appropriated to the discharge of the principal and interest of loans; those who held government securities, and sold them to others, selling, of course, a corresponding claim upon some fund. But after the debt began to grow large, and the practice of borrowing upon terminable annuities had been introduced, the meaning attached to the term fund was gradually changed; and, instead of signifying the security upon which loans were advanced, it, for a long time, signified the principal of the loans themselves.

Owing partly, perhaps, to the scarcity of disposable capital at the time, but far more to the supposed insecurity of the revolutionary establishment, the rate of interest paid by government in the early part of the funding system was comparatively high. But as the country became richer, and the confidence of the public in the stability of government increased, ministers were enabled to take measures for reducing the interest, first in 1716, and again in 1749.

During the reigns of William III. and Anne, the interest stipulated for loans was very various. But in the reign of George II. a different practice was adopted. Instead of varying the interest upon the loan according to the state of the money market at the time, the rate of interest was generally fixed at three, or three and a half per cent.; the necessary variation being made in the principal funded. Thus suppose government were anxious to borrow, that they preferred borrowing in a three per cent. stock, and that they could not negotiate a loan for less than four and a half per cent., they effected their object by giving the lender, in return for every 100*l.* advanced, 150*l.* three per cent. stock; that is, they bound the country to pay him, or his assigns, 4*l.* 10*s.* a-year, in all time to come, or, otherwise, to extinguish the debt, by a payment of 150*l.* In consequence of the prevalence of this practice, the principal of the debt now existing amounts to nearly two-fifths more than the sum actually advanced by the lenders.

Some advantages are, however, derivable, or supposed to be derivable, from this system. It renders the management of the debt, and its transfer, more simple and convenient than it would have been, had it consisted of a greater number of funds bearing different rates of interest; and it is contended, that the greater field for speculation afforded to the holders in stocks bearing a low rate of interest, has enabled government to borrow, by funding additional capitals, for a considerably less payment, on account of interest, than would have been necessary, had no such increase of capital been permitted. Were this a proper place for entering upon such discussions, it would be easy to show that the advantages now ascribed to the present mode of funding, by an increase of capital, has been a most imprudent one, and most injurious to the public interests. But it would be quite foreign from the objects of this work, to enter into an examination of such questions; and our readers will, however, find them fully investigated in an article in the ninety-third Number of the Edinburgh Review. Here we have merely to consider funded property, or government securities, as transferable or marketable commodities.

The following is an account of the progress of the national debt of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the present time:—

Total funded and unfunded debt, 5th of January, 1817, when the English and Irish exchequer were consolidated	848,282,477	33,854,466

Since 1817 a deduction has been made of about sixty millions from the principal of the debt, and about five millions from the annual charge on its account. This diminution has been principally effected by taking advantage of the fall in the rate of interest since the peace, and offering to pay off the holders of different stocks, unless they consented to accept a reduced payment; and had it not have been for the highly objectionable practice, already adverted to, of funding large capitals at a low rate of interest, the saving in this way might have been incomparably larger.

The total funded and unfunded debt, on the 5th of January, 1833, was 781,378,549*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*; and the annual charge thereon, 28,351,352*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*

We shall now subjoin some account of the different funds, or stocks, forming the public debt.

I. Funds bearing Interest at Three per Cent.

1. South Sea Debt and Annuities.—This portion of the debt, amounting on the 5th of January, 1833, to 10,144,584*l.*, is all that now remains of the capital of the once famous, or rather infamous, South Sea Company. The company has, for a considerable time past, ceased to have any thing to do with trade; so that the functions of the directors are wholly restricted to the transfer of the company's stock, and the payment of the dividends on it; both of which operations are performed at the South Sea House, and not at the Bank. The dividends on the old South Sea annuities are payable on the 5th of April, and 10th of October; the dividends on the rest of the company's stock are payable on the 5th of January, and 5th of July.

2. Debt due to the Bank of England.—Until recently consisted of the sum of 14,686,800*l.* lent by the Bank to the public, at three per cent.: dividends payable on the 5th of April, and 10th of October. It must not be confounded with the Bank capital of 14,553,000*l.*, on which the stockholders divide. Under the provisions of the 3 & 4 W. 1. c. 58. renewing the Bank Charter, one-fourth of the above debt was to be repaid, which has been accomplished by the Bank agreeing to accept in lieu thereof 4,080,000*l.* three per cent. reduced annuities. See 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 80.

3. Bank Annuities created in 1726.—The civil list settled on George I. was 700,000 a-year; but having fallen into arrear, this stock was created for the purpose of cancelling exchequer bills, that had been issued to defray the arrear. "The capital is irredeemable; and being small, in comparison with the other public funds, and a stock in which little is done on speculation, the price is generally at least one per cent. lower than the three per cent. consols." (Cohen's edit. of Fairman on the Funds, p. 40.)

4. Three per Cent. Consols, or Consolidated Annuities.—This stock forms by much the largest portion of the public debt. It had its origin in 1751, when an act was passed, consolidating (hence the name) several separate stocks, bearing an interest of three per cent., into one general stock. At the period when the consolidation took place, the principal of the funds, blended together, amounted to 9,137,821*l.*; but, by finding of additional loans, and parts of loans, in this stock, it amounted, on the 5th of January, 1833, to the immense sum of 347,458,931*l*.

The consolidated annuities are distinguished from the three per cent. reduced annuities by the circumstance of the interest upon them never having been varied, and by the dividends becoming due at different periods. This stock is, from its magnitude, and the proportionably great number of its holders, the soonest affected by all those circumstances which tend to elevate or depress the price of funded property. And on this account, it is the stock which speculators and jobbers most commonly select for their operations. Dividends payable on the 5th of January, and 5th of July.

5. Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities.—This fund was established in 1757. It consisted, as the name implies, of several funds which had previously been borrowed at a higher rate of interest; but, by an act passed in 1749, it was declared that such holders of the funds in question, as did not choose to accept in future of a reduced interest of three per cent, should be paid off,—an alternative, which comparatively few embraced. The debts that were thus reduced and consolidated amounted, at the establishment of the fund, to 17,571,574*l*. By the addition of new loans, they now amount to 123,029,013*l*. And see ante, 2. Dividends payable on the 5th of April and 10th of October.

II. Funds bearing more than Three per Cent. Interest.

1. Annuities at three and a half per Cent., 1818.—This stock was formed in 1818, partly by subscription of three per cent. consolidated, and three per cent. reduced annuities, and partly by a subscription of exchequer bills. It was made redeemable at par any time after the 5th of April, 1829, upon six months' notice being given. Dividends payable on the 5th of April and 10th of October. The capital of this stock amounts to 12,350,802*l*.

2. Reduced three and a half per Cent. Annuities.—This stock was created in 1824, by the transfer of stock bearing interest at four per cent. (old four per cents.) It is redeemable at pleasure. Dividends payable on the 5th of April and 10th of October. Amount, on the 5th of January, 1833, 63,453,824*l*.

3. New three and a half per Cent. Annuities.—This stock was formed by the act of 11 Geo. 4. c. 13, out of the stock known by the name of new four per cents.; amounting, on the 5th of January, 1830, to 154,331,212*l*. The holders of this four per cent. stock had their option, either to subscribe into the new three and a half per cent. annuities, or into a new five per cent. stock, at the rate of 100*l*., four per cents, for 70*l*., five per cents. Dissentients to be paid off. Only 467,713*l*. new five per cent. stock was created under this arrangement. The sum required to pay dissentients was 2,610,000*l*. The new three and a half per cent that was thus created amounted on the 5th of January, 1833, to 137,613,820*l*. Dividends payable 5th of January and 5th of July.

4. Four per Cent. Annuities created in 1826.—By virtue of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 39, 3,000,000 of exchequer bills were funded, at the rate of 107*l*. four per cent. annuities for every 100 bills. In 1829, (10 Geo. 4. c. 31), three additional millions of exchequer bills were funded in this stock, at the rate of 101*l*. 10*s*. stock, for every 100 bills. Dividends payable 5th of April and 10th of October. Amount, 5th of January, 1833, 10,796,340*l*. A considerable sum was transferred from this stock for the purchase of annuities, under the 10 Geo. 4. c. 24.

By an act of the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 31, these four per cent. annuities were reduced, and added to the above new three and a half per cent. annuities. This stock thus created, is not to be redeemed before the 5th of January, 1840. Dissentients (who are understood to be numerous) are to be paid off.

5. New five per cent.—Amount, 5th of January, 1833,

462,737*l*. (See above, 3, New three and a half per Cent Annuities.)

III. Annuities.

1. Long Annuities.—These annuities were created at different periods, but they all expire together in 1860. They were chiefly granted by way of premiums, or douceurs, to the subscribers to loans: payable on the 5th of April, and 10th of October.

2. Annuities under 4 Geo. 4. c. 22. This annuity is payable to the Bank of England, and is commonly known by the name of the "dead weight" annuity. It expires in 1860. It is equivalent to a perpetual annuity of 470,317*l*. 10*s*.

3. Annuities under 48 Geo. 3. c. 142, &c.; and 10 Geo. 4. c. 24.—The 48 Geo. 3. c. 142, was the first act that authorised the granting of life annuities, and that statute was followed by various others, whereby its provisions were amended and extended, all of which were repealed by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 16, but this latter act did not affect annuities that had then been granted. By the 10 Geo. 4. c. 24 the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, were once more empowered to grant annuities for terms of years, and life annuities, accepting in payment either money or stock, according to rates specified in tables, to be approved by the lords of the treasury. No annuities are granted on the life of any nominee under fifteen years of age, nor in any case not approved by the commissioners. Annuities for terms of years not granted for any period less than ten years. These annuities are transferable, but not in parts or shares. Those for terms of years, payable 5th of January and 5th of July, and those for lives, 5th of April and 10th of October. See also 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 59. and 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 24.

The annuities for terms of years, granted under the above acts, amounted, on the 10th of October, 1830, to 772,714*l*. being equal to a perpetual annuity of 491,058*l*. The life annuities amounted, at the same period, to 666,411*l*; being equal to a perpetual annuity of 266,071*l*. (Parl. Paper, No. 174, Sess. 1831.)

Irish Debt.—It seems unnecessary to enter into any details with respect to the public debt of Ireland. The various descriptions of stock of which it consists, and their amounts, are specified above. The dividends on the Irish debt are paid at the Bank of Ireland; and, in order to accommodate the public, stock may be transferred, at the pleasure of the holders, from Ireland to Great Britain, and from the latter to the former.

Exchequer Bills.—Are bills of credit, issued by authority of parliament. They are for various sums, and bear interest (at present at the rate of one and a half per diem, per 100*l*) according to the usual rate at the time. The advances of the Bank to government are made upon exchequer bills, and the daily transactions between the Bank and government are principally carried on through their intervention. None of the time at which out-standing exchequer bills are to be paid off is given by public advertisement. Bankers provide for vesting in exchequer bills to any other species of stock, even though the interest be for the most part comparatively small, because the capital may be received at the treasury at the rate originally paid for it; the holders being exempted from any risk of fluctuation. Exchequer bills were first issued in 1696; and have been annually issued ever since. The amount outstanding, and unprovided for, on the 5th of January, 1833, was 27,279,000*l*. By the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 31, the commissioners of the treasury may issue exchequer bills to the amount of 14,000,000*l*, for the service of the year 1833.

India Stock and India Bonds are also quoted in the prices of the public funds. The stock, on which the East India Company divide, is, 6,000,000*l*., the dividend on which has been, since 1793, ten and a half per cent. provisions for its payment under the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 83. East India Company, II. India bonds are generally for 100*l*. each, and bear at present two and a half per cent. interest.

payable 31st of March, and 30th of September. In selling them, the interest down to the day of sale is, with the premiums, added to the amount of the bills; the total being the sum to be paid by the purchaser. The premium, which is, consequently, the only variable part of the price, is influenced by the circumstances which influence the price of stocks generally, the number of bonds in circulation, &c.

The price of stocks is influenced by a variety of circumstances. Whatever tends to shake or to increase the public confidence in the stability of government, tends at the same time to lower or increase the price of stocks. They are also affected by the state of the revenue; and, more than all, by the facility of obtaining supplies of disposable capital, and the interest which may be realised upon loans to responsible persons.

From 1730, till the rebellion of 1745, the three per cents. were never under 89; and were once, in June, 1737, as high as 107. During the rebellion, they sunk to 76; but, in 1749, rose again to 100. In the interval between the peace of Paris, in 1763, and the breaking out of the American war, they averaged from 80 to 90; but towards the close of the war they sunk to 54. In 1792 they were, at one time, as high as 96. In 1797 the prospects of the country, owing to the successes of the French, the mutiny in the fleet, and other adverse circumstances, were by no means favourable; and, in consequence, the price of three per cents. sunk, on the 20th of September, on the intelligence transpiring of an attempt to negotiate with the French republic having failed, to 47½; being the lowest price to which they have ever fallen.

The commissioners for auditing the public accounts, in the year 1786, strongly recommended the adoption of some effectual plan for the reduction of the national debt; and various measures were taken accordingly towards accomplishing this purpose.

In the first place, a sinking fund, of one million payable at the exchequer quarterly in every year, was created in the year 1786, (see 26 Geo. 3. c. 31) to which certain annuities were directed to be added, upon the expiration of the terms for which they were respectively granted, and the whole was vested in commissioners for the reduction of the national debt; these sums were afterwards directed to be paid out of the consolidated fund, 17 Geo. 3. c. 12 § 19; and such annuities for lives as should remain unclaimed for three years, were added to the same sinking fund, which was, nevertheless, to operate no longer as a sinking fund, at compound interest, whenever the monies annually placed to the account of the commissioners, including the original million, should amount to the sum of four millions. From this period, the annual sum of four millions was still to be applied to the same purpose; but the interest of the debt purchased thereby, and the annuities which might afterwards expire, were to remain at the disposition of parliament.

In the year 1792, a further provision was made; (by 32 Geo. 3. c. 55); that when the interest of any redeemable stock is reduced, or the capital paid off by money raised at a lower interest, a sum, equal to the interest so saved, should be paid quarterly from the consolidated fund, and placed to the account of the commissioners: the operation of this fund at compound interest was, by this act, directed to cease, whenever the monies annually paid to the commissioners on the account, as well as on those above stated, should amount to three millions, exclusive of the original million, or of any additions which parliament may direct to be made thereto, or of any sinking fund which may be created in consequence of new loans. From this period, the annual sum of four millions so constituted, was also to be applied as before directed. By the same act it was also enacted, "for the more effectually preventing the inconvenient and dangerous accumulation of debt thereafter, in consequence of any further loans;" that an annual sum, equal to one hundredth part of the capital stock created by any such loans, should be paid to the Bank, and placed to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, without any limits to its operation short of redeeming the whole of the stock created by such loans respectively.

To accelerate the effect of all the preceding measures, parliament, in every year, from 1792 to 1802, uniformly granted, and applied the sum of 200,000*l.*; pursuing the principle laid down in times of peace, even through a period of war, notwithstanding the necessary increase of public burdens.

In order that the public might have a continual view of the state of the national debt, and also of its progressive reduction, it is further provided that an account of each shall be laid before both Houses annually. By 27 Geo. 3. c. 13. § 72, it was enacted that there shall be presented, within fourteen days after the commencement of every session, an account of all additions which shall have been made to the annual charge of the public debt by the interest or annuities for, or on account of, any loan made after the passing of that act, and within ten years next preceding the date of such account; together with an account of the produce, within the year next preceding, of any duties which shall have been imposed, or of any additions which shall have been made to the revenue for the purpose of defraying the increased charge occasioned by every such loan respectively.

By 48 Geo. 3. c. 142, the chief baron of the court of exchequer, in England, (or, in his absence, one of the puisne barons), was added to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt.

By 56 Geo. 3. c. 98, (for uniting and consolidating into one fund all the public revenues of Great Britain and Ireland, and to provide for the application thereof to the general service of the united kingdom,) § 1. and 13. so much of any existing acts as appoints commissioners for the reduction of the national debt in Ireland is repealed; and the British commissioners are declared commissioners for the reduction of the national debt of the united kingdom, produced by the consolidation of the national debt of Great Britain and Ireland.

By 58 Geo. 3. c. 66. § 1, three commissioners are empowered to act in all cases.

Various other statutes were subsequently passed, relating to the management and reduction of the national debt, prior to the 10 Geo. 4. c. 27 (amended by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 24); which, in effect, abolished the sinking fund, by enacting that the sum to be thenceforth applicable should consist of the actual surplus revenue.

NATIONAL EDUCATION. Notwithstanding the attention that has been attracted of late years to the subject of education, and although the necessity of establishing a national system for the instruction of the lower classes is now generally admitted, no legislative measure has yet been passed, recognizing this important duty of a government, with the exception of an act passed in the session before the last (3 & 4 W. 4. c. 103), usually called the Factory Act; which renders it compulsory on the employers of children engaged in factories, to allow them to attend some school for two hours, at least six days in the week.

NATIVI DE STIPITE. In the survey of the duchy of Cornwall, there is mention of nativi de stipite, and nativi conventionarii; the first were villeins or bondmen, by birth or stock; the other, by contract or agreement. LL. Hen. 1. cap. 76. And in Cornwall it was a custom, that a freeman marrying natusum, if he had two daughters, one of them was free, and the other villein. Bract. lib. 4. c. 21, 22.

NATIVITY, nativitas. Birth, or the being born in a place. The casting the nativity, or by calculation seeking to know how long the queen should live, &c. was made felony by 23 Eliz. c. 2.

Nativitas (Nefsty) was anciently taken for the servitude, bondage, or villeinage, of women. Leg. Wil. 1.

NATIVO HABENDO. A writ that lay to the sheriff for a lord who claimed inheritance in any villein, when his villein was run away, for the apprehending and restoring him to the lord; and the sheriff might seize the villein, and deliver him unto his lord, if he confessed his villeinage; but if he alleged that he was a freeman, then the sheriff ought not to seize him, but the lord was to sue forth a pone to remove the plea before the justices of C. B. &c. And if the villein purchased a writ de libertate probanda before the lord had taken out the pone, it was a supersedeas to the lord, that he proceeded not on the writ of nativo habendo. Reg. Orig. 7, 8; F. N. B. 77; New Nat. Brev. 171, 172.

This writ nativo habendo was in nature of a writ of right, to recover the inheritance in the villein; upon which the lord was to pursue his plaint, and declare thereupon, and the villein to make his defence so as the freedom was to be tried. New Nat. Br. 171, 173. See Villein.

NATIVUS. He who was born a servant, and so differed from him who suffered himself to be sold, of which servants there were three sorts, bondmen, natives, and villains: bondmen were those who bound themselves by covenants to serve, and took their name from the word bond; natives we spoke of just before; and villains were such who, belonging to the land, tilled the lord's demesnes, nor might depart thence without the lord's licence. Spelman's Gloss. See Chart. R. 2; Quid omnes manumittit a bondagio in com. Hertf. Walsingham, p. 254. Conell. See Villain.

NATURAL-BORN SUBJECTS. By the 4 Geo. 2. c. 21. (made to explain the third section of the 7 Ann. c. 5. relative to children of the natural-born subjects of this kingdom) children of natural-born subjects, born out of the allegiance of the crown, are declared to be natural-born subjects; but by § 2. this is not to extend to the issue of persons attainted of treason, or in the service of foreign princes in enmity with the crown.

By the 13 Geo. 3. c. 21. these benefits are further extended to persons born out of the allegiance of the crown, whose fathers were by the former statute entitled to the rights of natural-born subjects. See Alien, I.

NATURAL AFFECTION, naturalis affectio.] Is a good consideration in a deed; and if one, without expressing any consideration, covenant to stand seised to the use of his wife, child, or brother, &c. here the naming them to be of kin, implies the consideration of natural affection, whereupon such use will arise. Cart. 188. See Consideration.

NATURALIZATION. See Alien, II. III.

NATURÆ Pudenda, Privities. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 83.

NAVAGIUM. A duty incumbent on tenants, to carry their lord's goods in a ship. Mon. Angl. i. 922.

NAVAL STORES. See Public Stores.

NAUFRAGE. A sea term for shipwreck. Merch. Dict.

NAVIGABLE RIVERS. See Rivers.

NAVIGATION. Is the art of sailing at sea, also the manner of trading; and a navigator is one who understands navigation, or imports goods in foreign bottoms.

NAVIGATION ACTS.

These statutes, which form an important branch of our maritime code, comprise the enactments that have been passed for regulating the commercial intercourse of this kingdom and its colonies with other countries; by what vessels it shall be carried on; and generally the mode in which it is to be conducted.

The prominent objects of the old navigation acts were—first, the securing to our own shipping, as far as circumstances would safely admit, the carrying trade, as the great source of our naval strength; secondly, the confining our trade, as much as possible, without exciting jealousy in our neighbours, to the capital of our own merchants by excluding foreigners, who were not the subjects of the countries of which the articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture, from becoming the intermediate negociators; and thirdly, the encouragement of our own manufactures, by checking, through the means of absolute prohibitions or high duties, the introduction into the same market of such articles of foreign manufactures as might rival our own; especially those in a progressive state of improvement.

The origin of the navigation laws of England may be traced to the reign of Richard II. or perhaps to a still more remote period. But, as no intelligible account of the varying and contradictory enactments framed at so distant an epoch could be pressed within any reasonable space, it is sufficient to observe, that in the reign of Henry VII. two of the leading principles of the late navigation law were distinctly recognized, in the prohibition of the importation of certain commodities, unless imported in ships belonging to English owners, and manned by English seamen. In the early part of the reign of Elizabeth (5 Eliz. c. 5.) foreign ships were excluded from our fisheries and coasting trade. The republican parliament gave a great extension to the navigation laws by the act 1650, which prohibited all ships, of all foreign nations whatever, from trading with the plantations in America, without having previously obtained a licence. These acts were, however, rather intended to regulate the trade between the different ports and dependencies of the empire, than to regulate our intercourse with foreigners. But in the following year, (9th of October, 1651,) the republican parliament passed the famous act of navigation. This act had a double object. It was intended not only to promote our own navigation, but also to strike a decisive blow at the naval power of the Dutch, who then engrossed almost the whole carrying trade of the world, and against whom various circumstances had conspired to incense the English. The act in question declared, that no goods or commodities whatever of the growth, production, or manufacture of Asia, Africa, or America, should be imported either into England or Ireland, or any of the plantations, except in ships belonging to English subjects, and of which the master and the greater number of the crew were also English. Having thus secured the import trade of Asia, Africa, and America, to the English ship-owners, the act went on to secure to them, as far as that was possible, the import trade of Europe. For this purpose, it further enacted, that no goods of the growth, production, or manufacture of any country in Europe should be imported into Great Britain except in British ships, or in such ships as were the real property of the people of the country or place in which the goods were produced, or from which they could only be, or most usually were, exported. The latter part of the clause was entirely levelled against the Dutch, who had but little native produce to export, and whose ships were principally employed in carrying the produce of other countries to foreign markets. Such were the leading provisions of this famous act. They were adopted by the regal government which succeeded Cromwell, and form the basis of the act of the 12 Car. 2. c. 18. which continued to a very recent period to be the rule by which our naval intercourse with other countries was mainly regulated, and has been designated the Charta Maritima of England.

In the 12 Car. 2. c. 18. the clause against importing foreign commodities, except in British ships, or in ships belonging to the country or place where the goods were produced, or from which they were exported, was so far modified, that the prohibition was made to apply only to the goods of Russia and Turkey, and to certain articles since well known in commerce by the name of enumerated articles, leave being at the same time given to import all other articles in ships of any description. But this modification was of very little importance in commerce, as timber, grain, tar, hemp and flax, potashes, wines, spirits, sugar, &c. Parliament seems, however, to have very speedily come round to the opinion that too much had been done in the way of relaxation; and in the 11th of Charles II. a supplemental statute was passed, avowedly with the intent on of obviating some evasions of the statute of the preceding, which, it was affirmed, had been practised by the Hollanders and Germans. This, however, seems to have been a mere pretence to excuse the desire to follow up the blow aimed, by the former statute, at the carrying trade of Holland. And such was our jealousy of the naval and commercial greatness of the Dutch, that in order to cripple it, we did not hesitate totally to proscribe all trade with them; and to prevent the possibility of fraud or of clandestine or indirect intercourse with Holland, we went so far as to include the commerce with the Netherlands and Germany in the same proscription. The 11 Car. 2. prohibited all importation from these countries of a long list of enumerated commodities, under any circumstances, or in any vessels, whether British or foreign, under the penalty of seizure and confiscation of the ships and goods. So far as it depended on us, Holland, the Netherlands, and Germany, were virtually placed out of the pale of the commercial world; and though the extreme rigour of this statute was subsequently modified, its principal provisions remained in full force until the late alterations. See McCulloch's Com. Dict. 817.

The changes in the navigation laws were effected partly by the bills introduced by Mr. (now Lord Wallace) in 1821, and Mr. Huskisson in 1825, and partly by what has been called the Reciprocity System. By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 100. the intercourse of all European countries in amity with this country was placed on the same footing.

That statute was amended by several subsequent enactments; and for the purpose of consolidating the law into one act, the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 54. was passed.

Ships in which only enumerated goods of Europe may be imported.—The several sorts of goods hereinafter enumerated, being the produce of Europe; (that is to say,) masts, timber, boards, tar, tallow, hemp, flax, currants, raisins, figs, prunes, olive oil, corn or grain, wine, brandy, tobacco, wool, shumac, madders, madder roots, barilla, brimstone, bark of oak, cork, oranges, lemons, linseed, rape seed, and clover seed, shall not be imported into the united kingdom to be used therein, except in British ships, or in ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, or in ships of the country from which the goods are imported.—§ 2.

Places from which only goods of Asia, Africa, or America, may be imported.—Goods, the produce of Asia, Africa, or America, shall not be imported from Europe into the united kingdom, to be used therein, except the goods hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say,)

(1.) Goods, the produce of the dominions of the Emperor of Morocco, which may be reported from places in Europe within the Straits of Gibraltar;

(2.) Goods, the produce of Asia or Africa, which having been brought into places in Europe within the Straits of Gibraltar, from or through places in Asia or Africa within the Straits, and not by way of the Atlantic ocean, may be imported from places in Europe within the Straits of Gibraltar.

(3.) Goods, the produce of places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, which (having been imported from these places into Gibraltar or Malta in British ships) may be exported from Gibraltar or Malta:

Goods taken by way of reprisal by British ships: Bullion, diamonds, pearls, rubies, emeralds, and other jewels or precious stones.—§ 3.

Ships in which only goods of Asia, Africa, or America, may be imported.—Goods, the produce of Asia, Africa, or America, shall not be imported into the united kingdom, to be used therein, in foreign ships, unless they be the ships of the country in Asia, Africa, or America, of which the goods are the produce, and from which they are imported, except the goods hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say,)

(1.) Goods, the produce of the dominions of the Grand Seigneur, in Asia or Africa, which may be imported from his dominions in Europe, in ships of his dominions:

Raw silk and mohair yarn, the produce of Asia, which may be imported from the dominions of the Grand Seigneur in the Levant seas, in ships of his dominions:

Bullion.—§ 4.

Manufacture deemed produce.—All manufactured goods shall be deemed to be the produce of the country of which they are the manufacture.—§ 5.

From Guernsey, &c.—No goods shall be imported into the united kingdom from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, except in British ships.—§ 6.

Exports to Asia, &c. and to Guernsey, &c.—No goods shall be exported from the united kingdom to any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, nor to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, except in British ships.—§ 7.

Coastwise.—That no goods shall be carried coastwise from one part of the united kingdom to another, except in British ships.—§ 8.

Between Guernsey, Jersey, &c.—No goods shall be carried from any of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, to any other of such islands, nor from one part of any of such islands to another part of the same island, except in British ships.—§ 9.

Between British possessions in Asia, &c.—No goods shall be carried from any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, to any other of such possessions, nor from one part of any of such possessions to another part of the same, except in British ships.—§ 10.

Imports into British possessions in Asia, &c.—No goods shall be imported into any British possessions in Asia, Africa, or America, in any foreign ships, unless they be the ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, and from which the goods are imported.—§ 11.

No ship British, unless registered and navigated as such, &c.—No ship shall be admitted to be a British ship unless duly registered and navigated as such; and every British registered ship (so long as the registry of such ship shall be in force, or the certificate of such registry retained for the use of such ship) shall be navigated during the whole of every voyage (whether with a cargo or in ballast,) in every part of the world by a master who is a British subject, and by a crew, whereof three-fourths at least are British seamen; and if such ship be employed in a coasting voyage from one part of the united kingdom to another, or in a voyage between the united kingdom and the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, or from one of the said islands to another of them, or from one part of either of them to another of the same, or be employed in fishing on the coasts of the united kingdom, or any of the said islands, then the whole of the crew shall be British seamen.

Exceptions as to registry.—Provided that all British-built vessels under fifteen tons burden, wholly owned and navigated by British subjects, although not registered as British ships, shall be admitted to be British vessels, in all navigation in the rivers and upon the coasts of the united kingdom, or of the British possessions abroad, and not proceeding over sea, except within the limits of the respective colonial governments within which the managing owners of such vessels respectively reside; and that all British-built vessels wholly owned and navigated by British subjects, not exceeding thirty tons, and not having a whole or a fixed deck, and employed solely in fishing on the banks and shores of Newfoundland, and of the parts adjacent, or on the banks and shores of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, adjacent to the gulf of Saint Lawrence, or on the north of Cape Canso, or of the islands within the same, or in trading coastwise within the said limits, shall be admitted to be British boats or vessels, although not registered, so long as such boats or vessels shall be solely so employed.—§ 13.

Honduras ships.—All ships built in the British settlements at Honduras, and owned and navigated as British ships, shall be entitled to the privileges of British registered ships in all direct trade between the united kingdom or the British possessions in America and the said settlements; provided the master shall produce a certificate under the hand of the superintendent of those settlements, that satisfactory proof has been made before him that such ship (describing the same) was built in the said settlements, and is wholly owned by British subjects; Provided also, that the time of the clearance of such ship from the said settlements for every voyage shall be endorsed upon such certificate by such superintendent.—§ 14.

Ships of any foreign countries.—No ship shall be admitted to be a ship of any particular country, unless she be of the built of such country; or have been made prize of war to such country; or have been forfeited to such country under any law of the same, made for the prevention of the slave trade, and condemned as such prize or forfeiture by a competent court of such country; or be British-built (not having been a prize of war from British subjects to any other foreign country); nor unless she be navigated by a master who is a subject of such foreign country, and by a crew of whom three-fourths at least are subjects of such country; nor unless she be wholly owned by subjects of such country usually residing therein, or under the dominion thereof: Provided always, that the country of every ship shall be deemed to include all places which are under the same dominion as the place to which such ship belongs.—§ 15.

Master and seamen, when British seamen.—No person shall be qualified to be a master of a British ship, or to be a British seaman within the meaning of the act, except the natural-born subjects of his majesty, or persons naturalized by any act of parliament, or made denizens by letters of denization; or except persons who have become British subjects by virtue of conquest or cession of some newly acquired country, and who shall have taken the oath of allegiance to his majesty, or the oath of fidelity required by the treaty or capitulation by which such newly acquired country came into his majesty's possessions; or persons who shall have served on board any of his majesty's ships of war in time of war for the space of three years: Provided always, that the natives of places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, although under British dominion, shall not, upon the ground of being such natives, be deemed to be British seamen: Provided always, that every ship (except ships required to be wholly navigated by British seamen, which shall be navigated by one British seaman, if a British ship, or one seaman of the country of such ship, if a foreign ship, for every twenty tons of the burden of such ship, shall be deemed to be duly navigated, although the number of other seamen shall exceed one-fourth of the whole crew.—§ 16.

Foreigners serving two years on board his majesty's ships during war.—His majesty, by his royal proclamation during war, may declare that foreigners, having served two years on board any of his majesty's ships of war in time of such war, shall be British seamen within the meaning of the act.—§ 17.

British ship not to depart from British port unless duly navigated, &c.—No British registered ship shall be suffered to depart any port in the united kingdom, or any British possession in any part of the world, (whether with a cargo or in ballast), unless duly navigated: Provided that any British ships, trading between places in America, may be navigated by British negroes; and ships trading eastward of the Cape of Good Hope within the limits of the East India Company's charter, may be navigated by Lascars, or other natives of countries within those limits.—§ 18.

*If excess of foreign seamen, penalty 10*l.* for each, &c.*—If any British registered ship shall at any time have, as part of the crew in any part of the world, any foreign seaman not allowed by law, the master or owners of such ship shall for every such foreign seaman forfeit ten pounds: Provided, that if a due proportion of British seamen cannot be procured in any foreign port, or in any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter, for the navigation of any British ship; or if such proportion be destroyed during the voyage by any unavoidable circumstance, and the master of such ship shall produce a certificate of such facts under the hand of any British consul, or of two known British merchants, if there be no consul at the place where such facts can be ascertained, or from the British governor of any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter; or, in the want of such certificate, shall make proof of the truth of such facts to the satisfaction of the collector and controller of the customs of any British port, or of any person authorized in any other part of the world to inquire into the navigation of such ship, the same shall be deemed to be duly navigated.—§ 19.

Proportion of seamen may be altered by proclamation.—If his majesty shall, at any time by his royal proclamation, declare that the proportion of British seamen necessary to the due navigation of British ships shall be less than the proportion required by this act, every British ship navigated with the proportion of British seamen required by such proclamation shall be deemed to be duly navigated, so long as such proclamation shall remain in force.—§ 20.

Goods prohibited only by navigation law may be imported for exportation.—Goods of any sort or the produce of any place, not otherwise prohibited than by the law of navigation herebefore contained, may be imported into the united kingdom from any place in a British ship, and from any place not being a British possession in a foreign ship of any country and however navigated, to be warehoused for exportation only, under the provisions of any law in force for the time being, made for the warehousing of goods, without payment of duty upon the first entry thereof.—§ 21. See Warehousing.

Forfeitures.—If any goods be imported, exported, or carried coastwise, contrary to the law of navigation, all such goods shall be forfeited, and the master of such ship shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.—§ 22.

The duties payable upon goods and articles imported into, or exported out of this country, are closely connected with the present subject. These duties are generally known by the name of the customs; and have already been treated of under that title. Subsequent, however, to the printing off of that portion of this work, the 6 G. 4. c. 106. and various subsequent acts, relative to the customs, have been repealed, by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 50. with a view to their amendment and consolidation.

The 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 51. embodies the provision for the management, and the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 52. those for the general regulation of the customs; and the latter act contains tables of goods prohibited to be imported or exported, and of articles that may be imported, subject to certain restrictions, or prohibited from exportation by the royal proclamation.

By § 105, of c. 52. all trade, from one part to another of the united kingdom, or from any part to another in the Isle of Man, is to be deemed coastwise.

The 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 56. grants the new duties of customs, which are specified with the drawbacks allowed on certain articles in the tables annexed to the act.

By § 3. his majesty, with the advice of his privy council, by order of council, may, from time to time, direct the levying of an additional duty, not exceeding one-fifth of any existing duty, upon goods or merchandize, the growth or manufacture of any country, which shall levy higher or other duties upon any article, the growth or manufacture of any of his majesty's dominions, than upon the like article, the growth or manufacture of any other foreign country; and, in like manner, impose such additional duties upon goods when imported in the ships of any country which shall levy higher or other duties upon any goods when imported in British ships, than when imported in the national ships of such country; or which shall levy higher or other tonnage or port or other duties upon British ships, than upon such national ships; or which shall not place the commerce or navigation of this kingdom upon the footing of the most favoured nation in the ports of such country; and either prohibit the importation of any manufactured article, the produce of such country, in the event of the export of raw material, of which such article is wholly or in part made, being prohibited from such country to the British dominions; or impose an additional duty, not exceeding one-fifth, as aforesaid, upon such manufactured article; and also impose such additional duty, in the event of such raw material being subject to any duty upon being exported from the said country to any of his majesty's dominions.

Formerly various bounties or premiums were offered and paid by government to the producers, exporters, or importers of certain articles, or to those who employed ships in certain trades.

Bounties on production were most commonly given with a view to encourage the establishment of some new branch of industry, or to foster and extend an old branch that was considered of great importance to the national prosperity.

The linen manufactory throughout the united kingdom was stimulated and encouraged by a variety of bounties, both as regarded its production and exportation, for a long series of years, down to 1830, when the premiums on its exportation, as well as on other articles, ceased. And by the 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 14. all acts authorizing the appropriation of sums of money for the encouragement of the raising and dressing of flax were repealed.

The whale fishery was likewise for many years protected by large bounties, which were gradually reduced and abolished in 1824; as were also those granted for the encouragement of the herring fishery in 1830.

The bounty granted on the exportation of corn was repealed in 1815.

NAVIS ECCLESIA. The nave or body of the church, as distinguished from the choir, and wings, or isle; it is that part of the church where the common people sit. Du-Cange.

NAVIS, NAVICULA. A small dish to hold frankincense before put into the thuribulum, censor, or smoking pot; and seems to have its name from the shape, resembling a boat or little ship; we have several of these boat-cups in silver, &c. for various uses. Paroch. Antiq. 598.

NAVITHALAMUS. A ship or barge that noblemen use for pleasure, with fine chambers and other stately ornaments. Law Lat. Dict.

NAVY.

The fleet or shipping of a prince or state; or an armament at sea.

- I. Of the Navy of England, and its Jurisdiction in the British Seas.
- II. Of raising and paying the Mariners, and of the Laws made for their protection. [As to their prize-money, see also tit. Admiralty.]
- III. Of their Discipline, under the Articles of War and Naval Courts Martial.

I. THE NAVY OF ENGLAND, it has been observed, excels all others for three things, viz. beauty, strength, and safety; for beauty our ships of war are so many floating palaces; for their strength so many moving castles; and for safety, they are the most defensive walls of the land; and as our naval power gives us authority in the most distant climates, so the superiority of our fleet above other nations, renders the British monarch the arbiter of Europe.

The Kings of England in ancient times commanded their fleets in person; and King Arthur vindicated the dominion of the seas, making ships of all nations salute our ships of war by lowering the topsail, and striking the flag, as in like manner they shall do to the forts upon land; by which submission they are put in mind that they are come into a territory, wherein they are to own a sovereign power and jurisdiction, and receive protection from it; and this duty of the flag, which hath been constantly paid to our ancestors, serves to imprint reverence in foreigners, and adds new courage to our seamen; and reputation abroad is the principal support of any government at home.

King Edgar, successor to Arthur, stiled himself sovereign of the narrow seas; and having fitted out a fleet of four hundred sail of ships, in the year 937, sailing about Britain with his mighty navy, and arriving at Chester, was there met by eight kings and princes of foreign nations, come to do him homage; who, as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty, rowed this monarch in a boat down the river Dee, himself steering the boat; a marine triumph which is not to be paralleled in the histories of Europe.

Canute, Edgar's successor, laid the ancient tribute called danegeld, for guarding the seas, and sovereignty of them; with the following emblem expressed, viz. Himself sitting on the shore in his royal chair, while the sea was flowing, speaking, Tu mee ditionis es, et terra in qua sedeo est, &c.

Egbert, Althred, and Elthred kept up the dominion and sovereignty of their predecessors; nor did the succeeding princes of the Norman race waive this great advantage, but maintained the right to the four adjacent seas surrounding the British shore; the honour of the flag King John challenged, not barely as a civility, but a right to be paid cum debita reverentia, and the persons refusing he commanded to be taken as enemies; and the same was ordained not only to be paid to whole fleets, bearing the royal standard, but to those ships of privilege that wear the prince's ensigns or colours of service; this decree was confirmed and bravely asserted by a fleet of five hundred sail, in a royal voyage to Ireland, wherein he made all the vessels which he met with in his way, in the eight circumfluent seas, to pay that duty and acknowledgment, which has been maintained by our kings to this day, and was never contested by any nation unless by those who attempted the conquest of the entire empire.

Trade gave occasion to the bringing mighty fleets to sea, and on the increase of trade, ships of war were necessary in all countries for the preservation of it in the hands of the just proprietors.

In ancient times the several counties of England were liable to a particular taxation for building ships of war and fitting out fleets, every one in proportion to their extent and riches; so that the largest counties were each of them to furnish a first-rate man of war, and the others every one to build one in proportion; but this method has been long disused, and the fitting out our navy for many ages has been always thrown into the public charge.

King Edward III. in his wars with France, had a fleet of ships before Calais, so numerous that they amounted to seven hundred sail; but these were only very small vessels.

Notwithstanding that the fleets of Great Britain have been remarkable for several ages past, for the great and signal victories obtained from time to time over their enemies, and that in the reigns of some of our ancient kings there have been greater numbers of ships fitted out at different times, upon certain expeditions, than have been of late years, yet that of a royal navy was never properly established until by Henry VIII. in the fourth year of his reign, anno 1512; at which time, that king taking umbrage at the mighty naval preparations of France, made an augmentation of twenty-five large ships of war to those already in being; he likewise erected an office for the navy, and established a certain number of commissioners, to whom the charge of the navy was committed, and whose duty it was to inspect into the state and condition of the king's ships, and to make a report thereof to the lord high admiral, in order to their being repaired or rebuilt, and supplied with every thing necessary for the public service, according as the case required it; for till that time, the establishment of the naval forces of this kingdom seems to have been upon an auxiliary dependency of the sea ports and maritime towns, who were under certain conditions of furnishing their respective quotas of ships for the king's use, upon previous notice given to them in that behalf; after which, they all came to the appointed rendezvous, and were then disposed of by the king's order upon the services intended. Upon this augmentation, the king's fleet at that time consisted of no more than forty-five ships, with which that of the French was soon overcome. Of those towns which furnished ships for the public service, the cinque ports were the most noted, and whose privileges still subsist on account of the services which they obliged themselves in particular to perform to the crown. See Cinque Ports.

There are lists of the fleet of Queen Elizabeth, which make it appear there was but one private gentleman a captain, all the rest being lords and knights, so high was the esteem for service at sea in those days, when our princes ruled with the most consummate glory; but the opinion of serving at sea in late times having been very much lessened, it has since been declined by the nobility and gentry.

The navy of England is at present divided into three squadrons, distinguished by the different colours of the several flags, viz. red, white, and blue; the principal commander whereof bears the title of admiral, and each has under him a vice-admiral, and a rear-admiral, who are likewise flag officers. There are belonging to his majesty's navy six great yards, Chatham, Deptford, Woolwich, Portsmouth, Sheerness, and Plymouth; fitted with several docks, and furnished with store of timber, masts, anchors, cables, &c. And for the management of the royal navy, there are several officers of trust and authority, besides the commissioners of the admiralty; as the treasurer, controller, surveyor, commissioners of the navy, commissioners of the victualling office, &c. the principal whereof hold their offices by patent under the great seal.

By a late act, 2 Wm. 4. c. 40, in case his majesty shall revoke the patents of the commissioners of the navy and the commissioners for victualling, &c. the powers, duties, and authorities vested in them by any acts of parliament shall be vested in the lords commissioners of the admiralty; and by § 2. after the revocation of the patents, all lands, buildings, &c. vested in the commissioners of the navy and the commissioners for victualling, are to be transferred to and vested in the lords commissioners of the admiralty; and by § 3. all contracts, covenants, and agreements entered into with the commissioners of the navy and the commissioners for victualling, &c. shall be transferred to and vested in the lords commissioners of the admiralty. By § 4. all the duties of the treasurer of the navy are to be transferred to the lords commissioners of the admiralty, except receipts and payments of money, and the management of the Greenwich out-pensioners.

The maritime state, says Blackstone, though nearly related to the military, is much more agreeable to the principles of our free constitution. The royal navy of England hath ever been its greatest defence and ornament; it is its ancient and natural strength, the floating bulwark of the island; an army from which, however strong and powerful, no danger can ever be apprehended to liberty; and accordingly it has been assiduously cultivated, even from the earliest ages. To so much perfection was our naval reputation arrived in the twelfth century, that the code of maritime laws, which are called the laws of Oleron, and are received by all nations in Europe as the ground of all their marine constitutions, was confessedly compiled by our King Richard I. at the isle of Oleron, on the coast of France, then part of the possessions of the crown of England. 4 Inst. 144. And yet so vastly inferior were our ancestors in this point to the present age, that even in the maritime reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Edward Coke thinks it matter of boast that the royal navy of England then consisted of thirty-three ships. The present condition of our marine has been thought to be in a great measure owing to the salutary provisions of the old Navigation Acts; whereby the constant increase of English shipping and seamen was not only encouraged, but rendered unavoidably necessary. See Navigation Acts.

At the same time that the good economy of the royal navy is displayed, it seems necessary to take some notice of that which affords it an opportunity of appearing in more magnificent grandeur than can be represented by the ablest writer in the world, namely, the ocean on which it is borne; especially as there is a peculiar sovereignty and property inherent therein to the monarchs of Great Britain; the preservation of which, for several ages past, has not a little conduced to increase the glory of the nation, and to gain it such a reputation abroad as must justly make our fleets seem as formidable to strangers as they are to us, who know their real strength. This right is so ancient and undeniable, that even the most haughty of our neighbours dare not pretend to control it by any public act, however they may presume to contradict it by bare words; neither was any thing ever written against it until it was undertaken by Hugo Grotius, in his book called Mare Liberum; which was answered by Selden, in his treatise Mare Clausum, or Right and Dominion of the Sea, 1625, translated into English 1652. The duty of the flag, which is an acknowledgment of the British dominion on the sea, is as old as King John, and has been constantly asserted by his successors. This mark of respect had always been acknowledged as our right by foreigners, so that it was never inserted as a stipulation in a treaty till 1654. The refusal of the Dutch admiral to strike the flag in compliance with the signal of the English admiral was the immediate cause of the commencement of war at that time, and the Dutch admitted they had ever before paid that mark of respect to the English flag. See Bac. Ab. tit. Court of Admiralty, note, 7th ed.

The boundaries properly said to encompass what are called the British Seas are thus accounted under the distinction of the four cardinal points of the compass; taking it for granted in general that all the seas which surround Great Britain, Ireland, and the other islands appertaining to the crown, are called the British Seas; but as to particulars they stand thus:—On the south is the British Channel, which separates England from France, the boundaries of which extend to the opposite shores of France, and to those of Spain, as far as Cape Finisterre. From that cape it extends on the west in an imaginary line running in twenty-three degrees of longitude from London, to the latitude of sixty-three degrees north, which last is called the Western Ocean of Britain. From the aforesaid latitude of sixty-three degrees it extends in another line (supposed to be drawn) in that parallel of latitude, to the middle point of the land, Van Staten, on the coast of Norway, which is the northern boundary; and from that point it extends along the shores of Norway, Denmark, Germany, and the Netherlands, to the channel first mentioned; which last boundary comprehends what is called the Eastern Ocean of Britain.

There being no lands lying on the west and north sides of the British dominions nearer than the continent of America, the island of Newfoundland, and Greenland, and the king of Great Britain having possessions in the two first places; the boundaries of his maritime empire cannot be said to be strictly limited on that side. Moreover, as to Greenland, it was at first discovered in the reign of Edward the Sixth, by Sir Hugh Willoughby, for the use of the crown of England; and still again to the northward there is some foundation for extending this sovereignty a great deal farther, on account of the acquisitions of King Arthur, a record of which is to be found in Hackluyt, 205, translated from the Latin original there quoted from Geoffrey of Monmouth's Hist.

According to this ancient right, the British dominion on the North Sea is very extensive; and so far from being questioned, or the trade of the British subjects in those parts obstructed, that on the contrary, (without regard to the above relation concerning King Arthur,) Britain has a prior right even to Denmark and Norway in the Greenland fishery and Davis's Straits; these places being unknown to them and the rest of Europe till John Davis's voyage for discovery of the north-west passage in the year 1585, though it seems that the Danes afterwards demanded toll for our fishing at Greenland, but it was refused to them. See an incomplete note on this subject, 1 Inst. 107, a. n. 6.

A temporary act, 48 Geo. 3. c. 16. was passed for inquiring into irregularities and abuses in the admiralty and other naval departments, and into the business of prize agency. This act expired at the end of the session, 46 Geo. 3.

By the 54 Geo. 3. c. 159. regulations are made for the better security of his majesty's naval arsenals, by empowering the lords of the admiralty to prohibit vessels from entering the ports and harbours which they shall specify in the London Gazette, with gunpowder on board; and authorizing them to appoint places where vessels not belonging to the royal navy shall unlade and deposit all gunpowder exceeding five pounds weight, which they may have on board.

This act contains a variety of other provisions with respect to the royal dock yards and arsenals, and the harbours of the united kingdom.

II. Many laws have been made for the supply of the royal navy with seamen, for their regulation when on board, and to confer privileges and rewards on them during and after their service.

As to their supply, the power of impressing seamen, though one of the most mischievous, has ever been found one of the most certain means. It has been a matter of some dispute, and submitted to not without a national reluctance: it is now, however, established by the law of the land beyond question, and from the spirit of the constitution the exercise of it resides in the crown. See Impressing Seamen.

But besides this method of impressing (which, after all, is only defensible from absolute public necessity, to which all private considerations must give way,) other ways have been adopted, and many of them still continue to be, that tend to the increase of seamen and manning the royal navy. Among these deserves to be marked the law that every foreign seaman, who during a war shall serve two years in any man-of-war, merchantman, or privateer, is naturalized, see infra, 13 Geo. 3. c. 1. and serving three years may be employed as a British man-of-war, 34 Geo. 3. c. 8.; and by various statutes, seamen having served ten years for a limited time, are free to use any trade or profession in any town in the kingdom without exception.

For the recruiting of recruits for the fleet, an act of parliament 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 1. was passed, by which it was enacted, that all seamen, watermen, &c. above the age of eighteen years, and under fifty, capable of sea service, who shall register themselves voluntarily for the king's service in the royal navy, to the number of thirty thousand, should be paid to them the yearly sum or bounty of forty shillings, and their pay for actual service, and that whether they were in service or not; and among such mariners, &c. as were registered should be capable of preferment to any commission, or be warrant officers in the navy; and such registered persons were exempted from serving on juries, parish rates, &c. also from service abroad after the age of fifty-five years, unless they went voluntarily; and when by age, sickness, or other accidents, they were disabled for future service, they were to be admitted into Greenwich Hospital, and there be provided for during life; and the widows of such seamen as should be slain or drowned, not of ability to provide for themselves, should be likewise admitted into the hospital, and their children educated, &c. But if any registered seaman should withdraw himself from the king's service, in his ships or navy, or if any such mariner relinquished the service without consent of the commissioners of the admiralty, he was for ever to lose the benefit of the act, and be compelled to serve in his majesty's fleet six months without pay. This registry being by experience proved to be ineffectual, as well as oppressive, was abolished, and the above statute repealed, by 9 Ann. c. 21. § 64.

In consequence, however, of the strong feeling entertained throughout the country against impressment, the plan of endeavouring to dispense with its necessity by establishing a registry of seamen is again in agitation, and in all probability will be adopted.

By 4 Anne, c. 19. § 18. watermen plying on the Thames between Gravesend and Windsor, on notice given by the commissioners of the admiralty to the company of watermen, are to appear before the said company, to be sent to his majesty's fleet, or on refusal they shall suffer one month's imprisonment, and be disabled working on the Thames for two years.

The 2 & 3 Anne, c. 6. provides, that poor boys whose parents are chargeable to the parish, may, by churchwardens and overseers of the poor, with consent of two justices of peace, be placed out apprentices to the sea service, until the age of twenty-one years, they being thirteen years old at the time of their placing forth; these apprentices shall be protected from being impressed for the first three years (if they are not more than eighteen years old; 4 Anne, c. 19. § 17.); and if they are impressed afterwards, the master shall be allowed their wages. And all masters and owners of ships, from thirty to fifty tons burthen, are required to take one such apprentice, one more for the next fifty ton, and one more for every hundred ton above the first hundred, under the penalty of ten pounds. Masters of apprentices placed out by the parish, may, with the consent of two justices, turn over such apprentices to masters of ships.

Of more modern statutes, the following deserve particular notice:

By 35 Geo. 3. c. 5. 9. 19. and 29. and 36 Geo. 3. c. 115. a number of men were raised for the navy according to a certain proportion imposed on every county and port in Great Britain. The execution of this act was intrusted to the justices of peace and magistrates of corporations, and the expense defrayed by rates made upon every parish, out of which bounties were paid to volunteers entering.

To further the urgent demand for sailors, the 35 Geo. 3. c. 34. was passed to enable magistrates to levy for his majesty's navy in their several jurisdictions, "all able-bodied, idle, and disorderly persons, who could not on examination prove themselves to exercise and industriously follow some lawful trade or employment, or to have some substance sufficient for their maintenance." The execution of this act was by a clause therein allowed to be suspended and revived according to necessity, by his majesty's proclamation or notice from the admiralty.

By various acts, private militia-men having served in the navy, were allowed to be discharged from the militia in order to re-enter into the navy, to a certain extent. See the latest act, 43 Geo. 3. c. 62. 76. By 43 Geo. 3. c. 50. § 7. no seafaring man shall be a militia-man.

To encourage seamen to enter voluntarily into the service of his majesty, to ensure them their wages, to protect their persons, to provide for their families, and to secure them from impositions, in relation to their prize-money and other advantages, several acts of parliament have from time to time been past. The first of these was the stat. 31 Geo. 2. c. 10.

From the year 1758, the period of passing the above act, when Mr. Grenville so ably filled the office of first lord of the admiralty, down to Mr. Dundas's time, scarcely any parliamentary regulation appears to have been applied to disbursements on account of the navy, and these increasing with the expense of our marine, to an amount beyond all former example, had opened a wide door to imposition on our seamen.

Incapable as sailors are of taking care of their property, beyond every other description of men, they were, in numberless instances, either by forgeries committed upon them, or from their own credulity, defrauded of their wages and deprived of rewards due to them for a long and laborious service. This evil had arisen to its greatest height towards the close of the war, which ended in 1788, and was practised by the lowest orders of the community, who watching the necessities, and encouraging the vices and follies of the inexperienced sailor, supplied him with small sums of money, and in the hour of intoxication induced him to grant instruments which in one moment robbed him of all he had acquired, as well as of what he might afterwards be entitled to receive as a recompence for his toils and gallantry in the service. In other instances, less scrupulous as to the means, the same unprincipled set of men (always selecting for the objects of their spoil such names as appeared to have the largest sums due to them), forged at once the authorities under which they pretended to act, and with great facility deprived of a just maintenance the widows and orphan children of those who had unhappily lost their lives in their country's cause.

The remedy for these evils was first applied in the year 1786, by an act introduced by Mr. Dundas (afterwards Lord Melville). By this act, 26 Geo. 3. c. 68. modes were prescribed for executing all wills and instruments of delegated authority, which, by making the superior officers of our ships (and other persons above the reach of corruption) necessary witnesses to all such deeds, struck at the root of forgery. Every sort of guard was meant to be provided by it (as far as human nature in the character of a British seaman can be guarded) to protect the thoughtless and ignorant, or at least to insure that the act of the sailor, thus legalized, was not done under the influence of fear, false pretences, or intoxication.

Mr. Dundas's attention was in the next place directed to the protection of that property which devolved upon widows and other representatives of seamen dying in the service, and leaving arrears of wages due to them.

This portion of the sailor's reward seldom reached the door of his disconsolate widow and helpless children. The same class of people who had theretofore defrauded him, being no longer able, from the operations of the above-mentioned act, to interfere with his property while he continued in the service, now turned their designs upon intercepting that part of it which he should leave behind him in the event of his death. This was principally effected by the means of wills made in their own favour, and which, under false pretences, they easily procured from the unsuspecting sailor; and there is reason to believe that no less than one-half of the arrears due at the end of the war before-mentioned, was obtained by such impositions, or by entire forgeries of wills, which were not at that time directed to be attested and executed under sufficient regulations.

Against these infamous practices an act of parliament was passed (32 Geo. 3. c. 34), which was framed with great ingenuity.

By the above and another act, all those protections and privileges which had hitherto been enjoyed exclusively by the seamen, were extended to our marines, a most useful and meritorious part of our navy; and in the same session, the benefits arising from them were also extended to persons residing in Ireland, who were also admitted to participate in the benefit of 3 Geo. 3. c. 16. with respect to the pensioners of Greenwich hospital.

By the 55 Geo. 3. c. 60, the acts of 26 Geo. 3. c. 68, and 32 Geo. 3. c. 34. and also so much of any other acts in force as related to letters of attorney and wills of petty officers, seamen, and marines, were repealed, and new provisions enacted upon the like principles, but with such more effectual powers as experience had shown to be necessary.

With respect to the forgery of wills, &c. see Forgery, IV.

But notwithstanding so much had been done for the seaman, and every assistance had been extended to his widow and other representatives, something still was wanting, while his wife and family remained in poverty and distress during his absence. No effectual scheme had hitherto been proposed, none even thought of, to grant them assistance; and it was reserved for Mr. Dundas to establish a system of remittance and supply, so extensive as to convey relief into every corner of the kingdom to the scattered families of our brave defenders. Provisions were made by an act of parliament, which he procured to be passed in 1795, 35 Geo. 3. c. 28 (explained and enforced by 37 Geo. 3. c. 58; 46 Geo. 3. c. 127; 49 Geo. 3. c. 108; 58 Geo. 3. c. 60; 57 Geo. 3. c. 20, 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 49); for a regular monthly supply to be paid to the wife and each child, or to the parent of every seaman who was willing, upon a representation being made to him, to allow a portion of his pay to be appropriated to the support and comfort of his family during his absence.

The advantages of this act, 35 Geo. 3. c. 28. were, by another of a similar nature, extended to non-commissioned officers and their families. See 35 Geo. 3. c. 95. And the government of Ireland afterwards applied for the provisions of both to be extended to that country, in order to enable their seamen to receive their united benefits. The numerous list of persons relieved by this benevolent regulation, was a convincing proof of its national importance, not less than 30,000 families of seamen, in different parts of the three kingdoms, being from time to time supported by the voluntary application of that portion of their wages which sailors were formerly induced to squander, in a most unprofitable manner, either at seaport towns, or in London during their attendance at the navy pay office.

The higher classes of the service, as well as the lower, felt the good effects of Mr. Dundas's measures. In the session of 1795, he obtained an act, 35 Geo. 3. c. 91. (amended by 37 Geo. 3. c. 20) by which naval officers, who were not in affluent circumstances, were enabled to accept commands, or to undertake other services, without pecuniary embarrassment. For this purpose the arrears which were due to an officer from his half-pay, and three months of his full pay, were paid him in advance, as soon as his appointment took place. A fund was also provided for those who might wish to receive a part of their pay whilst employed upon foreign service, and the principle of remittance was extended to every one desirous to avail himself of its advantages.

For the purpose of consolidating and amending the laws relating to the pay of the royal navy, the above and various other subsequent statutes were repealed by the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 20. which contains a variety of provisions embodying former enactments with such improvements as had been suggested by time and experience. Several of these provisions have been altered and extended by the 3d & 4th Wm. 4. c. 25.

The following is an abstract of the principal clauses of both acts:

1. Of the Advances made to Volunteers and others, and Time of Payment of their Wages, &c.

By the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 20. § 2. volunteers are to receive certificates of their time of entry, to entitle them to wages, conduct-money, and two months' pay in advance; and every seaman and able-bodied landman entered on the books of any ship as a supernumerary, and who shall not be borne for wages on the books of any other ship, shall be entitled to wages on the books of the first ship in which he shall serve as part of the complement thereof or as a supernumerary for wages: provided the lord high admiral, or the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral, may authorize the payment of such advance to supernumeraries and others who may have entered themselves after the ship on board which they shall be serving shall have proceeded to sea.

By the 4 & 5 H. 11. c. 25. boatswains, gunners, carpenters, second masters, and petty officers, are also entitled to receive two months' wages in advance.

§ 3. From time to time a certain portion of the pay due to such warrant and petty officers (not entitled to draw bills for their pay, as thereafter provided), and also to such seamen and others as may be desirous of receiving it, shall be issued to them at the expiration of every month, or as soon after as the convenience of the service will admit, in such proportions per month as have been or shall be for that purpose directed by the lord high admiral or the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral; and to this end the captain shall make out a complete list of the names of the men, with their respective numbers on the ship's books, desirous of receiving a portion of their pay; and the purser shall then draw, for the amount of the said portion of pay so to be issued, a bill of exchange at three days sight upon the commissioners of the navy, in the accustomed form, or such other form as shall be supplied to the ship.

§ 7. Whenever any petty officer, seaman, or marine, shall be turned over from one ship to another, in any port of the united kingdom, or on the coast thereof, he shall, on the arrival of the ship to which he shall be removed at any port having an establishment of clerks of the treasurer of the navy, and before such ship shall proceed to sea, be paid all the wages due to him upon pay lists made out and signed by the captain and proper signing officers of the ship from which he shall be turned over, except in urgent cases, when the lord high admiral, &c. shall otherwise direct; and in such cases he shall be paid whenever the ship shall return to any port where there shall be a commissioner or other authorized officer of the navy to control such payment; provided no petty officer or seaman turned over from one ship to another shall be rated in a lower degree than that in which he was rated in the books of his former ship.

§ 8. In case the ship to which any person shall be so turned over be abroad, the captain shall, previous to his removal, cause to be made out a ticket, to be called a foreign remove ticket, which shall be delivered to the party to enable him to receive payment of his wages.

§ 9. When any petty officer, &c. shall be sent sick to any hospital or sick quarters at home or abroad, a ticket, to be called a sick ticket, shall in like manner be made out by the captain and sent with him, which upon his being thence discharged back to his own ship, he shall leave with the surgeon or agent; but if discharged to any other ship not to rejoin his own ship, the said ticket shall be sent with him, and be paid conformably with the established regulations of the navy; and in case he shall be discharged from the said hospital or sick quarters as unseviceable, a certificate of his discharge shall be delivered to him with the said sick ticket, to enable him to receive his wages; provided that all petty officers, &c. wounded in action with the enemy, shall receive the full amount of their wages and allowances until their wounds shall be healed, or be declared incurable, until they shall receive a pension or be admitted into the royal hospital at Greenwich; but no other petty officers, &c. discharged from hospitals or sick quarters at home, either to a ship or from the service, shall be allowed wages for more than thirty days of the time they remain in such hospital or sick quarters.

§ 10. When a petty officer, &c. shall by wounds or infirmity be disabled, the captain shall represent the same to the commander-in-chief or senior officer, who shall cause a survey according to the practice of the navy; and if upon such survey, such petty officer, &c. be found unfit for further service, he shall be discharged, and the captain shall thereupon make out and sign a ticket, to be called an unseviceable ticket, for the wages due to such unseviceable man.

§ 12. When any petty officer, &c. shall die in the service of his majesty, the captain of the ship to which he shall belong shall thereupon make out a ticket, to be called a dead ticket, for the wages due to the deceased for his service on board the same; which ticket, signed by the captain and the proper signing officers of the ship, shall be transmitted by the captain to the commissioners of the navy, in order that payment thereof may be made to the legal representative of the deceased; the deceased's clothes or other effects shall be publicly sold at the mast, and the sums for which the same shall be sold, charged in the ship's books against the wages of the respective purchasers, but no person shall purchase beyond the amount of the net wages then due to him; an account specifying the articles sold, &c. shall be transmitted to the commissioners of the navy, annexed to the dead ticket; and in case the deceased shall not have left any clothes or effects, the captain shall certify on the dead ticket to that effect.

§ 13. When any petty officer, &c. shall be promoted abroad to any rank above the rank of petty or non-commissioned officer, the captain shall cause to be delivered to him a ticket, to be called a promotion ticket, for the wages due to him, certifying that he has been actually promoted to the station therein mentioned, which ticket shall consist of the same particulars prescribed in regard to foreign remove tickets, and shall be transferable by indorsement of the party in whose favour it is made out, and be payable to the indorsee thereof.

By § 14. No ticket, except the promotion ticket, is to be transferable.

§ 22. Deserters are to forfeit their wages; but the admiralty may authorize the payment of their wages in certain cases.

§ 67. When any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines, or marine, shall be discharged for any cause from any ship of his majesty, the captain shall cause to be made out and sign a certificate describing the period of such discharged person's service on board the ship, his number on the ship's books, and his stature, complexion, and age, which shall be delivered to the party at the time of his discharge; and no petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer, or marine shall be entitled to receive his wages, prize-money, or other allowances, unless he shall produce such certificate at the time the same are claimed, or unless he shall be identified by one or more of the commission or warrant officers who belonged to the vessel during some part of the period for which he may so claim.

§ 68. Payment may be made of orders under 10*l*., executed by seamen.

§ 70. Monies due to lunatic officers or men made payable to persons having the care of them.

§ 80. It shall not be lawful for any person to arrest or take out of his majesty's service any petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines, or private marine, belonging to any ship of his majesty, by any warrant, process, or writ of execution whatever, to be issued either in the united kingdom or in any other part of his majesty's dominions, for any debt, unless such debt shall have been contracted by such officer, &c. when he did not belong to his majesty's service, and unless before the issuing of such process or execution the plaintiff in the suit, or some person on his behalf, shall make affidavit that the debt justly due and owing to the plaintiff, over and above all costs, was contracted by the defendant at a time when he did not belong to the service of his majesty, a memorandum of which oath shall be marked on the back of such process or execution, and of the warrant issued in pursuance thereof.

2. Of Allotments of Wages by Seamen for the Maintenance of their Wives and Families, &c.

§ 32. Every boatswain, gunner, carpenter, petty officer (not entitled to draw bills for pay), seaman, landman (boys excepted), and non-commissioned officer and private of marines, being part of the complement of a ship, or borne on the books as a supernumerary, for wages and victuals, may make an allotment of a certain portion, not exceeding one moiety, of his monthly wages, in favour or for the maintenance of the following relatives only (that is to say), wife, father, mother, child or children being under the age of fourteen years, or labouring under any bodily infirmity; and all the monies hereafter allotted shall, at the expiration of every calendar month (the first payment to be reckoned from the first day of the month subsequent to the date of the declaration of allotment, and not to include the period between that date and the first of the ensuing month), be paid to the parties entitled to receive the same; but no payment shall be made at any one time for a shorter period than a calendar month, and whenever any increase or decrease shall take place in the rate of allotment by promotion, disrating, or otherwise, payment of the same shall commence from the ending of the last preceding payment.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 25. § 4. allotments are extended to a brother, sister, grandfather, grandmother, mother-in-law, and child or children of the age of eighteen years or upwards, and to trustees for the support of any child under that age; and the next clause empowers the admiralty to fix from time to time the amount of the allotment, but which is never to exceed one moiety of the monthly wages. By § 6, allotments may be stopped until debts due to the public on the ship's books are cleared.

By 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 20. § 33. whenever any person entitled to make an allotment shall declare his intention so to do, the captain shall cause such person to subscribe his name or mark to a declaration or to a list of declarations for that purpose, which shall be transmitted to the commissioners of the navy, in order that they may take the necessary measures for causing allotment bills to be made out thereon, and payment to be made of the portion of wages so allotted.

§ 34. specifies how allotment bills are to be made out and paid.

By § 35. if the wife of any person by whom an allotment has been made, shall die, or desert her family, &c. payment may be stopped, or made to some other person.

§ 36. Allotments may be revoked by the person making the same, if the commissioners of the navy are satisfied with his reasons.

§ 37. Or by commissioners in cases of death or desertion.

By § 38. so soon as it shall come to the knowledge of the minister or of any churchwarden or elder of the parish, that any person resident therein, and entitled to receive payment of an allotment bill, is dead, such minister, &c. shall immediately give notice thereof, by letter, to the commissioners of the navy, or to the officer of the revenue, or clerk to the treasurer of the navy, by whom such allotment is payable, who shall immediately indorse the date of the receipt of such notice upon such allotment bill, and transmit the same to the navy office, and from that time all payments thereunder shall be discontinued.

§ 39. Payments of allotments made by collectors of customs and excise, to be refunded every three months.

§ 44. The party to whom allotment bills are payable, is to appear personally, and may be required to take an oath.

§ 45. If payment of allotment is not demanded within six months, the bill to be returned; but it may be renewed.

3. Of Remittances of Wages by Seamen for the Benefit of their Wives and Families, &c.

§ 40. Whenever a ship, not being in any port of the united kingdom, or on the coast thereof, shall have been twelve calendar months in sea pay, and so from time to time at the end of every six months, the captain shall, at the next subsequent muster of the ship's company, cause to be read over the names of the petty officers, seamen, non-commissioned officers and privates of marines, and cause each to answer to his name; and if any of them who have not made any allotment of their pay shall declare their desire that the whole or any part of their pay, except for the last six months, shall be paid either to a wife, child or children above the age of eighteen years, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, brother, or sister, the captain shall cause to be transmitted to the commissioners of the navy a list of such persons, containing their names, their numbers on the ship's books, and the names and residence of the parties to whom they shall desire the same to be paid; and the commissioners shall cause the requisite steps to be taken for making out the necessary remittance bills in the form heretofore used, or in such other form as shall be found most convenient, to be signed by a commissioner of the navy, and to be addressed to the same persons and in the same manner as allotment bills are by the act required to be addressed.

By § 41. every warrant officer not authorized to draw bills, and every petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer, or marine, entitled to the payment of any wages, or the wife of any such warrant officer (being legally empowered to receive her husband's wages), shall, if present at the place where such wages are paid, be at liberty in like manner to make a remittance thereof, or of any part thereof, to any person within the united kingdom, or if not present, but resident more than seven miles from the place of payment, shall, upon transmitting to the commissioners of the navy a regular certificate of discharge from the service, or other satisfactory proof of identity, be entitled to a remittance bill. (but payable to the party only) in any part of his majesty's dominions where naval payments are usually made; and payment may in like manner be made to the executors and administrators of any such deceased warrant officer, if they shall desire it.

But by 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 25. § 7. any petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines, or marine, notwithstanding he may have made an allotment of his pay, may cause to be paid by remittance in the manner thereby provided, any further portion of his pay which may remain due to him, except for the last six months, and any such remittance of wages may be made payable either to any of the relatives mentioned in the above act, or to any child or children of the age of eighteen years or upwards of the party making the allotment, or if under that age then to a trustee on the behalf of such child or children; or any such petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines, or marine, may authorize any such part of his pay to be invested for his benefit in such savings bank, and under and subject to such rules and regulations as the admiralty shall establish for that purpose.

4. Of Advances and other Payments to Officers, &c.

§ 23. Any commission or warrant officer, on being appointed to any ship of his majesty in commission, he being entitled to half pay, and there being no imposts standing against him, upon application to the commissioners of the navy, and on the production of the affidavit usually required from half pay officers, and a certificate of the date of his commencing sea pay, may receive the arrears of half pay due to him up to that date; and every such officer who shall have been on half pay for three months next before his appointment to any ship, and shall have no imposts outstanding against him, shall, on joining his ship, upon like application to the said commissioners, be entitled to receive the amount of three months personal sea pay in advance. provided in case any such officer shall be again put on half pay before the expiration of three lunar months from the time of such appointment, the amount of the three months wages so paid in advance, or for such part of the time as he shall not serve, shall be placed as an imposts against his future half pay.

§ 24. Every flag officer, commission officer, master (such commission officer or master not being in the command of a ship, or not having accounts to pass), secretary to a flag officer or commodore, physician, chaplain, second master, and assistant surgeon (not acting as surgeon), who shall be actually in the naval service of his majesty, and entitled to full pay in the fleet, may, at the expiration of every three, six, or twelve lunar months, or of any longer period, draw a bill of exchange, or a set of bills, of the same tenor and date, upon the commissioners of his majesty's navy for the net balance of the personal wages due to him; which bill or set of bills shall be made payable to himself or to his order at ten days sight, and shall state the rate or description and name of the ship to which he shall belong, and his station or rank on board the same, and also the full amount of the personal wages then due to him, and the period for which the same accrued, together with the amount of such charges and deductions as shall appear on the ship's books against him, and the net residue of the personal wages due to him, for which residue and no more the bill shall be drawn.

§ 25. Every captain, lieutenant, or master commanding a ship, surgeon, purser, and assistant surgeon acting as surgeon, may draw bills of exchange in like manner and under similar regulations, for three-fourths, and no more, of their net personal pay; and every mate, midshipman, and master's assistant, who shall have passed his examination for a lieutenant, master, or second master respectively, and every school-master, secretary's clerk, and captain's clerk, may draw bills in like manner and under similar regulations, at the end of every six or twelve, but not for a shorter period than six lunar months, for the net personal pay due to him: provided that no person who shall have received three months' advance shall be permitted to draw any such bill for the first three months after he shall have joined his ship.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 25. § 2. the officers who under the above clause could only claim for three-fourths of their pay, are now authorized to draw for the whole: provided that all bills for personal pay to be drawn under the authority either of the above act or that act, shall be drawn for such periods of time, and up to such periodical days in the year as the admiralty shall fix. And by § 1. every mate, midshipman, and master's assistant, although any such person shall not have passed his examination, and also every volunteer of the first class, and every engineer and assistant engineer belonging to any steam vessel of his majesty, at the end of every six or twelve months, but not for a shorter period than six months, may draw bills periodically upon the account-keeper of the navy for the net personal pay then due to him: provided always, that no person authorized to make any allotment of his wages, or entitled to receive monthly pay, under the provisions of the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 Wm. 4. c. 20. shall be allowed to draw any such bill as aforesaid for any period during which any such allotment shall be in force or in the course of payment, or during which he shall be in the receipt of such monthly pay.

By § 6. any officer fraudulently drawing any such bill for pay, when there shall not be pay to the amount so drawn for owing to him, shall forfeit all pay and other allowances to which he shall be then entitled, and moreover, upon being convicted thereof by court martial, shall be cashiered and rendered incapable of holding any office, civil or military, in his majesty's service: provided that no officer whose duty it shall be to transmit any logs, journals, returns, or other documents, either to the admiralty office or to the navy office, shall be entitled to receive any pay due at the time of his discharge, or any half pay afterwards to accrue due, until he shall have duly transmitted such logs, &c., or unless he shall have obtained a dispensing order from the lord high admiral, &c.

§ 31. Whenever any officer who is required to pass accounts to entitle him to the balance of his pay, shall have cleared his accounts for the period during which he shall have been on full pay, to the satisfaction of the commissioners of the navy and victualling respectively, he shall be entitled to a bill usually called a general certificate, specifying the net balance due to him, which shall be payable by the treasurer of the navy, and be negotiable like other bills.

§ 42. Any officer of the royal navy or royal marines entitled to half pay or to a pension, and also any person entitled to any money or allowance from the compassionate fund of the navy, or to his majesty's most gracious bounty given to the relatives of persons slain in fight with the enemy, or to a pension as the widow of an officer of the navy, and any petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer, or private marine entitled to a pension or allowance in respect of his services or wounds, shall be at liberty to receive such pay, allowance, bounty, or pension by means of a remittance bill as aforesaid.

§ 46. Naval officers and widows entitled to half pay or pensions, may draw on the navy board or be paid by extract.

By § 47. all assignments or sales and contracts by any person entitled to any marine half pay, or by any person entitled to an allowance from the compassionate fund, or to any pension as the widow of an officer, or of in relation to such half pay, allowance, or pension respectively, and all assignments or sales and contracts of or relating to any wages, half pay, prize money, pension, gratuities, and other allowances payable in respect of the services of any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, shall be null and void.

§ 54. all wages, pay, and other allowances payable for the service of any commission or warrant officer of his majesty's navy shall be paid to the officer himself, if present, at the pay table, or to his lawful attorney, upon the production of the usual certificates; but if he shall have assigned or sold his pay, the same shall be paid to the assignee, being duly authorized to receive the same; and if there shall be more assignments than one, they shall be satisfied according to priority of date; but the treasurer of the navy shall not pay regard to any assignment which shall not be presented at the pay table, accompanied by the usual certificates and papers, at the time the wages or pay are appointed to be paid, and unless a true copy of such assignment be left at the same time with the said treasurer, nor shall he be liable to pay under any assignment conveying generally any annual or other periodical wages or allowance to grow due, but only under such assignments of wages, pay, or other allowances due, as shall be made to secure payment of any sum advanced by the assignee, which shall be truly set forth in such assignment, and for the amount of which, and no more, the wages, pay, and other allowances payable to the officer shall be liable.

§ 71. All pensions to which the widows of officers of the royal navy are entitled, shall be paid in the same manner as other pensions for services in the royal navy are payable; and the admiralty may make regulations for the payment of marine half pay, &c.

5. Of Wills, &c. and Letters of Attorney made by Seamen.

§ 48. No will made by any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, before his entry into his majesty's service, shall be valid to pass any wages, prize money, or other monies payable in respect of services in his majesty's navy; and no letter of attorney made by any such person who shall be or shall have been in the said service, or by the widow, next of kin, executors, or administrators of any such person, shall be valid or sufficient to entitle any person to receive any wages, prize money, or other allowance of money of any kind for the service of any such person in his majesty's navy, unless such letter of attorney shall be therein expressed to be revocable; and no such letter of attorney shall be valid or sufficient to entitle any person to receive any such wages or other monies; nor shall any will made or to be made by any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines, or marine, who shall be or shall have been in the naval service of his majesty, be valid or sufficient to pass any such wages, prize money, or other monies, unless such letter of attorney or will respectively shall contain the name of the ship to which the person executing the same belonged at the time or to which he last belonged, nor unless such letter of attorney, if made by an executor or administrator, shall contain the name of the ship to which his or her testator or intestate last belonged, and also in every case a full description of the degree of relationship or residence of the person or persons to whom or in whose favour, either as attorney or attorneys, executor or executors, the same shall be made, and also the day of the month and year and the name of the place when and where the same shall have been executed, nor shall any such letter of attorney or will be valid for the purposes aforesaid unless the same respectively shall, in the several cases hereinafter specified, be executed and attested in the manner hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say,) in case any such letter of attorney or will shall be made by any such petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, while belonging to and on board of any ship of his majesty as part of her complement, or borne on the books thereof as a supernumerary or as an invalid, or for victuals only, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by the captain, or (in his absence) by the commanding officer for the time being, and who in that case shall state at the foot of the attestation the absence of the captain at the time, and the occasion thereof; and in case of the inability of the captain, by reason of wounds or sickness, to attest any such will or letter of attorney, then the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by the officer next in command, who shall state at the foot of such attestation the inability of the captain to attest the same, and the cause thereof; and if made in any of his majesty's hospital ships, or in any naval or other hospital, or at any sick quarters either at home or abroad, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by the governor, physician, surgeon, assistant surgeon, agent, or chaplain of any such hospital or sick quarters, or by the commanding officer, agent, physician, surgeon, assistant surgeon, or chaplain for the time being of any such hospital ship, or by the physician, surgeon, assistant surgeon, agent, chaplain, or chief officer of any military or merchant hospital or other sick quarters, or one of them; and if made on board of any ship or vessel in the transport service, or in any other merchant ship or vessel, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by some commission or warrant officer or chaplain in his majesty's navy, or some commission officer or chaplain belonging to his majesty's land forces or royal marines, or the governor, physician, surgeon, or agent of any hospital in his majesty's naval or military service, if any such shall be then on board, or by the master or first mate thereof; and if made after he shall have been discharged from his majesty's service, or if such letter of attorney be made by the executor or administrator of any such petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, if the party making the same shall then reside in London or within the bills of mortality, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by the inspector for the time being of seamen's wills and powers of attorney, or his assistant or clerk; or if the party making the same shall then reside at or within the distance of seven miles from any port or place where the wages of seamen in his majesty's service are paid, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by one of the clerks of the treasurer of the navy resident at such port or place; or if the party making such letter of attorney or will shall then reside at any other place in Great Britain or Ireland, or in the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by one of his majestry's justices of the peace, or by the minister or officiating minister or curate of the parish or place in which the same shall be executed; or if the party making the same shall then reside in any other part of his majesty's dominions, or in any colony, plantation, settlement, fort, factory, or any other foreign possession of his majesty, or any settlement within the charter of the East India Company, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by some commission or warrant officer or chaplain of his majesty's navy, or commission officer of royal marines, or the commissioner of the navy, or naval storekeeper at one of his majesty's naval yards, or a minister of the Church of England or Scotland, or a magistrate or principal officer residing in any of such places respectively; or if the party making the same shall then reside at any place not within his majesty's dominions, or any of the places last mentioned, the same shall be executed in the presence of and be attested by the British consul or vice consul, or some officer having a public appointment or commission, civil, naval, or military, under his majesty's government, or by a magistrate or notary public or near the place where such letter of attorney or will shall be executed; nor shall any will of any petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, be deemed good or valid in law, to any intent or purpose, which shall be contained, printed, or written in the same instrument, paper, or parchment with a power of attorney: provided that if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, in the case of any will or letter of attorney executed on board any of his majesty's ships, that in the attestation thereof the captain's signature hath by accident or inadvertence been omitted, and that in all other respects the execution has been conformable to the provisions and to the intent and meaning of this act, it shall be lawful for the inspector of seamen's wills and powers to pass the same as valid and sufficient.

§ 49. Provided, that every letter of attorney or will, which hath been or which hereafter shall be made by any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, while a prisoner of war, shall be valid, provided it shall have been executed in the presence of and be attested by some commission officer of the army, navy, or royal marines, or by some warrant officer of his majesty's navy, or by a physician, surgeon, or assistant surgeon in the army or navy, agent to some naval hospital, or chaplain of the army or navy, or by any notary public; but so as not to invalidate or disturb any payment which hath been already made under any letter of administration, certificates, or otherwise, in consequence of the rejection of any such wills by the inspector of seamen's wills for want of the due attestation thereof according to the directions of any former act of parliament.

§ 50. Wills, &c. to be noted in the muster book.

§ 51. Letters of attorney and wills to be examined by the inspector.

§ 52. No letter of attorney of any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, which shall not have been made or executed on board the ship to which the party shall have belonged, in the manner required by the act, shall be passed, stamped, or allowed by the said inspector until a certificate shall have been produced to him, under the hand of the captain, specifying the period of the party's service on board under the command of such captain, and a description of his height, complexion, and age, unless reasonable cause shall be shown to and allowed by the said treasurer or inspector for dispensing with such certificate.

§ 53. The treasurer of the navy shall not be bound to pay regard to any power of attorney, or check of any power, under which any wages may be claimed as due to any officers, seamen, or marines, unless such power or check of power, as the case may be, shall be actually produced at the time payment is claimed, and, in the case of an officer's pay, unless the power or a copy of the power be left with the proper officer of the said treasurer, accompanied with the usual certificates and papers; and in cases of the wages of a seaman or marine being claimed by any master under any indenture of apprenticeship, every such master shall, before he shall be entitled to receive the same, adduce satisfactory proof to the officer of the said treasurer that the indenture to be produced by him was in full force during the period for which such wages are claimed, and that the apprentice was, at the time of the execution of the indenture, under the age of eighteen years, and had not previously used the sea; but in case the indenture shall not be produced at the pay table when the wages shall be demanded, and such proof as aforesaid shall not be given, such wages shall be paid to the apprentice, and not to the master.

§ 55. specifies the mode by which executors are to obtain probate of such wills as therein before mentioned.

§ 56. enacts the mode of obtaining administration where no will has been made.

§ 59. When any probate or letters of administration shall have been so obtained, the proctor employed therein shall immediately send the same to the treasurer of the navy, with a copy of the will in the case of probate, and an account of his charges; and upon receipt thereof the inspector shall issue a check, containing the heads of such probate or letters of administration, and shall note thereon the amount of the proctor's charges and the address of the claimant; and so soon as the wages and prize money due to the deceased shall have been calculated in the proper departments, the amount shall be noted on the check, and, after abating the proctor's charges, the balance shall be paid to the party personally, or by means of a remittance bill, in the manner and under similar regulations as are therein before provided with respect to other contingencies of wages, and the check shall then be delivered to the party, to stand instead of probate or letters of administration, to enable him to receive whatever other sums may be payable to the deceased's estate.

§ 60. 1. any proctor, registrar, or other officer of any ecclesiastical court shall deliver any letters of administration, probate of will, or letters of administration with will annexed, to any other person than the treasurer of the navy or the said inspector, he shall forfeit one hundred pounds; and if any agent for prizes shall pay any prize money due to a petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, under any authority whatever, other than the inspector's check directed by the act, such payment shall be null and void, and the agent shall forfeit a sum equal to the amount of the prize money paid.

§ 61. limits the expense of probate, &c. to the sums specified in the schedule to the act.

§ 63. directs the manner of proceeding in case of executors, &c. crying before the receipt of wages.

§ 64. regulations are made for preventing fraudulent claims by pretended creditors of seamen and marines.

but (§ 5.) creditors to be paid if there are no executors or administrators.

§ 69. sums not exceeding 20*l.* due to deceased petty officers, &c. are to be paid on certificate; extended by 4 & 5 Edw. 1. c. 25, § 8. to 32*l.*

6. Provisions for the Passage Home and Maintenance of Unserviceable or Shipwrecked Sailors.

§ 11. In case there shall be no opportunity of a passage by a king's ship, every man discharged abroad, either from a ship or from any hospital or sick quarters, shall be sent home by the first convenience of a merchant vessel, the master of which is thereby required (under 50*l.* penalty) to afford a passage to and subsist all such men, not exceeding four men to every 100 tons burthen of his ship, for which such allowance per day shall be made as shall be authorized by the lord high admiral, and except in cases when the man so discharged shall perform the duty of one of the crew of the vessel, and for which he may be entitled to receive wages from the owner.

§ 82. The governors, ministers, consuls, and other officers of his majesty in foreign parts, and in places where there shall be no such, then any two British merchants there residing, shall send for and provide for all such seafaring men and boys, being subjects of the United Kingdom, who shall by shipwreck, or by any other means, or from any cause whatever, be driven to or cast away or left or be in distress at any such foreign parts or places, or who shall have been discharged from any of his majesty's ships, and subsist all such seafaring men and boys, and for so doing they shall be allowed so much per day as hath been or shall be authorized by the admiralty, for the amount of which disbursements they shall send bills, together with proper vouchers, to the commissioners of the navy, in order that, after due examination of such vouchers, payment of the amount thereof may be made to them; and the said governors, &c. shall cause such men and boys to be put or sent on board the first or any ship or vessel belonging to any subjects of his majesty which shall be bound from thence or from the neighbourhood to any part of the United Kingdom, and shall be in want of men to make up their complement; and if there shall be no such ship in want of men within a convenient time, then they shall provide and order a passage home for such seafaring men and boys in the first ship or vessel of his majesty's subjects bound to any part of the said United Kingdom; and every master or other person having the charge of any such ship or vessel thereby required (under 100*l.* penalty) to receive and afford a passage, and subsistence during the voyage, to all such seafaring men and boys as shall be so sent on board his ship, not exceeding four for every 100 tons of his ship's burthen; and every such master, on the production to the commissioners of the navy of a certificate under the hands of any such governors, &c. specifying the number and names of the men and boys, and the time when they were so received on board, and upon making oath as to the number of days they were subsisted, and that he did not during that period want of his own complement of men, or if he did want any, then the number he so wanted of his complement, and for what time he shall be entitled to receive from the said commissioners an allowance in respect of the subsistence and passage of each such man and boy (exceeding the number so wanting of his complement), according to such rate per day in that behalf authorized by the admiralty. And see 6 Geo. 4. c. 87. § 18.

7. Of Forgeries, &c. under the Act.

§ 83. If any person shall forge, or offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, knowing the same to be forged, any ticket, certificate, or document whatever authorized or required by the act, shall be guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for life or for not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned not exceeding four years nor less than two years.

§ 84. If any person shall falsely and deceitfully personate any officer, or seaman, or commission or non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, or the wife, widow, or relation, executor, administrator, or creditor of any such officer, seaman, or marine, or any person entitled to any allowance from the compassionate fund of the navy, in order to receive any wages, &c. or other allowance for money due or payable to any such officer, &c. with intent to defraud any person whomsoever, shall be guilty of felony, and be liable to the like punishment. And see 5 Geo. 4. c. 107. § 5.

§ 85. If any person shall fraudulently and deceitfully take a false oath, in order to obtain probate of any will, or letters of administration of the effects of any deceased officer, or seaman, or commission or non-commissioned officer of marines or marine; or shall fraudulently receive or demand any wages, &c. or any allowance of money whatever, payable or supposed to be payable in respect of the services of any such officer, &c. or from the compassionate fund of the navy, or any pension to the widow of an officer, by virtue of any probate of a will or letters of administration, knowing such will to be forged, or such probate or letters of administration to have been obtained by means of a false oath, with intent in any of the said cases to defraud any person whomsoever, every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and be liable to the same punishment.

§ 86. If any person shall subscribe any false petition or application to the treasurer of his majesty's navy, or to the paymaster of royal marines, representing herself or himself therein to be the widow, executor, nearest or one of the nearest of kindred of any deceased officer of the navy, or commission officer of marines, or of any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, or shall utter or publish any such petition or application, knowing the same to be false, in order to procure, or to enable any other person to procure, a certificate from the said inspector of seamen's wills or from the paymaster of royal marines as hereinbefore respectively provided, thereby to obtain, or to enable any other person to obtain, without probate or letters of administration, payment of any wages, &c. payable in respect of the services, &c. of any officer in the royal navy, or thereby to obtain, or to enable any other person to obtain, probate of the will or administration of the effects of any deceased petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine; or if any person shall receive or demand any wages, &c. thereof, or any other allowance due or payable in respect of the services of any commission or warrant officer of the navy, or commission officer of royal marines, or of any petty officer, seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, by virtue of any certificate of the inspector of seamen's wills or paymaster of royal marines respectively as aforesaid, knowing any such certificate to have been obtained by any false representation or pretence; every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported beyond the seas for not exceeding fourteen and not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding three years nor less than one year.

§ 87. If any person shall forge, or shall utter, offer, or exhibit, knowing the same to be forged, any paper writing purporting to be an extract from any register of marriage, baptism, or burial, or any certificate of marriage, baptism, or burial, in order to sustain any claim to any wages, prize money, or other monies due or payable in respect of the services of any officer, seaman, or marine in his majesty's navy, or to sustain any claim to any half-pay payable to an officer of the royal navy or marines, or to any pension as the widow of an officer, or to any payment or allowance from the compassionate fund of the navy, or to any gratuity or bounty of his majesty given to the relatives of persons slain in fight with the enemy; or if any person shall make any false affidavit, or utter or exhibit any false affidavit, certificate, or other voucher or document, in order fraudulently to procure any person to be admitted a pensioner as the widow of an officer of the royal navy, or in order to sustain any claim to any wages, prize money, or other monies, or to any half-pay or pension, or arrears thereof, or any allowance from the compassionate fund of the navy, or to any gratuity or bounty as aforesaid, with intent to defraud any person whomsoever; every person in any of the said cases offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for not exceeding fourteen and not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding three years nor less than one year.

§ 88. In the case of every offence made felony by the act, every principal in the second degree and every accessory before the fact shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree; and every accessory after the fact to any such felony shall, on conviction, be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years; and that where any person shall be convicted of any offence punishable under the act for which imprisonment shall or may be awarded, the court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, and also direct him to be kept in solitary confinement for the whole or any portion or portions of such imprisonment.

§ 89. If any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, shall obtain or attempt to obtain his pay, or any part thereof, upon or by means of any false or forged certificate purporting to be a certificate of service in or discharge from any of his majesty's ships, or from any hospital or sick quarters, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to such pains and penalties as persons convicted of wilful and corrupt perjury are by law liable to.

§ 90. If any person shall take a false oath or make false affirmation in any case wherein an oath or affirmation is authorized or required by the act to be taken or made, and for which no punishment is otherwise by the act provided, every such person, being thereof duly convicted, shall be liable to such pains and penalties as persons guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury are by law subject to.

8. The General Provisions of the Statute.

§ 15. All tickets, certificates, pay lists, and other vouchers for wages to be made out as aforesaid, shall be in the forms theretofore established and in use in his majesty's naval service, or in such other forms as the lord high admiral, &c. shall from time to time authorize; and if any officer or other person shall make out, sign, or issue any ticket, &c. other than in the form and under the regulations therein prescribed, he shall forfeit 50*l.* and if belonging to his majesty's naval service shall moreover be liable to such punishment and forfeiture of wages as a court-martial shall adjudge.

§ 43. Any collector, clerk, &c. delaying payment or taking any fee, is liable to a penalty of 50*l.*

§ 62. If any officer, proctor, or other person shall take more than the sums allowed in the schedule, he shall forfeit 50*l.* with full costs of suit; or if any registrar, proctor, or other officer of any ecclesiastical court shall be aiding or assisting in procuring probate of any will or letters of administration, whereby any person may be enabled to claim any wages, pay, prize money, or allowance of money of any kind for the services of any such petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, otherwise than in the manner prescribed by the act, he shall forfeit 500*l.* and shall moreover forfeit his office and be rendered incapable of acting in any capacity in any court of admiralty or ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

§ 64. recites that "by an act of the 54th year of the reign of his late majesty, for regulating the payment of navy prize money, agents for prizes are prohibited from paying any prize money or bounty money to any person upon any order made within the distance of five miles of the place where the same shall be payable, (such prize money or bounty money being in course of distribution at the time of making such order) under the penalty therein mentioned:" it is enacted, that if any agent licensed by the treasurer of his majesty's navy, or if any other person, shall insert in any order for payment of prize money or bounty money payable in respect of the services of any petty officer or seaman, non-commissioned officer of marines or marine, in his majesty's navy, the name of any captured ship, vessel, fortress, or place, the proceeds of which or the bounty money payable in respect whereof shall be then in course of distribution within six miles of the place where such name or names shall be inserted, and where such order shall be intended to be attested under the prov-sions of the said last-mentioned act, or shall utter any such order with the name or names of any such captured ship, &c. inserted therein, for the purpose of demanding or receiving payment of any prize money or bounty money for or in respect of such captured ship, &c. such prize money or bounty money being then in course of distribution or payment within six miles of the place where such order shall have been made or drawn and attested, every such person so offending shall forfeit 50*l*.

§ 72. Wages, pay, prize money, &c. not claimed within six years, are declared forfeited; but the admiralty may authorize payment notwithstanding.

§ 73. Letters to and from the treasurer to go free.
As also (§ 74) letters to and from certain other officers to go free.

And by § 75. letters relating to the business of the commissioners of the navy or the victualling department to go free: persons sending letters other than those permitted, shall forfeit 100*l*.

§ 78. exempts from stamps all bills and documents made out under the act.

By § 81. the act is to extend to the royal marines.

§ 92. Treasurer and commissioners of the navy may act as justices.

In pursuance of the same plan, for the comfort and relief of the defenders of their country, it had been provided by several previous acts, the last 46 Geo. 3. c. 92. that letters to and from non-commissioned officers, seamen, and privates, in any departments of the army, navy or militia, shall be subject only to a penny postage.

Also 47 Geo. 3. st. 1. c. 52; 51 Geo. 3. c. 105. for establishing and supporting the Royal Naval Asylum for the education of orphans of officers and men of the navy and marines.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 26. the Royal Naval Asylum was consolidated with Greenwich Hospital, and the governors of the latter are empowered to make rules for its superintendence.

Acts are usually passed during war, for regulating the payment of prize money. See 51 Geo. 3. c. 93; 55 Geo. 3. c. 60; 59 Geo. 3. c. 56; and 1 Geo. 4. c. 85. and ante, 8.

The pay and wages of one man in a hundred, of every ship of war, and value of his victuals, shall be applied for relieving poor widows of officers of the navy, 6 Geo. 2. c. 25.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 53. justices might have sentenced persons convicted of smuggling to serve on board the royal navy for five years, but this was repealed by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 12.

III. The treasurer, comptroller, surveyor, and clerk of the acts, and commissioners of the navy, &c. have power to examine and punish all persons who make any disturbance, fighting or quarrelling, in the yards, and offices, &c. of the navy, and on any days, by rote and imprisonment, and to bind the offenders to good behaviour, and to answer at the assizes or sessions.

The method of ordering seamen in the royal fleet, and keeping up discipline there, is directed by certain express rules, and orders, first enacted by the authority of parliament soon after the Restoration, but since new modelled and altered. In the thirteenth year of King Charles II. an act passed for the regulating the government of the fleet, 13 Geo. 2. st. 1. c. 9. which was repealed by 22 Geo. 2. c. 23. and amended by 19 Geo. 3. c. 17. These two latter statutes contain not only the thirty-six articles of war, but almost every possible offence is explicitly set down, and the punishment thereof annexed or left to the discretion of a court martial; but also sundry clauses of express rules and orders for assembling and holding courts for the trial of any of the offences specified therein.

By 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 100. whereby his majesty was authorized to grant commissions for natives of Holland to serve on board certain Dutch ships of war which had surrendered, the articles of war were directed to be translated into Dutch, and the crews of the ships were made subject thereto.

The following are the ARTICLES of WAR above alluded to:

1. Officers are to cause public worship, according to the liturgy of the church of England, to be solemnly performed in their ships, and take care that prayers and preaching by the chaplains be performed diligently, and that the Lord's Day be observed.

2. Persons guilty of profane oaths, cursing, drunkenness, uncleanness, &c. to be punished as a court martial shall think fit.

3. If any person shall give or hold intelligence to or with an enemy without leave, he shall suffer death.

4. If any letter or message from an enemy be conveyed to any in the fleet, and he shall not in twelve hours acquaint his superior officer with it, or if the superior officer, being acquainted therewith, shall not reveal it to the commander-in-chief, the offender shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall impose.

5. Spies and persons endeavouring to corrupt any one in the fleet, shall suffer death, or such punishment as a court martial shall impose.

6. No person shall relieve an enemy with money, victuals, or ammunition, on like penalty.

7. All papers taken on board a prize shall be sent to the Court of Admiralty, &c. on penalty of forfeiting the same of the prize, and such punishment as a court martial shall impose.

8. No person shall take out of any prize any money or goods, unless for better securing the same, or for the necessary use of any of his majesty's ships, before the prize shall be condemned; upon penalty of forfeiting his share and such punishment as shall be imposed by a court martial.

9. No person on board a prize shall be stripped of his clothes, pillaged, beaten, or ill-treated, upon pain of such punishment as a court martial shall impose.

10. Every commander who, upon signal or order of fight, or sight of any ship which it may be his duty to engage, or who, upon likelihood of engagement, shall not make necessary preparation for fight, or encourage the crew, officers and men to fight, shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall deem him to deserve. And if any person shall treacherously or cowardly yield or cry for quarter, he shall suffer death.

11. Every person who shall not obey the orders of his superior officer, in time of action, to the best of his power, shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall deem him to deserve.

12. Every person who, in time of action, shall withdraw or keep back, or not come into the fight, or do his utmost to take or destroy any ship which it shall be his duty to engage, and to assist every ship of his majesty or his allies, which it shall be his duty to assist, shall suffer death or other punishment. See post, and 19 Geo. 3. c. 17. § 3.

13. Every person who, through cowardice, &c. shall forbear to pursue the chase of any enemy, &c. or shall not assist or relieve a known friend in view, to the utmost of his power, shall suffer death, or other punishment. See post.

14. If any person shall delay or discourage any action or service commanded, upon pretence of arrears of wages, or otherwise, he shall suffer death, or such punishment as a court martial shall deem him to deserve.

15. Every person who shall desert to the enemy, or run away with any ship, ordnance, &c. to the weakening of the service, or yield up the same cowardly or treacherously to the enemy, shall suffer death.

16. Every person who shall desert, or entice others so to do, shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall think fit. If any commanding officer shall receive a deserter, after discovering him to be such, and shall not with speed give notice to the captain of the ship to which he belongs, or, if the ship is at a considerable distance, to the secretary of the admiralty, or commander-in-chief, he shall be cashiered. [See also 44 Geo. 3. c. 13. by which petty officers or seamen, taken out of the navy for any civil or criminal matter, shall be kept in custody till discharged from such suit, and shall then be conveyed and delivered to some officer of the navy to continue their service therein. This act was passed to prevent desertion, under colour of false actions or prosecutions.]

17. Officers and seamen of ships appointed for convoy of merchant ships, or of any other, shall diligently attend upon that charge according to their instructions; and whosoever shall not faithfully perform their duty, and defend their ships in their convoy, or refuse to fight in their defence, or run away cowardly and submit the ships in their convoy to hazard, or exact any reward for conveying any ship, or misuse the master or mariners, shall make reparation of damages, as the Court of Admiralty shall adjudge; and be punished criminally by death, or other punishment, as shall be adjudged by a court martial. See Insurance.

18. If any officer shall receive or permit to be received on board any goods or merchandise, other than for the sole use of the ship, except gold, silver, or jewels, and except goods belonging to any ship which may be shipwrecked, or in danger thereof, in order to the preserving them for the owners, and except goods ordered to be received by the lord high admiral, &c. he shall be cashiered, and rendered incapable of further service.

19. Any person making or endeavouring to make any mutinous assembly shall suffer death. Any person uttering words of sedition or mutiny shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall deem him to deserve. If any officer, mariner, or soldier, in or belonging to the fleet, shall behave himself with contempt to his superior officer, being in the execution of his office, he shall be punished according to the nature of his offence, by the judgment of a court martial.

20. Any person concealing any traitorous or mutinous practice or design, shall suffer death; or such punishment as a court martial shall think fit. Any person concealing any traitorous or mutinous words, or any words, practice, or design, tending to the hinderance of the service, and not forthwith revealing the same to the commanding officer; or, being present at any mutiny or sedition, shall not use his utmost endeavours to suppress the same, shall be punished as a court martial shall think he deserves. [See the 37 Geo. 3. c. 71. for restraining intercourse with the crews of certain ships in a state of mutiny and rebellion; and for the suppression of such mutiny and rebellion; and 37 Geo. 3. c. 70. making it felony without clergy to attempt to seduce seamen (or soldiers) from their duty. This last act, and the Irish act, 37 Geo. 3. c. 40. for the same purpose are made perpetual by 57 Geo. 3. c. 7.]

21. Any person finding cause of complaint of the unwholesomeness of victuals, or upon other just ground, he shall quietly make the same known to his superior, who, as far as he is able, shall cause the same to be presently remedied; and no person upon any such or other pretence shall attempt to stir up any disturbance, upon pain of such punishment as a court martial shall think fit to inflict.

22. Any person striking any his superior officer, or drawing or offering to draw or lift up any weapon against him, being in the execution of his office, shall suffer death. And any person presuming to quarrel with any his superior officer, being in the execution of his office, or disobeying any lawful command of any his superior officer, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall be inflicted upon him by a court martial.

23. Any person quarrelling or fighting with any other person in the fleet, or using reproachful or provoking speeches or gestures, shall suffer punishment as a court martial shall impose.

24. There shall be no wasteful expense or embezzlement of any powder, shot, &c. upon penalty of such punishment as by a court martial shall be found just.

25. Every person burning or setting fire to any magazine, or store of powder, ship, &c. or furniture thereunto belonging, not then appertaining to an enemy, shall suffer death.

26. Care is to be taken that through wilfulness or negligence no ship be stranded, run upon rocks or sands, or split or hazarded; upon pain of death, or such punishment as a court martial shall deem the offence to deserve.

27. No person shall sleep upon his watch, or negligently perform his duty, or forsake his station, upon pain of death, or such punishment as, &c.

28. Murder; And,

29. Buggery or sodomy, shall be punished with death.

30. Robbery shall be punished with death, or otherwise as a court shall find meet.

31. Every person knowingly making or signing, or commanding, counselling, or procuring the making or signing, any false muster, shall be cashiered and rendered incapable of further employment.

32. Provost marshal refusing to apprehend or receive any criminal, or suffering him to escape, shall suffer such punishment as a court martial shall deem him to deserve. And all others shall do their endeavours to detect and apprehend all offenders, upon pain of being punished by a court martial.

33. If any flag-officer, captain, commander, or lieutenant, shall behave in a scandalous, infamous, cruel, oppressive, or fraudulent manner, unbecoming his character, he shall be dismissed.

34. Every person in actual service and full pay, guilty of mutiny, desertion, or disobedience, in any part of his majesty's dominions on shore, when in actual service relative to the fleet, shall be liable to be tried by a court martial, and suffer the like punishment as if the offence had been committed at sea.

35. Every person in actual service and full pay, committing upon shore, in any place out of his majesty's dominions any crime punishable by these articles, shall be liable to be tried and punished as if the crime had been committed at sea.

36. All other crimes not capital, not mentioned in this act, shall be punished according to the laws and customs used at sea. No person to be imprisoned for longer than two years. Court martial not to try any offence (except under the fifth, thirty-fourth, and thirty-fifth articles) not committed upon the main sea, or in great rivers beneath the bridges, or in any haven, &c. within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, or by persons in actual service and full pay, except such persons as mentioned in fifth article; nor to try a land officer or soldier on board of a transport-ship. The lord high admiral &c. may grant commissions to any officer commanding a chief any fleet, &c. to call courts martial, consisting of commanders and captains. And if the commander-in-chief shall die or be removed, the officer next in command may call courts martial. No commander-in-chief of a fleet, &c. of more than five ships, shall preside at any court martial in foreign parts, but the officer next in command shall preside. If a commander-in-chief shall detach any part of his fleet &c. he may empower the chief commander of the detachment to hold courts martial during the separate service. If two or more ships shall meet in foreign parts, the senior officer may hold courts martial and preside thereat. Where it is improper for the officer next to the commander-in-chief to hold or preside at a court martial, the third officer in command may be empowered to preside at, or hold, the same. No court martial shall consist of more than thirteen, nor less than five persons. Where there shall not be less than three, and yet not so many as five of the degree of a post-captain or superior rank, the officer who is to preside must call to his assistance as many commanders under the degree of a post-captain, as together with the post-captains shall make up the number five, to hold the court martial.

Proceedings shall not be delayed, if a sufficient number remain to compose the court, which shall sit from day to day (except Sunday) till sentence be given.

The judge advocate, and all officers constituting a court martial, and all witnesses, shall be upon oath. Persons refusing to give evidence may be imprisoned. Sentence of death within the narrow seas (except in case of mutiny) shall not be put in execution till a report be made to the lord high admiral, &c. Sentence of death beyond the narrow seas, shall not be put in execution but by order of the commander-in-chief of the fleet, &c. Sentence of death in any squadron detached from the fleet, shall not be put in execution (except in case of mutiny) but by order of the commander of the fleet, or lord high admiral, &c. And sentence of death passed in a court martial, held by the senior officer of five or more ships met in foreign parts, (except in case of mutiny,) shall not be put in execution but by order of the lord high admiral, &c.

The powers given by the said articles shall remain in force with respect to crews of ships wrecked, lost, or destroyed, until they be discharged or removed into another ship, or a court martial shall be held to inquire of the causes of the loss of the ship. And if upon inquiry it shall appear that all or any of the officers and seamen did their utmost to save the ship, and behaved obediently to their superior officers, their pay shall go on; as also shall the pay of officers and seamen taken by the enemy, having done their best to defend the ship, and behaved obediently. If any officer shall receive any goods on board, contrary to the eighteenth article, he shall neither forfeit the value of such goods, or 500*l.* at the election of the admiralty, half to the informer, and half to Greenwich Hospital. See Seamen, Ships.

By 31 Geo. 2. c. 10. § 1. a competent number of printed copies of the above articles of war are to be delivered to the captain or commander of every ship or vessel; who is to cause them to be hung up and affixed to the most public places of the ship, and to have them constantly kept up and renewed, so that they may be at all times accessible to the inferior officers and seamen on board; and likewise to observe that such abstract be audibly and distinctly read over, once in every month, in the presence of the officers and seamen, immediately after the articles of war are read. And by 32 Geo. 3. c. 67. abstracts of the several acts relating to the pay, &c. of the seamen are to be hung up on board all ships, &c. in like manner as the articles of war.

The offences comprehended and specified in the above articles of war may be classed under four general heads:—1. Those immediately against God and religion, contained in the first and second articles, viz. neglecting public worship, and being guilty of swearing, drunkenness, &c., the punishment of which is left to the discretion of the courts martial.—2. Such as affect the executive power of the state, or concern the criminal neglect of the established rules of discipline; these offences are specified in articles 3, 4, 5, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 27, and 31, viz. holding intelligence with an enemy or rebel; concealing letters or messages from, or revealing them; deserting to an enemy; running away with ships, stores, &c. or yielding the same to an enemy; desertion from the service, or entertaining deserters; waste or embezzlements of stores; mutinous assemblies; seditious or mutinous words; concealing any traitorous or mutinous designs, &c. striking, quarrelling, or disobeying the orders of a superior officer, sleeping upon the watch, neglecting duty or forsaking a station allotted; and knowingly signing false muster-books.—3. Such as violate or transgress the rights and duties which are owing to individuals or fellow-subjects: under which may be classed murder, robbery, &c. See articles 28, 29, 30.—4. Offences in themselves strictly military, and such as are peculiarly the object of martial law. These are recited in articles 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 17. The 12th and 13th articles as they formerly stood, by restraining the power of a court martial to the positive inflicting the punishment of death in the cases therein mentioned of cowardice, negligence, or disaffection in time of action, &c. were deemed too severe, and attended with peculiar inconveniences; one instance of which was the case of the unfortunate Admiral Byng. These articles were therefore explained and amended by § 3. of 19 Geo. 3. c. 17. whereby it is now lawful for a court martial to pronounce sentence of death, "or to inflict such other punishment as the nature and degree of the offence therein recited shall be found to deserve." See McArthur on Naval Courts Martial.

It is already mentioned under Courts Martial, that desertion from the king's armies in time of war is made felony by 18 Hen. 6. c. 19. It may here be added that by 5 Edw. 1. c. 5. § 27. this penalty extended to mariners and gunners serving in the navy.

The ground of the jurisdiction of naval courts martial depends on nearly the same reasoning as relates to those of the army; as to which see Courts Martial. The theory and general principles of courts of inquiry and courts martial in both services also rest upon the same basis. Some observations, however, more peculiarly applicable to the latter, are here introduced, chiefly from McArthur on Naval Courts Martial, and the authorities referred to by him.

It is to be observed, that though in this as in the ordinary course of the criminal judicature of the kingdom, the king has the prerogative of pardoning or remitting punishment; yet he can no more alter the sentence of a court martial than he can a judgment of any other court. At the same time it is unquestionable that the royal prerogative may be exercised on all occasions in dismissing officers from the service, even though acquitted by a court martial.

Among many reasons urged against naval courts martial, the most cogent and constitutional, at the first glance, is that of the inferior officers and seamen not being tried by their peers; for by the statute, no courts martial shall consist of more than thirteen or less than five persons, to be composed of such flag-officers, captains, or commanders, then present, as are next in seniority to the officer who presides at the court martial. This objection, however, is (we may say completely) obviated by the necessity of subordination, which could not be preserved by admitting those as jurymen, who certainly would have too great a fellow-feeling in the fate of the culprit; besides that, it would open a dangerous door to confederacies that might destroy the whole discipline of the navy.

To institute one inferior or divisional court martial, subject to appeal in the navy, analogous to the regimental courts in the army, would not be adequate to remedy some other evils complained of: for according to the ancient practice of the sea, and as established by the fourth article of the general printed instructions, a captain or commander of any of his majesty's ships or vessels has the power of inflicting punishment upon a seaman in a summary manner, for any faults or offences committed contrary to the rules of discipline and obedience established in the navy; such punishment not to exceed twelve lashes for any one fault.

All courts martial are to be held, and offences tried, in the forenoon, and in the most public part of the ship, where all who will may be present; and the captains of all his majesty's ships in company who take post, have a right to assist thereat. Instr. art. 4.

Under the 22 Geo. 2. c. 33. no member of any court martial, after the trial commenced, could go on shore, or leave the ship in which the court martial should first assemble, until sentence was given; but it having been found that this restraint and confinement might, in many cases, be attended with great inconvenience, and even prejudice to the health of the members, this clause was repealed by § 1, 2, of 19 Geo. 3. c. 17. under which all the members are now at liberty to retire upon every adjournment.

The jurisdiction of naval courts martial extends to the trial of all offences specified in the articles of war, which may be committed upon the main sea, or on great rivers only, beneath the bridges of the said rivers nigh to the sea, or in any haven, river, or creek within the jurisdiction of the admiralty; and which shall be committed by persons then in actual service and full pay in the fleet or ships of war of his majesty. 22 Geo. 2. c. 33, § 4. Likewise to the trial of all spies, and all persons whatsoever who shall come and be found in the nature of spies, as specified in the fifth of the above articles of war; as well as to the trial of every person who shall be guilty of mutiny, desertion, or disobedience to any lawful command, in any part of his majesty's dominions on shore, when in actual service, relative to the fleet; and for crimes committed on shore by such persons, in any places out of his majesty's dominions as are more fully specified in the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth of the said articles.

Murders are cognizable by courts martial only in cases where the stroke or poison is given on board ship, and the person dies in consequence thereof on board; but in order to prevent any failure of justice, it is enacted by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 31. by which the former act (2 Geo. 2. c. 24.) is repealed, that if any person be stricken or poisoned at sea or abroad, and die in England, or being stricken or poisoned in England, die at sea or abroad, the murderer and accessories are to be given up to the civil power, and may be indicted and tried in the county where the stroke, poison, or death happened. See Homicide, III. 3.

Naval courts martial can likewise take cognizance of crimes committed by warrant officers or men belonging to ships in ordinary; that is, stationed for particular purposes in the several dock-yards of the kingdom, and not in active public service. But they cannot take cognizance of offences committed by masters, mates, or seamen belonging to navy transports, as they are persons not subject to naval discipline. They are entitled to be discharged in time of war or peace, on their own application. The articles of war are never stuck up or read on board these navy transports; though the officers and men receive their wages quarterly at the dock-yards, in the same manner as the officers and men of his majesty's ships in ordinary.

By § 23 of the said 22 Geo. 2. c. 33, it is enacted, that no person, not flying from justice, shall be tried or punished by a court martial for any offence, unless the complaint of such offence be made in writing, or (and?) unless a court martial to try such offender shall be ordered within three years after the offence shall be committed; or within one year after the return of the ship into any of the ports of Great Britain or Ireland.

Pardons, when extended to a criminal tried by a naval court martial, are sent to the lords commissioners of the admiralty, who immediately transmit (as secret) their order of relieve or pardon to the commander-in-chief or senior officer of the place for the time being, where the execution would take place; signed by the lords under the admiralty seal, signifying his majesty's royal clemency, and directing the commander-in-chief to keep the whole of the order extremely secret, until the offender is, on the day appointed for execution, brought out upon deck, and every thing prepared for his execution, agreeable to the custom of the navy; and then only to make known to him his majesty's pleasure, and to release him from his confinement. M'Arthur.

As to conditional pardons to persons under sentence of naval courts martial, by which the transportation of such offenders is authorized, see 24 Geo. 3. st. 2. c. 56; 37 Geo. 3. c. 140; 55 Geo. 3. c. 156; and 56 Geo. 3. c. 5.

Some doubts having been entertained in the time of William III. whether the commissioners of the admiralty had the same power to issue commissions to a court martial to try a prisoner, as the lord high admiral was allowed to have; this and all the other powers of a lord high admiral were vested in such commissioners, by 2 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. See Admiral.

It is hinted under title Courts Martial, (ante, vol. i.) that members of courts martial are liable to answer, in damage, to the party injured, for the consequences of any unjust sentence. A remarkable instance of this occurred in the case of Lieutenant Frye, of the marines, who, in the year 1743, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment by a court martial. He brought an action against the president Sir Chaloner Ogle, and recovered 1000*l.* damages; and the judge informing him that he was at liberty to bring his action against any of the members, he proceeded against Rear-Admiral Mayne, and Captain Rentone, who were arrested by a capias from the Court of Common Pleas, at the breaking up of the court martial on Admiral Lestock, where the former presided, and the latter sat as member. This was much resented by that court martial, who passed some resolutions on the subject, reflecting in interperate language on the chief justice of the court, (Sir John Willes,) and these were laid by the lords of the admiralty before the king: upon this the chief justice caused every member of the court to be taken into custody; and was proceeding in legal measures to assert and maintain the authority of his office, when a stop was put to the process by a public written submission, signed by all the members of the court, transmitted to the lord chief justice, received and read in the Court of Common Pleas, registered in the Remembrancer's Office, and inserted in the Gazette of November 15, 1746. "A memorial (as the chief justice observed) to the present and future ages, that whoever set themselves up in opposition to the laws, or think themselves above the law, will in the end find themselves mistaken." See the case stated in M'Arthur on Courts Martial, vol. i. appendix xiii.; see further, Ships.

NAVY BILLS. As to counterfeiting, forging, or stealing them, see Forgery, Larceny.

NE ADMITTAS. A writ directed to the bishop for the plaintiff or defendant, where a quare impedit or assize of darrein presentment is depending, when either party fears that the bishop will admit the other's clerk during the suit between them; it ought to be brought within six calendar months after the avoidance, before the bishop may present by livery; for it is in vain to sue out this writ when the title to present is devolved upon the bishop. Reg. Orig. 31; F. N. B. 37. Assizes of darrein presentment are however now abolished by the 1 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 7.

Writ of ne admittas doth not lie, if the plea be not depending in the king's court by quare impedit, or darrein presentment; therefore there is a writ in the register directed to the chief justice of C. B. to certify the king in the chancery if there be any plea before him and the other judges between the parties, &c. So that the writ should not be granted until that be done; but yet it may be had out of the chancery before the king is certified that such plea of quare impedit is depending: and then the party grieved may require the chief justice to certify, &c. New Nat. Br. 83, 84. The writ runs, Prohibemus vobis, ne admittas, &c.

Immediately on the suing out of a quare impedit, if the plaintiff suspects that the bishop will admit the defendant's or any other clerk pending the suit, he (or the defendant versé) may have this prohibitory writ of ne admittas, which recites the contention begun in the king's courts, and forbids the bishop to admit any clerk whatsoever till such content be determined. And if the bishop doth, after the receipt of this writ, admit any person, even though the patron's right may have been found in a jure patronatus, then the plaintiff, after he has obtained judgment in the quare impedit, may remove the incumbent, if the clerk of a stranger, by writ of scire facias, 2 Sid. 94. And he shall have a special action against the bishop, called a quare incumbavit, to recover the presentation; and also satisfaction in damages for the injury done him by incumbering the church with a clerk pending the suit, and after the ne admittas received. F. N. B. 46. But if the bishop has incumbered the church by instituting the clerk, no quare incumbavit lies; for the bishop hath no legal notice till the writ of ne admittas is served upon him. The patron is therefore left to his quare impedit merely, which, since the stat. Westm. 2. lies as well upon a recent usurpation within six months past, as upon a disturbance without usurpation had. See 3 Comm. c. 16. p. 248, 9.

NEAT, or NET. Is the weight of a pure commodity alone, without the cask, bag, dross, &c. Merch. Diet.

NECESSARY INTROMISSION. Is when a husband or wife continues in possession of the other's goods, after their decease, for preservation. Scotch Diet.

NECESSITY. The law charges no man with default where the act is compulsory, and not voluntary, and where there is not a consent and election; therefore if there be an impossibility for a man to do otherwise, or so great a perturbation of the judgment and reason as, in presumption of law, he cannot overcome, such necessity carries a privilege in itself. See Bac. Elem. 25—29.

Compulsion and inevitable necessity are considered, by Blackstone, among those causes from whence arises a defect of will; and under which, therefore, an action is not to be considered as criminal which would otherwise be so.

These he states to be a constraint upon the will, whereby a man is urged to do that which his judgment disapproves; and which, it is to be presumed, his will (if left to itself) would reject. As punishments are therefore only inflicted for the abuse of that free will which God has given to man, it is highly just and equitable that a man should be excused for those acts which are done through unavoidable force and compulsion.

Of this nature, in the first place, is the obligation of civil subjection, whereby the inferior is constrained by the superior to act contrary to what his own reason and inclination would suggest; as when a legislature establishes iniquity by a law, and commands the subject to do an act contrary to reason or sound morality. How far this excuse will be admitted in foro conscientie, or whether the inferior in this case is bound to obey the divine, rather than the human law, is a question not determinable by municipal law, though among casuists it will hardly bear a doubt. But, however that may be, obedience to the laws in being is undoubtedly a sufficient extenuation of civil guilt before the municipal tribunal. The sheriff who burnt Latimer and Ridley, in the reign of Queen Mary, was not liable to process from Elizabeth, for executing so horrid an office; being justified by the commands of the then existing magistracy.

As to persons in private relations, the principal case where constraint of a superior is allowed as an excuse for criminal conduct, is with regard to the matrimonial subjection of a wife to her husband; for neither a son nor a servant are excused for the commission of any crime, whether capital or otherwise, by the command or coercion of the parent or master; though in some cases the command or authority of the husband, either express or implied, will privilege the wife from punishment even for capital offences; as to which see the Baron and Feme, VII.

Another species of compulsion or necessity, is what our law calls duress per minas; as to which see Duress.

There is a third species of necessity, which may be distinguished from the actual compulsion of external force or being the result of reason and reflection, which act would constrain a man's will, and oblige him to an action, which, without such obligation, would be criminal. And that is, when a man has his choice of two evils set before him, and, being under a necessity of choosing one, he chooses the least pernicious of the two. Here the will cannot be said freely to exert itself, being rather passive than active or if active, it is rather in rejecting the greater evil than in choosing the less. Of this sort is that necessity where a man by the commandment of the law is bound to arrest another for any capital offence, or to disperse a riot, and resistance is made to his authority; it is here justifiable, and even necessary, to beat, to wound, or perhaps to kill the offenders, rather than permit the murderer to escape, or the riot to continue; for the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and the apprehending of notorious malefactors, are of the utmost consequence to the public, and therefore excuse the felony which the killing would otherwise amount to. 1 Hal. P. C. 58; see 4 Comm. 27—31.

As to homicide justifiable by necessity, see Homicide, I.

In an action founded in tort against a master of a ship for throwing goods overboard, it is a good defence for him to prove that they were cast into the sea from necessity, to prevent the vessel from sinking. 2 Bulstr. 280.

The evidence of persons interested is admitted from necessity, in cases where from the nature of the subject of inquiry, it is exceedingly improbable that individuals not interested should possess any knowledge of the facts. Thus it is the constant course to admit the servant of a tradesman to prove the delivery of goods, and the payment of money, without any release from the master. 1 T. R. 790. So it has been held, that an apprentice is a competent witness, to prove money has been overpaid by mistake. Str. 647. So in an action against a carrier for not delivering a parcel, its delivery may be proved by his servant. Ross v. Rowe, Ford's MSS. 98. See further, 1 Stark on Ev. 120.

A wife is also sometimes admitted ex necessitate as a witness against her husband, as on a charge against him of violence committed on her person. 1 St. Tr. 387; 1 Str. 633; 1 T. R. 698. See Baron and Feme, 1, 2.

A right of way by necessity may likewise be pleaded to an action of trespass. See Ways.

NE DISTURBAS. The general issue in Quare Impedit. Hob. 162; Bac. Abr. Simony (1). But there is a dictum of Ashhurst, J. that there is no general issue in that action. 3 T. R. 158.

It simply denies that the defendant obstructed the presentation, and is adapted to no other ground of defence. Consequently it is never pleaded, unless in cases where there has been actually no refusal to institute and induct the plaintiff's clerk. It amounts to a confession of the right of patronage; and, therefore, upon its being pleaded, the plaintiff may immediately pray judgment and a writ to the ordinary. Or if he pleases, he may proceed in the action to maintain the disturbance, and recover damages. 1 Arch. 441; Hob. 162; Bac. Abr. Simony (1). See further Quare Impedit.

NE DONA PAS, or NON DEDIT. Was the general issue in a formedon. See 10 Wentw. 182. It merely denied the gift in tail to have been made in manner and form as alleged, and was therefore the proper plea, if the tenant meant to dispute the fact of the gift, but did not apply to any other case. See 5 East, 289.

NEEDLE-WORK. May be exported duty free. 11 & 12 W. 3. c. 3. § 15.

NE EXEAT REGNO; (or as it is sometimes, ungrammatically as it seems, termed, ne exeat regnum.) A writ (issuing out of chancery) to restrain a person from going out of the kingdom without the king's licence. F. N. B. 85. It may be directed to the sheriff to make the party find surety that he will not depart the realm; and on his refusal, to commit him to prison: or it may be directed to the party himself; and if he then goes, he may be fined. 2 Inst. 178.

The use and object of this writ is, in fact, at present, exactly the same as an arrest at law in the commencement of an action, viz. to prevent the party from withdrawing his person and property beyond the jurisdiction of the court, before a judgment could be obtained and carried into execution: so where there is a suit in equity for a demand, for which the defendant cannot be arrested in an action at law, upon an affidavit made that there is reason to apprehend that he will leave the kingdom before the conclusion of the suit, the chancellor by this writ will stop him, and will commit him to prison, unless he produces sufficient sureties that he will abide the event of the suit. 1 Comm. c. 7. p. 266. n. And see 2 Com. Dig.; F. N. B. 85, &c.; 2 C. C. 245; La. 29; 7 Mod. 9; Pre. Ch. 171; 1 P. Wms. 263, and Mr. Cox's note there; 15 Vin. 537, 9.

The affidavit of a threat or intention to go abroad must be positive, not upon information and belief. 3 Ves. 597; 16 Ves. 470. But the court acts on evidence of design to go without regard to denial. 3 Swanst. 575. And notice of motion for the writ need not be given, for that might defeat its object. 18 Ves. 355. A bill must however be first filed. 6 Ves. 92; and 3 P. W. 312, post.

The demand for which a ne exeat may be issued must in general be equitable, and not legal, except in the case of an account. 1 Ball & B. 327. It must be completely due, and be such a debt, that the sum to be marked on the writ may be ascertained. 3 Swanst. 577; 1 Turn. & Russ. 343. This writ may be obtained by a British subject against a foreigner who happens to be in this country, to enforce the adjustment of an account upon a foreign transaction, although according to the law of that country, the foreigner could not there have been held to bail. 1 Jac. & W. 405. And see 1 B. & Ad. 284.

This writ of ne exeat is also used where a party has been decreed by the ecclesiastical courts to pay alimony and costs, and is about to withdraw himself from the court's jurisdiction. A bill is filed in these cases founded on the affidavit, and prays for the writ; the granting it is matter of discretion, and as it is a severe process, and such use of it is a departure from its original purpose, the discretion is exercised with great caution. See 1 Ves. jun. 94; 7 Ves. 171; 1 Turn. and Russ. 322.

A ne exeat regno has been granted to stay a defendant from going to Scotland: for though it is not out of the kingdom, yet it is out of the process of the court, and within the same mischief. Salk. 702; 3 Mod. 127, 169; 4 Mod. 179. If the writ be sued for the king, the party against whom sued may plead licence by letters-patent, &c. which shall discharge him; but where any subject goes beyond sea with the king's licence, and continues longer than his appointed time, it hath been held he loses the benefit of a subject. 4 Leon. 29. And if a person beyond sea refuses to return to England on the king's letters under his privy seal, commanding him upon his allegiance to return; being certified into the chancery, a commission may be awarded to seize his lands and goods for the contempt; and so it is if such person's servants hinder a messenger from delivering his message, on affidavit of it, &c. Jenk. Cent. 246; 3 Nels. Abr. 211. See King, V. 3.

The right which the king has, whenever he sees proper, of confining his subjects to stay within the realm, (or of recalling them when beyond sea,) is classed by Blackstone among his prerogatives as Generalissimo of the realm. By the common law every man may go out of the realm for whatever cause he pleaseth, without obtaining the king's leave; provided he is under no injunction of staying at home; (which liberty was expressly declared in king John's great charter, though left out in that of Henry III.), but, because that every man ought of right to defend the king and his realm, therefore the king at his pleasure may command him by his writ that he go not beyond the seas, or out of the realm without licence; and if he do the contrary, he shall be punished for disobeying the king's command. F. N. B. 85. Some persons there anciently were, that, by reason of their stations, were under a perpetual prohibition of going abroad without licence obtained; among which were reckoned all peers, on account of their being counsellors of the crown; all knights, who were bound to defend the kingdom from invasions: all ecclesiastics, who were expressly confined, by the fourth chapter of the constitution of Clarendon, on account of their attachment in the times of popery to the see of Rome; all archers and other artificers, lest they should instruct foreigners to rival us in their several trades and manufactures. This was law in the times of Britton, who wrote in the reign of Edw. I. And Sir E. Coke gives us many instances to this effect in the time of Edw. III. Britton, c. 133; 3 Inst. 175. In the succeeding reign the affair of travelling wore a very different aspect: an act of parliament being made (5 Ric. 2 c. 2.), forbidding all persons whatever to go abroad without licence; except only the lords and other great men of the realm; and true and notable merchants; and the king's soldiers. But this act was repealed by 4 Jac. 1. c. 1. And at present every body has, or at least assumes, the liberty of going abroad when he pleases. Yet undoubtedly if the king by writ of ne exeat regno under his great seal or privy seal, thinks proper to prohibit him from so doing, and the subject disobeys, it is a high contempt of the king's prerogative, for which the offender's lands shall be seized till he return, and then he is liable to fine and imprisonment. 1 Hawk. P. C. 22; 1 Comm. c. 7.

It is said, in Lord Bacon's Ordinances, No. 89, that, "towards the latter end of the reign of king James I. this writ was first thought proper to be granted, not only in respect of attempts prejudicial to the king and state; (in which case the lord chancellor granted it on application from any of the principal secretaries, without showing cause, or upon such information as his lordship should think of weight;) but also in the case of interlopers in trade; great bankrupts in whose estates many subjects might be interested; in duels and other cases that did concern multitudes of the king's subjects."

But in the year 1734, Lord Chancellor Tulbot declared, that in his experience he never knew this writ of ne exeat regno granted or taken out without a bill first filed. It is true, it was originally a state-writ, but for some time, though not very long, it has been made use of in aid of the subjects for the helping of them to justice; but it ought not to be made use of where the demand is entirely at law, for there the plaintiff has bail, and he ought not to have double bail both in law and equity. 3 P. Wms. 312.

NEGATIVE. Is a proposition by which something is denied; also a particle of denial; as, not. An affirmative includes a negative; for where any thing is limited to be done in one form, this includes a negative on the contrary. Plowd. 206. b. 207. a; 2 P. Wms. 19. But, 2 contra, a negative or prohibition does not necessarily imply an affirmation. 2 P. Wms. 9.

A negative cannot be proved or testified by witnesses, only an affirmative. 2 Inst. 682. Though a negative is incapable of being proved directly, yet indirectly it is otherwise. For in case one accuses B. to have been at York, and there to have committed a certain fact, in proof of which he produces several witnesses; here B. cannot prove that he was not at York against positive evidence that he was; but shall be allowed to make out the negative by collateral testimony, that at that very time he was at Exeter, &c. in such a house and in such a company. Fortescue, 87.

Negative may be implied by an affirmative, but not necessarily 2 contra. As the saying, that a papist, unless he conforms, shall not take by devise, does not necessarily imply that if he does conform he shall take by devise, &c. 2 P. Wms. 9.

NEGATIVE PREGNANT, negativa pregnans. Is a negative, implying also an affirmative; as if a man being impleaded to have done a thing on such a day, or in such a place, denieth that he did it modo et forma declarata, which implieth, nevertheless, that in some sort he did it; or if a man be said to have alienated land in fee, and he saith he hath not aliened in fee, that is a negative pregnant, for though he hath not aliened in fee, yet it may be, he hath made an estate in tail. Terms of the Law.

A negative pregnant is a fault in pleading, to which there must be a special demurrer, for the court will intend every pleading to be good, till the contrary doth appear. See 2 Leon. 248; Bro. Issue join. pl. 81; Huth's Mac. 53; 2 Loe. 199; Cro. Jac. 559, 560.

A negative pregnant is such a form of negative expression, as may imply or carry within it an affirmative. This is considered as a fault in pleading; and the reason why it is so considered is, that the meaning of such a form of expression is ambiguous. In trespass, for entering the plaintiff's house, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff's daughter gave him licence to do so, and that he entered by that licence. The plaintiff replied, that he did not enter by her licence. This was considered as a negative pregnant; and it was held that the plaintiff should have traversed the entry by itself, or the licence by itself, and not both together. Cro. Jac. 87. It will be observed that this form of traverse may imply, or carry within it, that a licence was given, though the defendant did not enter by that licence. It is, therefore, in the language of pleading, said to be pregnant with that admission,—viz., that a licence was given. Bac. Abr. Pleas, &c. At the same time the licence is not expressly admitted; and the effect therefore is, to leave it in doubt, whether the plaintiff means to deny the licence, or to deny that the defendant entered by virtue of that licence. It is this ambiguity which appears to constitute the fault. 28 Hen. 6, 7; Hob. 295; States' Prac. Reg. tit. Negative Pregnant.

This rule, however, against a negative pregnant, appears in modern times at least to have received no very strict construction. For many cases have occurred, in which, upon various grounds of distinction from the general rule, that a negative expression has been held free from objection. See several instances in Com. Dig. Pleader, (R. 6.) Thus in debt on a bond, conditioned to perform the covenants in an indenture of lease, one of which covenants was, that the defendant, the lessee, would not deliver possession to any but the lessor, or such persons as should lawfully evict him; the defendant pleaded, that he did not deliver the possession to any but such as lawfully evicted him. On demurrer to this plea, it was objected that the same was ill, and a negative pregnant; and that he ought to have said, that such an one lawfully evicted him, to whom he delivered the possession; or that he did not deliver the possession to any; but the court held the plea as pursuing the words of the covenant good, being in the negative,—and that the plaintiff ought to have replied, and assigned a breach; and therefore judgment was given against him. 1 Lev. 88. Stephen on Pleading, 428; 1st ed. See further, 15 Vin. Abr. title Negative pregnant; and title Pleading.

MAGNITUDE. To claim kindred. Leg. H. 1. c. 70; 1 L. Ind. § 7, 8.

Negligence. Negligence may be considered, 1st, generally as a test of civil or criminal liability. A gross and wanton disregard of the interests of others is not distinguishable, either in point of moral guilt, or evil results, from a malicious intention to injure; and therefore, where a man so even his own carelessly and negligently, and without a reasonable degree of care and caution not to injure others, where injury is likely to ensue, he is usually not only civilly but even criminally responsible for the consequences. It may be regarded as an important and fundamental principle of adjudication, in cases where a loss occasioned by spoliation of fraud must fall on one, or the other of two innocent persons, that he through whose negligence or want of caution the injury has been effected should bear the loss. See 6 Loe. 76; 1 B. & C. 70.

In the next place, negligence may be regarded as a species of fault, being a breach of some undertaking, either express or implied; in this point of view its effect will at present be considered. Where the plaintiff complains of an injury resulting from the negligence or unskilful conduct of the defendant, in the performance of some work or duty undertaken by the latter, he must, whether the action be framed in contract or in tort, prove, 1st. The contract or undertaking on the ground of which the defendant acted. 2dly, The negligence of the defendant. 3dly, The loss which has resulted from it, according to the allegations in the declaration. The degree of negligence which is essential to the action varies much in reference to circumstances. According to the soundest principles of morality, the very foundation of the law itself—"whoever undertakes another man's business, makes it his own, that is, promises to employ upon it the same care, attention, and diligence, that he would do if it were actually his own; for he knows that the business was committed to him with that expectation, and with no more than this." This principle seems to govern all cases where one man acts gratuitously for another, whether the business in which he acts does or does not import particular skill and knowledge. If the party act gratuitously, and in a situation which does not import particular skill and experience, and act bond fide to the best of his ability, and with as much discretion as he would exercise in his own affairs, he is not liable to an action for any loss which ensues.

Thus, where a merchant voluntarily, and without reward, undertook to enter a parcel of goods at the custom-house for the plaintiff, together with a parcel of his own, and made the entry under a wrong denomination, in consequence of which the goods were seized, it was held that having acted bond fide, and to the best of his knowledge, he was not liable. 1 H. Bl. 158. But it seems, that in such a case, if a ship broker or clerk in a custom-house had undertaken to enter the goods, although gratuitously, such a mistake in making the entry would have amounted to gross negligence, since his situation and employment would then have necessarily implied a complete degree of knowledge in making such entries. See Lord Loughborough's observations, 1 H. B. 162.

Although in each of the preceding cases the agent acted gratuitously, in the former he was not liable, because he acted to the best of his ability, which was all that he engaged to do; in the latter, he impliedly undertook to exert a degree of skill and knowledge which he failed to do.

Most then of the cases of this nature, if not all, resolve themselves into a question of understanding and compact. Lord Holt, in the case of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Ray. 808, held, that the mandatory was liable, because in such a case a neglect is a deceit to the bailor: for when he trusts the bailee upon his undertaking to be careful, he has put a fraud upon the plaintiff by being negligent, his pretence of care being the persuasion that induced the plaintiff to trust him; and a breach of trust undertaken voluntarily will be a good ground of action.

Where a party receives a reward for the performance of certain acts, he is by law answerable for any degree of neglect on his part; the payment of the money may be considered as an insurance for the due performing of what he has undertaken. See 1 H. Bl. 161. And it seems, that in general, where a person professes himself to be of a certain business, trade, or profession, and undertakes to perform an act which relates to his particular employment, an action lies for any injury resulting either from want of skill in his business or profession, or from negligence or carelessness in his conduct. 8 East, 348.

In some instances, as in the cases of carriers and innkeepers, (see these titles,) the undertaking results as a legal obligation incident to the character in which the defendant undertakes to act; and it is consequently sufficient to show that the plaintiff dealt with him in that character, without proof of any special undertaking of agreement.

The question of negligence is usually one of fact for the jury. The question may be either one of law, where the case falls within any general and settled rule or principle; or of fact, where no such rule or principle is applicable to the particular circumstances, and where therefore the conclusion of negligence in fact must be found, or excluded by the jury.

In an action against a coach owner for negligence, proof that the coach broke down, and that the plaintiff was greatly bruised, is prima facie evidence that the injury arose from the unskilfulness of the driver, or the insufficiency of the coach. 2 Camp. 79. NE INJUSTE VEXES. A writ founded on Magna Carta, c. 10, that lay for a tenant distrained by his lord, for more services than he ought to perform; and it was a prohibition to the lord not unjustly to distrain or vex his tenant: in a special use, it was where the tenant had prejudiced himself, by doing greater services, or paying more rent, without constraint, than he needed; for in that case, by reason of the lord's seisin, the tenant could not avoid it by avowry, but was driven to his writ for remedy. Reg. Orig. 4; F. N. B. 10. And if the lord distrained to do other services, or to pay other rent than due, after the prohibition delivered unto him, then the tenant should have an attachment against the lord, &c. and when the lord came thereon, the tenant should count against him, and put himself upon the grand assise, &c. whereupon judgment should be given. New Nat. Br. 22.

This writ was one of the remedies which the ancient law provided to remedy the oppression of lords; though it was of the prohibitory kind, yet it was in the nature of a writ of right. Booth, 126. It lay where tenant in fee simple and his ancestors had held of the lord by certain services, and the lord had obtained seisin of more or greater service, by the inadvertent payment or performance of them by the tenant himself; there the tenant could not in an avowry avoid the lord's possessory right, because of the seisin given by his own hands; but was driven to this writ to divest the lord's possession, and to establish the mere right of property, by ascertaining the services, and reducing them to their proper standard. 3 Comm. c. 15. p. 234.

The writ was always ancestral, where the tenant and his ancestors had holden of the lord and his ancestors; and the lord had encroached any rent, &c. A feoffee could not avoid seisin of rent had by encroachment of his feoffor, nor have the writ ne injuste vexes; also a man could not have a writ of ne injuste vexes against the grantee of the seignior. Mich. 18 Ed. 2; 10 Ed. 3. Tenant in tail might not have this writ; but should plead and show the matter, and not to be estopped by the payment of his ancestors, &c.; Trin. 20 Ed. 3; for he might avoid such seisin of the lord obtained from the payment of his ancestors, by plea to an avowry in replevin. F. N. B. 11; 2 Inst. 21.

This writ has been long laid aside, as almost every question that arose, where it was formerly in use, might be determined in an action of trespass. It is now abolished by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 35.

The following was the form of the writ of ne injuste vexes :—

George the Third, &c. To A. B. greeting: We command you, that you do not vex or trouble C. D., or suffer him to be vexed, for his freehold messuage, &c. which he holds of you, in, &c. Nor in any manner exact, or permit to be exacted from him, services which therefore he ought not to do, (or rent which he owes not,) nor has been accustomed, &c.

NEMINE CONTRADICENTE. Words used to signify the unanimous consent of the members of the House of Commons in parliament to a vote or resolution. The term Nemine dissentiente is, in the same manner, applied in the House of Peers.

NE RECIPIATUR. A caveat against the receiving and setting down a cause to be tried; that is, where the cause is not entered in due time. See Trial.

NE UNQUES EXECUTOR, or ADMINISTRATOR. A plea whereby a defendant denies his being executor or administrator. It does not deny the cause of action, but only that the defendant is the personal representative of the testator or intestate. 1 Saund. 207, a.

NE UNQUES ACCOUPLE, in loyal matrimonio.] A plea, whereby the tenant in an action of dower, under nihil habet, controverts the validity of the demandant's marriage with the person out of whose lands she claims dower. Co. Ent. 180, a; Com. Dig. Pleader, (2 Y 10.)

To this plea the demandant must reply, that she was accoupled in lawful matrimony at B., in such a diocese, upon which a writ issues to the bishop of that diocese, requiring him to certify the fact to the court. Co. Ent. 180, a; Rast. Ent. 228, b; Dyer 313 a, 308, b; 2 H. Bl. 145.

NEW ASSIGNMENT. In many actions the plaintiff who hath alleged in his declaration a general wrong, may, in his replication, after an evasive plea by the defendant, reduce that general wrong to a more particular certainty, by assigning the injury afresh, with all its specific circumstances, in such a manner as clearly to ascertain and identify it consistently with his general complaint; which is called a new or novel assignment. 3 Comm. 311. See Pleading.

The following perspicuous account of the nature and object of a new assignment is taken from Serjeant Stephens's valuable treatise on pleading :—

A new assignment is a method of pleading, to which the plaintiff, in such cases, is obliged to resort in his replication for the purpose of settling the defendant's right. An example shall be given in an action for assault and battery. A case may occur, in which the plaintiff has been twice assaulted by the defendant; and one of these assaults may have been justifiable, being committed in self defence, while the other may have been committed without any legal excuse. Supposing the plaintiff to bring his action for the latter, it will be found, by referring to the precedents of declaration for assault and battery, that the statement is so general, as not to indicate to which of the two assaults the plaintiff means to refer. The defendant may, therefore, suppose, or affect to suppose, that the first is the assault intended, and will plead son assault demesne, (see that title.) This plea the plaintiff cannot safely traverse; because, as an assault was in fact committed by the defendant, under the circumstances & excuse here alleged, the defendant would have a right, upon the issue joined upon such traverse, to prove those circumstances, and to presume such assault, and no other, as the cause of action. And it is evidently reasonable that he should have this right; for, if the plaintiff were, at the trial of the issue, to be allowed to set up a different assault than the defendant might suffer by a mistake, into which he had been led by the generality of the plaintiff's declaration. The plaintiff, therefore, in the case supposed, not being able safely to traverse, and having no ground for demurrer, or for pleading in confession and avoidance, has no course but, by a new pleading, to correct the mistake occasioned by the generality of the declaration, and to declare that he brought his action, not for the first, but for the second assault, and this is called a new assignment.

The example that has been given is a case where the defendant, in his plea, wholly mistakes the subject of complaint. But it may also happen, that the plea correctly applies to part of the injuries; while, owing to a misapprehension occasioned by the generality of the statement in the declaration, it fails to cover the whole. Thus, in trespass quare clausum fregit, for repeated trespasses, the declaration usually states, that the defendant, on divers days and times, before the commencement of the suit, broke and entered the plaintiff's close, and trod down the soil, &c., without setting forth more specifically in what parts of the close, or on what occasions, the defendant trespassed. Now the case may be, that the defendant claims a right of way over a certain part of the close; and, in exercise of that right, has repeatedly entered, and walked over it; but has also entered and trod down the soil, &c., on other occasions, and in parts out of the supposed right of way; and the plaintiff, not admitting the right claimed, may have intended to point this action both to the one set of trespasses and to the other. But from the generality of the declaration, the defendant is entitled to suppose that it refers only to his entering and walking in the line of way. He may therefore, in his plea, allege, as a complete answer to the whole complaint, that he has a right of way by grant, &c., over the said close; and if he does this, and the plaintiff replies himself, in his replication, to a traverse of that plea, or if the defendant at the trial proves a right of way as alleged, the plaintiff would be precluded (upon the principle already explained, from giving evidence of any trespasses committed out of the line or tract in which the defendant should thus appear entitled to pass. His course of pleading in such a case, therefore, is, both to traverse the plea, and also to new assign, by alleging that he brought his action, not only for the trespasses supposed by the defendant, but for others, committed on other occasions, and in other parts of the close, out of the supposed way, which is usually called a new assignment, extra viam; or if he means to admit the right of way, he may new assign simply without the traverse. See examples of a new assignment, extra viam, 9 Went. 323, 326.

As the object of a new assignment is to correct a mistake occasioned by the generality of the declaration, it always occurs in answer to a plea; and is, therefore, in the nature of a replication. It is not used in any other part of the pleadings, because the statements subsequent to the declaration are not in that nature, such, when properly framed, to give rise to the kind of mistake which requires to be corrected by a new assignment. See the Next Assignment.

A new assignment chiefly occurs in an action of trespass; but it is generally allowed in all actions in which the declaration makes the reason of the practice applicable.

Several new assignments may occur in the course of the same series of pleading. Thus, in the example given above, if it be supposed that three different assaults had been committed, two of which were justifiable, the defendant might plead, as above, to the declaration; and then, by way of new assignment, he might again justify, in the same manner, another assault; upon which, it would become necessary for the plaintiff to new assign a third; and this is required by the same principle by which the first new assignment was required. 1 Saund. 299 c.

A new assignment is said to be in the nature of a new declaration. Bac. Abr. Trespass, (I.), 4, 2; 1 Saund. 299, c. It seems, however, to be more properly considered as a repetition of the declaration, differing only in this, that it distinguishes the true ground of complaint, as being different from that which is covered by the plea. Being in the nature of a new, or repeated declaration, it is consequently to be framed with as much certainty or specification of circumstance as the declaration itself. Bac. Abr. ubi supra. In some cases, indeed, it should be even more particular; so as to avoid the necessity of another new assignment.

A new assignment was formerly of frequent occurrence in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. In that action it was, until recently, allowable for the plaintiff to declare for breaking his close in a certain parish, without naming, or otherwise describing the close. See 2 Bl. 1089. If the defendant happened to have any freehold land in the same parish, he might be supposed to mistake the close in question for his own; and might, therefore, plead what is called the common bar, viz., that the close in which the trespass was committed was his own freehold. And then, upon the principle already explained, it became necessary for the plaintiff to new assign; alleging, that he brought his action in respect of a different close from that claimed by the defendant as his freehold. In order, however, to avoid the necessity of a new assignment, it has long been the practice to name or describe the close in the declaration; and now, by the general rules, H. T. & W. 4. the close must be designated in the declaration by name, or abutments, or other description; in failure whereof, the defendant may demur specially. See further Pleading, Trespass.

NEWCASTLE UPON TYNE. No person shall ship, load, or unload any goods to be sold, into or from ships at any place on the river Tyne, but at the town of Newcastle, on pain to forfeit the goods; and none shall raise any wear in the haven there, between certain places on the said river, &c. Stat. 21 H. 8. c. 18.

NEW FOREST, Hampshire. See 39 & 40 G. 3. c. 86; & 41 G. 3. (U. K.) c. 108, for the preservation of timber there, and for ascertaining the bounds of the forest.

NEWFOUNDLAND. See Fisheries, Plantations.

NEWPORT, in the Isle of Wight. The poll for a knight of the shire is to be held at Newport for the whole of the island, which is now severed from Hampshire. See 2 W. 4. c. 45. § 16.

NEW RIVER. See Rivers.

NEWS. Spreading false news, to make discord between the king and nobility, or concerning any great man of the realm, is punishable at common law with fine and imprisonment; which is confirmed by Westm. 1. 3 E. 1. c. 34; 2 R. 3. st. 1. c. 5; 12 R. 2. c. 11; 2 Inst. 226; 3 Inst. 198; 4 Comm. c. 11. p. 149. See False News.

NEWSPAPERS. The earliest attempt at periodical literature was made, in England, in the reign of Elizabeth. It was in the shape of a pamphlet, called the "English Mercury;" and its first number, dated 1588, is still preserved in the British Museum. No newspapers, however, appeared in England, in single sheets of paper, until many years afterwards. The first newspaper, called "The Public Intelligencer," was published by Sir Roger L'Estrange, on the 31st of August, 1663. Periodical pamphlets, which had become fashionable in the reign of Charles I., were more rare in the reign of James II. The rebellion in 1641 gave rise to a great number of tracts, filled with violent appeals to the public, many of which bore the title of diurnal occurrences of parliament. The first gazette in England was published at Oxford, on the 7th of November, 1665; the court being then held there. On the removal of the court to London, the title was altered to "The London Gazette." The "Orange Intelligencer" was the third newspaper published, and the first after the Revolution in 1688. This latter continued to be the only daily newspaper in England for some years; but, in 1690, there appears to have been nine London newspapers published weekly. In Queen Anne's reign, (in 1709), the number of these was increased to eighteen; but still there continued to be but one daily paper, which was then called "The London Courant." In the reign of George I., the number was three daily, six weekly, and ten published three times in the week.

In 1833, the number of newspapers in the United Kingdom amounted to 369; whereof 248 were published in England, 46 in Scotland, and 75 in Ireland.

A variety of statutory regulations have been made with respect to newspapers, for the purpose of securing to government the heavy duties with which they are charged, and for facilitating the proof of their publication.

By the 5 G. 3. c. 46. the persons applying for stamped paper for newspapers, were first to give security to his majesty for the payment of the advertisement duties.

By the 29 G. 3. c. 50. the duties on newspapers were put under the management of the commissioners of stamps; and (§ 10) the proprietors of such papers were required to join in the security to be given under the above act.

By the 38 G. 3. c. 78. no person is to print or publish a newspaper until an affidavit be delivered at the stamp office, specifying the names and abode of the printer, publisher, and of the proprietors, if the number, exclusive of the printer and publisher, do not exceed two; and in case they exceed that number, then of two of such proprietors, and also their proportional shares in the paper, with a description of the printing house and the title of such paper. Printing, &c., a newspaper without such an affidavit renders the party liable to a penalty of 500*l*.

§ 10. requires the names of the printers and publishers of the paper to be printed in some part thereof, under a penalty of 100*l*.

By § 11, after production of the affidavit, or a certified copy thereof, and of a newspaper intituled as that mentioned in such affidavit, it shall not be necessary to prove that such paper was purchased of the defendants or their servants.

§ 17. A copy of every newspaper is to be delivered within six days after publication to the commissioners of stamps, on a penalty of 100*l*.

By the 60 G. 3. & 1 G. 4. c. 9. (passed to restrain the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels,) all pamphlets, and papers containing public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or remarks thereon, or upon any matter of church or state, printed in any part of the United Kingdom, and published periodically in parts or numbers, at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days, where the same shall not exceed two sheets, and be published for less than sixpence, exclusive of the duty thereon imposed, shall be deemed newspapers, within the acts relating to newspapers.

By § 8. no person shall print or publish newspapers or pamphlets containing public news, &c., without entering into a recognizance of 300*l*., if such papers, &c., are printed in London, or Westminster, or in Edinburgh, or in Dublin; or giving a bond in 200*l*. (or 300*l*., if within twenty miles of London) with two or three sufficient sureties, where the papers, &c. are printed elsewhere, for securing fines upon conviction for blasphemous or seditious libels.

By the 1 W. 4. c. 73. the amount of recognizances to be given under the above act, by principals and their sureties, is increased to 400*l*., and of bonds, to 300*l*.; and damages due for any libel may be recovered on such recognizances, &c.

By 6 G. 4. c. 119. newspapers, which before could not be contained on sheets of paper exceeding thirty-two inches in length, and twenty-two inches in breadth, may be printed on paper of any size.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 23. the duties on advertisements were considerably reduced; but no alterations has been made in the amount of the stamps required on newspapers, which are regulated by the 55 G. 3. c. 184.

For the conveyance of newspapers by post, see Post Office.

NEW STYLE. See Year.

NEW TRIAL. Judgments are often suspended by granting new trials. The causes of suspending the judgment by granting a new trial, are at present wholly extrinsic, arising from matter foreign to or dehors the record. See Trial.

NEXT OF KIN. See Descent; Executor, III.; and V 8.

NICOLE. Anciently used for Lincoln. 7 E. 1; 30 Ed. 1; et sæpe alibi. Cowell.

NIDERLING, NIDERING, or NITHING. A vile, base person, or sluggard. Will. of Malmsb. p. 121; Mat. Par. Ann. 1088 Chicken-hearted. See Spelman in voc.

NIENT COMPRISE. Is an exception taken to a petition, because the thing desired is not contained in that deed or proceeding whereon the petition is founded; for example, one desires of the court wherein a recovery is had of lands, &c. to be put in possession of a house, formerly among the lands adjudged unto him; to which the adverse party pleads, that this is not to be granted, by reason this house is not comprised amongst the lands and houses for which he had judgment. New Book Entries.

NIENT DEDIRE. Signifies to suffer judgment to be had against one, by not denying or opposing it, i. e. by default.

When a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the venue is laid, the court, on an affidavit of the circumstances, will change it in transitory actions; or in local actions, will give leave to enter a suggestion on the roll, with a nient dedire, in order to have the trial in an adjoining county. 1 Tidd's Pr. 655, 8th ed.

NIGER LIBER. The black book or register in the Exchequer is called by this name. Several chartularies of abbeys, cathedrals, &c. are distinguished by a like appellation.

NIGHT. Is when it is so dark that the countenance of a man cannot be discerned; and by some opinions, burglary in the night may be committed at any time after sun-set, and before rising. H. P. C. 79; 3 Inst. 63; 1 Hawk. P. C. See Noctanter; Burglary.

Under the act against poaching by night (9 G. 4. c. 69. § 12.) the night is to be considered to commence at the expiration of the first hour after sun-set, and to conclude at the beginning of the last hour before sun-rise.

NIGHTWALKERS. Are such persons as sleep by day, and walk by night, being oftentimes pilferers, or disturbers of the peace. 5 Ed. 3. c. 14.

Constables are authorised by the common law to arrest nightwalkers, and suspicious persons, &c. Watchmen may also arrest nightwalkers, and hold them until the morning; and it is said, that a private person may arrest any suspicious night-walker, and detain him till he give a good account of himself. 2 Hawk. P. C. Watchmen, either those appointed by the statute of Winchester, 13 E. 1. c. 4, to keep watch and ward in all towns from sun-setting till sun-rising, or such as are mere assistants to the constable, may, virtute officii, arrest all offenders, and particularly nightwalkers, and commit them to custody till morning. 4 Comm. c. 31. p. 292; cites 2 Hawk. P. C. 88—96. One may be bound to the good behaviour for being a nightwalker; and common nightwalkers and haunters of bawdy-houses are to be indicted before justices of peace, &c. 1 Hawk. P. C.; 2 Hawk. P. C.; Latch. 173 Poph. 280.

By the 5 G. 4. c. 83. all provisions theretofore made, relative to idle and disorderly persons, rogues and vagabonds, incorrigible rogues, or other vagrants, in England, are repealed. The provisions of this statute will be found under tit. Vagrants.

NIHIL CAPIAT PER BREVE, or per Billam. Is the judgment given against the plaintiff in an action, either in bar of his action, or in abatement of his writ or bill, &c. Co. Litt. 363.

Proceedings by bill are now abolished. See Process.

NIHIL, or NIL DEBET. Was the proper form of the general issue, not only in debt or simple contract, but in all other actions of debt, not founded on a deed or specialty. And an action was not considered as founded on a deed or specialty, so as to require a plea of non est factum, if the deed were mentioned in the declaration only as introductory to some other main cause of action. Therefore nil debet was a good plea in debt for rent, upon an indenture, or in debt for an escape, or in debt upon a devastavit. 1 Tidd, 701, 8th ed.

There was hardly any matter of defence to an action of debt, to which the plea of nil debet might not be applied; because almost all defences resolved themselves into a denial of the debt. See Stephen on Pleading, 194, 1st ed.

Now, by the general rules, H. T. 4. W. 4. the plea of nil debet is no longer allowed in any action.

NIHIL, or NIL DICIT. Is a failing by the defendant to put in an answer to the plaintiff by the day assigned; which being omitted, judgment is had against him of course, as saying nothing why it should not. See Judgment.

NIHIL, or NIL HABUIT IN TENEMENTIS. A plea to be pleaded in an action of debt only, brought by a lessor against lessee for years, or at will, without deed. 2 Lil. Abr. 214. In debt for rent upon an indenture of lease, nil habuit in tenementis may not be pleaded; because it is an estoppel, and a general demurrer will serve. 3 Lev. 146. But if debt is brought for rent upon a deed poll, the defendant may plead this plea; and where a defendant pleaded nil habuit in tenementis tempore dimissionis, the plaintiff replied, quod habuit in tenementis, &c. and verdict and judgment was had for the plaintiff; whereupon writ of error being brought, it was assigned for error, that the replication was not good, for he ought to have shown what estate he then had; and of that opinion was the court; and it had been bad upon demurrer; but being after a verdict, it is good. Cro. Jac. 312. If a less estate is found than the plaintiff pleads in his reply to a nil habuit, &c. so as it be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to make a lease, it is good enough. 10 W. 3. Nil habuit in tenementis cannot be given in evidence where the plaintiff hath been in possession. Ld. Raym. 746.

But though nil habuit in tenementis is a bad plea, when demurred to, yet where the declaration merely states quod cum dimissionet, without stating an indenture, it is, prima facie, a good plea, till the plaintiff reply to the indenture, and rely on the estoppel; and if the plaintiff replies, that he had a sufficient estate in the premises, he loses the benefit of the estoppel. 6 T. R. 62; 1 Will. Saund. 276, b. And if the lessor become bankrupt, the assignees have the benefit of the estoppel, if the demise is by indenture. 7 T. R. 537: and see Bac. Ab. tit. Pleas, G. 3. p. 253, (7th ed.) In assumpsit for use and occupation, nil habuit is a bad plea. 1 Wils. 314. See Covenant, Pleading.

NIHILS, or NICHILS. Were issues which the sheriff that was apposed in the Exchequer said were nothing worth, and illeivable, for the insufficiency of the parties from whom due. Accounts of nihil should be put out of the Exchequer. 5 R. 2. c. 13.

But now, by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 99. sheriffs are no longer to be apposed, or to pass their accounts in the Exchequer; but these are to be audited by the commissioners for auditing the public accounts.

NISI PRIUS. The commission to justices of assize; so called from a judicial writ of distringas, whereby the sheriff is commanded to distrain the empannelled jury to appear at Westminster before the justices at a certain day, in the following term, to try some cause. Nisi prius justic. domini regis ad assisas capiend. venerint, viz. unless the justices come before that day to such a place, &c. 2 Inst. 1. c. 1. Inst. 169.

A writ of nisi prius is where an issue is joined; then there goes a venire to summon the jury to appear at a day in court; and upon the return of the venire, with the panel of the jurors' names, the record of nisi prius is made up and sealed, and there goes forth the writ of distringas to have the jurors in court, Nisi prius justic. venerint, &c. such a day in such a county, to try the issue joined between the parties. 2 Lil. 215.

All civil causes at issue in the courts at Westminster, are brought down in the two issuable vacations before the day of appearance appointed for the jury above, into the county where the action was laid to be tried there, viz. at the assizes; and then, upon the return of the verdict given by the jury to the court above, the next term, the judges there give judgment for the party for whom the verdict is found; and these trials by nisi prius are for the ease of the county, the parties, jurors, and witnesses, by saving them the charge and trouble of coming to Westminster; but in matters of great weight and difficulty, the judges above, upon motion, will retain causes to be tried there; though laid in the country, and then the juries and witnesses in such causes must come up to the courts at Westminster for trial at bar; and the king hath his election to try his suits at the bar, or in the county, &c. Wood's Inst. 479.

The statute of Westm. 2. 13 Ed. 1. st. 1. c. 30. having ordained, "that all pleas in either bench, which require only an easy examination, shall be determined in the country, before justices of assize, by virtue of the writ appointed by that statute, commonly called the writ of nisi prius; it has been held, that an issue joined in the King's Bench upon an indictment or appeal (now abolished,) whether for treason or felony, or a crime of an inferior nature, committed in a different county from that wherein the court sits, may be tried in the proper county by writ of nisi prius: but as the king is not expressly named in this statute, and it is a general rule that he shall not be bound except named, it is said, where the king is party, a nisi prius ought not to be granted without his special warrant, or the assent of his attorney; though the court may grant it in appeals in the same manner as any other actions. 2 Inst. 424; 4 Inst. 160; Dyer 46; 2 Hawk P. C. c. 42. § 2, 3.

Justices of nisi prius have power to record nonsuits and defaults in the country at the days assigned; and are to report them at the bench, &c. And are to hear and determine conspiracy, confederacy, champerty, &c. 4 Ed. 3. c. 11.

Nisi prius was granted in attainds (abolished by 6 G. 4. c. 50. § 60); but that which cannot be determined before the justices upon the nisi prius, shall be adjourned to the bench where they are justices; and the justices before whom inquisitions, inquests, and juries, shall be taken by the king's writ of nisi prius, are empowered to give judgment in felony and treason, &c. and to award execution by force of their judgment. 5 Ed. 3. c. 11; 14 Hen. 6. c. 1.

It was held by Hale, that the justices of nisi prius have not any original power of determining felony, without special commission for that purpose; and by virtue of 27 Ed. 1. st. 1. c. 3; 14 H. 6. c. 1, they have authority to determine such felonies only as are sent down to be tried before them; in which case, on removal of the indictments, they may proceed to trial and judgment as if justices of gaol-delivery. 1 H. 1. Hist. P. C. 1.

The sessions of the judges at nisi prius are chiefly confined to criminal causes, those in London and Middlesex being regulated by 18 Edw. 1. c. 12; 12 Geo. 1. c. 31; 24 Geo. 2. c. 18; 1 G. 3. c. 1, and 1 Wm. 4. c. 70; and those at the assizes by the statute of Westminster 2, 13 Edw. 1. c. 30; 27 Edw. 1. c. 4; 12 Edw. 2. st. 1. c. 3; and 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 16.

By the construction of these statutes, the Court of King's Bench may grant a writ of nisi prius as well in cases of treason and felony, as in other common cases. 2 Hawk. c. 3. § 7; c. 42. § 2. Yet, inasmuch as the king is not expressly named in the statute of Westm. 2, it seems to have been generally holden, that whenever the king is a party, it is irregular to grant a trial by nisi prius without his special warrant, or the assent of the attorney-general. 6 Mod. 246; 2 Hawk. c. 42. § 3. And in one case where, on an indictment for barratry against a justice of peace, the attorney-general himself moved for a trial at nisi prius, the court (thinking it was a cause that required great examination) refused the motion, unless the king, by his letters, should signify his pleasure that the indictment should be so tried, which was afterwards so done. Cro. Car. 348. So in another case, where the attorney-general opposed the motion of a defendant for a trial at bar, the court said, that they were not satisfied that the attorney-general ought to have a nisi prius, (where a trial at bar is reasonable), without consent. 6 Mod. 123.

The authority of justices of nisi prius in the country, is annexed to the justices of assize; and the court above will take judicial notice of what is done at nisi prius, being entered on record.

With respect to the powers given to judges at nisi prius to amend records in case of variance, see Amendment; Record; Variance.

As to the course of trial at Nisi prius, see Trial. And see further, Assize; Circuits; Jury; Justices of Assize, &c.

NISI PRIUS RECORD. Is supposed to be transcribed from the issue roll (see that title), and ought to contain an entry of the declaration and pleadings, and the issue or issues joined thereon, with the award of the venire facias, as in the issue. It formerly consisted of four parts; the first placita; the pleadings, &c.; the second placita; and the jurata. But now, by the form prescribed by the general rules, H. T. 4. W. 4. the placitas are to be omitted. See 1 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 303, 4th ed.

NIVICOLINI BRITONES. Welshmen; because in Caermarthenshire and other northern counties of Wales, they lived near high mountains, covered with snow. Du Cange; Cowel.

NOBILITY, nobilitas. Comprises all degrees of dignity above a knight; under which latter term is included a baronet; so that a baron is the lowest order of nobility: it is derived from the king, and may by him be granted by patent in fee, for life, &c. See Peers of the Realm.

NOBLE. An ancient kind of English money in use in England in the time of Edw. III. Knighton says, the rose noble was a gold coin, current in England about the year 1344. A noble is now valued at 6s. 8d.; but we have no peculiar coin of that name. From the treaty of peace between John, king of France, and Edward III. A. D. 1360, the noble was valued as equal to two French gold crowns.

NOCTANTER, by night; in the night time. The name of a writ formerly issuing out of the Chancery, and returnable in the King's Bench, given by Westm. 2; 13 E. 1. st. 1. c. 46; (but which has been repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27.)

By virtue of that statute, in case any one having right to approve waste ground, &c. raised and levied a ditch or hedge, and it was thrown down in the night-time, and it could not be known by a verdict of the assize or a jury by whom; or if the neighbouring towns could not indict such as are guilty, they were liable to be distrained to make again the hedge or ditch at their own costs, and to answer damages. 2 Inst. 476. And the noctanter writ thereupon was directed to the sheriff of the county to make inquisition relative thereto. On the return of this writ by the sheriff, that the same was found by inquisition, and that the jury were ignorant who did it, the return being filed in the Crown-office, there went out a writ of inquiry of damages, and a distringas to the sheriff to distrain the circumadjacent vills, to repair the hedges and fences so destroyed at their own charge, and also to restore the damages, &c. See 2 Lil. Abr. 217.

The writ of noctanter, by the better opinion, lay for the prostration as well of all inclosures as those improved out of commons; but if it were not in the night, this writ would not have lain; and there ought to have been a convenient time (which the court was to judge of) before the writ was brought, for the country to inquire of and indict the offenders; which,

according to Coke, was a year and a day. 2 Inst. 476. See Cro. Car. 440; 1 Keb. 545. And if any one of the offenders were indicted, the defendants must have pleaded it, &c.

The words, in the night-time, are so necessary in an indictment of burglary, that it hath been adjudged insufficient for the burglary without it. Cro. Eliz. 483. See Burglary.

NOCTES ET NOCTEM DE FIRMA. In the book of Domesday we often meet with Tot noctes de firma, or forma tot noctium; which is understood of entertainment of meat and drink for so many nights; for in the time of the English Saxons, time was computed not by days, but nights; and so it continued till the reign of King Henry I. as appears by his laws, c. 66, § 76. And hence it is still usual to say a seven-night, i. e. septem noctes, for a week; and a fortnight for two weeks, i. e. quatuordecim noctes.

NOFFYRS, or NEDFRI, Sax.] Spelman says this word is derived from the old Saxon neod, obsequium, and fry, ignis, and signifies fires made in honour of the heathen deities. But by others it is said to come from the Saxon neb, that is, necessary; and was used for the necessary fire.

NOLLE PROSEQUI. Is used in the law, where a plaintiff in any action will not proceed any further; and may be before or after verdict, though it is usually before; and it is then stronger against the plaintiff than a nonsuit, which is only a default in appearance; but this is a voluntary acknowledgment that he hath no cause of action. 2 Lil. 218.

A nolle prosequi is an acknowledgment or agreement by the plaintiff, that he will not further prosecute his suit as to the whole or a part of the cause of action; or where there are several defendants, against some or one of them; and it is in nature of a retraxit operating as a release or perpetual bar. Tidd, Pract. cites Cro. Car. 239, 243; 2 Rol. Ab. 100. Hard. 153; 8 Co. 58; Cro. Jac. 211. But see Ld. Raym. 599, where there are other defendants.

On a plea of coverture, &c. if the plaintiff cannot answer it, he may enter a nolle prosequi as to the whole cause of action, but the defendant in such case is entitled to costs under 8 Eliz. c. 2. § 2; 3 T. R. 511. So if the defendant demur to one of several counts of a declaration, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to that count which is demurred to, and proceed to trial upon the other counts. 2 Salk. 456. Or if judgment be given for him on demurrer, he may enter a nolle prosequi as to the issue, and proceed to a writ of inquiry on the demurrer. 1 Salk. 219; 2 Salk. 456; 1 Str. 501. 574. But after a demurrer for misjoinder, the plaintiff cannot cure it by entering a nolle prosequi. 1 H. Bl. 108. And after demurrer to a declaration, consisting of two counts against two defendants, because one of them was not named in the last count, the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi on that count, and proceed on the other. 4 T. R. 300. And the court of C. P. refused to allow a defendant to strike out the entry of a judgment of nolle prosequi, entered by a plaintiff as to one of the counts of the declaration, after it had been demurred to, &c. and would not in that stage of the proceedings determine the question of costs respecting said count. 1 Bos. & Pull. 157.

If there be a demurrer to part, and an issue upon other part, and the plaintiff prevails upon the demurrer, it was in one case holden, that without a nolle prosequi as to the issue, he cannot have a writ of inquiry on the demurrer; because on the trial of the issue, the same jury will ascertain the damages for that part which is demurred to. 1 Salk. 219, 12 Mod. 378. But in a subsequent case, where the declaration consisted of four counts, to three of which there was a plea of non assumptum, and a demurrer to the fourth; and after judgment on the demurrer, the plaintiff took out a writ of inquiry and executed it; this was moved to be set aside, there being no nolle prosequi on the roll; and it was insisted that the plaintiff ought to take out a venire, as well to try the issue as to inquire of the damages upon the demurrer; sed per curiam that is, indeed, the course where the issues are carried down trial before the demurrer is determined, and in that case the jury give contingent damages; but here the demurrer being determined, and the plaintiff being able to recover all he goes for upon that count, there is no reason why we should force him to carry down the record to nil prius, and as to the want of a nolle prosequi upon the roll, he may supply that when he comes to enter the final judgment; if not, you will have the advantage of it upon a writ of error. The judgment upon the inquiry must stand. 1 Str. 532; 8 Mod. 108.

In trespass or other action for a wrong, against several defendants, the plaintiff may, at any time before final judgment, enter a nolle prosequi as to one defendant, and proceed against the others, 1 Hob. 70; Cro. Car. 259, 243; 2 Roll. Abr. 100; 2 Salk. 55, u, 7; 3 Salk. 244, 5; 1 Wils. 306; so in assumpsit, or other action upon contract, against several defendants, one of whom pleads bankruptcy, or other matter in his personal discharge, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him, and proceed against the other defendants. 1 Wils. 89. But a nolle prosequi cannot be entered as to one defendant after final judgment against the others. 2 Salk. 455.

It seems that in assumpsit, or other action upon contract, against several defendants, the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi as to one, unless it be for some matter operating in his personal discharge, without releasing the others. 1 Wils. 89; 6 Taunt. 179.

Thus in assumpsit against two, where one pleads non assumpsit and a plea of bankruptcy, and the plaintiff enters a nolle prosequi as to him, as to the several matters pleaded by him, and the other defendant pleads non assumpsit, the latter is not discharged by the nolle prosequi. 2 M. & S. 114.

Where, in an action against several defendants, the jury by mistake have assessed several damages, the plaintiff may cure it by entering a nolle prosequi as to one of the defendants, taking judgment against the others. 11 Co. 1, Cro. Car. 215; Carth. 19.

Where there are several defendants, and they severally plead, whereupon issue is joined, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to one defendant at any time before the record is sent down, so to be tried at nil prius. 2 Roll. Abr. 100; Salk. 157. See Ansaut.

A plaintiff comes by his attorney hic in curiam et fatetur se ulterius nolle prosequi; whereupon judgment was given that the defendant eat sine die, and no morement upon the plaintiff; this was held erroneous; for the plaintiff ought also to be awarded. 3 Rep. 58. But later determinations have settled that in entering a nolle prosequi the plaintiff need not be amerced pro falso clamore, but it is sufficient that the defendant be put without day. 1 Str. 574.

Where there are two defendants, and one pleads not guilty, and the other another plea; if on demurrer there is judgment for the plaintiff against one on the demurrer, and a nolle prosequi for the other, there it ought to be eat sine die, or it is ill, and the entry of quod eat sine die is a discharge to the defendant. Cro. Jac. 439; Hob. 180.

With respect to criminal proceedings, the king may, by his attorney-general, enter a nolle prosequi on an information, but it shall not stop the proceedings of the informer. 1 Leon. 119.

But the clerk of the crown cannot enter a nolle prosequi on an indictment without leave of the attorney-general. 1 Ed. Raym. 721. Nor can an agreement between the parties for this purpose be effected, unless the attorney-general actually enters a nolle prosequi. 2 Wils. 341; 5 East. 302; 2 Bing. 258.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 32. where any one or more of several defendants shall have a nolle prosequi entered as to him or them, or upon a trial a verdict shall pass for him or them, every such person shall be adjudged to pay his costs, unless the judge, in case of a trial, shall certify on the record there was reasonable cause for making him a defendant.

And by § 32, where any nolle prosequi shall have been entered upon any count, or as to part of any declaration, the defendant shall be entitled to his costs.

NOMENCLATOR. One who opens the etymologies of names, interpreted Thesaurarius. Spelman; Cowell.

NOMINATION, nominatio.] Is the power (by virtue of some manor or otherwise) of appointing a clerk to a patron of a benefice, by him to be presented to the ordinary. The right of nomination a man may have by deed; and in such case, if the patron refuse to present the nominee, or presents another, he may bring a quare impedit; for he who is to present, is only an instrument to him who nominates; and the person who hath the nomination is in effect the patron of the church. Plowd. 529; Moor. 47. A nominator must appoint his clerk within six months after avoidance; if he doth not, and the patron presents his clerk before the bishop hath taken any benefit of the lapse, he is obliged to admit that clerk. But where one hath the nomination, and another the presentation, if the right of presentation should afterwards come to the king, it is said he who hath the nomination will be entitled to the presentation also; because the king, who should present, cannot be subservient to the nominator, being contrary to his dignity. Hughes's Par. Lam. 76, 77. Right of nomination may be forfeited to the crown as well as presentation, where the nominator corruptly agrees to nominate, within the statute of Simony, &c. See Admanson, Parson.

NOMINA VILLARUM. Edward II. in the 9th year of his reign, sent his letters to every sheriff in England, requiring an exact account and return into the Exchequer of the names of all the villages, and possessors thereof, in every county, which being done accordingly, the returns of the sheriffs all joined together are called nomina villarum, still remaining in the Exchequer, anno 9 Ed. 2.

NOMINE PENÆ. A penalty incurred for not paying rent, &c. at the day appointed by the lease or agreement for payment thereof. 2 Lil. 221.

This nomine penæ is incident to the rent, and will descend to the heir; if an annual rent, therefore, be devised, the nomine penæ passes as incident thereto, and the devisee may have an action of debt for the arrears. Co. Lit. 61 b; Cro. Eliz. 383; Lutw. 1156.

If rent is reserved, and there is a nomine penæ on the non-payment of it, and the rent be behind and unpaid, there must be an actual demand thereof made before the grantee of the rent can distrain for it; the nomine penæ being of the same nature as the rent, and issuing out of the land out of which the rent doth issue. Hob. 82, 133. And where a rent-charge was granted for years, with a nomine penæ and clause of distress, if it was not paid on the day; on the rent's being behind, and the term expired, the court was moved that the grantee might distrain for the nomine penæ; but it was held that he could not, because the nomine penæ depended on the rent, and the distress was gone for that, and by consequence for the other. 2 Nels. Abr. 1182. See 8 Ann. c. 14.

When any sum nomine penæ is to be forfeited for non-payment of the rent at the time, &c. the demand of the rent ought to be precisely at the day, in respect of the penalty; and debt will not lie on a nomine penæ without a demand. 7 Rep. 28; Cro. Eliz. 383; Style, 4. If there is a nomine penæ of such a sum for every day after rent becomes due, it has been a question whether there must be a demand for every day's nomine penæ, or one demand for many days. And by the better opinion it hath been holden, that for every day there ought to be a demand; and that one will not be sufficient for the whole; but where a nomine penæ of forty shillings was limited quolibet die proximo the feast-day on which the rent ought to be paid, it was adjudged that there was but one forty shillings forfeited, because the word proximo must relate to the very next day following the rent day; so likewise when the rent became due and unpaid at the next rent day after that, and so on. Palm. 207; 2 Nels. 1182.

This penalty, it should seem, is waived by an acceptance of the rent. Comp. 247.

An assignee is chargeable with a nomine penæ incurred

ment for barratry against a justice of peace, the attorney-general himself moved for a trial at nisi prius, the court (thinking it was a cause that required great examination) refused the motion, unless the king, by his letters, should signify his pleasure that the indictment should be so tried, which was afterwards so done. Cro. Car. 348. So in another case, where the attorney-general opposed the motion of a defendant for a trial at bar, the court said, that they were not satisfied that the attorney-general ought to have a nisi prius, (where a trial at bar is reasonable), without consent. 6 Mod. 123.

The authority of justices of nisi prius in the country, is annexed to the justices of assize; and the court above will take judicial notice of what is done at nisi prius, being entered on record.

With respect to the powers given to judges at nisi prius to amend records in case of variance, see Amendment; Record; Variance.

As to the course of trial at Nisi prius, see Trial. And see further, Assize; Circuits; Jury; Justices of Assize, &c.

NISI PRIUS RECORD. Is supposed to be transcribed from the issue roll (see that title), and ought to contain an entry of the declaration and pleadings, and the issue or issues joined thereon, with the award of the venire facias, as in the issue. It formerly consisted of four parts; the first placita; the pleadings, &c.; the second placita; and the jurata. But now, by the form prescribed by the general rules, H. T. 4. W. 4. the placitas are to be omitted. See 1 Archb. Pr. by Chitty, 808, 4th ed.

NIVICOLINI BRITONES. Welshmen; because in Caermarthenshire and other northern counties of Wales, they lived near high mountains, covered with snow. Du Cange; Conel.

NOBILITY, nobilitas. Comprises all degrees of dignity above a knight; under which latter term is included a baronet; so that a baron is the lowest order of nobility: it is derived from the king, and may by him be granted by patent in fee, for life, &c. See Peers of the Realm.

NOBLE. An ancient kind of English money in use in England in the time of Edw. III. Knighton says, the rose noble was a gold coin, current in England about the year 1344. A noble is now valued at 6s. 8d.; but we have no peculiar coin of that name. From the treaty of peace between John, king of France, and Edward III. A. D. 1360, the noble was valued as equal to two French gold crowns.

NOCTANTER, by night; in the night time. The name of a writ formerly issuing out of the Chancery, and returnable in the King's Bench, given by Westm. 2; 13 E. 1. st. 1. c. 46; (but which has been repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27.)

By virtue of that statute, in case any one having right to approve waste ground, &c. raised and levied a ditch or hedge, and it was thrown down in the night-time, and it could not be known by a verdict of the assize or a jury by whom; or if the neighbouring towns could not indict such as are guilty, they were liable to be distrained to make again the hedge or ditch at their own costs, and to answer damages. 2 Inst. 476. And the noctanter writ thereupon was directed to the sheriff of the county to make inquisition relative thereto. On the return of this writ by the sheriff, that the same was found by inquisition, and that the jury were ignorant who did it, the return being filed in the Crown-office, there went out a writ of inquiry of damages, and a distringas to the sheriff to distrain the circumadjacent villis, to repair the hedges and fences so destroyed at their own charge, and also to restore the damages, &c. See 2 Lil. Abr. 217.

The writ of noctanter, by the better opinion, lay for the prostration as well of all inclosures as those improved out of commons; but if it were not in the night, this writ would not have lain; and there ought to have been a convenient time (which the court was to judge of) before the writ was brought, for the country to inquire of and indict the offenders; which,

according to Coke, was a year and a day. 2 Inst. 476. See Cro. Car. 440; 1 Keb. 545. And if any one of the offenders were indicted, the defendants must have pleaded it, &c.

The words, in the night-time, are so necessary in an indictment of burglary, that it hath been adjudged insufficient for the burglary without it. Cro. Eliz. 483. See Burglary.

NOCTES ET NOCTEM DE FIRMA. In the book of Domesday we often meet with Tot noctes de firmâ, or firma tot noctum; which is understood of entertainment of meat and drink for so many nights; for in the time of the English Saxons, time was computed not by days, but nights; and so it continued till the reign of King Henry I. as appears by his laws, c. 66, § 76. And hence it is still usual to say a seven-night, i. e. septem noctes, for a week; and a fortnight for two weeks, i. e. quatuordecim noctes.

NODFYRS, or NEDFRI, Sax.] Spelman says this word is derived from the old Saxon neod, obsequium, and fry, ignis, and signifies fires made in honour of the heathen deities. But by others it is said to come from the Saxon neb, that is, necessary; and was used for the necessary fire.

NOLLE PROSEQUI. Is used in the law, where a plaintiff in any action will not proceed any further; and may be before or after verdict, though it is usually before; and it is then stronger against the plaintiff than a nonsuit, which is only a default in appearance; but this is a voluntary acknowledgment that he hath no cause of action. 2 Lil. 218.

A nolle prosequi is an acknowledgment or agreement by the plaintiff, that he will not further prosecute his suit as to the whole or a part of the cause of action; or where there are several defendants, against some or one of them; and it is in nature of a retrahit operating as a release or perpetual bar. Tidd, Pract. cites Cro. Car. 239, 243; 2 Rol. Ab. 100; Hard. 153; 8 Co. 58; Cro. Jac. 211. But see Ld. Raym. 599, where there are other defendants.

On a plea of coverture, &c. if the plaintiff cannot answer it, he may enter a nolle prosequi as to the whole cause of action, but the defendant in such case is entitled to costs, under 8 Eliz. c. 2, § 2, 3 T. R. 511. So if the defendant demur to one of several counts of a declaration, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to that count which is demurred to, and proceed to trial upon the other counts. 2 Salk. 154. Or if judgment be given for him on demurrer, he may enter a nolle prosequi as to the issue, and proceed to a writ of inquiry on the demurrer. 1 Salk. 219; 2 Salk. 456; 1 Str. 551, 574. But after a demurrer for misjoinder, the plaintiff cannot cure it by entering a nolle prosequi. 1 H. Bl. 108. And after demurrer to a declaration, consisting of two counts against two defendants, because one of them was not named in the last count, the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi on that count, and proceed on the other. 4 T. R. 360. And the court of C. P. refused to allow a defendant to strike out the entry of a judgment of nolle prosequi, entered by a plaintiff as to one of the counts of the declaration, after it had been demurred to, &c. and would not in that stage of the proceedings determine the question of costs respecting such count. 1 Bos. & Pull. 157.

If there be a demurrer to part, and an issue upon other part, and the plaintiff prevails upon the demurrer, it was in one case holden, that without a nolle prosequi as to the issue, he cannot have a writ of inquiry on the demurrer; because on the trial of the issue, the same jury will ascertain the damages for that part which is demurred to. 1 Salk. 219; 12 Mod. 358. But in a subsequent case, where the declaration consisted of four counts, to three of which there was a plea of non assumpsit, and a demurrer to the fourth; and after judgment on the demurrer, the plaintiff took out a writ of inquiry, and executed it; this was moved to be set aside, there being no nolle prosequi on the roll; and it was insisted that the plaintiff ought to take out a venire, as well to try the issue, as to inquire of the damages upon the demurrer; sed per curiam, that is, indeed, the course where the issues are carried down to trial before the demurrer is determined, and in that case the jury give contingent damages; but here the demurrer being determined, and the plaintiff being able to recover all he goes for upon that count, there is no reason why we should force him to carry down the record to nisi prius, and as to the want of a nolle prosequi upon the roll, he may supply that when he comes to enter the final judgment; if not, you will have the advantage of it upon a writ of error. The judgment upon the inquiry must stand. 1 Str. 532; 8 Mod. 108.

In trespass or other action for a wrong, against several defendants, the plaintiff may, at any time before final judgment, enter a nolle prosequi as to one defendant, and proceed against the others; Hob. 70; Cro. Car. 239, 243; 2 Roll. Abr. 100; 2 Salk. 55, 6, 7; 3 Salk. 244, 5; 1 Wils. 306; so in assumpsit, or other action upon contract, against several defendants, one of whom pleads bankruptcy, or other matter in his personal discharge, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him, and proceed against the other defendants. 1 Wils. 89. But a nolle prosequi cannot be entered as to one defendant after final judgment against the others. 2 Salk. 455.

It seems that in assumpsit, or other action upon contract, against several defendants, the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi as to one, unless it be for some matter operating in his personal discharge, without releasing the others. 1 Wils. 89; 6 Taunt. 179.

Thus in assumpsit against two, where one pleads non assumpsit and a plea of bankruptcy, and the plaintiff enters a nolle prosequi as to him, as to the several matters pleaded by him, and the other defendant pleads non assumpsit, the latter is not discharged by the nolle prosequi. 2 M. & S. 411.

Where, in an action against several defendants, the jury by mistake have assessed several damages, the plaintiff may cure it by entering a nolle prosequi as to one of the defendants and taking judgment against the others. 11 Co. 5; Cro. Car. 239, 243; Carth. 19.

Where there are several defendants, and they sever in plea, whereupon issue is joined, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to one defendant at any time before the record is sent down to be tried at nisi prius. 2 Roll. Ab. 100; Salk. 457. See Nonsuit.

A plaintiff comes by his attorney hic in curiam et fatetur ut ulterius nolle prosequi; whereupon judgment was given that the defendant eat sine die, and no amercement upon the plaintiff; this was held erroneous; for the plaintiff ought not to be amerced. 8 Rep. 88. But later determinations are settled that in entering a nolle prosequi the plaintiff need not be amerced pro falso clamore, but it is sufficient that the defendant be put without day. 1 Str. 574.

Where there are two defendants, and one pleads not guilty, and the other another plea, if on demurrer there is judgment for the plaintiff against one on the demurrer, and a nolle prosequi for the other, there it ought to be eat sine die, or it shall, and the entry of quod eat sine die is a discharge to the defendant. Cro. Jac. 459; Hob. 180.

With respect to criminal proceedings, the king may, by his attorney-general, enter a nolle prosequi out of an information; but shall not stop the proceedings of the informer. 1 Leon. 1. But the clerk of the crown cannot enter a nolle prosequi on an indictment without leave of the attorney-general. 1 Ed. Ryym. 721. Nor can an agreement between the parties for this purpose be effected, unless the attorney-general actually enters a nolle prosequi. 2 Wils. 341; 5 East. 302; 2 B. & C. 258.

By the 1 & 2 H. 6, c. 12, § 12, where any one or more of several defendants shall have a nolle prosequi entered as to him or them, or upon a trial a verdict shall pass for him or them, every such person shall have judgment for his costs, and the judge, in case of a trial, shall certify on the record that was a reasonable cause for making him a defendant.

And by § 33, where any nolle prosequi shall have been entered upon any count, or as to part of any declaration, the defendant shall be entitled to his costs.

NOMENCLATOR. One who opens the etymologies of names, interpreted Thesaurarius. Spelman; Cowell.

NOMINATION, nominatio. Is the power (by virtue of some manor or otherwise) of appointing a clerk to a patron of a benefice, by him to be presented to the ordinary. The right of nomination a man may have by deed; and in such case, if the patron refuse to present the nominee, or presents another, he may bring a quare impedit; for he who is to present, is only an instrument to him who nominates; and the person who hath the nomination is in effect the patron of the church. Plowd. 529; Moor. 47. A nominator must appoint his clerk within six months after avoidance; if he doth not, and the patron presents his clerk before the bishop hath taken any benefit of the lapse, he is obliged to admit that clerk. But where one hath the nomination, and another the presentation, if the right of presentation should afterwards come to the king, it is said he who hath the nomination will be entitled to the presentation also; because the king, who should present, cannot be subservient to the nominator, being contrary to his dignity. Hughes's Par. Law. 76, 77. Right of nomination may be forfeited to the crown as well as presentation, where the nominator corruptly agrees to nominate, within the statute of Simony, &c. See Advomson, Parson.

NOMINA VILLARUM. Edward II. in the 9th year of his reign, sent his letters to every sheriff in England, requiring an exact account and return into the Exchequer of the names of all the villages, and possessors thereof; in every county, which being done accordingly, the returns of the sheriffs all joined together are called nomina villarum, still remaining in the Exchequer, anno 9 Ed. 2.

NOMINE PENÆ. A penalty incurred for not paying rent, &c. at the day appointed by the lease or agreement for payment thereof. 2 Lit. 221.

This nomine penæ is incident to the rent, and will descend to the heir; if an annual rent, therefore, be devised, the nomine penæ passes as incident thereto, and the devisee may have an action of debt for the arrears. Co. Lit. 61 b; Cro. Eliz. 383; Lutw. 1156.

If rent is reserved, and there is a nomine penæ on the non-payment of it, and the rent be behind and unpaid, there must be an actual demand thereof made before the grantee of the rent can distrain for it; the nomine penæ being of the same nature as the rent, and issuing out of the land out of which the rent doth issue. Hob. 82, 133. And where a rent-charge was granted for years, with a nomine penæ and clause of distress, if it was not paid on the day; on the rent's being behind, and the term expired, the court was moved that the grantee might distrain for the nomine penæ; but it was held that he could not, because the nomine penæ depended on the rent, and the distress was gone for that, and by consequence for the other. 2 Nels. Abr. 1182. See 8 Ann. c. 14.

When any sum nomine penæ is to be forfeited for non-payment of the rent at the time, &c. the demand of the rent ought to be precisely at the day, in respect of the penalty; and debt will not lie on a nomine penæ without a demand. 7 Rep. 28; Cro. Eliz. 383; Style. 4. If there is a nomine penæ of such a sum for every day after rent becomes due, it has been a question whether there must be a demand for every day's nomine penæ, or one demand for many days. And by the better opinion it hath been holden, that for every day there ought to be a demand; and that one will not be sufficient for the whole; but where a nomine penæ of forty shillings was limited quolibet die proximo the feast-day on which the rent ought to be paid, it was adjudged that there was but one forty shillings forfeited, because the word proximo must relate to the very next day following the rent day; so likewise when the rent became due and unpaid at the next rent day after that, and so on. Palm. 207; 2 Nels. 1182.

This penalty, it should seem, is waived by an acceptance of the rent. Comp. 247.

An assignee is chargeable with a nomine penæ incurred after the assignment, but not before Moor, 357; 2 Lil. Abr. 221.

Though forfeiture is mentioned to be nomine pœnæ, for not paying of a collateral sum, it is no nomine pœnæ, if it be not of a rent. Lutw. 1156.

It is not unusual to mention stipulated penalties for other things, as for ploughing up ancient meadow, or above a certain number of acres in one year, for changing the character of particular premises or the like, by the general name of nomine pœnæ. See further Distress, IV.

NON-ABILITY. Is an exception taken against the plaintiff in a cause, upon some just ground, why he cannot commence any suit in law; as præmunire, outlawry, excommunication, &c. F. N. B. 35, 65. See Abatement; Disability.

NONÆ ET DECIMÆ. Payments made to the church by those who were tenants of church farms; where nonæ was a rent or duty for things belonging to husbandry, and decimæ were claimed in right of the church. Formerly a ninth part of moveable goods was paid to the clergy on the death of persons in their parish, which was called nonagium, and claimed on pretence of being distributed to pious uses. Blount.

NON-AGE. In general understanding, is all the time of a person's being under the age of twenty-one; and in a special sense, where one is under fourteen as to marriage, &c. See Age, Infant.

NON ASSUMPSIT. The general issue in an action of assumpsit, whereby a man denies that he made any promise. See further Pleading.

By this plea, until recently, the defendant could put in issue all the material allegations of the declaration; and under the summary denial it contained of the plaintiff's case, could, with a few exceptions, urge any ground of defence, whether it were in direct repudiation of the contract or obligation charged, or by way of confession in avoidance of the cause of action.

Now by the general rules of H. T. 4 W. 4. in all actions of assumpsit, except on bills of exchange and promissory notes, the plea of non assumpsit shall operate only as a denial in fact of the express contract or promise alleged, or of the matters of fact from which the contract or promise alleged may be implied by law.

Ex. gr.—In an action on a warranty, the plea will operate as the denial of the fact of the warranty having been given upon the alleged consideration, but not of the breach; and in an action on a policy of insurance, of the subscription to the alleged policy by the defendant, but not of the interest, of the commencement of the risk, of the loss, or of the alleged compliance with warranties.

Where there have been two accounts stated between the parties, and the plaintiff sues upon the former, the defendant cannot, since the above rules, under the plea of non assumpsit, give the second account in evidence. 1 C. M. & R. 108.

In actions against carriers and other bailees, for not delivering or not keeping goods safe, or not returning them on request, and in actions against agents for not accounting, the plea will operate as a denial of any express contract to the effect alleged in the declaration, and of such bailment or employment as would raise a promise in law to the effect alleged, but not of the breach.

In an action of indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, the plea of non assumpsit will operate as a denial of the sale and delivery in point of fact; in the like action for money had and received, it will operate as a denial both of the receipt of the money and the existence of those facts which makes such receipt by the defendant a receipt to the use of the plaintiff.

In all actions upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, the plea of non assumpsit shall be inadmissible. In such actions, therefore, a plea in denial must traverse some matter of fact; ex. gr. the drawing or making, or indorsing or accepting, or presenting, or notice of dishonour of the bill or note.

In every species of assumpsit, all matters in confession and avoidance, including not only those by way of discharge, but those which show the transaction to be either void or voidable in point of law, on the ground of fraud or otherwise, shall be specially pleaded; ex. gr. insanity, coverture, release, payment, performance, illegality of consideration either by statute or common law, drawing, indorsing, accepting, &c. bills or notes, by way of accommodation, set-off, mutual credit, unseaworthiness, misrepresentation, concealment, deviation, and various other defences, must be pleaded.

NON ASSUMPSIT INFRA SEX ANNOS. See Limitation of Actions.

NON-CEPIT. The general issue in replevin. See that title.

NON-CLAIM. An omission or neglect of one that claimed not within the time limited by law, as within a year and a day, where a continual claim ought to have been made, or in five years after a fine had been levied, &c. by which a man might be barred of his right of entry. See 4 H. 7. c. 24; 32 H. 8. c. 33.

Now by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 11. no continual or other claim shall preserve any right of making an entry or distress, or of bringing an action.

And by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 74. fines are abolished. See further Claim, Entry, Fine, Limitation of Actions.

NON COMPOS MENTIS. One not of sound mind, memory, and understanding. See Idiots and Lunatics.

NON-CONFORMISTS. Persons not conforming to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England as by law established. The stats. 1 Eliz. c. 2; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. were made for the uniformity of common prayer and service in the church. Non-conformists to be punished by imprisonment, and to submit in three months, or to abjure the realm; and keeping a non-conformist in the house after notice, subjected the offender to the penalty of 10*l.* a month. 35 Eliz. c. 1. Penalties on being at conventicles. 22 Car. 2. c. 1.

Toleration of the episcopal communion in Scotland. 10 Ann. c. 7. Episcopal meeting-houses in Scotland to be registered; and a penalty imposed on unqualified ministers officiating in Scotland. 19 Geo. 2. c. 38. Episcopal ministers in Scotland to be ordained by a bishop of England or Ireland. 16. and 21 Geo. 2. c. 34. Peers and others present at unlawful meeting-houses in Scotland disqualified from voting. 19 Geo. 2. c. 38. A form of affirmation to be taken instead of an oath by the members of the unitas fratrum; and privileges granted to the members thereof who should settle in America. 22 Geo. 2. c. 30.

After the Revolution, it was enacted by the Toleration Act, 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 18. that the 1 Eliz. c. 2. § 1; 23 Eliz. c. 1; 29 Eliz. c. 6; 3 Jac. c. 4; 3 Jac. c. 5. (or any other statute made against Papists, with two exceptions, but the whole of which last mentioned statutes are now in effect repealed by the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 10 Geo. 4. c. 7) should not extend to persons dissenting from the Church of England that should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe the declaration against popery.

By 52 Geo. 3. c. 155. the acts 18 & 14 Car. 2. c. 1. for preventing mischief by Quakers and others refusing lawful oaths; 17 Car. 2. c. 2. for restraining non-conformists from inhabiting in corporations; and 22 Car. 2. c. 1. to prevent and suppress seditious conventicles, were repealed.

By 9 Geo. 4. c. 17. so much of the 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 1 and the 25 Car. 2. c. 2. (commonly called the Test and Corporation Acts), and of the 16 Geo. 2. c. 30. as required the persons therein described to receive the Sacrament as a qualification for offices, were repealed; and by § 2. all mayors, aldermen, recorders, and corporate officers are within one month before or upon their admission to office to make and subscribe the declaration set forth in the act, to the effect that they will not use the power or influence of their office to injure or weaken the Protestant church, or disturb the bishops or clergy in the rights and privileges to which they are by law entitled. See Bac. Abr. Office (E), 7th ed.

By the 10 Geo. 4. c. 7. the acts requiring the declarations against transubstantiation, &c. were repealed; and by § 10. his majesty's subjects professing the Roman Catholic religion may hold any offices, civil or military, and places of trust or profit, under his majesty, and exercise any other franchise (except as therein mentioned) on taking the oath therein set forth instead of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, and instead of such other oaths as were then by law required to be taken for the purpose aforesaid by Roman Catholics. See further tits. Dissenters, Non-Jurors, Oaths, Quakers, Roman Catholics.

NON CULPABILIS. See Not Guilty.

NON DAMNIFICATUS. A plea to an action of debt upon bond, with condition to save the plaintiff harmless. 2 Lit. Abr. 224.

It cannot be pleaded to an action of debt on bond conditioned for payment of a sum of money on a certain day, although it appears by the condition that the bond was given by way of indemnity. 1 Bos. & Pull. 688; and see as to this plea, Bac. Abr. Pleas (I.) 7th ed.

NON DECIMANDO. A custom or prescription. De non decimando is to be discharged of all tithes, &c. See Modus Decimandi, Tithes.

NON DEMISIT. Where a demise is stated to have been by indenture, this is not a good plea to an action of debt for rent, though it may be pleaded when the plaintiff declares quod cum demisisset without stating the indenture. Bull. N. P. 177; Gibb. on Action of Debt, 436, 438.

And as a less cannot plead habuit in tenementis to an action of covenant, neither can he nor his assignee plead non demisit. 2 Taunt. 278.

NON DETINET. The general issue in an action of detinue.

By the rules, H. T. 4 Wm. 4. this plea shall operate as a denial of the detention of the goods by the defendant, but not of the plaintiff's property therein, and no other defence than such denial shall be admissible under it.

NON DISTRINGENDO. A writ not to distrain, used in divers cases. Table of Reg. of Writs.

NONES, nonas.] So called from their beginning the ninth day before the Ides. The seventh day of March, May, July, and October, and the fifth day of all other months. By the Roman account the nones in the above-mentioned months are to six days next following the first day, or the calends; and of others the four days next after the first, according to these VERBS :—

Sex Nonas, Maius, October, Julius, et Mars, Quatuor at reliqui, &c.

Though the last of these days is properly called nones; for the others are reckoned backwards as distant from them, and accounted the third, fourth, or fifth nones. See Ides.

NON EST FACTUM. The general issue, in an action on bond or other deed, whereby the defendant denies that to be his deed whereon he is implicated. Broke. In every case where a bond is void, the defendant may plead non est factum. and when a bond is voidable only, he must show the special matter, and conclude judgment. Si actio, &c. 2 Lit. 226.

None but the party, his heirs, executors, &c. can plead non est factum. Lutw. 602. For a stranger to the deed cannot plead a special non est factum; but must say, nothing passed by the deed. 1 Rot. 188.

Now by the rules of H. T. 4 Wm. 4. in debt on specialty or covenant, the plea of non est factum shall operate as a denial of the deed in point of fact only, and all other defences shall be specially pleaded, including matters which make the deed absolutely void, as well as those which make it voidable. See Com. Dig. tit. Pleading; and this Dict. tit. Bond, Ired. Pleas.

NON EST INVENTUS. The sheriff's return to a writ when the defendant is not to be found in his bailiwick. And there was a return that the plaintiff non invenit plegiam on original writs. Shep. Epit. 1129. See further Process.

NON-FEASANCE. An offence of omission of what ought to be done; as in not coming to church, &c. which need not be alleged in any certain place; for, generally speaking, it is not committed any where. But non-feasance will not make a man a trespasser, &c. Hob. 251; 8 Rep. 146.

Non-feasance is to be distinguished from misfeasance or malfeasance. Non-feasance is the not doing that which it was a legal obligation or duty, or contract, to perform; misfeasance is the performance in an improper manner of an act which it was either the party's duty or his contract to perform, or which he had a right to do; and malfeasance the unjustifiable performance of some act which the party had no right, or which he had contracted not to do. These several modes of committing private injuries are compensated by peculiar and appropriate remedies, in which the cause of action must be properly described. See Nuisance, Trespass.

NON IMPLACITANDO ALIQUEM DE LIBERO TENEMENTO SINE BREVI. A writ to prohibit bailiffs, &c. from distraining or impleading any man touching his freehold without the king's writ. Reg. Orig. 171.

NON INTROMITTENDO, QUANDO BREVE PRÆCIPE IN CAPITIS SUBDOLE IMPETRATUR. Was a writ directed to the justices of the bench, or in eyre, commanding them not to give one, who had, under colour of entitling the king to land, &c. as holding of him in capite, deceitfully obtained the writ called præcipe in capite, any benefit thereof, but to put him to his writ of right. Reg. Orig. 4. This writ having dependence on the court of wards, since taken away, is now disused.

NON-JOINDER. A plea in abatement.

In actions upon contracts, when there are several parties, the action should be brought by or against all of them if living; 1 Saund. 291, b. (4); or if some are dead, by or against the survivors. 2 Saund. 121, c. (1). But if an action be brought upon a joint contract against one of several partners, he can only plead an abatement, though the plaintiff knew and even contracted with the other partners. 5 Burr. 2611; 2 Bl. 695; 5 T. R. 649.

In actions for wrongs, as they are of a joint and several nature, the plaintiff may proceed against all or any of the parties who committed them; and it is no plea in abatement, or ground of nonsuit, that there are other parties not named. In an action on the case, therefore, against a common carrier for the loss of goods, or for not safely carrying a passenger, the defendant cannot plead in abatement the non-joinder of a co-partner. And by the Common Carriers' Act, 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Wm. 4. c. 68. § 5. any one or more of several mail contractors, stage-coach proprietors, or common carriers, may be sued; and no action commenced to recover damages for loss or injury to any parcel, package, or person, shall abate for the want of joining any co-proprietor or co-partner in any mail, stage-coach, or other public conveyance by land for hire.

By Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. § 2. no plea in abatement can be supported alleging the non-joinder of parties against whom no action is maintainable for want of a written promise.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 42. § 8. pleas in abatement must state that the person, the non-joinder of whom is pleaded, resides in the jurisdiction of the court, and his residence must be stated with convenient certainty in affidavits verifying such pleas.

§ 9. To a plea in abatement for non-joinder the plaintiff may reply that the person has been discharged by bankruptcy and certificate, or under the Insolvent Acts.

§ 10. A plaintiff commencing another action against defendants in the action wherein a plea of abatement was pleaded, and the persons named in such plea as joint-contractors (if it shall appear by the pleadings or on the trial of such subsequent action that all the original defendants are liable, but one or more of the others are not,) shall nevertheless be entitled to judgment, or to a verdict and judgment against the defendants appearing liable; and every defendant not so liable shall have judgment and his costs as against the plaintiff, who shall be the same against the original defendants; but the latter may in the trial adduce evidence of the liability of the defendants named by them.

By the rules H. T. 4 Wm. 4, in all cases under the above section, the commencement of the declaration shall be in the form thereby given.

NON-JURORS. Persons who refuse to take the oaths to government, who are liable to certain penalties.

By 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 1. those who maintained that oaths in any case were unlawful, were for a third offence to abjure the realm, or otherwise to be transported; but this statute was repealed by 52 Geo. 3. c. 155.

Ecclesiastical persons not taking the oaths on the Revolution, were rendered incapable to hold their livings; but the king was empowered to grant such of the non-juring clergy as he thought fit, not above twelve, an allowance out of their ecclesiastical benefices for their subsistence, not exceeding a third part. 1 W. & M. sess. 1. c. 8. Persons refusing the oaths shall incur, forfeit, and suffer the penalties then inflicted on Popish recusants, and the Court of Exchequer may issue out process against their lands, &c. 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 27.

Blackstone enumerates, among the contempts to the king's title, the refusing or neglecting to take the oaths appointed by the statutes for the better securing the government, and yet acting in a public office, place of trust, or other capacity for which the said oaths are required to be taken, viz. those of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, which must be taken within six calendar months after admission. The penalties for this contempt, inflicted by 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 13. are very little if any thing short of those of a præmunire; being an incapacity to hold the said offices or any other, to prosecute any suit, to be guardian or executor, to take any legacy or deed of gift; and to vote at any election for members of parliament; and after conviction the offender shall also forfeit 500*l.* to him or them that will sue for the same. Members on the foundation in any college of the two universities, who by this statute are bound to take the oaths, must also register a certificate thereof in the college register within one month after; otherwise, if the electors do not remove him and elect another within twelve months, or after, the king may nominate a person to succeed him, by his great seal or sign manual. Besides thus taking the oaths for offices, any two justices of the peace may by the same statute summon and tender the oaths to any person whom they shall suspect to be disaffected. 4 Comm. 123, 124. See further Dissenters, Non-conformists, Oaths, Roman Catholics.

NON MERCHANDIZANDO VICTUALIA. An ancient writ to justices of assize, to inquire whether the magistrates of such a town do sell victuals in gross, or by retail, during the time of their being in office, which is contrary to an obsolete statute; and to punish them if they do. Reg. Orig. 184.

NON MOLESTANDO. A writ that lies for a person who is molested contrary to the king's protection granted him. Reg. of Writs, 184.

NON OBSTANTE, Notwithstanding.] Was a clause heretofore frequent in statutes and letters-patent, and was a licence from the king to do a thing which at the common law might be lawfully done; but which being restrained by act of parliament, could not be done without such licence. Vaugh. 347; Plowd. 501. But this doctrine of non obstante, which sets the prerogative above the laws, was effectually demolished by the Bill of Rights at the Revolution, and abdicated at Westminster Hall when King James abdicated the kingdom. 1 Comm. 342. See tit. Grant of the King; King, V. 3; Mortmain; Pardon.

NON OMITTAS. A writ directed to the sheriff, where the bailiff of a liberty or franchise who hath the return of writs refuses or neglects to serve a process for the sheriff to enter into the franchise and execute the king's process himself, or by his officer.

Before this writ is granted, the sheriff ought to return that he hath sent to the bailiff, and that he hath not served the writ; but for despatch, the usual practice was to send a non omittas with a capias or latitat. F. N. B. 68, 74; 2 Inst. 453. And a clause of non omittas is to be inserted in the capias given by the uniformity of process act. See Process.

If a sheriff return that he sent the process to the bailiff of a liberty, who hath given him no answer, a non omittas shall be awarded to the sheriff. And if he returns that he sent the process to such bailiff, who hath returned a cepi corpus, or such like matter, and the bailiff bring not in the body, or money, &c. at the day, the bailiff shall be amerced, and a writ issue to the sheriff to distrain the bailiff to bring in the body. 2 Hawk. P. C.

The Reg. of Writs mentions three sorts of this writ, given to prevent liberties being privileged to hinder or delay the general execution of justice; and the clause of the non omittas is, quod non omittas, propter aliquam libertatem, (viz. such liberty to which the sheriff hath made a mandavi ballivo, quod nullum dedit responsum) quin in am ingrediaris et capias A. B. Si, &c.

Writs of capias utlagatum and of quo minus (now abolished) out of the Exchequer, and it is said all writs whatsoever at the king's suit, are of the same effect as a non omittas; and the sheriff may by virtue of them enter into a liberty and execute them. 2 Lil. Abr. 229.

NON PLEVIN, non plevina.] Is defined to be defaulta post defaultam; and in Hengham Magna, cap. 8. it is said that the defendant is to replevy his lands seized by the king within fifteen days; and if he neglects, then, at the instance of the plaintiff, at the next court-day, he shall lose his seisin, sicut per defaultam post defaultam. But by 9 Edw. 3. c. 2. it was enacted, that none should lose his land, because of non plevin, i. e. where the land was not replevied in due time.

NON PONENDIS IN ASSISIS ET JURATIS. A writ formerly granted for freeing and discharging persons from serving on assizes and juries; and when one had a charter of exemption, he might have sued the sheriff for returning him. This writ was founded on the West. 13 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 38. and Articuli super Chartas, 28 Edw. 1. st. 3. c. 9; both of which are now repealed by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 62. See F. N. B. 165; 2 Inst. 127, 447.

NON PROCEDENDO AD ASSISAM REGE INCONSULTO. A writ to stop the trial of a cause appertaining to one who is in the king's service, &c. until the king's pleasure be farther known. Reg. Orig. 220.

NON PROS, or NON PROSEQUITUR. See Nolle Prosequi Nonsuit.

NON RESIDENCE. The absence of spiritual persons from their benefices. See Residence.

NON RESIDENTIA PRO CLERICUS REGIS. A writ directed to the bishop, charging him not to molest a clerk employed in the king's service, by reason of his non-residence; in which case he is to be discharged. Reg. Orig. 58.

NON SANE MEMORY, Non sanæ Memoriae.] See Idiots and Lunatics.

NONSENSE. Where a matter set forth is grammatically right, but absurd in the sense and unintelligible, some words cannot be rejected to make sense of the rest, but must be taken as they are; for there is nothing so absurd but what by rejecting may be made sense; but where the matter is nonsense by being contradictory and repugnant to some precedent, there the precedent matter which is sense shall not be defeated by the repugnancy which follows, but that which is contradictory shall be rejected. As in ejectment where the declaration is of a demise the 2d of January, and that the defendant postea, to wit, on the 1st of January, ejected him; here the scilicet may be rejected, as being expressly contrary to the postea and the precedent matter; per Holt, C. J. 1 Salk. 324. But per Powell, J.—Words unnecessary might in construction be omitted or rejected, though they are not repugnant or contradictory; but in causis omnibus agreed with the chief justice. See Awardment, Mistake.

NON SOLVENDO PECUNIAM, AD QUAM CLERICUS MILITATUR PRO NON RESIDENTIA. A writ prohibiting an ordinary to take a pecuniary mulet, imposed on a clerk of the king's for non-residence. Reg. of Writs, fol. 59.

NONSUIT.

[NON EST PROSECUTUS.] A renunciation of a suit by the plaintiff or demandant, most commonly upon the discovery of some error or defect, when the matter is so far proceeded in that the jury is ready to deliver their verdict. The civilians term it litis renunciationem. Cowell.

If the plaintiff in an action neglects to deliver a declaration in two terms after the defendant appears, or suffers delay or delays or defaults against the rules of law, in any subsequent stage of the action, he is adjudged not to follow or pursue his remedy as he ought to do; and thereupon a nonsuit or non prosequitur is entered, and he is said to be non prosecuted. And for thus deserting his complaint, after making a false claim (pro falso clamore suo), he shall not only pay costs to the defendant, but is liable to be amerced to the king. A nonsuit differs from a retraxit, in that the former is a mere default and neglect of the plaintiff, and therefore he is allowed to begin his suit again upon payment of costs; but a retraxit is an open and voluntary renunciation of his suit in court, and by this he for ever loses his action. 3 Comm. c. 20. 95, 296.

Before the jury gave their verdict on a trial, it was formerly usual to call or demand the plaintiff, in order to answer the amercement, to which by the old law he was liable, in case he failed in his suit. 3 Comm. 376. And it is now usual to call him, whenever he is unable to make out his case, or by reason of his not adducing any evidence in support of it, or any evidence arising in the proper county. The cases in which it is necessary that the evidence should arise in a particular county, are either where the action is in itself local, or made so by act of parliament, as in action upon penalties, statutes, &c. or where upon a motion to change or retain venue, the plaintiff undertakes to give material evidence in the county where the action was brought. 2 Black. Rep. See Action, Venue. And there is this advantage attending a nonsuit, that, as is already hinted, the plaintiff, if he pay costs, may afterwards bring another action for the same cause, which he cannot do after a verdict against him. Tidd's Pract.

- I. Who may be Nonsuit; in what Action, and at what time, there may be a Nonsuit.
- II. How far the Nonsuit of one shall be the Nonsuit of another; and how far a Nonsuit for part of the thing in demand shall be a Nonsuit for the whole.
- III. Of the effect of a Nonsuit; and of its being a temporary bar.
- IV. Of Judgments as in case of a Nonsuit.

I. It is agreed that the king being, in supposition of law, always present in court, cannot be nonsuit in any information or action wherein he is sole plaintiff, but it is held, that a nonsuit, as well in respect of the king as of himself, is a nonsuit, as in respect of the king as of himself. Nonsuit, 68; Co. Lit. 139, b; 2 Roll. Abr. 131. If an infant bring an assize by guardian, although the infant disavow the suit in proper person, yet no nonsuit shall be awarded. 39 Ass. pl. 1; 2 Roll. Abr. 130.

If an attorney of the Common Pleas sues an action there, he shall not be demanded, because he is supposed always present aiding the court. 2 H. 6. 44 b; 1 Roll. Abr. 581. See qu. as to this doctrine. In many cases it is the interest of the plaintiff to be nonsuit, instead of having a verdict against him, as he may bring a new action, wherein, if properly advised and pursued, he may recover. J. M.

A person may be nonsuit in a writ of error. 2 Roll. Abr. 130; 1 Sid. 255. So in a writ of false judgment. 20 H. 6. 18 b; 2 Roll. Abr. 130, S. C.

One cannot be nonsuit in an action in which he is not an actor or demandant; and though he afterwards becomes an actor, yet not being originally so, he cannot be nonsuit, as an avowant; so of garnishees who become actors, but were not so originally. 22 Edm. 4. 10.

So if a person outlawed hath a charter of pardon, and sues a scire facias against the party, though hereby he is an actor, yet he cannot be nonsuit. 2 Roll. Abr. 130.

So if a man traverse an office he cannot be nonsuit, though he is an actor, for he hath no original pending against the king. 2 Roll. Abr. 130; Dyer, 141, pl. 47; where it is made a quære.

But in a petition of right against the king, the plaintiff may be nonsuit. 11 H. 4. 52; 2 Roll. Abr. 130.

So in an audita querela, to avoid a statute, the plaintiff may be nonsuit, for he is plaintiff in this action. 47 Edm. 3. 5 b.

So he may be nonsuit in scire facias as well as in other actions. 1 Camp. 484.

If in two nihilis returned to a scire facias on a charter of pardon, the plaintiff does not appear, he shall be nonsuit; for the statute ordains, that upon his appearing he ought to count against the defendant. 45 Edm. 3. 16.

At the common law, upon every continuance, or day given over before judgment, the plaintiff was demandable, and upon his non-appearance might have been nonsuit. Co. Lit. 1. 9, b. That if at common law he did not like the damages given by the jury, he might be nonsuit. See 5 Mod. 208.

But by 2 Hen. 4. c. 7. it was enacted in the words following: "Whereas, upon verdict found before any justice in assize of novel disseisin, mort d'ancestor, (now abolished,) or any other action whatsoever, the parties before this time have been adjourned upon difficulty in law, upon the matter so found; it is ordained and established, that if the verdict goes against the plaintiff, the same plaintiff shall not be nonsuited."

Notwithstanding this statute, it has been held, that the plaintiff may be nonsuited after a special verdict, or after a demurrer and argument thereon. Co. Lit. 139; 2 Jon. 1; 2 Roll. Abr. 131, 132; 3 Leon. 28; and see 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 23, § 95.

A nonsuit can only be at the instance of the defendant; and therefore where the cause at nisi prius was called on, and jury sworn, but no counsel, attorneys, parties, or witnesses appeared on either side, the judge held, that the only way was to discharge the jury; for nobody has a right to demand the plaintiff but the defendant, and the defendant not demanding him, the judge could not order him to be called. 1 Stra. 267. See also 2 Stra. 1117.

But the plaintiff may be nonsuited in an undefended cause if he do not make out a proper case, or for a variance. 3 Taunt. 81. Where a cause is undefended at nisi prius, and the judge directs a nonsuit, with liberty for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict, the court may order the verdict to be entered accordingly for the plaintiff. 4 B. & A. 418.

When a cause is carried down by proviso, and the plaintiff does not appear at the trial, he should be nonsuited. 1 B. & C. 110; and see 1 B. & C. 94.

After a plea of tender the plaintiff, it is said, cannot be nonsuited. 1 Camp. 327, (but see the notes.) It is the practice to nonsuit him if he cannot make out his case, 2 F although money has been paid into court. 2 Salk. 597; 7 T. R. 372.

The plaintiff in no case is compellable to be nonsuited after he has appeared; 2 T. R. 275; and therefore if he insist upon the matter being left to a jury, they must give in their verdict, which is general or special. If it be for the plaintiff, or for the defendant in replevin, the jury should regularly assess the damages; but when the plaintiff is nonsuited on the trial of an issue, he cannot have contingent damages assessed for him on a demurrer. 1 Stra. 507. Though when the plaintiff in replevin is nonsuited, the jury may assess damages for the defendant. Comb. 11; 5 Mod. 76; and see Tidd's Pract.

With respect to nonsuits in ejectment, see that title, VII.

II. In real or mixt actions, the nonsuit of one demandant is not the nonsuit of both; but he who makes default shall be summoned and severed; but regularly, in personal actions, the nonsuit of one is the nonsuit of both. Co. Lit. 139; 2 Inst. 563; and see Roll. Abr. 132, several cases to this purpose.

But in personal actions brought by executors, there shall be summons and severance, because the best measure shall be taken for the benefit of the dead; and so it is in action of trespass, as executors for goods taken out of their own possession. Like law in account, as executors by the receipt of their own hands. Co. Lit. 139, a. See Executors, VI. 2.

In an audita querela concerning the personalty, the nonsuit of the one is not the nonsuit of the other; because it goeth by way of discharge, and freeing themselves, therefore the default of the one shall not hurt the other. Co. Lit. 139. In an audita querela, scire facias, attaint, the nonsuit of one shall not prejudice the other. 6 Co. 26.

In a quid juris clamat, the nonsuit of the one is the nonsuit of both; because the tenant cannot attorn according to the grant. Co. Lit. 139, a.

So on an appeal against divers, whether they pleaded to the same or several issues, it was adjudged that a nonsuit against one, at the trial of any of the issues, was a nonsuit as to all, because a nonsuit operated as a release of the whole. Cro. Eliz. 460, pl. 6; Dyer, 120; 2 Roll. Abr. 133; 1 Sid. 378.

A latital was sued out against four defendants in trespass, the plaintiff was nonsuit for want of a declaration, and the defendant's attorney entered four nonsuits against him; and it was held to be irregular, because the trespass is joint; and though the plaintiff may count severally against the defendants, yet it remains joint till severed by the court. 2 Salk. 455. There is a nonsuit before appearance at the return of the writ, or after appearance at some day of continuance. Co. Lit. 138, b.

In an action against several defendants, the plaintiff must be nonsuited as to all or none of them; and, therefore, if one of two defendants suffer judgment by default, and the other go to trial, the plaintiff cannot be nonsuited as to him; but such defendant must have a verdict if the plaintiff fail to make out his case. 3 T. R. 662.

It is laid down as a general rule, that a nonsuit for part is a nonsuit for the whole; but it hath been held, that if a defendant plead to one part, and thereupon issue is joined, and demur to the other, the plaintiff may be nonsuit as to one part, and proceed for the other. 2 Leon. 177; Hob. 180.

If in debt the defendant acknowledges the action as to part, and joins issue as to the residue, and the plaintiff hath judgment for that which is confessed; but there is a cesset executio, by reason of the damages to be assessed by the jury; if the plaintiff be nonsuited in this issue, this shall be a nonsuit for the damages to be given, because that he had judgment. 2 Roll. Abr. 134.

If in trover the defendant pleads, that as to some of the goods they were fixed to his freehold, as to others, that he had them of the gift of the plaintiff, and as to the rest not guilty; and as to the first, the plaintiff enters non vult ulterius prosegui; this amounts only to a retraxit, and is no nonsuit, so as to bar the plaintiff from proceeding on the other parts of the plea, on the rule that a nonsuit for part is a nonsuit for the whole. 2 Leon. 177.

III. A NONSUIT, as hath been observed, is regularly no peremptory bar; but the plaintiff may, notwithstanding, commence any new action of the same or like nature; but this general rule has or had the following exceptions:—

1. It is peremptory in a quare impedit; and in that action a discontinuance is also peremptory; and the reason is, for that the defendant had, by judgment of the court, a writ to the bishop; and the incumbent that cometh in by that writ shall never be removed, which is a flat bar to that presentation.

2. Nonsuit in an appeal of murder, rape, robbery, &c. after appearance was peremptory, and this in favorem vita, but the nonsuit of the plaintiff in an appeal was not such an acquittal on which the defendant should recover damages against the abettors, by Westm. 2. 13 Edm. 1. st. 1. c. 12; unless after the nonsuit he were arraigned at the king's suit, and acquitted.

3. So if the plaintiff, in an appeal of maihem, were nonsuit after appearance, it was peremptory, for the words thereat were felonice maihemavit. Appeals, however, in criminal cases, were abolished by the 59 Geo. 3. c. 46.

4. A nonsuit after appearance is also peremptory in a writ of nativo habendo, and the nonsuit of one plaintiff in that action nonsuits both in favorem libertatis; for in a liberate proband such nonsuit is not peremptory, neither is the nonsuit of one plaintiff the nonsuit of both. Co. Lit. 139, a. Cro. Eliz. 881.

5. Such nonsuit was also peremptory in attaint (abolished by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. § 60), but a discontinuance in an attaint was not, because there was a judgment given upon the nonsuit, but not upon the discontinuance. Co. Lit. 139, a.

If a record be ever so erroneous, the plaintiff who has made default by suffering a nonsuit, cannot have a judgment afterwards in his favour. 4 T. R. 436.

IV. THE delay and expense attending the trial by provision (see Trial), gave rise to the 14 Geo. 2. c. 17. which enacted, that where any issue is joined in an action in the courts at Westminster, and the plaintiff hath neglected to bring such issue on to be tried, according to the practice of the said courts, the judges of the said courts respectively may, at any time after such neglect, upon motion in open court, and notice having been given thereof, give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit; unless the said court shall, upon just cause and reasonable terms, allow any further time for the trial of such issue; and if the plaintiff shall neglect to try such issue within the time so allowed, then the said court shall proceed to give such judgment as aforesaid. Provided that all judgments, given by virtue of this act shall be of the like force and effect as judgments upon nonsuit. Provided also, that the defendants shall upon such judgment be awarded their costs in any action or suit where they were upon nonsuit be entitled to the same.

This statute has been held to extend to qui tam actions as well as others. Barnes, 315. And also to a traverse or return of a mandamus. Say. Rep. 110; Say. Costs, 166; 4 T. R. 689. And to a writ of right, in which it may be entered against the demandant. 1 Bos. & Pull. 103.

But it does not extend any more than the trial by provision to actions of replevin, &c. in which the defendant is considered as an actor, and may therefore enter the issue and carry down the cause to trial himself. 1 Black. Rep. 375; Say. Costs, 168; 3 T. R. 661; 5 T. R. 400; but see Barnes, 317. And where there are two defendants, one of whom lets judgment go by default, the other cannot have judgment as in case of a non-suit. Say. Rep. 22, 103; Say. Costs, 163, 164, 168; 1 Wils. 325; 1 Burr. 358. Also, where the cause has been once carried down to trial, the defendant cannot have such judgment for not carrying it down again. 1 T. R. 492; 3 T. R. 1; 1 H. Black. 101.

The course and practice of the court, referred to by the statute, is that which before regulated the trial by proesso (see Trial); and as the defendant could not have such trial until the plaintiff had been guilty of laches, nor until after the issue was entered on record, so neither till then is he entitled to judgment as in case of a nonsuit. If the action be laid in London or Middlesex, the defendant ought not to give a rule for the plaintiff to enter his issue the same term in which it is joined, unless notice of trial hath been given; and accordingly it is held, that in a town cause, unless notice of trial has been given, the defendant cannot move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit the next term after that in which issue was joined, although it was joined early enough to enable the plaintiff to give notice of trial for the sittings after that term; the plaintiff in such case having the whole of the next term to enter the issue, and no laches can be imputed to him till the term after. 1 T. R. 557; 1 H. Black. 67, contra; and see 1 H. Black. 129, 282. But if notice of trial has been given, in a town cause, for a sitting in term, the plaintiff may move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit, the next term, being the term after that in which the issue ought to be entered. To support a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit in the next term after that in which issue was joined, the affidavit must state that notice of trial was given for a sitting in the preceding term; but in the third or other subsequent term, a general affidavit, stating the term when the issue was joined, is deemed sufficient. 1 H. Black. 282. In a country cause, where notice of trial is given for the assizes, the defendant may move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit the next term; but the plaintiff is not bound to give notice of trial till the term succeeding that in which issue was joined. And if he do not, the plaintiff cannot move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit till after the next assizes. 2 T. R. 734.

The rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit is a rule to slow cause, founded on an affidavit of the state of the proceedings, and of the plaintiff's default in not proceeding to trial; which rule has been held sufficient notice of motion within the act. Lofft, 265; 1 H. Black. 527, contra.

Now by the rules H. T. 2 W. L. a rule not for judgment as in case of a nonsuit may be obtained on motion without previous notice, but in that case it shall not operate as a stay of proceedings.

No motion for judgment as in case of a nonsuit shall be allowed after a motion for costs for not proceeding to trial for the same default, but such costs may be moved for separately, i. e. without moving at all for judgment as in case of a nonsuit, or after such motion is disposed of; or the court, on discharging a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit, may order the plaintiff to pay the costs of not proceeding to trial, but the payment of such costs shall not be made a condition of discharging the rule.

The roll must formerly have been in court at the time the motion was made.

But by one of the above rules, no entry of the issue shall be deemed necessary to entitle a defendant to move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit.

The rule is made absolute of course, on an affidavit of service, unless the plaintiff show some cause to the contrary; as the absence of a material witness, &c. But a slight cause in general is deemed sufficient, if the plaintiff will undertake pre-emptorily to try at the next sittings or assizes. The insolvency of the defendant, after the action brought, is good cause against judgment as in case of a nonsuit. Doug. 671.

But unless the plaintiff will consent to stay all further proceedings, and enter a cesset processus, the court will send him down to a pre-emptory undertaking. Where the rule to show cause was discharged, on an affidavit which contained an answer false in itself, the court would not afterwards open the matter, on an affidavit which disproved the contents of the former one. 3 T. R. 405. See Tidd's Pract. See further Costs, Damages, Process, Trial, &c.

NON SUM INFORMATUS. A formal answer made of course by an attorney, that he is not instructed or informed to say any thing material in defence of his client; by which he is deemed to leave it undefended, and so judgment passeth against his client. See Judgments acknowledged for Debts.

NON-TENURE. Was a plea in bar to a real action, by saying, that he (the defendant) held not the land mentioned in the plaintiff's count or declaration, or at least some part thereof. See 25 E. 3. c. 16; 1 Mod. Rep. 250. And our books mention non-tenure general and special; general, where one denied ever to have been tenant of the land in question; and special was an exception, alleging that he was not tenant on the day whereon the writ was purchased. West. Synb. par. 2. When the tenant or defendant pleaded non-tenure of the whole, he need not have said who was tenant; but if he pleaded non-tenure as to part, he must have set the tenant forth. 1 Mod. 181. Non-tenure in part, or in the whole, was not pleadable after imparlance. 3 Lev. 55. See Pleading.

NON-TERM, non terminus.] The vacation between term and term; formerly called the time or days of the king's peace. Lamb. Arch. 126.

NON-USER. Of offices concerning the public, is cause of forfeiture. 9 Rep. 50. And if one have a franchise, and do not use it, he shall forfeit the same; which likewise may be lost by default, as well as non-user. See Condition, I. 1, Office.

NOOK OF LAND, nocata terræ. In an old deed of Sir Walter de Pedwardyn, twelve acres and a half of land were called a nook of land; but the quantity is generally uncertain. Dugd. Warwick, p. 685.

NORRY, quasi North Roy. The Northern King at Arms, 14 Car. 2. c. 33. See Herald.

NORTHAMPTON. The statute named from this place was made there, anno 2 E. 3.

NORTHERN BORDERS, NORTHUMBERLAND AND NORTHERN COUNTIES. Provisions for preventing theft and rapine upon the northern borders were made by numerous statutes, which are now repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27.

NORTH WALES. See Wales.

NORTH-WEST PASSAGE. Various rewards for the discovery of a passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, were offered by the 16 Geo. 3. c. 6. and the 58 Geo. 3. c. 20. both of which statutes were repealed by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 66. The same act also repealed the statutes proposing rewards for the discovery of the longitude at sea. See Longitude; under which head it should have been stated that these latter statutes are now no longer in force.

NORWICH. See 9 Geo. 1. c. 9; and Wool, Woollen Manufactures.

NOTARY, or NOTARY-PUBLIC, notarius. A person who takes notes, or makes a short draught of contracts, obligations, or other writings and instruments. 27 Ed. 3. st. 1. c. 1. At this time a notary-public is one who publicly attests deeds or writings, to make them authentic in another country; but principally in business relating to merchants; they make protests of foreign bills of exchange, &c.

The 41 Geo. 3. c. 79. was passed for regulating public notaries in England. By this act no person shall act as a notary unless duly admitted, nor shall he be admitted as a notary unless he shall have served seven years' apprenticeship to a notary, on penalty of 50*l.* Notaries shall not permit unqualified persons to act in their names. Persons applying to become notaries within the jurisdiction of the Company of Scriveners in London, shall be free of the said company.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 70. the clause in the above act requiring persons to serve a seven years' clerkship before they can be admitted notaries, is limited to London and a circuit of ten miles from the Royal Exchange.

§ 2. empowers the master of the Court of Faculties of the Archbishop of Canterbury to appoint and admit as notaries, attornies, solicitors, or proctors, residing beyond, but who (§ 3.) are not to practise within the above limits. By § 4. notaries admitted under the act, practising out of the district specified in their faculties, are to be struck off the roll, and disabled from performing any notarial act.

NOTE OF A FINE. Was a brief of the fine made by the chirographer before it was engrossed. West. Symb.

NOTES PROMISSORY. See Bills of Exchange.

NOT GUILTY, IN CRIMINAL CASES. The general issue or plea of the defendant in any criminal action or prosecution.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 28. § 1. if any person, not having privilege of peerage, being arraigned upon any indictment for treason, felony, or piracy, shall plead thereto "not guilty," he shall by such plea, without any further form, be deemed to have put himself upon the country for trial, and the court shall in the usual manner order a jury for the trial of such person accordingly.

By § 2. if any person arraigned upon or charged with any indictment or information for treason, felony, piracy, or misdemeanor, shall stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to the indictment or information, the court may, if it think fit, order a plea of not guilty to be entered on behalf of such person, which shall have the same effect as if such person had pleaded.

NOT GUILTY, IN CIVIL ACTIONS. The general issue in trespass and actions on the case. Not guilty is a good issue in actions of trespass, and upon the case for deceipts or wrongs: but not on a promise, &c. Palm. 393. If one have just cause of justification in trespass, and plead not guilty, he cannot give the special matter in evidence, but must confess the fact, and plead the special matter, &c. 5 Rep. 119. Unless where it is otherwise provided for by statute; as in the case of justices of the peace, peace-officers, church-wardens, and overseers of the poor, &c.

By the rules of H. T. 4 W. 4. in actions on the case, the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial only of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the facts stated in the indictment, and no other defence than such denial shall be admissible under that plea; all other pleas in denial shall take issue on some particular matter of fact alleged in the declaration.

See the instances subjoined of the above rule by way of example. See further Nuisance, Pleading, Slander, Way.

NOTICE. The making something known, that a man was or might be ignorant of before. And it produces divers effects; for by it the party who gives the same shall have some benefit, which otherwise he should not have had; by this means, the party to whom the notice is given is made subject to some action or charge that otherwise he had not been liable to, and his estate in danger of prejudice. Co. Lit. 309.

Notice is required to be given in many cases by law to justify proceedings where any thing is to be done or demanded, &c. But none is bound by law to give notice to another person of that which such other may otherwise inform himself, except in cases where notice is directed by act of parliament.

Generally speaking, where it is required by law that notice shall be given to a party before he shall be affected by any act, leaving it at his dwelling-house is sufficient. But it is otherwise in the case of process to bring a party into contempt; there personal notice is necessary.

It is impossible in the present work to enumerate the various cases in which a notice is necessary or advisable; many of which will be found enumerated in 1 Chitty's

General Practice of the Law. And see further Action, Award, Condition, Covenant, Justice, Lease, Mortgage, Motion, Trial, &c.

NOTICE TO QUIT. See Ejectment, V., Lease, I. 4.

NOVALE. Land newly ploughed or converted into tillage, that had not been tilled within time of memory; and sometimes it is taken for ground which hath been ploughed for two years, and afterwards lies fallow for one year; or that which lies fallow every other year; it is called novale, because the earth novè culturâ proscinditur. Cartular. Abbat. de Furnesse in Com. Lac. in Officio Ducat. Lanc. fol. 41.

NOVA OBLATA. See Oblata.

NOVEL ASSIGNMENT, nova assignatio.] See New Assignment, Trespass.

NOVELLÆ. Those constitutions of the civil law which were made after the publication of the Theodosian code, were called novellæ by the Emperors who ordained them; but some writers call the Justinian edition only by that name. See Civil Law.

NOYLES. By the 21 Jac. 1. c. 18. no person should put any flocks, noyles, thrums, &c. or other deceivable thing into any broad woollen cloth; but this statute was repealed by the 49 Geo. 3. c. 109.

NUCES COLLIGERE. To gather hazle-nuts; this was formerly one of the works or services imposed by lords upon their inferior tenants. Paroch. Antiq. 495.

NUDE CONTRACT. See Nudum Pactum.

NUDE MATTER. A bare allegation of a thing done, &c. See Matter.

NUDUM PACTUM. Is a bare naked contract without a consideration. If a man bargains or sells goods, &c. and there is no recompence made or given for the doing thereof, as if one say to another, I sell you all my lands or goods, &c. nothing is agreed upon what the other shall give or pay for the same, so that there is not a quid pro quo of one thing for another; this is a nude contract, and void in law, and for the non-performance thereof, no action will lie; for the maxim in law is ex nudo pacto non oritur actio. Terms de Leg. 111. law, in fact, supposes error in making these contracts; thereby being as it were of one side only. See Assumpsit, 111. Consideration.

NUISANCE (anciently spelled) NUSANCE.

NOCUMENTUM, from the Fr. nuire, i. e. nocere.] Annoyance any thing that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage.

Nuisances are of two kinds; public or common, which affect the public, and are an annoyance to all the king's subjects, and private nuisances, which may be defined to be any thing done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, &c. hereditaments of another. Finch, L. 188.

I. Common or public Nuisances; what shall be considered such.

II. What are private Nuisances.

III. Of the remedy for public Nuisances.

IV. Of the remedy for Private Nuisances.

I. COMMON NUISANCES are a species of offences against the public order and economical regimen of the state; being either the doing of a thing to the annoyance of all the king's subjects, or the neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75. § 1.

Of this nature are - 1. Annoyances in the highways, bridges, and the public rivers, by rendering the same inconvenient or dangerous to pass, either positively by actual obstruction, or negatively by want of reparations. For both of these, the person so obstructing, or such individuals as are bound to repair and cleanse them, or (in default of these last) the parish at large may be indicted, distrained to repair and amend them, and in some cases fined. And a presentment thereof by a judge of assize, &c. or a justice of the peace, shall be in all respects equivalent to an indictment. 7 Geo. 3. c. 42.

Where there is an house erected, or an inclosure made on any part of the king's demesnes, or of an highway, or common street, or public river, or such like public things, it is called a perpresture, from the French pourpris, an inclosure. 1 Inst. 277; and see Way.

A bridge built in a public highway without public utility, is indictable as a nuisance; and so it is if built colorably in an imperfect or inconvenient manner, with a view to throw the onus of rebuilding or repairing it immediately on the county. 2 East, 342.

In a late case, the defendant being proprietor of a colliery, made a rail-road from it to a sea-port town. The rail-road was 400 yards long, and laid upon a turnpike-road, which it narrowed so far, that in some places there was not a clear space for two carriages to pass. Defendant allowed the public to use the rail-road, paying a toll. Held, that the facility thereby given to the general traffic with the sea-port, and particularly to the conveyance of coals there, was not such a convenience as justified the obstruction of the highway. 1 B. & Adol. 441.

The defendants, for the preservation of their lands had severally raised banks or fenders, which occasioned the water of a brook to flow in much greater quantities to the conduit of a canal than otherwise would be the case, and thereby greatly endangered the canal. The canal had been constructed under an act of parliament before the embankments of the defendants were made, and had not been the cause of a greater flow of water on the defendants' lands. Held, that the defendants were indictable as for a nuisance, in turning the water from its natural course to the injury of the canal, (which was regarded as a public highway,) though so doing they protected their own lands from injury. The King v. Trafford, 1 B. & Ad. 874; and see 6 B. & C. 317; 8 B. & C. 355.

Under acts of parliament empowering a company to make a railway between certain points, (reciting that it would be of great public utility, and materially assist the general traffic of the country), and to use locomotive engines upon it; the railway was made parallel to an ancient highway, and in some places within a few yards of it. The locomotive engines frightened the horses of persons using the highway. On an indictment against the company for a nuisance, it was held that this interference with the rights of the public must be taken to have been contemplated and sanctioned by the legislature, the words authorising the use of the engines being regulated; and the public benefit derived from the railway showed that there was nothing unreasonable in the clause which gave such an authority to the company. Rex v. Pease, 1 B. & Ad. 30.

A common waggoner, who continually obstructs the passage of a street by the exercise of his business, may be indicted for a nuisance. 6 East, 427. See 3 Camp. 226.

If a ship be sunk in a port or haven, and it is not removed by the owner, he may be indicted for it as a common nuisance, because it is prejudicial to the commonwealth in hindering navigation and trade. 2 Lil. 244.

So it is a nuisance to lay timber in a public river, although the soil on which it is laid belong to the party; provided it obstructs the necessary intercourse. 3 Bac. Abr.; Stra. 1247. Or to place a floating dock in the river, although beneficial for repairing ships. 2 Hank. P. C. c. 75. § 11. in n.

So indictment lies for laying logs, &c. in the stream of a public navigable river; it is a common nuisance to divert part of a public navigable river whereby the current is weakened, and made unable to carry vessels of the same burden it could bear; and if a river be stopped to the nuisance of the country, and none appear bound by prescription to cleanse it, those who have the piscary, and the neighbouring towns that have a common passage and easement therein, may be compelled to do the same. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 75. §§ 11, 13.

In a late important case the law respecting nuisances in navigable rivers was fully considered, and led to a difference of opinion on the bench. On the trial of an indictment for a nuisance in the river at Newcastle by erecting staiths there for loading ships with coals, the jury were directed by Bayley, J. to acquit the defendants if they thought that the abridgment of the right of passage occasioned by these erections was for a public purpose, and produced a public benefit; and if the erections were in a reasonable situation, and a reasonable space was left for passage of vessels on the river; and he pointed out to the jury that by means of the staiths coals were supplied at a cheaper rate, and in better condition than they otherwise could be, which was a public benefit. Held by Bayley and Hobroyd, Justices, that this direction to the jury was proper. Lord Tenterden, C. J. dissente.; Rex v. Russell, 7 Barn. & C.; and see Rex v. Grosvenor, 2 Stark. 511.

2. All those kinds of nuisances (such as offensive trades and manufactures) which, when injurious to a private man, are actionable, are, when detrimental to the public, punishable by public prosecutions, and subject to fine according to the quantity of the misdemeanor; and particularly the keeping of any hogs in any city or market-town is indictable as a public nuisance. Salk. 460.

A brew-house erected in such an inconvenient place, wherein the business cannot be carried on without incommoding the neighbourhood, may be indicted as a common nuisance; and so in the like case may a glass-house, &c. 1 Hank. P. C. c. 75. § 10. Where there hath been an ancient brew-house time out of mind, although in a most public street of a city, this is not any nuisance, because it shall be supposed to be erected when there were no buildings near it; but if a brew-house should be now built in any of the high streets of London, or trading places, it will be a nuisance, and action on the case lies for whomsoever receives any damage thereby, 2 Lil. Abr. 246; Palm. 53.

So it was decided in a recent case, that where a person sets up a noxious trade remote from human habitations and public roads, and new houses are afterwards built, and new roads constructed near it; the party in this case is not guilty of a nuisance for continuing his trade, although it be a nuisance to the new inhabitants, and to persons passing along the new constructed road; for they cannot by their own act of coming to settle in the neighbourhood, make that a nuisance which was not so before, on the principle of volenti non fit injuria. 2 C. & P. 483.

It is a nuisance to manufacture acid spirit of sulphur, vitrol, or aqua fortis in the vicinity of dwelling-houses, 1 Burr. 339; and see Peake's Ca. 90; 1 Mod. & Malk.; and it is not necessary that the smell should be unwholesome, it is enough if it renders the enjoyment of life uncomfortable; 1 Burr. 337; and it seems to be immaterial how long an offensive manufacture or other nuisance has been carried on, since no length of time can legitimate a nuisance; 3 Camp. 227; 7 East, 199; and at all events a party increasing the nuisance of an offensive trade may be indicted for the increase, even though the original establishment of it may have become legal by lapse of time. 1 Mod. & Malk. 281.

In judging whether a particular trade is a public nuisance or not, the public good may in some cases—when the public health is not concerned—be taken into consideration to see if it outweighs the public annoyance. And with respect to offensive works, though they may have been originally established under circumstances which would prima facie protect them against a prosecution for a nuisance, yet it seems, that a wilful neglect to adopt established improvements which would make them less offensive may be indictable. 1 Russ. 297.

3. All disorderly inns or ale-houses, bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, stage plays unlicensed, bootles and stages for rope-dancers, mountebanks, and the like, are public nuisances, and may upon indictment be suppressed and fined. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75. § 6.

Inns in particular, being intended for the lodging and receipt of travellers, may be indicted, suppressed, and the inn-keepers fined, if they refuse to entertain a traveller, without a very sufficient cause; for thus to frustrate the end of their institution is held to be disorderly behaviour. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 78. § 2. See Inns.

4. By the 10 & 11 W. 3. c. 17. all lotteries are declared to be public nuisances; and all grants, patents, or licenses for the same to be contrary to law. See further Lotteries.

As to the statute 6 Geo. 1. c. 18. (now repealed), which rendered certain advertising stock companies, with transferable shares, public nuisances, and the cases decided on the act, see Bac. Abr. Nuisance, A. 7th edit.

5. The making and selling of fire-works and squibs, or throwing them about in any street, is, on account of the danger that may ensue to any thatched or timber buildings, declared to be a common nuisance, 9 & 10 W. 3. c. 7. and therefore is punishable by fine. See title Fire-works. To this head also may be referred (though not declared a common nuisance) the making, keeping, or carriage of too large a quantity of gunpowder at one time, or in one place, or vehicle, which is prohibited by 12 Geo. 3. c. 61. under heavy penalties and penalties and forfeiture. See title Gunpowder.

6. Eaves-droppers, or such as listen under walls or windows, or the eaves of a house, to hearken after discourse, and thereupon to frame slanderous and mischievous tales, are a common nuisance, and presentable at the court-leet. Kitch. of Courts, 20. Or are indictable at the sessions, and punishable by fine, and finding sureties for their good behaviour. Ibid.; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 61. § 4.

Lastly, a common scold is a public nuisance to her neighbourhood. For which offence she may be indicted. 6 Mod. 213. And, if convicted, shall be sentenced to be placed in a certain engine of correction, called the trebucket, castigatory, or cuck-stool. 3 Inst. 219. See Castigatory, Scold.

It is a common nuisance indictable to divide a house in a town for poor people to inhabit in, by reason whereof it will be more dangerous in the time of sickness and infection of the plague. 2 Roll. Abr. 139.

So it is a nuisance for persons afflicted with infectious disorders to go about in the highways and other places of resort. See 4 M. & S. 73; Ib. 272.

A common playhouse, if it draws together such number of coaches and people as incommode and disturb the neighbourhood, may be a nuisance; but these places are not naturally nuisances, but become so by accident. 1 Roll. Rep. 109; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75. § 7.

A prohibitory writ was issued out of B. R. against Betterton and other actors, for erecting a new playhouse in Little Lincoln's Inn Fields, reciting that it was a nuisance to the neighbourhood; and they not obeying the writ, an attachment was granted against them; but it was objected that an attachment could not be issued, and that the most proper method was to proceed by indictment, and then the jury would consider whether it were a nuisance or not; and this was the better opinion. 5 Mod. 142; 2 Nels. Abr. 1192.

One Hall having begun to build a booth near Charing-Cross, for rope-dancing, which drew together many idle people, was ordered by the lord chief justice not to proceed: he proceeded, notwithstanding, affirming, that he had the king's warrant and promise to hear him harmless; but being required to give a recognizance of three hundred pounds that he would not go on with the building, and he refusing, he was committed, and a record was made of this nuisance, as upon the court's own view, it being in their way to Westminster, and a writ issued to the sheriff of Middlesex to prostrate it. 1 Vent. 169; 1 Mod. 96.

And it has lately been held that keeping a pigeon-shooting-ground at Bayswater for rifle-shooting, whereby idle and disorderly persons are collected in the neighbourhood outside the ground to shoot the strayed pigeons, is an indictable nuisance. 3 B. & Adol. 184.

It hath been holden to be a common nuisance to make great noises in the night with a speaking trumpet. Str. 704. Or to permit a house near the highway to continue in a ruinous condition. Salk. 357. Or to travel with a cart on a common pack-way or horse-way, and by thus ploughing it up to render the use of it inconvenient. 6 Mod. 145. Or to put a ship of three hundred tons into Billingsgate dock, for although it is a common dock, it is only for the reception of small vessels freighted with provisions for the London market. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75. § 11.

So it is an indictable nuisance to keep a fierce dog and to bite mankind, to go at large unmuzzled; 4 Burn's J. 578; and the like for permitting a savage bull to go about the public thoroughfares.

So it is a public nuisance to sell unwholesome food, or to mix noxious ingredients in any thing made and supplied for the food of man. See 3 M. & S. 11.

So whatever openly outrages decency, and is injurious to public morals, is a common nuisance, and indictable as a misdemeanor. 1 Hawk. c. 5. § 4; 4 Comm. 65, n. And see Indecency, &c.

But erecting a dove-cote is not a common nuisance; though action on the case will lie at the suit of the lord of the manor for erecting it without his license. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75. § 8. It was anciently held, that if a man erected a dove-cote it was punishable at the leet; but it has been since adjudged not to be punishable in the leet as a common nuisance, it that the lord for this particular nuisance should have an action on the case, or an assize of nuisance: as he may for building an house to the nuisance of his mill. 5 Rep. 101; 3 Salk. 248.

And the annoyance proceeding from a public nuisance must be of a real and substantial nature; for the fears of mankind, however reasonable, will not create a nuisance; therefore it is no nuisance to erect a building for the purpose of inoculation. 3 Atk. 21, 726, 750.

Neither the king, nor lord of a manor, may license any man to make or commit a nuisance. 1 Roll. Abr. 138.

Generally speaking, no length of time will legalise a public nuisance. See 7 East, 195; 3 Camp. 227; 2 B. & 4. c. 8.

A nuisance in a church-yard is, properly, of ecclesiastical cognizance. Carth. 152.

II. PRIVATE NUISANCES are such as affect either the corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments of an individual.

First, As to corporeal hereditaments. If a man builds a house so close to mine that his roof overhangs my roof, or throws the water off his roof upon mine, this is a nuisance for which an action will lie. F. N. B. 184.

So if a man have a spout falling down from his house, and another person erect any thing above it, that the water cannot fall as it did, but is forced into the house of the plaintiff, and rots the timber, it is a nuisance actionable. 18 E. 3; 2 Roll. Abr. 140. And in trespass for a nuisance, in causing stinking water in the defendant's yard to run to the walls of the plaintiff's house, and piercing them so that it ran into his cellar. See judgment was given for the plaintiff. Hard. 60.

Likewise to erect a house or other building so near to mine that it obstructs my ancient lights and windows, is a nuisance of a similar nature. 9 Rep. 58. But in this latter case it is necessary that the windows be ancient; that is, have existed a long time without interruption, otherwise there is no injury done, (but see the recent statute under tit. Lights.) For he hath as much right to build a new edifice upon ground as I have upon mine, since every man may erect what he pleases upon the upright or perpendicular of his own soil, so as not to prejudice what has long been enjoyed by another; and it was my folly to set so near another's ground. Cro. Eliz. 118; Salk. 459.

Also if a person keeps his hogs, or other noisome animals, so near the house of another that the stench of them incommodates him, and make the air unwholesome (or renders the enjoyment of life or property uncomfortable,) this is an injurious nuisance, as it tends to deprive him of the use and benefit of his house. 9 Rep. 58; 1 Burr. 337.

So where a person kept a hog-sty near a man's parlour, whereby he lost the benefit of it. 2 Roll. Abr. 140.

A like injury is, if one's neighbour sets up and exercises any offensive trade; as a tanner's, a tallow chandler's, or the like; for though these are lawful and necessary trades, yet they should be exercised in remote places; for the rule is, sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas; this therefore is an actionable nuisance. Cro. Car. 510.

An inn-keeper brought an action on the case against a person for erecting a tallow furnace, and melting stinking tallow so near his house, that it annoyed his guests, and his family became unhealthy; and adjudged that the action lay. Cro. Car. 367.

So that the nuisances which affect a man's dwelling may be reduced to these three: 1. Overhanging it, which is also a species of trespass, for, cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad medium. 2. Stopping lights; and 3. Corrupting the air with noisome smells; for light and air are two indispensable requisites to every dwelling. But depriving one of a mere matter of pleasure, as of a fine prospect, by building a wall, or the like; this, as it abridges nothing really convenient or necessary, is no injury to the sufferer, and is therefore not an actionable nuisance. 9 Rep. 58; Cro. Eliz. 118; 3 Salk. 459.

As to nuisance to one's lands, if one erects a smelting-house for lead so near the land of another, that the vapour and smoke kills his corn and grass, and damages his cattle therein, this is held to be a nuisance. 1 Roll. Abr. 89.

If a person melt lead so near the close of another that it scorches his grass there, whereby cattle are lost; notwithstanding this is a lawful trade, and for the benefit of the nation, action lies against him, for he ought to use his trade in a proper place, so as no damage may happen to the proprietors of the land adjoining. 2 Roll. Abr. 141.

A plaintiff was possessed of an house wherein he dwelled, and the defendant built a brew-house, &c. in which he burnt coal so near the house that by the stink and smoke he could not dwell there without danger of his health; and it was adjudged that the action lay, though a brew-house is necessary, when he is burning coal in it. Hutton, 195.

And by consequence it follows, that if one does any other act, in itself lawful, which yet being done in that place necessarily tends to the damage of another's property, it is a nuisance; for it is incumbent on him to find some other place to that act where it will be less offensive. So also if my neighbour ought to scour a ditch, and does not, whereby the ditch is overflowed, this is an actionable nuisance. Hale on F. N. B. 427.

With regard to other corporeal hereditaments; it is a nuisance to stop or divert water that used to run to another's mill or pond. F. N. B. 184. To corrupt or poison a stream of course, by erecting a dye-house, or a lime-pit, for the exercise of trade, in the upper part of the stream. 9 Rep. 59; 2 Roll. Abr. 141. Or, in short, to do any act therein, that in its consequences must necessarily tend to the prejudice of one's neighbour. 3 Comm. c. 13.

Building a smith's forge near a man's house, and making a noise with hammers, so that he could not sleep, was held a nuisance for which action lies, although the smith pleaded that he and his servants worked at seasonable times; that he had been a blacksmith and used the trade above twenty years in that place, and set up his forge in an old room, &c. For though a smith is a necessary trade, and so is a lime-burner and a hog-merchant, yet these trades must be used so as not to be injurious to the neighbours. 1 Lutw. 69.

But if a schoolmaster keeps a school so near the study of a lawyer by profession, that it is a disturbance to him, this is not a nuisance for which action may be brought. Wood's Inst. 538.

Where two houses, one whereof is a nuisance to the other, come both into one and the same hand, the wrong is purged. See Hob. 131.

Secondly, As to incorporeal hereditaments. If I have a way annexed to my estate, across another's lands, and he obstructs me in the use of it either by totally stopping it or putting logs across it, or ploughing over it, it is a nuisance; for in the first case I cannot enjoy my right at all, and in the latter I cannot enjoy it so commodiously as I ought. F. N. B. 183; 2 Roll. Abr. 140.

Also if I am entitled to hold a fair or market, and another person sets up a fair or market so near mine that he does me a prejudice, it is a nuisance to the freehold which I have in my market or fair. F. N. B. 148; 2 Roll. Abr. 140. See Market.

If a ferry is erected on a river so near another ancient ferry as to draw away its custom, it is a nuisance to the owner of the old one. For where there is a ferry by prescription, the owner is bound to keep it always in repair and readiness, for the ease of all the king's subjects: otherwise he may be grievously amerced: it would therefore, be extremely hard if a new ferry were suffered to share its profits, which does not also share his burden. 2 Roll. Abr. 140.

But where the reason ceases, the law also ceases with it; therefore it is no nuisance to erect a mill so near mine as to draw away the custom, unless the miller also intercepts the water. Neither is it a nuisance to set up any trade, or a school, in a neighbourhood, in rivalry with another; for by such emulation the public are like to be gainers; and if the new mill or school occasion a damage to the old one, it is damnum absque injuriâ. Hale on F. N. B. 184.

The stopping up a way leading from houses to lands, suffering the next house to decay, to the damage of my house (but see contra, Page v. Mayor of London, 9 B. & C. 725), and setting up or making a house of office, lime-pit, dye-house, tan-house, or butcher's shop, &c. and using them so near my house that the smell annoys me, or is infectious; or if they hurt my lands or trees, or the corruption of the water of lime-pits spoils my water or destroys fish in a river, &c.; these and the other evils already enumerated, are in general private nuisances. 3 Inst. 231; 5 Rep. 101; 9 Rep. 54; 1 Roll. Abr. 88; 2 Roll. 140; 1 Dunw. Abr. 173.

III. The proceeding in the case of a public nuisance is by indictment or presentment, which should charge the offence to be done to the common nuisance of all the large subjects, &c. Cro. Eliz. 148; 1 Hack. c. 7, §. 1.

By an old statute, 12 R. 2. c. 13, which if not actually obsolete is now entirely disregarded, none shall cast any garbage, dung, or filth, into ditches, waters, or other places within or near any city or town, on pain of punishment by the Lord Chancellor, at discretion, as a nuisance.

Where a statute makes an act "a common nuisance," an indictment lies against the offender, although a summary remedy is also given by proceedings before justices. 2 N. & M. 478.

The punishment imposed by the law on a person convicted of a nuisance, is fine and imprisonment; but as the removal of the nuisance is of course the object of the indictment, the court will adapt the judgment to the circumstances of the case.

On an indictment for a nuisance in erecting a wall across a road (not for continuing the nuisance), it is not necessary to adjudge that the nuisance be abated. But where it is stated in the indictment to be an existing nuisance, there must be judgment to abate it. 7 T. R. 467; 8 T. R. 148.

By 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 41, the court by which judgment ought to be pronounced on conviction for any public nuisance, is authorized to award such costs to the prosecutor as shall be deemed proper and reasonable, to be paid by the party convicted. By § 2, such court, without the consent of the prosecutor, may make order to remedy the grievance by altering the construction of the furnace, where the nuisance arises from furnaces used in the working of steam-engines: but by § 3, the act as to costs and alterations is not to extend to the furnaces of steam-engines used solely for sinking mines or smelting ores, &c. And see post, IV.

IV. As common or public nuisances are such inconvenient or troublesome offences which annoy the whole community in general, and not merely some particular person, they are therefore indictable only, and not actionable; as it would be unreasonable to multiply suits by giving every man a separate right of action for what damns him in common only with the rest of his fellow-subjects. 4 Comm. c. 13, p. 167; 5 Rep. 73; 1 Inst. 56; 1 Vent. 208. And as the law gives no private remedy for any thing but a private wrong, therefore no action lies for a public or common nuisance, but an indictment only, because the damage being common to all the king's subjects, no one can assign his particular proportion of it. 3 Comm. c. 13, p. 119. For this reason no person natural or corporate can have an action for a public nuisance, or nuisance, it, but only the king in his public capacity of supreme governor and pater familias of the kingdom. Vaugh. 341, 2. Yet this rule admits of one exception; where a private person suffers some extraordinary damage beyond the rest of the king's subjects by a public nuisance, in which case he shall have a private satisfaction by action. As if by means of a ditch dug across a public way, which is a common nuisance, a man or his horse suffer an injury by falling therein; there, for this particular damage, which is not common to others, the party shall have his action. 1 Inst. 56; 5 Rep. 73. So if by reason of a pit dug in a highway, a man for whose life I held lands, is drowned; or my servant falling into it receives injury, whereby I lose his service, &c.; for this special damage, which is not common to other persons, action lies. 4 Rep. 18; 5 Rep. 73; Cro. Car. 448; Vaugh. 341; 4 Bulst. 344. But a modern authority says, the injury must be direct, and not consequential, as by being delayed in a journey of importance. Bull. N. P. c. 5, p. 26; but see c. 7, p. 78. And where the inhabitants of a town had, by custom, a watering place for their cattle, which was stopped by another, it has been held that any inhabitant might have an action against him, otherwise they would be without remedy, because such a nuisance is not common to all the king's subjects, and presentable in the leet, or to be redressed by presentment or indictment in the quarter sessions. 5 Rep. 73; 9 Rep. 103.

It is said both of a common and private nuisance, that they may be abated or removed by those who are prejudiced by them, and they need not stay to prosecute for their removal. 2 Lil. Abr. 244; Wood's Inst. 443. Also if a house be on the highway, or a house hang over the ground of another, they may be pulled down; but no man can justify the doing more damage than is necessary, or removing the materials farther than requisite. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 75, 76; Stra. 680.

Also, if a man hath abated or removed a nuisance which offended him, in this case he is entitled to no action, for he had choice of two remedies; but having made his election of one remedy, he is totally precluded from the other. 3 Comm. c. 13, p. 220, cites 9 Rep. 55. See also F. N. B. 185; 2 Rol. Abr. 745. But this apparently admits of some qualification; for the party's right of action might attach before the removal; and in another case it is said, there is a difference between an assize for a nuisance (now abolished), and an action on the case (see post); for the first was to abate the nuisance, but the last is not to abate it, but to recover damages; therefore if the nuisance be removed, the plaintiff is entitled to his damages which accrued before; and though it is laid with a continuando for a longer time than the plaintiff can prove, he shall have damages for what he can prove before the nuisance was removed. 2 Mod. 253.

This abatement or removal of nuisances is classed by Blackstone among the species of remedy, allowed by law, through the mere act of the party injured. 3 Comm. c. 1. This abatement, removing, or taking away, may be performed by the party aggrieved by the nuisance, so as he commits no riot in the doing it. 5 Rep. 101; 9 Rep. 55. If a house or wall is erected so near to mine that it stops my ancient lights which is a private nuisance, I may enter my neighbour's lands and peaceably pull it down. Salk. 459. Or if a new gate be erected across the public highway, which is a common nuisance, any of the king's subjects passing that way may cut it down and destroy it. Cro. Car. 184. And the reason why the law allows this private and summary method of doing oneself justice, is because injuries of this kind, which obstruct or annoy such things as are of daily convenience and use, require an immediate remedy, and cannot wait for the slow progress of the ordinary forms of justice. 3 Comm. c. 1.

When the nuisance is caused by the misfeasance or nonfeasance of another, the party injured may in general abate it immediately, and without any previous notice or request, but if the nuisance be merely continued by a party who does not erect it, or when it consists of omission, he should be requested to remove it before the injured party can himself abate. 2 B. & C. 302; 3 D. & R. 556, S. C. And see supra as to the abating of private nuisances, 1 Chitty's Gen. Principles of the Law, 619.

With respect to the redressing of private nuisances by due course of law, the remedy by suit is by action on the case for damages, in which the party injured shall only recover satisfaction for the injury sustained, but cannot thereby remove the nuisance. However, every continuance of a nuisance is held to be a fresh one, and therefore a fresh action will lie, and very exemplary damages will probably be given, if after our verdict against him the defendant has the hardiness to continue it. 2 Leon. pl. 129; Cro. Eliz. 402.

On the principle that the continuation of a nuisance is, it were, a new nuisance, where a nuisance is erected in the time of the deviser, and continued afterwards by the devisee, an action may be maintained against the latter. 2 Leon. pl. 129; Cro. Car. 231. But a plaintiff may declare both vi et contra for erecting and continuing, the other for continuing only, though the latter method is sufficient in any case.

If one hath freehold land adjoining to the highway, and he encroach part of the way, and lay lands to it, and then dying, it comes to his heir, if he continues it, though he does nothing else, he may be indicted for the continuance of the nuisance. Rol. Abr. 137. So where a man erects a nuisance, and then lets it, the continuance by the lessee has been held to be a nuisance, and an action lies against him. Cro. Jac. 87; Moor, 353. And see 1 Mod. 54; 3 Salk. 248.

Also if a person assigns his lease with a nuisance, action lies against him for continuing it, because the lease was transferred with the original wrong, and his assignment continues the continuance; besides he hath a rent as consideration for the continuance; therefore he ought to answer the damages occasioned by it. 2 Salk. 460; 2 Cro. 272, 555.

The law, in order to give relief to the injured, formerly provided two other actions, the assize of nuisance and the writ of quod permittat prosternere; which not only gave the plaintiff satisfaction for his injury past, but also struck at the root, and removed the cause itself, the nuisance that occasioned the injury. These two actions, however, could only be brought by the tenant of the freehold, so that a lessee for years was confined to his action upon the case. Finch's L. 289.

An assize of nuisance was a writ wherein it was stated that the party injured complained of some particular fact done ad nocumentum liberi tenementi sui; and therefore commanding the sheriff to summon an assize, that is, a jury, and view the premises, and have them at the next commission of assizes, that justice may be done therein. F. N. B. 183. And if the assize was found for the plaintiff, he should have judgment of two things, 1st, to have the nuisance abated, and 2d, to recover damages. 9 Rep. 55. An assize of nuisance lay against the very wrong-doer himself who levied or did the nuisance, and did not lie against any person to whom he had aliened the tenements whereon the nuisance was situated. This was the immediate reason for making that equitable provision in stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 24, for granting a similar writ in casu consimili, where no former precedent was to be found. The statute gave the form of a new writ in this case, which only differed from the old one in stating that the wrong-doer and the alienee both raised the nuisance; for every continuation, as was before said, is a fresh nuisance.

Before this statute, the party injured, upon any alienation of the land wherein the nuisance was set up, was driven to his quod permittit prosterne, which was in the nature of a writ of right, and therefore subject to greater delays. 2 Inst. 105. This was a writ commanding the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance complained of, and unless he so permitted, to summon him to appear in court, and show cause why he would not. F. N. B. 121. And this writ lay as well for the alienee of the party first injured, as against the alienee of the party first injuring. 5 Rep. 100. And the plaintiff should have judgment therein to abate the nuisance, and to recover damages against the defendant.

Both these actions of assize of nuisance and of quod permittit prosterne have long been obsolete, having given way to the action on the case; and by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 36, they are abolished.

In an action on the case, as was before observed, no judgment can be had to abate the nuisance, but only to recover damages; and there is therefore now no proceeding at law whereby a man may obtain a judgment to abate a nuisance; but as a man is liable to a fresh suit for a continuance of a nuisance, the remedy afforded by an action on the case seems sufficient, as the damages awarded in repeated actions will at length compel the most obstinate man to remove the cause of complaint.

Where a party cannot himself, or with the assistance of others, abate a private nuisance, and in an action on the case fails in procuring him the desired relief, his only course to get rid of it seems to be by an application to a court of equity, which after a verdict at law finding the nuisance, and before, will cause it to be removed. 1 Cor. 102; 2 Ves. 299.

NULL DISSISIN. Plea of. A plea in real actions, that there was no dissisin, and it was one species of the general plea. See Dissisin.

NULL TIEL RECORD. The plea of a plaintiff that there is no such record, on the defendant's alleging matter of record, in bar of the plaintiff's action. See Failure of Record.

It is sometimes the plea of a defendant, as in action on a judgment, &c.

If a record be asserted on one side to exist, and which is denied by the opposite party under the form of traverse, that there is no such a record remaining in court as alleged, the issue thus raised is called an issue of null tiel record, and the court awards in such case a trial by inspection and examination of the record. See further Record.

NULL TORT. Plea of. A plea in a real action, i. e. that no wrong was done, and a species of the general issue. See Pleading.

NULLUM ARBITRIUM. The usual plea of the defendant prosecuted on an arbitration bond, for not abiding by an award; that there was no award made. See Award.

NULLITY. Is where a thing is null and void, or of no force. Lit. Dict.

NUMERUM. Civitas Cant' reddit 24l. ad numerum, i. e. by number or tale, as we call it. Domesday.

NUMMATA. The price of any thing, generally by money; as denariata denoteth the price of a thing by computation of pence, and librata by computation of pounds.

NUMMATA TERRÆ. Is the same with denariatus terræ, and thought to contain an acre. Spelman.

NUMMUS. A piece of money or coin among the Romans; and it is a penny according to Matth. Westm. sub anno 1095.

NUN, nunna.] A consecrated virgin or woman, who by vow has bound herself to a single and chaste life, in some place or company of other women, separated from the world, and devoted to the service of God by prayer, fasting, and such like holy exercises; it is an Egyptian word, St. Jerome says.

By Westm. 2. 13 Ed. 2. c. 34. the punishment of three years' imprisonment, &c. was imposed for taking a nun from her convent.

NUNCIUS. A nuncio, or messenger, servant, &c. The Pope's nuncio was termed legatus pontificis; a legate. See Legate.

NUCUPATIVE WILL. See Will.

NUPER OBIT. Was a writ that lay for a sister and co-heir, deforced by her coparcener of lands or tenements, whereof their father, brother, or any other common ancestor died seised of an estate in fee-simple; for if one sister deforced another of land held in fee-tail, her sister and co-heir should have a formedon against her, &c. and not a nuper obit; and where the ancestor, being once seised, died seised, not of the possession, but the reversion, in such a case a writ of rationabili parte lay. Reg. Orig. 226; F. N. B. 107; Terms de Ley; Finch. L.

This writ of nuper obit is now abolished. See Limitation of Actions, III. See also Assize of Mort d'Ancestor; which is likewise abolished.

NURSERY GROUND. See Gardens.

NURTURE. Guardian for. This is, of course, the father or mother, until the infant attains the age of fourteen years; and in default of father or mother, the ordinary usually assigns some proper person. Co. Lit. 88; Moor. 738; 3 Rep. 38; 2 Jones. 90; 2 Lev. 163. See further Guardian, I. 2.

NYAS, Nidarius accipiter.] A hawk or bird of prey. Litt. Dict.

OATH.

O. The seven Antiphones, or alternate hymn of seven verses, &c. sung by the choir in the time of Advent, was called O, from beginning with such exclamation. In the statutes of St. Paul's church in London, there is one chapter De faciendo O. Liber Statut. MS. f. 86.

[OATH, Sax. soth, Lat. juramentum.] An affirmation or denial of any thing before one or more persons who have authority to administer the same, for the discovery and advancement of truth and right, calling God to witness that the testimony is true; therefore it is termed sacramentum, a holy band or tie: it is called a corporal oath, because the witness when he swears lays his right hand on the Holy Evangelists, or New Testament. 3 Inst. 165.

There are several sorts of oaths in our law; viz. Juramentum promissionis, where oath is made either to do, or not to do such a thing. Juramentum purgationis, when a person is charged with any matter by bill in Chancery, &c.: Juramentum probationis, where any one is produced as a witness, to prove or disprove a thing: and Juramentum triationis, when any persons are sworn to try an issue, &c. 2 Nels. 1181.

All oaths must be lawful, allowed by the common law, or some statute; if they are administered by persons in a private capacity, or not duly authorized, they are coram non judice, and void; and those administering them are guilty of a high contempt, for doing it without warrant of law, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. 3 Inst. 165; 4 Inst. 278; 2 Roll. Abr. 277.

One who was to testify on behalf of a felon, or person indicted of treason, or other capital offence, upon an indictment at the king's suit, could not formerly be examined on his oath for the prisoner against the king, though he might be examined without oath; but by the 1 Ann. 2. c. 9. witnesses on behalf of the prisoner upon indictments are to be sworn to depose the truth in such manner as witnesses for the king; and if convicted of wilful perjury, shall suffer the punishment inflicted for such offences.

The evidence for the defendant in an appeal (now abolished), whether capital or not, or on indictment or information for a misdemeanor, was to be on oath before this statute. 2 Hawk. P. C.

A person who is to be a witness in a cause may have two oaths given him, one to speak the truth to such things as the court shall ask him concerning himself, or other things which are not evidence in the cause; the other, to give testimony in the cause in which he is produced as a witness; the former is called the oath upon a voir (vrai) dire.

If oath be made against oath in a cause, it is a non liquet to the court which oath is true; and in such case the court will take that oath to be true which is to affirm a verdict, judgment, &c. as it tends to the expediting of justice. 2 Lil. Abr. 247.

A voluntary oath, by consent and agreement of the parties, is lawful as well as a compulsory oath; and in such case, if it is do a spiritual thing, and the party fail, he is suable in the ecclesiastical court, pro læsione fidei; if to do a temporal thing, and he fail therein, he may be punished in B. R. Adjudged on assumpsit, where, if the defendant would make oath before such a person, the plaintiff promised, &c. Cro. Car. 488; 3 Sulk. 248.

By the common law, officers of justice are bound to take an oath for the due execution of justice. Trin. 22 Car. 1. B. R. Though if promissory oaths of officers are broken, they are not punished as perjuries, like unto the breach of assertory oaths; but their offences ought to be punished with a severe fine, &c. Wood's Inst. 412.

Anciently, at the end of a legal oath, was added, So help me God at his holy dome, i. e. judgment; and our ancestors did believe that a man could not be so wicked as to call God to witness any thing which was not true; but that if any one should be perjured, he must continually expect that God would be the revenger; and thence probably purgations of criminals by their own oaths, and for great offences by the oaths of others, were allowed. Malmsh. lib. 2. c. 6; Leg. Hen. 1. c. 64.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 87. § 20. consuls at foreign parts may administer oaths or take affirmations, and do all acts which may be performed by notaries.

By 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 4. a great variety of oaths and affirmations in the customs and excise departments were abolished, and declarations substituted. But this act was repealed as to the customs by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 50.

Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists, are now in all cases relieved from the necessity of taking oaths. See Quakers, Separatists.

OATHS, UNLAWFUL. In 1797, in consequence of the alarm excited by the mutiny at the Nore, and with a view to check the attempts then made to induce the soldiery as well as sailors to enter into seditious conspiracies, the 37 Geo. 3. c. 123. was passed. By this statute persons administering or aiding, or present at and consenting to the administering of any oath or engagement purporting or intended to bind the person taking the same to engage in any mutinous or seditious purpose; or to disturb the public peace; or being of any association, society or confederacy for any such purpose; or obeying the orders or commands of any committee or body of men not lawfully constituted; or of any leader or commander, or other person not having authority by law for that purpose; or not informing or giving evidence against any associate, confederate, or other person; or not revealing or discovering any illegal act done or to be done; or any illegal oath or engagement which may have been administered or tendered or taken; are declared guilty of felony, punishable with transportation for seven years.

And every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto, is also declared guilty of felony, and subject to the same punishment.

By § 5. any engagement or obligation whatsoever shall be deemed an oath within the act, and whether the same shall be actually administered by any person, or taken by any person without administration.

By the 52 Geo. 3. c. 104. the provisions of the 37 Geo. 3. c. 123. were extended, and it was made a capital felony for any person to administer, &c. any oath binding the person taking it to commit treason, murder, or any capital felony; and the person taking such oath is declared guilty of felony, and is liable to be transported for life.

By § 5. any engagement or obligation in the nature of an oath, is to be deemed an oath within the act.

By the 39 Geo. 3. c. 79. and the 57 Geo. 3. c. 19. enactments were made against unlawful combinations and seditious assemblies, the members whereof were required to bind themselves by oaths, and such oaths were declared to be unlawful within the 37 Geo. 3. c. 123. See these statutes more fully stated under the title of Seditious Societies.

Although the preamble of the 37 Geo. 3. c. 123. is mainly directed against combinations for purposes of sedition and mutiny, yet the enacting part extends to all illegal associations in which oaths are administered of the nature described in that act. Therefore, where an associated body of men conspired together to raise the price of wages, and to make regulations in a particular trade (which was then an illegal act), and administered an oath binding the individual not to reveal such conspiracy, the offence was held to be within the above statute. 6 East, 419.

So in the recent case of the Dorsetshire Labourers, where the prisoners were charged in the indictment with administering an oath not to reveal an unlawful combination; an oath not to reveal an illegal oath; and an oath to obey the orders of a body of men not lawfully constituted; they were found guilty under the same act, and were sentenced to seven years' transportation.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 102. persons in Ireland administering or tendering any oath for various unlawful purposes (stated in the act), are declared felons, punishable by transportation for life, and persons taking any such oath felons transportable for seven years.

By the above acts, persons compelled to take such oaths, &c. are not justified or excused, unless they declare the same (within fourteen days in England, and ten in Ireland) to some Justice of peace, &c. All aiders and abettors are declared principals.

OATHS TO THE GOVERNMENT. As to the oaths of the Chancellor, Judges of both benches, Barons of the Exchequer, &c. Clerks in Chancery, and the Cursitors, see 14 Edw. 3. st. 1. c. 5; 18 Edw. 3. st. 4. c. 5; 20 Edw. 3. c. 1, 2, 3.

Ecclesiastical persons are required to take the oaths of supremacy, &c. And clergymen not taking the oaths, on their refusal being certified into B. R. &c. do, for a second offence, incur the penalties of præmunire. See 1 Edw. c. 1; and tit. Person. Officers and ecclesiastical persons, members of parliament, lawyers, &c. are to take the oath of allegiance, or be liable to penalties and disabilities. 7 Jac. 1. c. 6.

By 1 H. & M. st. 1. c. 6. the coronation oath was altered and regulated. See King. The oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abrogated, and others appointed to be taken and enforced, on pain of disability, &c. by 1 W. & M. c. 8; 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 27.

By 13 W. 3. c. 6. all that bear offices in the government, peers, and members of the House of Commons, ecclesiastical persons, members of colleges, school-masters, preachers, serjeants at law, counsellors, attornies, solicitors, advocates, proctors, &c. are enjoined to take the oaths of allegiance; and persons neglecting or refusing are declared incapable to execute their offices and employments, disabled to sue in law or equity, to be guardian, executor, &c. or to receive any legacy or deed of gift, to be in any office, &c. and to forfeit five hundred pounds.

This extends not to constables, and other parish officers, nor to bailiffs of manors, &c.

The 1 Ann. c. 22. obliges the receiving the abjuration oath, with alterations.

The oath of allegiance, as administered for upwards of six hundred years, contained a promise "to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honour, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him, without defending him therefrom." See Mirr. c. 3. § 35; Fleta, 3. 16; Britt. c. 29; 7 Rep. Calvin's Ca. 6. Upon which Sir M. Hale makes this remark: that it was short and plain, not entangled with long and intricate clauses or declarations, and yet is comprehensive of the whole duty from the subject to his sovereign. 1 Hal. P. C. 63. But at the Revolution, the terms of this oath being thought perhaps to favour too much the notion of non-resistance, the present form was introduced by the convention parliament, which is more general and indeterminate than the former; the subject only promising "that he will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to the king," without mentioning "his heirs," or specifying the least wherein that allegiance consists. The oath of supremacy is principally calculated as a renunciation of the pope's pretended authority; and the Oath of Abjuration, as introduced by 13 Will. 3. c. c. and regulated by 6 Geo. 3. c. 58. very amply supplies the loose and general texture of the oath of allegiance; it recognizing the right of majesty, derived under the Act of Settlement; engaging to support him to the utmost of the juror's power; promising to disclose all traitorous conspiracies against him, and expressly renouncing any claim of the descendants of the late Pretender, in as clear and explicit terms as the English language can furnish. This oath must be taken by all persons in any office, trust, or employment; and may be tendered by two justices of the peace to any person whom they shall suspect of disaffection. 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. c. 13; 6 Geo. 3. c. 58. And the oath of allegiance may be tendered to all persons above the age of twelve years, whether natives, denizens, or aliens, either in the court-leet of the manor, or in the sheriff's tourn, which is the court-leet of the county. 2 Inst. 121; 1 Hal. P. C. 64; and see 1 Comm. 367, 368.

By 1 W. & M. c. 8. persons of eighteen years of age refusing to take the new oaths of allegiance on tender by the proper magistrate, are subject to the penalties of a præmunire. And by 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 24. serjeants, counsellors, proctors, attornies, and all officers of courts practising without having taken the oaths of allegiance, are guilty of a præmunire, whether the oaths be tendered or not. See 4 Comm. 116, 117.

By the 10 Geo. 4. c. 7. § 10. Roman Catholics may hold any offices, civil or military, and places of trust or profit under his majesty, and exercise any other franchise (except as therein mentioned), on taking the oath therein given instead of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, and instead of such other oaths as were then by law required to be taken for the purpose aforesaid by Roman Catholics. See this act more fully stated under the title Roman Catholics.

By several acts of Eliz., Jac. 1. and Will. & Mary, the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were required to be taken by all members of parliament, before the lord steward or his deputy, before they took their seats. And by the 30 Car. 2. c. 1. the same oaths were required to be taken at the table in the house before any member should sit or vote. This needless repetition of the same oaths is now put an end to by the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 9. by which the acts requiring the said oaths to be taken before the lord steward or his deputy, are repealed. See further, Parliament.

In every session of parliament acts are passed for indemnifying persons who have omitted to qualify themselves for offices and promotions within the time limited by law, and for allowing further time for that purpose.

These annual indemnity acts are prospective as well as retrospective, and extend to those who may be in default during the time for which they are made, as well as those who have incurred penalties before they passed. 2 B & C. 34.

OBEDIENTIA. In the canon law is used for an office, or the administration of it; whereupon the word obedientiales, in the provincial constitutions, is taken for officers under their superiors. Can. Law, c. 1. And as some of these offices consisted in the collection of rents or pensions, rents were called obedientie: quia colligebantur ab obedientibus. But though obedientia was a rent, as appears by Hoveden, in a general acceptance of this word, it extended to whatever was enjoined the monks by the abbot; and in a more restrained sense, to the cells or farms which belonged to the abbey to which the monks were sent, vi ejusdem obedientie, either to look after the farms, or to collect the rents, &c. See Mat. Paris, Ann. 1218.

OBIT, Lat.] Signifies a funeral solemnity or office for the dead, most commonly performed when the corpse lies in the church uninterred: also the anniversary office. 2 Cro. 51; Dyer, 343. The anniversary of any person's death was called the obit; and to observe such day with prayers and alms, or other commemoration, was the keeping of the obit. In religious houses they had a register wherein they entered the obits or obitual days of their founders or benefactors, which was thence termed the obituary. The tenure of obit, or obituary, or chantry lands, is taken away and extinct by 1 Edw. 1. 6. c. 4.

OBJURGATRICES. Scolds, or unquiet women, punished with the cucking-stool. MS. LL. Lib. Burg. Villæ de Montgomery temp. Hen. II. See Castigatory.

OBLATA. Gifts or offerings made to the king by any of his subjects, which in the reigns of King John and King Henry III. were so carefully heeded, that they were entered into the Fine Rolls under the title of Oblata; and if not paid, esteemed a duty, and put in charge to the sheriff. Philips of Purveyance.

In the Exchequer it signifies old debts, brought as it were together from precedent years, and put on the present sheriff's charge. Pract. Excheg. 78.

OBLATIONS, oblationes.] Offerings to God and the church. See Spelm. de Concil. tom. 1. p. 393.

The word is often mentioned in our law books; and formerly there were several sorts of oblations; viz. oblationes altaris, which the priest had for saying mass; oblationes defunctorum, which were given by the last wills and testaments of persons dying to the church; oblationes mortuorum, or funerales, given at burials; oblationes penitentium, which were given by persons penitent; and oblationes pentecostales, &c.

The chief or principal feasts for the oblations of the altar were All Saints, Christmas, Candlemas, and Easter, which were called oblationes quatuor principales; and of the customary offerings from the parishioners to the parish priest, solemnly laid on the altar, the mass or sacrament offerings were usually three-pence at Christmas, two-pence at Easter, and a penny at the two other principal feasts. Under this title of oblations were comprehended all the accustomed dues for sacramentalia or Christian offices; and also the little sums paid for saying masses and prayers for the deceased. Kennett's Gloss. See Offerings.

Oblationes funerales were often the best horse of the defunct, delivered at the church gate or grave to the priest of the parish; to which old custom we owe the origin of mortuaries, &c. And at the burial of the dead, it was usual for the surviving friends to offer liberally at the altar for the pious use of the priest, and the good estate of the soul deceased, being called the soul-scent. In North Wales this usage still prevails, where at the rails of the communion-table in churches is a tablet conveniently fixed to receive the money offered at funerals according to the quality of the deceased; which has been observed to be a providential augmentation to some of those poor churches. Kennett's Gloss. At first the church had no other revenues beside these oblations, till in the fourth century it was enriched with lands and other possessions. Blount. See Mortuary.

Oblations, &c. are in the nature of tithes, and may be sued for in the ecclesiastical courts, and it is said are included in the act 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 6. for recovery of small tithes under 40s. by the determination of justices of peace, &c. See Tithes.

OBLIGATION, Obligatio.] A bond, containing a penalty, with a condition annexed for payment of money, performance of covenants, or the like; it differs from a bill, which is generally without a penalty or condition, though a bill may be obligatory. Co. Lit. 172. See Bond.

Obligations may also be by matter of record; as statutes and recognizances, to which there are sometimes added defeasances, like the condition of an obligation; but when the obligation is simple, or single, without any defeasance or condition, it is most properly called so. 2 Shep. Abr. 475.

OBLIGOR. He who enters into an obligation; as obligee is the person to whom it is entered into.

Before the coming in of the Normans, writings obligatory were made firm with golden crosses, or other small signs or marks. But the Normans began the making such bills and obligations with a print or seal in wax, impressed with every one's special signet, attested by three or four witnesses. In former times many houses and lands thereto passed by grant and bargain, without script, charter or deed, only with the landlord's sword or helmet, with his horn or cup; and many tenements were demised with a spur or currycomb, with a bow or with an arrow. Comell. See Bond, Deed, II. 6, Horn.

OBLATA TERRÆ. According to some accounts, an acre of land; but others hold it to be only half a perch. Spelm. Gloss.

OBREPTION. The obtaining a gift of the king by a false suggestion. Scotch Dict.

OBVENTIONS, Obventiones.] Offerings or tithes; and oblations, obventions, and offerings are generally the same thing, though obvention has been esteemed the most comprehensive. See Oblations, Tithes.

OCCASIO. Is taken for a tribute which the lord imposed on his vassals or tenants; propter occasiones bellorum et aliarum necessitatum. Fleta, lib. 1. c. 24. Rather the cause or pretext of such imposition.

OCCASIONARI. To be charged or loaded with payments, or occasional penalties. Edw. 2. anno 21. See 3 Fleta, Ita quod ipsi vigilatores non occasionentur, lib. 1. c. 4. par. 7.

OCCASIONES. Assarts, whereof Manwood speaks at large, the word is derived ab occando, i. e. throwing or breaking clods. See Spelman's Glossary, v. Assartum. Niger Scac. par. 1. cap. 13. and ante, Assart.

OCCUPANT. He who first gets possession of a thing. An island in the sea, precious stones on the sea-shore, and treasure discovered in a ground that has no particular own by the law of nations belong to him who finds them and makes the first occupation of them. Treat. Laws, 342.

THE LAW OF OCCUPANCY is founded upon the law of nature, viz. Quod terra manens vacua occupanti conceditur. So as, upon the first coming of the inhabitants to a new country, he who first enters upon such part of it and manures it gains the property; (as is now used in Cornwall, &c. by the laws of the Stannaries, under certain regulations;) so that it is the actual possession and manurance of the land which was the first cause of occupancy, and consequently is to be gained by actual entry. Sid. 347.

Where a man finds a piece of land which no other person possesses, or hath title unto, and enters upon the same, he gains a property, and a title by occupancy; but this manner of gaining property of lands has long since been out of use in England; for lands now possessed without any title are a crown, and not in him who first enters. Sid. 218.

However, the mere prior occupancy of land, however recent, gives a good title to the occupier, whereupon he may recover as plaintiff against all the world, except such as can prove an older and better title in themselves. 4 Taunt. 547; see also 2 Savind. 111; and 8 East, 356.

The true ground of occupancy is, that anciently all titles of titles were by real actions, therefore he who had the freehold was one to whom the law had a special regard. The ancient law, for many reasons, did not allow leases for above forty years, till the 21 Hen. 8. c. 15. Besides, there was reason too, that not only he who had right paramount, might know how to try his action, but that the lord might know how to avow for his services (which were considerable things formerly); he ought to know who was his tenant, therefore the law provided there should be a person on whom he should avow. See Cart. 57; 1 Sid. 346; 1 Lev. 202. Gray v. Beaufort.

An estate for another's life, by our ancient laws, might be gotten by occupancy, as, for example, suppose A. had lands granted to him for the life of B. and died without making any estate of it, in such case, whoever first entered into the land after the death of A. got the property for the remainder of the estate granted to A. for the life of B. For to the heir of A. it could not go, not being an estate of inheritance, but only an estate for another man's life; which was not descendible to the heir unless he were specially named in the grant; and the executors of A. could not have it as it was not an estate testamentary, that it should go to the executor as goods and chattels; so that in truth no man could entitle himself unto those lands; therefore the law preferred him who first entered, and he was called occupans, and should hold the land during the life of B. paying the rent, and performing the covenants, &c. Bac. Elem. 1. And not only if tenant pur terme d'autre vie died, living cestui que vie; but if tenant for his own life granted over his estate to another, and the grantee died before him, there should be an occupant. Co. Lit. 41, 388.

The title by general occupancy of estates pur autre vie is now universally prevented by 29 Car. 2. c. 3. § 12; 4 Geo. 2. c. 20. § 9. The first statute enacts, that estates pur autre vie shall be devisable; and if not devised, chargeable in the hands of the heir as assets by descent where the estate falls on him as special occupant; and if he is not entitled as such, shall go to the grantee's executors or administrators, and be assets. On this statute a doubt arose whether it operated further than by making such estate devisable, and a contrary rights, and in the latter was a ground, that the grantee took the profits of such estate after payment of debts, if not devised, for his own benefit, as in the case of a general occupant. See 12 Mod. 103. This gave occasion to the second statute, which expressly makes the surplus, in case of intestacy, distributable as personal estate. See further as to occupancy, 2 Comm. 258; Vaugh. 187; Vin. title Occupancy and Estates, R. 2, 3; Com. Dig. Estates, F.

By the old law no right of occupancy was allowed where the king had the reversion of the lands; for the reversioner had an equal right with any other man to enter upon the land in possession; and where the king's title and a subject's title, the king's shall be always preferred; against the king, therefore, there could be no prior occupant, for nullum tempus occurrat regi. 1 Inst. 111. And even the case of a subject, had the estate pur autre vie been granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestui que vie, there the heir might and still may enter and hold possession, and is called by the law a special occupant; as having a special exclusive right, by the terms of the original grant, to enter upon and occupy the hereditas jacens during the residue of the estate granted. Though some have thought him so called with no very great propriety, and that such estate is rather a descendible freehold. Vaugh. 201. See 2 Comm. c. 16. p. 259.

By the statutes above mentioned, though the title of common or general occupancy is utterly extinct and abolished, yet that of special occupancy by the heir at law continues to this day; such heir being held to succeed to the ancestor's estate, not by descent, for then he must take an estate of inheritance; but as an occupant specially marked out and appointed by the original grant. And it seems (notwithstanding the opinion of Blackstone to the contrary) that these statutes extend to cases of incorporeal hereditaments; although, as has been already noticed, before the statute no common occupancy could be had of such incorporeal hereditaments. See 2 Comm. c. 16. p. 260; and Christian's note there; and 3 P. Wms. 264—6, with Cox's notes.

Thus in a recent case it was held, that a rent charge pur autre vie, if the grantee die, living the cestui que vie, goes to the grantee's executor, although not named in the grant. 7 Bing. 178.

Where the tenant of lands granted to him and his heirs pur autre vie devised them to A. B. without saying more, and A. B. died in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, it was held that the heir of the devisor took the lands as special occupant. 8 B. & C. 296.

As to the occupancy of leaseholds for lives limited to executors, administrators, and assigns, see 7 Ves. 425.

A man cannot, however, be an occupant but of a void possession; and it is not every possession of a person entering that can make an occupancy, for it must be such as would maintain trespass without farther entry. Vaugh. 191, 192; Carter, 65; 2 Keb. 250.

It has also been held, that there could be no occupancy by any person of what another has a present right to possess; and there cannot be an occupant of a copyhold estate. Vaugh. 190; Mod. Ca. 66; 1 Inst. 41. So in a recent case it was decided that there can be no general occupancy of copyholds, since the freehold is always in the lord, and the 29 Car. 2. c. 3. and 14 Geo. 2. c. 20. do not apply to copyholds. 1 East, 80.

But there may be a special occupancy by the heirs of a copyholder, if he died, before the limitation in the deed, the lord has expressly excluded himself during the life of the cestui que vie. Co. Lit. 111; 1 Black. 1118.

On the Forfeiture, to which a claim may be made by an occupant, among several things enumerated, the goods of alien enemies, captured and brought to England, and by public authority, and to goods brought into the country by an alien enemy after a declaration of war without a safe conduct. See Alien, and also Insurance, II. 2. The persons of prisoners till their ransom is paid; and perhaps in some cases negro slaves. See Slaves, 2. Any thing found which does not come under the description of waifs, estrays, wreck, or treasure-trove. See those titles. 3. The benefit of the elements of light, air, and water, as far as they are previously unoccupied, or as they may be occupied without injury to another. See Nuisance. 4. Animals feræ naturæ, under the restrictions of the Game Laws. See that title. 5. A special personal property in corn growing on the ground, or other emblements; though the title to these, as Mr. Christian observes, is rather the continuation of an inchoate, than the acquisition of an original right. See Emblements. 6, 7. Property arising by accession and confusion of goods; as to the former of which a little shall be said presently. As to the latter, see Confusion, property by. 8. Literary property; see that title.

In some cases where the laws of other nations give a right by occupancy, as in lands newly created by the rising of an island in the sea or in a river, or by the alluvion or dereliction of the waters; in these instances the law of England assigns them an immediate owner. For Bracton says, that if an island arise in the middle of a river, it belongs in common to those who have lands on each side thereof; but if it be nearer to one bank than another, it belongs only to him who is proprietor of the nearest shore. Bract. l. 2. c. 2.

Yet this seems only to be reasonable, where the soil of the river is equally divided between the owners of the opposite shores; for if the whole soil is the freehold of any one man, as it usually is whenever a several fishery is claimed, there it seems just (and so is the constant practice) that the eyotts or little islands, arising in any part of the river, shall be the property of him who owneth the piscary and soil. Salk. 637. However, in case a new island rise in the sea, though the civil law gave it to the occupant, yet ours gives it to the king. Bract. l. 2. c. 2; Callis of Sewers, 22. And as to lands gained from the sea, either by alluvion, by the washing up of sand and earth so as in time to make terra firma; or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks back below the usual water-mark; in these cases the law is held to be, that if this gain be by little and little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the land adjoining. 2 Roll. Abr. 170; Dyer, 326. For de minimis non curat lex; and besides, these owners being often losers by the breaking in of the sea, or at charges to keep it out, this possible gain is, therefore, a reciprocal consideration for such possible charge or loss. But if the alluvion or dereliction be sudden and considerable, in this case it belongs to the king; for as the king is lord of the sea, and so owner of the soil while it is covered with water, it is but reasonable he should have the soil when the water has left it dry. Callis, 24, 28. So that the quantity of ground gained, and the time during which it is being gained, are what make it either the king's or the subject's property. See Smart v. Dundee Corporation, Cases in Parliament.

If a river running between two lordships by degrees gains upon the one, and thereby leaves the other dry, the owner who loses his ground thus imperceptibly has no remedy; but if the course of the river be changed by a sudden and violent flood, or other hasty means, and thereby a man loses his ground, it is said that he shall have what the river has left in any other place as a recompence for this sudden loss. Callis, 28.

Where the lord of a manor acquired a piece of land which had been formed gradually by ooze and soil deposited by the sea upon the extremity of his demesne lands, and it appeared that the increase could not be observed when actually going on, although a visible increase took place every year, and in the course of fifty years a large piece of land had been thus formed; upon an inquest finding that the land had been lost by the seas, and in an issue taken upon a traverse to that finding, the verdict was for the defendant; it was held that the crown was not entitled to judgment. R. v. Lord Yarborough, 4 D. & R. 790; and see the Sixth Report of the Commissioners of Land Revenue, &c. June, 1829; and 5 Bingh. 193, Dom. Proc.

The principle decided is, that land gradually and imperceptibly added by alluvion to the demesne lands of a manor, belongs not to the crown but to the owner of the demesne lands. As to the proceedings in this case, see 2 Blgh. 147.

The lord of a manor by lease and release bargained and sold certain sea-grounds, oyster-layings, shores, and fisheries, extending from the south at low-water-mark, to north at high-water-mark, and containing in the whole by estimation 800 acres of land covered with water, or thereabouts, as the same were beaconed, marked, and stobbed out. After the date of the deed, the sea imperceptibly encroached on the land, and the high and low-water-marks had varied in the same proportion; held, that so much of the soil of the shore as from time to time lay between high and low-water-mark passed to the grantee under this deed. Scrafton v. Brown, 6 D. & R. 536; 4 B. & C. 485.

As to property arising from accession.—By the Roman laws, if any given corporeal substance received afterwards an accession by natural or by artificial means, as by the growth of vegetables, the pregnancy of animals, the em-broidering of cloth, or the conversion of wood or metal into vessels and utensils, the original owner of the thing was entitled by his right of possession to the property of it under such its state of improvement. This has also long been the law of England; for it is laid down in the Year Books, that whatever alteration of form any property has undergone the owner may seize it in its new shape, if he can prove the identity of the original materials; as if leather be made into gloves, cloth into a coat; or if a tree be squared into timber, or silver melted or beat into a different figure. 5 Hen. 7. c. 15; 12 Hen. 8. c. 10. But if the thing itself by such operation were changed into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread, from another's grapes, olives, or wheat, the civil law held, that it belonged to the new operator, who was only to make a satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials which he had so converted. These doctrines are implicitly copied and adopted by Bracton, and have since been confirmed by many resolutions of the courts. Bract. l. 2. c. 2, 3; Bro. Ab. title Property, 23; Moor, 20; Poph. 28. It hath even been held, that if one takes away and clothes another's wife or son, and afterwards they return home, the garments shall cease to be his property who provided them, being annexed to the person of the child or woman. Moor, 214. See 2 Comm. c. 26.

OCCUPATION, occupatio.] Use or tenure; as we say such land is in the tenure or occupation of such a man, that is, in his possession or management. Also it is used for a trade or mystery. See the repealed stat. 12 Car. 2. c. 18.

Occupations at large are taken for purprestures, intrusions, and usurpations, and particularly for usurpations upon the king, by the stat. de Bigamus, c. 4; 2 Inst. 272.

OCCUPAVIT. A writ that lay for him who was ejected out of his freehold in time of war; as the writ of novel disseisin lay for one disseised in time of peace. Ingham.

OCHIERN. The chief of a branch of a great family. Scotch Dict.

OCTAVE. The eighth day after any feast, inclusive. See Utas.

ODIO ET ATIA. Was a writ anciently called breve de bono et malo, directed to the sheriff to inquire whether a man committed to prison upon suspicion of murder, were committed on just cause of suspicion, or only upon malice and ill-will; and if upon the inquisition it were found that he was not guilty, then there issued another writ to the sheriff to bail him. See Reg. Orig. 133; Bract. lib. 3. cap. 20; 3 Edw. 1. c. 11; 28 Edw. 3. c. 9; S. P. C. 77; 2 Inst. 42. 9 Rep. 506.

The party committed, if entitled to be bailed, may now have the cause of his commitment inquired into, and be discharged on bail, by suing out an habeas corpus. See Habeas Corpus.

Blackstone remarks, that according to Bracton, lib. 3. c. 8, this writ ought not to be denied to any man, it being expressly ordered to be made out gratis, without any denial, by Magna Carta, c. 26. and stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 29. but the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 9, took it away in the case of killing by misadventure or self-defence; and the 28 Edw. 3. c. 9, abolished it in all cases whatsoever; but the 42 Edw. 3. c. 1, repealed all the statutes then in being contrary to the Great Charter, Sir Edward Coke is of opinion that the writ de odio et atia was thereby revived. 2 Inst. 43, 55, 315. See 2 Comm. c. 8. p. 129.

OECONOMUS. Is sometimes taken for an advocate or defender; as summus secularium oeconomus et protector ecclesiarum. Matt. Par. anno 1245.

OECONOMICUS. A word used for the executor of a last will and testament, as the person who had the economy or fiduciary disposal of the goods of the deceased. Hut Dunelm. apud Wharton Angl. Sac. par. 1. page 784.

OFFENCE, Delictum.] An act committed against a law, or omitted where the law requires it, and punishable by it. West. Symb.

Offences are capital or not; capital those for which the offender shall lose his life; not capital where an offender may forfeit his lands and goods, be fined, or suffer corporal punishment, or both; but not loss of life. H. P. C. 2, 126, 134.

Under capital offences were formerly comprehended treason and felony; but the greater number of felonies are now not visited with death.

Offences not capital include the remaining part of the pleas of the crown, and come under the title of misdemeanors.

An offence may be greater or less according to the place wherein it is done. Finch, 25. But the offence will be in equal degree in them who are equally tainted with it; and those who act and consent thereto are alike offenders. 5 Rep. 80. See Misdemeanor.

The term "offence" is usually, by itself, understood to be a crime not indictable but punishable summarily, or by the forfeiture of a penalty. If one statute make the doing an act felonious, and a subsequent act make it only penal, the latter is considered as a virtual repeal of the former. 1 Hawk. c. 20, § 5. These distinctions will be found highly important in their consequences. Private remedies are, in the case of felonies, suspended until after conviction or acquittal of the felon, but not so in general in the case of misdemeanors or minor offences. 1 Chitty's Prac. of the Law, 15.

OFFERINGS. Are reckoned among personal tithes payable by custom to the parson or vicar of the parish, either occasionally, as at sacraments, marriages, christenings, church-funerals, burials, &c.; or at constant times, as at Easter, Christmas. See 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13, 20, 21. Stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 7, § 2, enforces the payment of offerings according to the custom and place where they grow due. See Oblations.

By 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13, § 10, all persons who ought to pay offerings, shall yearly pay to the parson, vicar, proprietors or their deputies, or farmers of the parishes where they dwell, at such four offering days as heretofore, within the space of four last years past, hath been accustomed, and in default thereof shall pay for their said offerings at Easter the next.

The four offering days are Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and the feast of the dedication of the parish church. Gibbs.

OFFERINGS OF THE KING. All offerings made at the holy altar by the king and queen are distributed amongst the poor by the dean of the chapel; there are twelve days in the year called offering days, as to these offerings, viz. Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday, All Saints, New Year's-day, Candlemas, Annunciation, Ascension, Trinity Sunday, St. John Baptist, and Michaelmas-day; all which are, at festivals. See Constitutionis, 184.

The offering commonly made by James I. was a piece of gold, having on one side the portrait of the king kneeling before the altar, with four crowns before him, and circumscribed with this motto—"Quod retribuam Domino pro omnibus que tribuit mihi;" and on the other side, a lamb lying near a lion, with this inscription—"Cor contritum et humiliatum non despicit Deus." Ibid.

OFFERTORIUM. A piece of silk or fine linen used to cover and wrap up the offerings or occasional oblations in church. Statut. Eccl. S. Pauli, London, MS. folio, 39. Sometimes this word signifies the offerings of the faithful, the place where they are made or kept; sometimes the time at the time of sacrament, the offertory, &c. See Common Prayer, in the Communion Service.

OFFICE.

OFFICIUM.] That function by virtue whereof a man hath some employment in the affairs of another, as of the king, or of another person. Cowell.

Offices are classed by Blackstone among incorporeal hereditaments; and an office is defined to be a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging, whether public as those of magistrates, or private, as of bailiffs, receivers, or the like. 2 Comm. c. 2. p. 36.

It is said that the word officium principally implies a duty, and in the next place the charge of such duty; and that it is a rule, that where one man hath to do with another's affairs against his will, and without his leave, that this is an office, and he who is in it is an officer. Carth. 478.

There is a difference between an office and an employment, every office being an employment; but there are employments which do not come under the denomination of offices, such as an agreement to make hay, plough land, herd a flock, &c. which differ widely from that of steward of a manor, &c. 2 Sid. 142.

By the ancient common law, officers ought to be honest men, legal and sage, et qui melius sciant et possint officio illi intendere; and this, says Lord Coke, was the policy of prudent antiquity, that officers did ever give grace to the place, and not the place grace the officer. 2 Inst. 32, 456.

Officers are distinguished into civil and military, according to the nature of their several trusts. Carth. 479.

So officers are public or private; and it is said that every man is a public officer who hath any duty concerning the public; and he is not the less a public officer where his authority is confined to narrow limits; because it is the duty of his office, and the nature of that duty, which makes him a public officer, and not the extent of his authority. Carth. 479.

Also offices are distinguished into ancient offices, and those which are of a new creation; and herein it is observable, that constant usage hath not only sanctioned the first establishment of such ancient offices as have existed time out of mind, but also hath prescribed and settled the manner in which they have existed and are to continue to exist, in what manner to be exercised, how to be disposed, &c. 9 Co. 97; Cro. Eliz. 636; 2 Rol. Abr. 182; Cro. Car. 513; 1 Show. 436.

There is likewise another distinction of offices into judicial and ministerial; the first, relating to the administration of justice or the actual exercise thereof, must be executed by persons of sufficient capacity, and by the persons themselves to whom they are granted; and herein also ancient usage and custom must govern. 1 Jon. 109; Dav. 35; 9 Co. 97.

- I. Who has a right to create and grant or assign an Office; and how and to whom; and of one Office being incident to or compatible with another.
- II. Of the Offence of buying and selling an Office, and what Offices are prohibited to be thus disposed of.
- III. What Remedies a person having a right to an Office must pursue to be let into the enjoyment of it, and how a disturbance is punishable.
- IV. Of the Forfeiture of an Office; and where, for corruption, bribery, extortion, and oppressive proceedings, Officers are punishable.

I. The king is the universal officer and disposer of justice within this realm, from whom all others are said to be derived; yet he cannot create a new office inconsistent with our constitution, or prejudicial to the subject. 12 Co. 116; 1 Rol. Rep. 206; Carth. 478. See King.

A man may have an estate in offices either to him and his heirs, or for life, or for a term of years, or during pleasure only, save only that offices of public trust cannot be granted for a term of years, especially if they concern the administration of justice, for then they might perhaps vest in executors or administrators. 9 Rep. 97. Neither can any judicial office be granted in reversion, because though the grantee may be able to perform it at the time of the grant, yet before the office falls he may become unable and insufficient; but ministerial offices may be so granted, for these may be executed by deputy. 11 Rep. 4.

There are three things, says Lord Coke, which have fair pretences, yet are mischievous; 1st, new courts; 2d, new offices; 3d, new corporations for trade. And as to new offices, either in courts or out of them, these cannot be erected without act of parliament; for that under the pretence of common good, they are exercised to the intolerable grievance of the subject. 2 Inst. 540.

An office granted by letters-patent for the sole making of all bills, informations, and letters missive in the council of York, was held unreasonable and void. 1 Jon. 281.

One Chute petitioned the king to erect a new office for registering all strangers within the realm, except merchant strangers, and to grant the office to the petitioner with or without a fee; and it was resolved by all the judges, that the erection of such new office for the benefit of a private person was against all law of what nature soever. 1 Co. 116, and several cases there cited to this purpose.

The king cannot grant to any person to hold a court of equity, though he may grant tenere placita; for the dispensation of equity is a special trust committed to the king, and not by him to be intrusted with any other, except his chancellor. Hob. 65.

As to the alienation of an office by the crown, see 1 B. & Ad. 761.

The grant of an office, generally, may be made to any person whom the king pleases, for the king has an interest in his subject, and a right to his service; and therefore an information lies against him who refuses an office being duly elected; and he shall not be excused for his neglect to qualify himself according to law. 1 Salk. 168.

A woman may be an officer. Thus the grant of any office of government which may be exercised by deputy, is good, as regent of the kingdom; so of the keeper of a castle, forester, gaoler, commissioner of sewers, sexton, and overseer of the poor. See Comm. Dig. tit. Officer (B). So an office of inheritance may descend or be granted to a woman, as the office of earl marshal. Com. Dig. Or lord great chamberlain of England. Bro. P. C.

Wherever one office is incident to another, such incident office is regularly grantable by him who hath the principal office; and on this foundation it hath been held, that the king's grant of the office of county clerk was void, it being inseparably incident to the office of sheriff, and could not be by any law or contrivance be taken away from him. 4 Co. 32, Milton's case.

So an office of chamberlain of the King's Bench prison is inseparably incident to the office of marshal; therefore a grant of the office of marshal, with a reservation of the office of chamberlain, is void. 1 Salk. 489; 1 Leon. 310, 321.

So it hath been resolved, that the office of exigenter of London and other counties in England, is incident to the office of chief justice of C. B., and therefore a grant thereof by the king, though in the vacancy of a chief justice, is null and void. Dyer, 175, a. pl. 25; 1 And. 162; and see Shom. P. C., Sir Rowland Holt's case.

Lord Coke says, that the justices of courts did ever appoint their clerks, some of which after, by prescription, grew to be officers in their courts; and this right which they had of constituting their own officers is further confirmed to them by stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 30. The reasons are, 1st, that the law ever appoints those who have the greatest knowledge and skill to perform that which is to be done; 2dly, the officers and clerks are but to enter, inrol, or effect that which the justices adjudge, award, or order; the insufficient doing whereof maketh the proceeding of the justices erroneous, than which nothing can be more dishonour-able and grievous to the justices, and prejudicial to the party. 2 Inst. 435, 4 Mod. 179.

If two offices are incompatible, by the acceptance of the latter the first is relinquished and vacant, even though it should be a superior office. 2 T. R. 81. See also ibid. 777; and Dougl. 298, in note, Rex v. Godwin.

By 50 Geo. 3. c. 85; 52 Geo. 3. c. 66. (which do not extend to offices under the government in Ireland) provisions are made for taking security for all persons employed in situations of public trust, and concerned in the receipt or distribution of public money. And see 50 Geo. 3. c. 59. amended and rendered more effectual by the 2 W. 4. c. 4. for preventing the embezzlement of public money by collectors, receivers, &c. throughout the United Kingdom.

By the 1 Will. 4. c. 42. the acts relating to the office of the treasurer of the navy were consolidated and amended.

See also the 50 Geo. 3. c. 117. for regulating the granting of salaries and pensions, and directing accounts of the payment thereof to be laid before parliament. This act applies to the minor officers in the various public departments in Great Britain and Ireland.

By 57 Geo. 3. c. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 67. and 84. various offices were abolished, and others regulated; as to which see the titles of the several offices.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 111. certain offices connected with the Court of Chancery were abolished, and the performence of the duties attached thereto, and the practice of other offices in that court, regulated by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 31 & 54.

By the 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 116. provision was made for the payment of the salaries of the judges in England and Ireland of the lord lieutenant of the latter country, and for increasing diplomatic salaries and pensions, all of which are now charged on the consolidated fund instead of the civil list.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 15. the office of the receipt of his majesty's Exchequer is regulated, various offices therein abolished, and new arrangements made with respect to the post.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 24. itself amended by c. 45. the laws regulating the pensions, compensations, and allowances to be made to persons holding civil offices under his majesty, are amended and consolidated.

By the 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 70. the salaries of the officers of the House of Commons are regulated, and several offices therein abolished.

For the act of the present reign, abolishing all stamp duties, and fees, formerly payable on the renewal of appointments consequent on the demise of the crown, see Fees, I.

II. The taking or giving a reward for offices of a public nature is said to be bribery; and nothing can be more prejudicial to the good of the public, than to have places of the highest concern, (on the due execution whereof the happiness of both king and people depends,) disposed of, not to those who are most able to execute, but to those who are most anxious to pay for them; nor can any thing be a greater discount to industry and virtue, than to see those places of trust and honour, which ought to be the rewards of those who by their industry have qualified themselves for them, conferred on such who have no other recommendation but that of being the highest bidders: neither can any thing be a greater temptation to officers to abuse their power by bribery and extortion, and other acts of injustice, than the consideration of the great expenses they were at in gaining their places, and the necessity of sometimes straining a point to make their bargain answer their expectations. 2 Inst. 148; 1 Hawk. P. C. It is said to be malum in se, and indictable at common law. Noy. 102; Moor. 781.

For which reasons, among many others, it is expressly enacted by 12 R. 2. c. 2. that the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward of the king's house, the king's chamberlain, clerk of the rolls of the justices of the Bench and of the other, barons of the Exchequer, and a others who shall be called to ordain, name, or make justices of the peace, sheriffs, escheators, customers, comptrollers, or any other officer or minister of the king, shall be firmly sworn that they shall not ordain, name, or make any of the above-mentioned officers for any gift or brokerage, favour or affection; nor that none who sueth by himself, or by others, privily or openly, to be in any manner of office, shall be put in the same office, or in any other; but that they make all such officers and ministers of the best and most lawful men, and sufficient, to their estimation and knowledge.

And by 4 H. 4. c. 5. it is enacted, that no sheriff shall let his bailiwick to farm to any man for the time he occupieth such office.

But the principal statute relating to this matter is 5 & 6 Ed. 6. c. 16; whereby it is enacted, "That if any person bargain or sell any office, or deputation of any office, or any part of any of them, or receive any money, fee, &c. directly or indirectly, or take any promise, &c. to receive any money, &c. directly or indirectly, for any office, or for the deputation of any office, or any part of any of them; or to the intent that any person should have, exercise, or enjoy any office, or the deputation of any office, or any part of any of them, which shall in anywise concern the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt, &c. of any of the king's treasure, &c. or the keeping of any of the king's towns, &c. being for a place of strength and defence; or which shall concern or touch any clerkship to be occupied in any manner of Court of Record wherein justice is to be ministered; that then every person that shall so offend shall not only lose and forfeit all his and their right, interest, and estate, in or to any of the said office or offices, &c. but also persons who shall give or pay any sum of money, &c. or shall make any promise, &c. shall immediately be adjudged a disabled person in the law to all intents and purposes to have, &c. the said office, &c."

"It is further enacted, that bargains, sales, promises, bonds, agreements, covenants, and assurances shall be void to and against him and them by whom any such bargain, &c. shall be made."

"Provided always, that this act shall not extend to any office whereof any person is seized of any estate of inheritance, nor to any office of parkership, or of the keeping of any park-house, manor, garden, chase, or forest, or to any of them."

"It is also provided, that this act shall not be prejudicial to the chief justices of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, or the justices of assize; but that they may do in every behalf, concerning any office to be given or granted by them, as they might have done before the making this act."

In the construction of the 5 & 6 Ed. 6. the following opinions have been holden.

The office of chancellor, registrar, and commissary in ecclesiastical Courts are within the meaning of the statute, inasmuch as those courts do not only determine matters which are brought before them pro salute anime, but also have the decision of disputes concerning the lawfulness of matrimony, and legitimation of children, which touch the inheritance of the subject; and also hold plea of legacies and tithes, &c. in which respects they are courts of justice. Cro. Jac. 293; 1 Inst. 148; 12 Co. 78; Salk. 468; 3 Lev. 287; 2 Vent. 87, 97.

That the office of clerk to the deputy registrar in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury has been held not to be an office within the meaning of the statute, so as to prevent its being aliened or charged; nor is such alienation or charge contrary to the general policy of the law as to offices. 3 L. & J. 150.

Offices in fee are out of the statute: for if the king be seized in fee of a bailiwick, and he demise the same to A. who demises it to B., rendering, &c. the demise to B. is not within the statute; for offices in fee being excepted out of the statute under-leases of such offices are also excepted inclusively. 2 Lev. 151.

vol. II.

The place of cofferer is within this statute, and a person having once purchased this place is for ever disabled to enjoy the same; and the king is bound by this statute, and could not dispense with it by any non obstante. 3 Bulst. 91; Co. Lit. 234; Cro. Jac. 385.

The sale of a bailiwick of a hundred is not within the statute; for such an offence doth not concern the administration of justice, nor is it an office of trust. 4 Leon. 38; 3 Mod. 223.

A seat in the six-clerks' office is not within the statute, being a ministerial office only; and they are but under clerks, who have so much a sheet for copying, &c.; but one judge held it not saleable at common law, for the following reasons: 1st. Discouragement of merit and industry. 2dly. It occasions extortion and exaction of excessive fees. 3dly. From its being a great charge to suitors. 4thly. It exempts the persons who enter, by these means, in a great measure, from the due regulations under which they ought to be; for they are not so easily removed as if they were at the will of him who had the disposal of them. Pasch. 26 Car. 2. in C. B. Sparrow v. Reynolds.

An assignment of all the emoluments of the office of clerk of the peace for Westminster is invalid, though the assignment is expressly subject to the deduction of the salary or allowance of the deputy. 2 Brod. & Bing. 673; 6 Moo. 28.

It is illegal to sell many offices not within the 5 & 6 Ed. 6. c. 16. Thus the appointment of captain of an East Indiaman cannot be legally sold (although not within the statute) without the consent of the East India Company, such a sale being contrary to a bye-law of the Company, a fraud on the Company, and contrary to the principles of public policy. But many offices, not within that statute, may be sold, provided the sale takes place with the consent of those who have the power of appointment. 8 T. R. 94. And see 2 Barn. & C. 661.

One who makes a contract for an office, contrary to the purport of this statute, is so far disabled to hold the same, that he cannot at any time during life be restored to a capacity of holding it by any grant or dispensation whatsoever. Hob. 75; Co. Lit. 234; Cro. Car. 361; Cro. Jac. 386.

Where an office is within the statute, and the salary is certain, if the principal make a deputation, reserving a lesser sum out of the salary, it is good; so if the profits be uncertain arising from fees, if the principal make a deputation, reserving a certain sum out of the fees and profits of the office, it is good; for in these cases the deputy by his constitution is in place of his principal, yet he has no right to his fees, they still continue to be the principal's, so that as to him it is only reserving a part of his own, and giving away the rest to another; but where the reservation or agreement is not to pay out of the profits, but to pay generally a certain sum, it must be paid at all events; and a bond of performance of such agreement is void by the statute. Salk. 468; 6 Mod. 234; Comb. 356.

This being a public law, the judges ex officio are to take notice of it; but yet it seems the more regular and safe way to plead it; but it hath been resolved, that a person in pleading this statute need not allege that the party against whom it is pleaded is not within any of the provisos or exceptions in the statute; but that if he be, it must come on his side to show it. Trin. 9 Geo. 2. in B. R. Maccarty v. Wickford. Sed quære? Also vide 2 And. 55. 107; Ld. Raym. 1245.

By 49 Geo. 3. c. 126. the 5 & 6 Ed. 6. c. 16. is extended to Scotland and Ireland, and to all offices in the gift of the crown, and to all civil, naval, and military commissions, employments, and appointments under government, in the United Kingdom or in the colonies, or under the East India Company.

By § 3. persons buying or selling, or receiving and paying money, reward, or profit for buying or selling, any office, commission or employment mentioned in this act, or 5 & 6 Ed. 6. or any deputation thereto, or any participation in the profits thereof, or for consenting to any resignation, are declared guilty of a misdemeanor, § 3. As are also persons receiving or paying any money or profit for soliciting or obtaining offices, § 4. Like penalty on persons opening or keeping any place for soliciting for any such offices, or negotiating for the same, § 5. Penalty 50*l.* on persons advertising for like purposes, § 6. Officers in the army giving more than regulated prices shall forfeit their commissions, and be cashiered, § 8.

By 53 Geo. 3. c. 54. the battle-axe guards in Ireland, and by 53 Geo. 3. c. 129. the six clerks in Chancery there, are exempt from the operation of this act.

A bond was given by A. B. to C. D. colonial secretary of Tobago, reciting that C. D. had appointed A. B. his deputy, and to receive the fees of office in consideration of his paying him 450*l.* per annum thereout, and the condition was for punctual payment of that sum, without saying "out of the fees." To an action on the bond, A. B. pleaded that the bond was given in pursuance of a corrupt agreement against the statute, that A. B. should pay 450*l.* per annum at all events to C. D. Issue was taken on the plea and found for A. B. The court held that the fact showed the bond to be illegal and void by the 49 Geo. 3. c. 126; and that the plea showing the illegal agreement was good. Grenville v. Atkins, 9 Barn. & C. 462. And see 2 Balk. 468; 1 Bro. P. C. 135.

Offices in the gift of the chief justices of the King's Bench and the Common Pleas, were expressly excepted out of the 5 & 6 Edw. 6. c. 16, and continued saleable down to the passing of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 82 and 83, whereby the sale of offices in both courts was abolished, and a compensation provided for the chief justices in lieu of the emoluments formerly derivable by them from disposing of such offices. These statutes enact, that all appointments by the two chief justices shall be without fee, and quam diu se bene gesserint.

III. It was held clearly, that an assize lay at common law for an office, and that therefore though the statute of Westminst. 2. 13 Ed. 1. st. 1. c. 25. speaks only of offices in fee, yet an assize lay for an office in tail, or for life; but this is to be understood of offices of profit, for of an office of charge and no profit an assize did not lie. 8 Co. 47*a*; 2 Inst. 412.

But a man should not have an assize of the whole office, unless he were disseised of the whole; yet if a man were disseised of parcel of the profits of an office, he may have had an assize for that parcel only. 8 Co. 49*b*; 2 Inst. 412.

In an assize for an office newly erected and constituted, the demandant in his plaint must have shown what fee or profit is granted for the exercise thereof; for this office could not have a fee or profit appurtenant to it, as an ancient office might, and for an office without fee or profit no assize lay. 8 Co. 49.

But in assize for an ancient office, the demandant in his plaint need have shown what fee or profit was belonging to it, for it should be intended there is some fee or profit. 8 Co. 49.

In an assize for an office, the demandant must have shown a seisin; but it was held, that taking 8*d.* for a capias against B. was sufficient seisin of the office of filacer de banco. 1 Roll. Abr. 270.

Also in an assize for an office, the demandant in his patent must have set forth a title. 3 Mod. 273.

An assize lay for the office of registrar of the admiralty; for though their proceedings are according to the civil law, yet the right of their office is determinable at the common law; so of the mastership of an hospital, being a lay fee. 8 Co. 47; 2 Inst. 412; 11 Co. 99*b*; Dyer, 152.

Now by the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 27. all real actions are, with one or two exceptions, abolished; and among them that of an assize for an office which had long been obsolete.

A man may bring an action on the case for the profits of an office, though he never had seisin. 1 Mod. 122. Where a person has usurped an office belonging to another, and taken the known and accustomed fees of office, or where two persons claim title to an office, and one receive the profits, either by himself or his collector, the other may bring indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received, wherein the title must be proved. 2 Mod. 260, 263; 3 Lev. 262; 2 T. Jon. 127. But such action must be brought against the principal, and not against the collector. 4 Burr. 1984; Bul. N. P. 133.

If the king grant the office of comptroller of the customs to A. and B. durante beneplacito, and A. dies, and afterwards the king grants the said office to C., and yet B. under pretence of survivorship, exercises the said office, and receives the profits thereof; C. may have an indebitatus assumpsit for so much money had and received to his use. 2 Mod. 260. See 2 Lee. to try the question of right.

So where a person is entitled to an office, with fees annexed, and a stranger intrudes into the office and receives the fees, this form of action lies to recover them; but they must be certain, known, and accustomed fees annexed to the office, and such as the legal officer could himself recover in a court of law from the persons of whom they are claimed and received. See 6 T. R. 681; Peake's N. P. C. 182. Where fees of office are demanded and received, but the party paying them disputes the receiver's right to them, or his own liability to be charged, an action of indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received will lie to try the question between them. See Wilkes, 536.

And in general, an action by a person claiming an office against the person in actual possession, and receiving the fees, is now perhaps the most eligible method that can be pursued. 108; 1 Mod. 122.

The most usual remedy, however, for a party to be admitted or restored to an office is by mandamus. See that title and Quo Warranto.

IV. It is laid down in general, that if an officer acts contrary to the nature and duty of his office, or if he refuses to act at all, that in these cases the office is forfeited. 11 Ed. 4. 1*b*; 2 Roll. Abr. 155.

There are, says Lord Coke, three causes of forfeiture or seizure of offices by matter in deed. 1st. By abuser; 2dly. Non-user; 3dly. Refusal.

1st. Abuser; as by a marshal or other gaoler's permitting escapes.

2dly. By Non-user; in which there is this difference, when the office concerns the administration of justice or the commonwealth, the officer ex officio ought to attend without request, there by non-user or non-attendance the office is forfeited; but where an officer is not obliged to attend, but upon demand or request made by him whose officer he is, there without such demand or request there can be no forfeiture; and herein also Lord Coke in another place takes the following diversity, viz. that non-user, of itself, without some special damage, is no forfeiture of private offices, but that it is otherwise of a public one, which concerns the administration of justice.

3dly. As to refusal, he says, that in all cases where an officer is bound upon request to exercise his office, if he does not do it upon request, he forfeits it; as if the steward of a manor be requested by the lord to hold a court, if he does not do it, it is a forfeiture. 6 Co. 50; Co. Litt. 233*b*.

But herein it will be necessary to consider more minutely what shall be said to be such acts as are contrary to the duty of his office; and how far the same (whether they are acts of omission or commission) amount to a forfeiture; where, as hath been clearly agreed, that a gaoler by suffering voluntary escapes, by abusing his prisoners, by extorting unreasonable fees from them, or by detaining them in gaol after having been legally discharged and paid their just fees, forfeits his office; for that in the grant of every office it is implied that the grantee execute it faithfully and diligently. Co. Litt. 233; 9 Co. 50; 3 Mod. 143.

If a gaoler leave his prison door unlocked, and the prisoners escape, it is not only a negligent, but a voluntary escape. Cro. Car. 492.

But it is held, that one negligent escape is not a forfeiture, though a voluntary one is, but that two negligent escapes amount to a forfeiture. 39 Hen. 6, 33; 2 Roll. Abr. 197; 2 Jern. 173; and see 8 & 9 Wm. 3, c. 27; and tit. Escape, Gaoler.

If conditions in law, which are annexed to offices, be not observed and fulfilled, the office is lost for ever, for these conditions are as strong and binding as express conditions; therefore if the office of forester, &c. descend to an infant or feme-covert, (where by law they may so descend,) and these are not exercised by sufficient deputies, they become forfeited. Co. Litt. 233 b.; 8 Co. 44; Cro. Car. 556; Hard 11.

Insufficiency is an original incapacity which creates the forfeiture of an office; so if a superior puts in a deputy into an office, which may be exercised by a deputy, who is ignorant and unskilful, this is a forfeiture of the office. 4 Mod. 29. arguendo.

If the king grants an office in any of the courts at Westminster, the judges may remove an officer for insufficiency, and they are the proper judges of his abilities. 4 Mod. 30. arguendo. Where an officer may be removed, but not abridged of his fee, see 1 Roll. Rep. 82, 83.

A Mace of C. B. being absent two years, and having farmed out his office from year to year, without licence of a court, was discharged by the chief justice, ex assensu sociorum suorum, by word, spoken openly in court; and there was no record made of the discharge, nor legal summons for him to answer to any accusation, yet the discharge was held good. Dyer, 114 b. pl. 64; 1 Roll. Abr. 155.

The clerk of the papers, in the King's Bench prison, cannot act by deputy, but must himself reside within the prison. Clerk of the papers, and clerk of the day-rules in the King's Bench prison, was removed by the Court of K. B. for non-residence. 4 T. R. 716; 5 T. R. 511.

An officer was turned out because that he spoliavit quædam recorda contra officii sui debitum; and it was objected, 1st, That it was not certain enough, because not shown what records: to which the court answered, that it would be proved, and then he having spoiled the records, they are not perhaps to be had. 2dly, That it may be he did it by force, and not wilfully; to which the court said, that the conclusion contra officii sui debitum includes that. 1 Keb. 597.

But if the king grants an office which concerns trust and allegiance to two, and one is attainted, the entire office is forfeited to the king; for he cannot make one occupy in common with another. Plow. 180.

Wherever an officer, who holds his office by patent, commits a forfeiture, he cannot regularly be turned out without a seque facias, nor can he be said to be completely ousted or discharged without a writ of discharge; for his right appearance of record, the same must be defeated by matter of fact, and not of nature. But for this see Dyer, 155, 198, 211; 9 Co. 58; Co. Litt. 233; Cro. Car. 60, 61; 1 Sid. 81, 134; 8 Co. 44 b.; 1 Roll. Abr. 580; 3 Mod. 335; 3 Lev. 238.

All officers are punishable for corruption and oppressive proceedings, according to the nature of the offence, either by indictment, attachment, action at the suit of the party injured, loss of their office, &c. 6 Mod. 96.

In addition to the punishment by indictment, &c. all courts are to have a discretionary power over their officers, and are to see that no abuse is committed by them, which may bring disgrace on the courts themselves: the Court of King's Bench, by the plenitude of its power, exercises a superintendency over all inferior courts; and may grant an attachment against the judges of such courts for oppressive, unjust, or irregular practice, contrary to the obvious rules of natural justice. Dyer, 218; Palm. 564; 1 Salk. 210.

As to extortion by officers, it is so odious, (being more heinous, as Lord Coke says, than robbery, as it is usually attended with the aggravating sin of perjury,) that it is punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, and also by removal from the office in the execution whereof it was committed; and is defined to be, the taking of money by any officer, by colour of his office, either where none is due, or not so much is due, or where it is not yet due. Co. Litt. 368 b.; 2 Inst. 209; 10 Co. 102; 2 Roll. Abr. 32, 57; Cro. Car. 438, 448; Raym. 315.

But the stated and known fees allowed by the courts of justice to their respective officers, for their labour and trouble, are not restrained by the common law, or by the statute of Westm. 1. Therefore such fees may be legally demanded, without danger of extortion. 21 Hen. 7, 17; Co. Litt. 368. See further Bribery, Extortion, Fees.

In general, all wilful breaches of the duty of an office are forfeitures of it, and punishable by fine, &c.; for since every office is instituted, not for the sake of the officer, but for the good of some other, nothing can be more just than that he, who either neglects or refuses to answer the end for which his office was ordained, should give way to others who are both able and willing to take care of it, and that he should be punished for his neglect or oppressive execution; but the particular instances wherein a man may be said to act contrary to the duty of his office, though various, are yet so generally obvious, that it is needless to enumerate them. Co. Litt. 233, 234.

By the 50 Geo. 3, c. 85, and 52 Geo. 3, c. 66, all persons appointed to any office or commission civil or military, in any public department, or to any office of public trust under the crown, or wherein he shall be concerned in the receipt or disbursement of any public monies, shall give security by bond with sufficient surety to be approved of by the lords of the treasury, or the principal officer in the department, for due performance of his office, and for duly accounting for all public money received by him. These acts extend to Scotland, but not to Ireland. See 50 Geo. 3, c. 59, as to collectors and receivers, &c. in Ireland, and ante, 1.

For further matter connected with this title, see Mandamus, Quo Warranto, &c.

OFFICE FOUND. Is where an inquisition is made to the king's use, of any thing by virtue of his office who inquireth, and it is found by the inquisition. In this signification it is used in 38 H. 8, c. 20; where to traverse an office, is to traverse an inquisition taken of office; and to return an office, is to return that which is found by virtue of the office. Kitch. 177.

There are two kinds of offices issuing out of the exchequer by commission, viz. an office to entitle the king in the thing inquired of, and an office of instruction. 6 Rep. 52. The office of entitling doth vest the estate and possession of the land, &c. in the king, who had therein before only a right or title; as where an alien purchases lands, a person is attaint of felony, or the like; and the other office is where land is vested and settled before in the king, but the particulars thereof do not appear upon record. 4 Rep. 58; Plowd. 484. The effect of this office is, that the king, from the time of finding, shall be answered the profits without entry, &c. 5 Rep. 32; 10 Rep. 115. If any office be wrongfully found, those who are grieved may be relieved by a traverse, or monstrans de droit, by pleading or petition; for every office is in nature of a declaration, to which any man may plead, and either deny or confess, &c. Plowd. 448; Bro. 506. Where offices are found before the escheators, they must be delivered by indenture under the hands and seals of the jurors. Dyer 170. See Inquest of Office, Monstrans de droit.

OFFICIAL, officialis.] In the ancient civil law signifies him who is the minister of, or attendant upon, a magistrate. In the canon law, it is he to whom any bishop generally commits the charge of his spiritual jurisdiction; and in this sense there is one in every diocese called officialis principalis, whom the law styles chancellor; and the rest, if there are more, are by the canonists termed officiales foranei, but by us commissaries. In our statutes, this word signified properly him whom the archdeacon substitutes for the executing his jurisdiction. The archdeacon hath an official or church-lawyer to assist him, who is judge of the archdeacon's court. Wood's Inst. 30, 505.

OFFICIARIIS NON FACIENDIS VEL AMOVENDIS. A writ directed to the magistrates of a corporation, requiring them not to make such a man an officer, or to put one out of the office he hath, until inquiry is made of his manners, &c. Reg. Orig. 126.

OFFICIUM CURTAGII PANNORUM. Granted to William Osborne, anno 2 Ed. 2. Extract. Fin. Cancell.

OIL. The lord mayor of London, and the master and wardens of the tallow-chandlers' company, are to search all oils brought to London; and if any is deceitfully mixed, they may throw it away, and punish the offenders: and head officers in corporations have like power. 3 Hen. 8, cap. 14.

No lamps to be used in private houses but of fish oil. 8 Ann. c. 9, § 18. See Candles.

OLD JEWRY, Vetus Judæismus.] The place or street where the Jews lived in London. See Jews.

OLD STYLE. See Year.

OLERON LAWS, Uliarenses Leges.] Laws relating to maritime affairs, so called because said to be made by king Richard I. when he was at Oleron, an island lying in the bay of Aquitaine, at the mouth of the river Charent. Co. Litt. 260.

These laws are recorded in the black-book of the admiralty, and are accounted the most excellent composition of sea laws in the world. See Selden's Mare Clausum, 222, 254; 1 Comm. 413; 4 Comm. 423; Luder's Tracts. See Navy.

OLYMPIAD, Olympias.] An account of time among the Greeks, consisting of four complete years, having its name from the Olympic games, which were kept every fourth year, in honour of Jupiter Olympius, near the city of Olympia; when they entered the names of the conquerors on public records. The first Olympiad began in the year 3938 of the Julian period, 505 years after the taking of Troy, 776 before the birth of Christ, and 21 years before the founding of Rome. Æthelred, king of the English Saxons, computed his reign by Olympiads. Spelm.

OMISSIONS. Are placed among crimes and offences; and omission to hold a court-leet, or not swearing officers therein, &c. is a cause of forfeiture. Omissions in law proceedings render them vicious and defective. See Amendment, Office.

OMNIUM. A term used at the Stock Exchange, to express the aggregate value of the different stocks in which a loan is usually funded.

Thus in the loan of 36,000,000*l.* contracted for in June 1815, the omnium consisted of 130*l.* 3 per cent. reduced annuities, 44*l.* 3 per cent. consols, and 10*l.* 4 per cent. annuities for each 100*l.* subscribed.

The loan was contracted for on the 14th June, when the prices of the above stocks were—3 per cents. reduced 54, 3 per cent. consols 55, 4 per cents. 70; hence the parcels of stock given for 100*l.* advanced, were worth—

	£	s.	d.
130 l. reduced at 54	70	4	0
44 l. consols at 55	24	4	0
10 l. 4 per cents. at 70	7	0	0

Together £101 8 0

which would be the value of the omnium, or 1*l.* 8*s.* per cent.

premium, independently of any discount for prompt payment. McCulloch's Comm. Dic.

ONCUNNE, Sax. On Cunnan, accusatus.] Leg. Alf. c. 29
ONERANDO PRO RATA PORTIONIS. A writ that lies for a joint-tenant, or tenant in common, who is distrained for more rent than his proportion of the land comes to. Reg. Orig. 182. See Joint-tenants.

ONEROUS CAUSE. The Scotch phrase for a good and legal consideration. See Assumpsit.

O. NI. It was the course of the exchequer, as soon as the sheriff entered into and made up his account for issues, amerciements, and mean profits, to mark upon each head O. Ni; which denoted oneratur nisi habeat sufficientem exonerationem, and presently he became the king's debtor, and a debt was set upon his head; whereupon the parties paravale became debtors to the sheriff, and were discharged against the king, &c. 4 Inst. 116.

By a recent act sheriffs are now to account to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts. See Sheriff.

ONUS EPISCOPALE. Ancient customary payments from the clergy to their diocesan bishop, of synodals, pentecostals, &c. See Episcopalia.

ONUS IMPORTANDI. The charge or burden of importing merchandise, mentioned in 13 Car. 2.

ONUS PROBANDI. The burden of proving: upon whom it shall be imposed. See Evidence.

OPEN LAW, lex manifesta.] The making or waging of law; which bailiffs might not put men to, upon the bare assertion, except they had witnesses to prove the truth of it. Magna Carta, c. 21.

OPEN THEFT, Sax. Opentheof.] A theft that is manifest. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 13.

OPEN TIDE. The time after corn is carried out of the common fields. Brit.

OPERARIL. Such tenants, under feudal tenures, who had some little portions of land by the duty of performing many bodily labours and servile works for their lord, being no other than the servi and bondmen: they are mentioned in several ancient surveys of manors.

OPERATIO. One day's work performed by a tenant for his lord. Paroch. Antig. 320.

OPPOSER. An officer formerly belonging to the Green Wax in the Exchequer. See Exchequer.

OPPRESSION. In a private sense, is the trampling upon or bearing down one, on pretence of law, which is unjust; but where the law is known and clear, though it appear hard or unequitable, the judges must determine according to the law. Vaugh. 37. As to the remedy for the oppression of the crown, see King, V. 2.

OPTION. When a new suffragan bishop is consecrated by the archbishop of the province, by a customary prerogative the archbishop claims the collation of the first vacant dignity or benefice in that see, at his own choice; which is called his option. Cowel. See Bishops.

OPTIONAL WRIT. A præcipe was an optional writ, i. e. it was in the alternative, commanding the defendant to do the thing required, or show the reason wherefore he had not done it. There was another species of original writ called peremptory or a si fecerit te securum, from the words of the writ, which directed the sheriff to cause the defendant to appear in court, without any option given him, provided the plaintiff gave the sheriff security effectually to prosecute his claim. 3 Comm. 274. See Original Writ.

ORA. A Saxon money or coin, valued at sixteen pence, and sometimes, according to variation of the standard, at twenty pence. The word often occurs in Domesday, and in laws of King Canute.

ORANDO PRO REGE ET REGNO. An ancient writ before the Reformation, while there was no standing council for a sitting parliament, when the houses of parliament were met, they petitioned the king that he would require the bishops and clergy to pray for the peace and good government of the realm, and for a continuance of the good understanding between his majesty and the estates of the kingdom; and accordingly the writ de orando pro rege et regno was issued, which was common in the time of King Edw. III. Nichols. Engl. Hist. par. 3. p. 66.

ORBIS. A bonney; a swelling or knot in the flesh, caused by a blow. Bract. lib. 3. tit. De Coronâ, c. 28. num. 2.

ORCHARDS. See Gardens.

ORCHEL or ORCHAL. Mentioned in 1 Rich. 3. c. 8; 3 & 4 Edw. 6. c. 2. A kind of stone like alum, which dyes use in their colours. It is among the articles liable to a duty on importation.

ORDEAL or ORDAL, Sax. compounded of or, magnum, and deal, or dele, judicium; or as others, from or, privative, and del, part; that is, expers criminis, or not guilty.] See 4 Comm. 343. n. An ancient manner of trial in criminal cases; for when an offender, being arraigned, pleaded not guilty, he might choose whether he would put himself for trial upon God and the country, by twelve men, as at this day, or upon God only; and then it was called the judgment of God, presuming that he would deliver the innocent. Terms de Leg. 9 Rep. 32.

This trial, according to Blackstone, arose from the superstition of our Saxon ancestors, who, like other northern nations, were extremely addicted to divination; they therefore invented this among the methods of purgation or trial to preserve innocence from the danger of false witnesses, and in consequence of a notion that God would always interpose miraculously to vindicate the guiltless. 4 Comm. 342.

According to Meyer, the word ordal is from the same origin as ordeul in Dutch, and urtheil in German, and signified judgment, so that the term was used to denominate the highest form of trial. He deduces the practice from a still earlier mode of trying offences by lots, which itself is referable to that partiality for auspicia and sortes, mentioned by Tacitus as remarkable among the ancient Germans, and which, with many other similar feelings and habits, they carried with them and retained, under a modified form, after their conversion to Christianity.

There were two sorts of ordeal; one by fire, another by water. Of these see Lambard, in his Explication of Saxon Words, verbo Ordalium; Holingshed, fol. 98, and Hotoman, especially Disput. de Feud. p. 41. See Skene de verbor. Significat. verbo Machinam.

This seems to have been in use in the time of Henry the Second, as appears by Glanv. lib. 14. c. 1. 2. See also Forstegan, c. 3. p. 63, &c. and Hoveden, 566. This ordalian was condemned by Pope Stephen the Second, and afterwards totally abolished here by parliament, as appears by Rel. Patr. d. anno 2 Hen. 3. mod. 5. Coroll. P. 1. leg. 1. de Confess. c. 9. Blackstone says, Ordeal was abolished in our courts of justice by an act of parliament in 3 Hen. 3. according to Coke, or rather by an order of the king in council. See 4 Comm. 343. 15; and 9 Rep. 32. 1 Rep. Inst. 283; Specim. Gloss. 320; 2 P. q. R. 1. 1. 20; Sold. Edm. fol. 48. According to the record in Specimen, it appears that the order of council alluded to the trial by ordeal as continued by the church of Rome, and substituted the punishment of imprisonment, abjuration of the realm, and security for good behaviour in the case of suspicion of certain crimes committed.

As late as King John's time, we find grants to the bishops and clergy to use the judicium ferri, aquæ et ignis. Specim. Gloss. 1. 1. And both in England and in Sweden the clergy presided at this trial, and it was only performed in the churches or in other consecrated ground. 4 Comm. 345.

The water ordeal was performed either in hot or cold; in cold water, the parties suspected were adjudged innocent if their bones were not borne up by the water contrary to the course of nature: in hot water, they were to put their bare arms or legs into scalding water, which, if they brought out without hurt, they were taken to be innocent of the crime.

It is easy, says Blackstone, to trace out the traditional relics of this water ordeal in the ignorant barbarity still practised in many counties to discover witches by casting them into a pool of water and drowning them to prove their innocence. 4 Comm. 343.

Those that were tried by the fire ordeal passed barefooted and blindfold over nine hot glowing ploughshares; or were to carry burning irons in their hands, usually of one pound weight, which was called simple ordeal; or of two pounds, which was duplex; or of three pounds' weight, which was triplex ordalium; and accordingly as they escaped they were judged innocent or guilty, acquitted or condemned. This fire ordeal was for freemen, and persons of better condition; and the water ordeal for bondmen and rustics. Glanv. lib. 4. c. 1.

And the horrible trial by fire ordeal, in the first degree, Queen Emma, mother of Edward the Confessor, is said to have undergone on a suspicion of her chastity; though the truth of the story is now, we believe, nearly exploded.

Both sorts of ordeal might be performed by deputy, but the principal was to answer for the success of the trial; the deputy only venturing some corporal pain for hire, or perhaps for friendship. 4 Comm. 342, 343.

For another species of purgation, see Corsned Bread.

ORDEFFE, or ORDELFE, effossio metalli, from the Sax. ore, metallum, and delfan, effodere.] A word often used in charters of privileges; signifying a liberty whereby a man claims the ore found in his own ground; but properly is the ore lying under ground. A delfe of coal, is coal lying in veins under ground, before it is dug up. Cowell.

ORDELS. Oaths and ordels were part of the privileges and immunities granted in old charters; meaning the right of administering oaths and adjudging ordeal trials within such a precinct or liberty. Cowell.

ORDER FOR THE PAYMENT OF MONEY, &c. See Larceny, l.

ORDERS. Are of several sorts, and by divers courts; as of the Chancery, King's Bench, &c.

ORDERS OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY. Either of course or otherwise, are obtained on the petition or motion of one of the parties in a cause, or of some other interested in or affected by it; and they are sometimes made on hearings, sometimes by consent of parties. They are to be pronounced in open court, and drawn up by the registrar from his notes; and if there be any difficulty in adjusting the notes, a summons is given by the registrar for the clerk or solicitor of the other side to attend, whereupon they are settled, or the court is applied to if it cannot be otherwise done. Before the orders are entered and passed by the registrar, the other side has four days allowed to object against them, for which purpose copies are delivered; and when they are perfected, they are to be served on the parties, or the clerk or solicitor employed by them. If an order is of course, the solicitor usually draws up the notes or minutes, and gives them to the registrar's clerk to draw up the order from; and when the order is drawn up, it is to be entered by the entering clerk, which must be within eight days from the pronouncing; then the registrar passes and signs it, after which is the service, &c. For not obeying an order, personally served, a party may be committed. See the Books of Practice.

A variety of orders have recently been issued by the lord chancellor, with the concurrence of the master of the rolls and the vice-chancellor, making extensive alterations in the practice of the Court of Chancery. See Equity.

ORDERS OF THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH. Rules made by the court in causes there depending, which, when drawn up and entered by the clerk of the rules, become orders of the court. 2 Lill. 261. See further, Motion, Rules.

ORDERS OF JUSTICES OF PEACE, or of the Sessions. See Justices of the Peace, Sessions.

ORDERS of the Clergy, or HOLY ORDERS. See Clergy, Ordination.

ORDINALE. A book which contains the manner of performing divine offices, in quo ordinatur modus, &c.

ORDINANCE, ordinatio.] A law, decree, or statute, variously used.

ORDINANCE OF THE FOREST, ordinatio forestarum.] A statute made touching matters and causes of the forest. See 33 & 34 Edw. 1.

ORDINANCE OF PARLIAMENT. Acts of parliament are often called ordinances, and ordinances acts; but originally there seems to be this difference between them—that an ordinance was but a temporary act, not introducing any new law, but founded on acts formerly made; and such ordinances might be altered by subsequent ordinances; but an act of parliament is a perpetual law, not to be altered but by king, lords, and commons. Rot. Parl. 37 Edw. 3; Pryn. on 4 Inst. 13. See Statute.

ORDINARY, ordinarius.] A civil law term for any judge who hath authority to take cognizance of causes in his own right, and not by deputation: by the common law it is taken for him who hath ordinary or exempt and immediate jurisdiction in causes ecclesiastical. Co. Litt. 344; Stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. st. 1. c. 19.

This name is applied to a bishop who hath original jurisdiction; and an archbishop is the ordinary of the whole province, to visit and receive appeals from inferior jurisdictions, &c. 2 Inst. 398; 9 Rep. 41; Wood's Inst. 25. The word ordinary is also used for every commissary or official of the bishop, or other ecclesiastical judge having judicial power: an archdeacon is an ordinary; and ordinaries may grant administration of intestates' estates, &c. 31 Edw. 3. c. 11; 9 Rep. 96. But the bishop of the diocese is the true and only ordinary to certify excommunications, lawfulness of marriage, and such ecclesiastical and spiritual acts, to the judges of the common law, for he is the person to whom the court is to write in such things. 2 Shep. Abr. 472.

For the ordinary's power, it is declared by many statutes: as relating to visiting hospitals, by 2 Hen. 5. st. 1. c. 1; the certifying of bastardy, &c. 9 Hen. 6. c. 11; concerning questions of tithes that shall come in debate before him, 27 Hen. 8. c. 20; allowance of school-masters, &c. 23 Eliz. c. 1; 1 Jac. 1. c. 4. If a man may keep a school without licence of the ordinary, see Ld. Raym. 603; and post, tit. School master. And the authority of ordinaries in general is restored by the 13 Car. 2. st. 1. c. 12.

The ordinary's power and interest in a church is of admitting, instituting, and inducting parsons; of seeing and taking care that it be provided with a pastor by the patron who has the right of presenting; or in his default to bestow the church on some proper person to serve the cure, &c. 1 Roll. Rep. 453. Before presentation to a church, the ordinary may sequester the profits; and during the vacation, it is said, he may make a lease. 1 Keb. 370. When the ordinaries or their ministers have committed extortion or oppression, they may be indicted, putting the things in certain, and in what manner, &c. 25 Edw. 3. st. 3. c. 9.

Formerly clerks accused of crimes were delivered to the ordinary, and the bodies of such clerks kept in the ordinary's prison until tried before him by a jury of twelve clerks; and if condemned, they were liable to no greater punishment than degradation, loss of goods, and the profits of their lands; unless they had been guilty of apostacy, &c. This was when they had the privilege of being tried only by ecclesiastical judges; which was so far indulged them, that after they had been once delivered to the ordinary, they could not be remanded to any temporal court, until the 8 Eliz. c. 4. See Clergy, Benefit of.

No ornaments can be set up in a church without the consent of the ordinary 1 Stran. 576; see 9 Co. 36; and Stats. Westm. 2. c. 19; 31 Edw. 3. c. 11; 21 Hen. 8. c. 5; 2 Inst. c. 19. See further, Brooke, tit. Ordinary; Landmode in cap. de Constitutionibus verbo Ordinarii; and ante, tit. Administrator, Bishop, Clergy.

ORDINARY OF NEWGATE. The clergyman who is attendant in ordinary upon condemned malefactors in that prison, to prepare them for death; and who records the behaviour of those unhappy culprits.

ORDINATIONE CONTRA SERVIENTES. A writ that lay against a servant for leaving his master contrary to the ordinance or statute 23 & 25 Edw. 3; Reg. Orig. 180.

ORDINATION OF THE CLERGY. By common law, a deacon of any age might be instituted and inducted to a parsonage or vicarage; but now, by statute, no man is capable of taking any ecclesiastical benefice with cure, promotion, or dignity, unless he be ordained a priest, to qualify him for the same. A clerk is to be twenty-three years old, and have deacon's orders, before he can be admitted into any share of the ministry; and the priest must be twenty-four years of age before he shall be admitted into orders to preach, or to administer the sacraments, or to hold any ecclesiastical benefice; but the archbishop may dispense with one to be made deacon at what age he pleases, though he cannot with one who is to be made a priest. See 13 Eliz. c. 12; 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4, extended to Ireland by 44 Geo. 3. c. 43. By the latter statute, the granting faculties of dispensation appears to be confined to the archbishops of Canterbury and Armagh.

Deacons and priests are to be ordained only on the four Sundays immediately following the Ember Weeks, except on urgent occasions; and it is to be done in the cathedral or parish church where the bishop resides, in time of divine service, and in the presence of the archdeacon, dean, and two prebendaries, or of four other grave divines. And no bishop shall admit any person into orders without a title or assurance of being provided for; and before any are admitted, the bishop shall examine them in the presence of the ministers, who assist him at the imposition of hands; on pain, if he admits any not qualified, &c. of being suspended by the archbishop from making either deacons or priests for two years. Can. 31, 34.

If any impediment be objected against one who is to be made either priest or deacon at the time he is to be ordained, the bishop is bound to surcease from ordaining him, until he shall be found clear of that impediment; and it is generally held, that whatever are good causes of deprivation are also sufficient causes to deny admission to orders; as incompetency, drunkenness, illiterature, perjury, forgery, simony, heresy, outlawry, bastardy, &c. 2 Inst. 631; 5 Rep. 4. A person to be ordained priest must bring a testimonial of four persons, known to the bishop, of his life and doctrine; and be able to give an account of his faith in Latin: and a deacon is not to be made a priest unless he produce to the bishop such a testimonial of his life, &c., and that he hath been found faithful and diligent in executing the office of a deacon.

A bishop shall not make any one deacon and minister on the same day; for there must be some time to try the behaviour of a deacon in his office before he is admitted to the order of priesthood, which time is generally a year, but it may be shorter on reasonable cause allowed by the bishop. Priests and deacons are not only to subscribe the thirty-nine articles, but take the oath of the king's supremacy, &c. as directed and altered by 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 1, 8. A priest by his ordination receives authority to preach the word and administer the holy sacraments, &c. But he may not preach without licence from the bishop, archbishop, or one of the universities.

The 31 Eliz. c. 6, punishes corrupt ordination of priests, &c. (which, says Blackstone, seems to be the true, though not the common notion of simony.) If any persons shall take any reward or other profit to make and ordain a minister, or to license him to preach, they shall by this statute forfeit 40*l.*, and the party so ordained, &c. 10*l.*, and be incapable of any ecclesiastical preferment for seven years afterwards.

By 59 Geo. 3. c. 60. the archbishop of Canterbury or York, or the bishop of London, or any bishop specially authorized by either of them for the purpose, may ordain any person for the express purpose of officiating in any of his majesty's colonies or foreign possessions which shall be stated in the letters of ordination; but no person so ordained shall be capable of holding any living in Great Britain or Ireland without the consent of the bishop of the diocese; and the like restraint is extended to persons ordained by the bishops of Quebec, Nova Scotia, &c. See Bishops. It is also expressly provided, that no persons ordained by a colonial bishop, not actually resident in his diocese, shall be capable of holding any preferment, or officiating in any manner as a minister of the church of England or Ireland. See further, tit. Clergy, Person, Simony.

ORDINES. A general chapter or other solemn convention of the religious of such a particular order. Paroch. Antiq. p. 576.

ORDINES MAJORES ET MINORES. The holy orders of priest, deacon, and subdeacon, any of which did qualify for presentation and admission to an ecclesiastical dignity or cure, were called ordines majores; and the inferior orders of chanter, psalmist, ostiary, reader, exorcist, and acolyte, were called ordines minores; for which the person so ordained had their prima tonsura different from the tonsura clericorum. Comell.

The deacons, priests, and deacons, the church of Rome had five orders; viz. subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and ostiaries. 1. The subdeacon is he who delivereth the vessels to the deacon, and assisteth him in the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's supper; 2. The acolyte is he who bears the lighted candle whilst the Gospel is in reading, or whilst the priest consecrateth the host; 3. The exorcist is he who abjureth evil spirits, in the name of Almighty God, to go out of persons troubled therewith; 4. The reader is he who readeth in the church of God, being also ordained to this, that he may preach the word of God to the people; 5. The ostiary is he who keepeth the doors of the church, and tolleth the bell. These, though some of them ancient, were a Roman institutions, and such as come not under the institution which immediately precedes (from the apostle's time) for which reason, and because they were evidently instituted for convenience only, and were not immediately concerned in the sacred offices of the church, they were abolished by our first reformers. Cole's 9.

ORDINUM TERTIUM. Signified those of the religious who dedicated their houses; and, throwing off their habits, received their particular order, in contempt of their oath and other obligations. Paroch. Antiq. 388.

ORDNANCE. Letters patent for making it are not now in the statute of monopolies, 21 Jac. 1. c. 3. § 10. See 4 Geo. 3. c. 89; 43 Geo. 3. c. 35, 65, 66; 44 Geo. 3. c. 78, § 107, for transferring lands for the service of the Board of Ordnance.

As to pension to the clerk of the ordinance after ten years' service, see 4 & 5 Wm. 4. c. 24. s. 4. non. types.

ORDO. That rule which the monks were obliged to observe. Labaur, Ludo S. Augustini.

ORDO ALBUS. The White Friars, or Augustines; the Carthusians also wore white.

ORDO NIGER. The Black Friars. Ingulphus, p. 851. The Cistercians likewise wore black. Mat. Paris, 321, 514.

ORFGILD, or CHEAPGELD, from Sax. orf, pecus, and ald, solutio vel redemptio. A delivery or restitution of cattle. But Lambard says, it is a restitution made by the hundred, or county, for any wrong done by one who was in the age; or rather a penalty for taking away cattle. Lamb. Arch. 125.

ORFRAIES, aurifrisum. A sort of cloth of gold, frizzed or embroidered, formerly made and used in England, worn by our kings and nobility; and the clothes of the king's guards were called orfraies, because adorned with such works of gold. Mention is made of these orfraies in the Records of the Tower.

ORGEYS. Mentioned in 31 E. 3. st. 3. c. 2. is the greatest sort of North-sea fish (for the statute says they are greater than lob-fish); which we call organ-ling, corruptly from Orkney-ling, because the best are near that island. Comell.

ORGILD, sine compensatione. Without recompense; as where no satisfaction was to be made for the death of a man killed, so that he was judged lawfully slain. Spelman.

ORIGINAL CHARTER. That which is granted first to the vassal by the superior. Scotch Dict.

ORIGINAL, or ORIGINAL WRIT. The beginning or foundation of a suit. When a person has received an injury, and thinks it worth his while to demand a satisfaction for it, he must apply for that specific remedy which he is advised or determined to pursue. To this end he is to sue out an original, or original writ, from the Court of Chancery, the officina justitiæ, wherein all the king's writs are framed.

This original writ is a mandatory letter from the king in Chancery, sealed with his great seal; and, until recently, it lay, in all personal actions, against every person not privileged as an attorney, officer, or prisoner of the court. Formerly, indeed, it was not usual to proceed in the King's Bench by original writ, in debt, detain, or other action of a mere civil nature. But the modern practice was different; and where the defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction, in an action of debt commenced by original writ, the court gave judgment on demurrer for the plaintiff; and declared that if such a plea should come before them again they would inquire by whom it was signed. See Hardw. 317. On the other hand, an original writ was formerly the most common, if not the only ground of proceeding against peers, and members of the House of Commons; but by the 12 & 13 Wm. 3. c. 3. § 2. they might also be sued by original bill and summons, attachment and distress infinite. Still, however, an original writ was the only ground of proceeding against a corporation or hundredors on the statutes of hue and cry, &c.; or where, by reason of the defendant's being abroad, or by keeping out of the way, he would not be arrested, or served with process; (and it was intended to sue him to outlawry.)

Original writs are calculated for the commencement or removal of actions. And they are either de cursu, or magistralia; the former were framed in the king's court, before the division of it; the latter were made out by the masters in Chancery, pursuant to the stat. Westm. 2. 13 E. 1. st. 1. c. 24. In personal actions, they were ex contractu, vel ex delicto, upon contracts, or for wrongs immediate and consequential. See Tidd's Pract. and the authorities there cited.

In actions of covenant, debt, and detain, the original writ was called a præcipe, by which the defendant had an option given him, either to do what he was required, or show cause to the contrary: but in assumpsit, and actions for wrongs, it was called a pone, or si te fecerit securum; by which the defendant was peremptorily required to show cause in the first instance. Finch, L. 357.

The use of the præcipe was, where something certain was demanded by the plaintiff, which it was incumbent on the defendant himself to perform; as to restore the possession of land, to pay a certain liquidated debt, to perform a specific covenant, to render an account, and the like: in all which cases the writ was drawn up in the form of a command, to do thus, or show cause to the contrary; giving the defendant his choice to redress the injury, or to stand the suit. The other sort of original was in use where nothing is specifically demanded, but only a satisfaction in general; to obtain which, and administer complete redress, the intervention of some judicature is necessary. Such were writs of trespass, or on the case, wherein no debt or specific thing is sued for in certain, but only damages to be assessed by a jury. For this end the defendant was immediately called upon to appear in court, provided the plaintiff gives good security of prosecuting his claim. 3 Comm. c. 18, p. 274.

In point of form, the original writ was special or general; nommatim vel innominatim. 1 Bac. Abr. 29; Gilb. C. P. 3. The former contained the time, place, and other circumstances of the demand, very particularly; the latter only a general complaint, without expressing the particulars, as the writ of trespass, quare clausum fregit, &c.

The original writ, issuing out of Chancery, was teste'd, (that is witnessed) in the king's name at Westminster, or wherever else the Chancery was holden; and as that court is supposed to be always open, it might have been teste'd in vacation as well as in term-time. It was teste'd after the cause of action accrued, and made returnable on a general return day in term-time, ubicunque, i. e. wheresoever the king was then in England. There must have been fifteen days at least between the teste and return of an original; the law requiring that distance of time, between the service and return of it, to enable the defendant to come from any part of the kingdom, though if there were less, it was aided by the defendant's appearing and pleading in chief.

Now, by the uniformity of process act, 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. the proceeding by original, in personal actions, is, in effect, abolished, and the only process, in all the courts, by and against all persons, and whether such persons have privilege of peerage or of parliament or otherwise, including corporations or hundredors, where the suit is not bailable, is a writ of summons, and in all actions where bail is required, a writ of caapias. See the forms in the schedules of the act. Proceedings to outlawry may be had under the act in the same manner as formerly, on an original writ; and a filacer, exigenter, and clerk of outlawries, is for that purpose to be appointed in the Court of Exchequer. This alteration considerably simplifies and cheapens the procedure of the courts at Westminster.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. s. 36. all real and mixed actions are abolished, except the writ of right of dower; writ of dower, under nil habet, quare impedit, and ejectment, which excepted actions may still be commenced by original writ.

Replevin, and other personal actions, commenced in inferior courts, and removed to the superior courts, do not seem within the 2 Wm. 4. c. 39.

See further titles Latitat, Practice, Privilege, Process, &c.

ORIGINALIA. In the treasurer's remembrancer's office in the Exchequer, the transcripts, &c. sent thither out of the Chancery are called by this name, and distinguished from recorda, which contain the judgments and pleadings in suits tried before the barons.

These transcripts contain extracts of all grants of the crown inrolled on the patent and other rolls in Chancery, wherein any rent is received, any salary payable, or any service to be performed. They commence temp. Hen. 3. and are continued to a late period. Report on Records, 1800.

ORPED. Some orped knight, i. e. a knight whose clothes shone with gold. Blount.

ORPHAN, orphanus.] A fatherless child: and in the city of London there is a court of record established for the care and government of orphans. 4 Inst. 248.

The lord mayor and aldermen of London had the custody of orphans under age and unmarried, of freemen that died, and the keeping of their lands and goods; and if they committed the custody of an orphan to any man, he should have the writ of ravishment of ward, if the orphan were taken away; or the mayor and aldermen might imprison the offender until he produced the infant. 2 Danv. Abr. 311. If any one, without consent of the court of aldermen, marries such an orphan under the age of twenty-one years, though out of the city, they may fine, and imprison him until the fine is paid. 1 Lev. 32; 1 Vent. 178. Executors and administrators of freemen dying, are to exhibit true inventories of their estates before the lord mayor and aldermen in the Court of Orphans, and must give security to the chamberlain of London, and his successors, by recognizance, for the orphan's part; which if they refuse to do, they may be committed to prison until they obey. Wood's Inst. 522. If any orphan who, by the custom of London, is under the government of the lord mayor and aldermen, sue in the spiritual court for any legacy, &c. a prohibition shall be granted; because the lord mayor and aldermen only have jurisdiction of them. 5 Rep. 73. But an orphan may waive the benefit of suing in the Court of Orphans, and file a bill in equity for discovery of the personal estate, &c.

The lord mayor and commonalty of London being answerable for the orphan's money paid into the chamber of the city, and having become indebted to the orphans and their creditors, in a greater sum than they could pay, it was enacted, by the 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 10, that the lands, markets, fairs, &c. belonging to the city of London, should be chargeable for raising 8,000*l.* per annum, to be appropriated for a perpetual fund for orphans; and, towards raising such a fund, the mayor and commonalty might assess 2,000*l.* yearly upon the personal estates of inhabitants of the city, and levy the same by distress, &c. Also a duty was granted of 4*s.* per ton on wines imported, and on coals; and every apprentice should pay 2*s.* 6*d.* when bound, and 5*s.* when admitted a freeman, for raising the fund; the fund was to be applied for payment of the debts due to orphans, by interest, after the rate of 4*l.* per cent., &c. And by § 18 of the said statute, no person should be compelled, by virtue of any custom in the city, to pay into the chamber of London any sum of money, or personal estate, belonging to an orphan of any freeman, for the future. By the 21 Geo. 2. c. 29 the duty of 6*d.* per chaldron on coals, given by the 5 & 6 H. 8. M. c. 10. towards the orphan's debt, was continued for three years; and by the 7 Geo. 3. c. 37. for forty-six years more; and various provisions were made for the security and application of the orphan's fund. See also the local act 39 Geo. 3. c. 69. and the several acts for improving the port of London.

ORTELLI, Fr.] A forest word, signifying the claws on a dog's foot. Kitch. See Carta de Foresta, c. 6.

ORYAL, oriolum.] A room, or cloister, of a monastery priory, &c.; whence it is presumed that Oriel, or Orve College, in Oxford, took its name. Matt. Paris, in Vit. Abb. St. Alban.

OSCULATORY. Was a tablet or board, with the picture of Christ, or the blessed Virgin, or of some saint: where after the consecration of the elements in the eucharist, the priest first kissed himself, and then delivered to the people for the same purpose. 3 Burn's Ecclesiast. Law, 58.

OSCULUM PACIS. A custom formerly of the church that in the celebration of the mass, after the priest had spoke these words, viz. pax domini vobiscum, the people kissed him; other, was called osculum pacis; afterwards, when this custom was abrogated, another was introduced; which whilst the priest spoke the aforementioned words, a deacon offered the people on image to kiss, which was common; called pacem. Matt. Paris, anno 1100.

OSMONDS. A kind of iron ore, anciently brought into England. See the 32 H. 8. c. 14, repealed by 3 Geo. 4. c. 41 § 2.

OSTENSIO. A tribute anciently paid by merchants, for leave to expose their goods for sale in markets. Leg. Ethelred, c. 23.

OSTIARY. See Ordines Majores.

OSWALD'S LAW, Lex Oswaldi.] The law by which was effected the ejecting married priests, and introducing monks into churches, by Oswald, bishop of Worcester, about the year 964.

OSWALD'S LAW HUNDRED. An ancient hundred in Worcestershire, so called from Bishop Oswald, who obtained it of King Edgar, to be given to St. Mary's church in Worcester; it is exempt from the jurisdiction of the sheriff, and comprehends 800 hides of lands. Camd. Brit.

OTHO. Was a deacon cardinal of St. Nicholas, in carcere Tulliano, a legate for the pope here in England, 22 Hen. 3, whose constitutions we have at this day. Stowe's Annals, 30. Cowell.

OTHOBONUS. Was a deacon cardinal of St. Adrian, and the pope's legate here in England, 15 Hen. 3, as appeareth by the award made between the said king and his commons at Kenilworth. His constitutions we have at this day in use. Cowell.

OUCH. A collar of gold or such like ornament worn by women about their necks. See the old statute 24 Hen. 8. c. 13. Cowell.

OVEALTY. Equality. See Onctly.

OVER, Sax. ofer, rapt.] In the beginning or ending of the names of places, signifies a situation near the bank of some river, as St. Maryover, in Southwark, Andover, in Hampshire, &c.

OVERCYTED or OVERCYHSED, from the Sax. ofer, c. cyper and cythan, offendere.] Proved guilty or convicted. Is said where a person is convicted of any crime; that it is found upon the offender; this word is mentioned in the laws of Edward, apud Brompton, p. 836. Blount; Cowell.

OVERHERNISA. Contumacy, or contempt of court. In the laws of Æthelstan, cap. 25, it is used for contumacy; but in a council held at Winchester, anno 1027, it signifies a censure paid to the bishop by one who came in after excommunication. See Spelman, and ante, tit. Laghalite.

OVERSAMESSA. Seems to have been an ancient fine before the statute for hue and cry, laid upon those who, hearing of a murder or robbery, did not pursue the malefactor. 1 Inst. 116; Lib. Rub. cap. 36. See Cowell, who says it is lawfully written oversegenesse and overseeness. It appears confounded with the preceding word overhernissa, and that all the terms signify a forfeiture for contempt or neglect.

OVERSEERS OF THE POOR. Public officers created by the 43 Edw. c. 2, to provide for the poor of every parish, and are sometimes two, three, or four, according to the extent of parishes. Churchwardens by this statute are called overseers of the poor, and they join with the overseers in making a poor's-rate, &c.; but the churchwardens having their net business of their own, usually leave the care of the poor to the overseers only, though anciently they were the overseers of the poor. Dalt. ch. 27; Wood's Inst. 98.

OVERSEWENESSE. See Overhernissa.

OVERT, Fr.; open, overture, an opening; also a proposal. Law Fr. Dict.

OVERT-ACT, opertum factum.] An open act, which by law must be manifestly proved. 3 Inst. 12. Some overt-act is to be alleged in every indictment for high treason; such as for treason in compassing the death of the king, the procuring arms to effect it, &c. 3 Inst. 6, 12. And no evidence may be admitted of any overt-act, that is not expressly laid in the indictment, by 7 Wm. 3. c. 3. See Treason.

OVERT-WORD. An open plain word, not to be mistaken. Stat. 1 Mar. sess. 2. c. 3.

OVRES, Fr.] Acts, deeds, or works; ovrages or ouvrages are days' works. 8 Rep. 131.

OURLOP. The lierwite or fine paid to the lord by the inferior tenant, when his daughter was corrupted or debauched. Petr. Bles. Contin. Hist. Croyland, 115.

OUSTED, from the French ouster, to put out.] As ousted out of possession is where one is removed or put out of possession. 3 Cro. 349.

OUSTER LE MAIN, amovere manum.] A livery of land out of the king's hand, on a judgment given for him that sued a monstrans de droit; for when it appeared upon the matter that the king had no title to the land he seized, judgment was given in the chancery that the king's hands be removed; and thereupon an amoveas manus was awarded to the escheator to restore the land, it being as much as if the judgment were given that the party should have his land again. Staundf. Prærog. cap. 24; see 28 Edw. 1. st. 3. c. 19. It was also taken for the writ granted upon a petition for this purpose. F. N. B. 256. But now all wardships, liveries, and ouster le mains, &c. are taken away by 12 Car. 2. c. 24. See Monstrans de Droit, Tenures.

OUSTER LE MER, oultre, i. e. ultra, and le mer, marc.] One cause ofessoign or excuse, if a man appeared not in court on summons, for that he was then beyond the seas. See Essoign.

OUTFANGTHEF, from the Saxon ut, i. e. extra, fang, captus, and theaf, fur.] A liberty or privilege, as used in the ancient common law, whereby a lord was enabled to call any man dwelling in his manor, and taken for felony in another place out of his fee, to judgment in his own court. Rustal; Bract. lib. 2. tract. 2. cap. 35; 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 15.

OUTHEST or OUTHORN. A calling men out to the army, by the sound of an horn.

OUTHOUSES. Are the buildings belonging and adjoining to dwelling-houses. See Burglary, Curtilage, Larceny, II.

OUTLAND. The Saxon thanes divided their hereditary lands into inland, such as lay nearest their dwelling, which they kept to their own use; and outland, which lay beyond the demesnes, and was granted out to tenants, at the will of the lord, like copyhold estates. This outland they subdivided into two parts, one part they disposed amongst those who attended their persons, called theodans or lesser thanes; the other part they allotted to their husbandmen or churls. Spelm. de Feud. cap. 5.

OUTLAW, Saxon, utlaghe; Latin, utlagatus.] One deprived of the benefit of the law, and out of the king's protection. Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 47. When a person is restored to the king's protection, he is inlawed again. See Outlawry.

OUTLAWRY.

UTLAGAMA.] The being put out of the law. The loss of the benefit of a subject, that is, of the king's protection. Cowell.

Outlawry is a punishment inflicted for a contempt, in refusing to be amenable to the justice of that court, which hath authority to call a defendant before them; and as this is a crime of the highest nature, being an act of rebellion against that state or community of which he is a member, so it subjects the party to forfeitures and disabilities; for he loseth his liberam legem, is out of the king's protection, &c. Co. Lit. 128; Doct. & Stud. dial. 2. cap. 3; 1 Roll. Abr. 802.

And as to forfeitures for refusing to appear, the law distinguishes between outlawries in capital cases, and those of an inferior nature; for as to outlawries in treason and felony, the law interprets the party's absence a sufficient evidence of his guilt, and without requiring further proof, accounts him guilty of the fact, on which issues corruption of blood and forfeiture of his estate, real and personal. Co. Lit. 128; 3 Inst. 161. See further, Forfeiture, II.

But outlawry in personal actions does not occasion the party to be looked on as guilty of the fact, nor does it occasion an entire forfeiture of his real estate, yet it is very fatal and penal in its consequences; for hereby he is restrained of his liberty, if he can be found; forfeits his goods and chattels, and the profits of his lands, while the outlawry remains in force. Plowd. 541; 9 Hen. 6. 20 b; Shon. Parl. Ca. 73.

Outlawry in civil actions is putting a man out of the protection of the law, so that he is not only incapable of suing for the redress of injuries, but may be imprisoned, and forfeits all his goods and chattels, and the profits of his lands; his personal chattels immediately upon the outlawry, and his chattels real, and the profits of his lands, when found by inquisition. 1 Salk. 395.

So penal were the consequences of an outlawry, that until some time after the Conquest, no man could have been outlawed except for felony, the punishment whereof was death; but in Bracton's time, and somewhat earlier, process of outlawry was ordained to lie in all actions vi et armis. Bract. lib. 5. p. 425. And since, by a variety of statutes (the same as introduced the capias), process of outlawry lies in account, debt, detinue, and divers other common or civil actions. See post, I.

Anciently outlawry was looked upon as so horrid a crime, that any one might as lawfully kill a person outlawed, as he might a wolf or other noxious animal; but it is now holden that no man is entitled to kill an outlaw wantonly or wilfully, but in so doing is guilty of murder; 1 Hale, P. C. 497; unless it happens in the endeavour to apprehend him. Bract. fol. 125. See post, IV.

Also, from the heinousness of the offence, the sheriff may, on a capias utlagatum, break open the house of the person outlawed; for it would be unreasonable that the protection allowed in other cases should extend to him who is declared a contemner and violator of the law; therefore the seizing him as an outlaw implies the liberty of entering and seizing him wherever he lies hid. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 202; 9 Co. 91; 1 Bulst. 146; Cro. Eliz. 908; Moor, 606, 668; Yelv. 28; Cro. Car. 537; 4 Leon. 41; 2 Jon. 233.

If the defendant be a woman, the proceeding is called a waiver; for as women were not sworn to the law by taking the oath of allegiance in theleet (as men anciently were when of the age of twelve years or upwards), they could not properly be outlawed or put out of the law, but were said to be waived, that is, derelecta, left out, or not regarded. Litt. § 186; Co. Litt. 122 b. And for this same reason an infant cannot be outlawed under the age of twelve years. Co. Litt. 128 a. See post, div. II.

I. WHERE the defendant is abroad, or keeps out of the way, so that he cannot be arrested or served with process, the plaintiff, on the return of non est inventus to the pluries capias (see post), may have a writ of exigi facias (see post, III.), and proceed to outlawry; or if there be several defendants in a joint action, and one of them be abroad or keep out of the way, the plaintiff may have a writ of exigi facias against that defendant, and must proceed to outlawry against him before he can go on against the others. 1 Stra. 173; 1 Wils. 78; 2 Stra. 1269; 1 Bla. Rep. 20.

Process of outlawry lay in all appeals until they were abolished, and it now lies in all indictments of conspiracy and deceit, or other crimes of a higher nature than trespass vi et armis; but it lies not in an action, nor, as some say, on an indictment on a statute, unless it be given by such statute, either expressly, as in the case of preconjurare; or impliedly, as in cases made treason or felony by statute; or where a recovery is given by an action in which such process lay before, as in case of forcible entry. Staundf. 192; Bro. tit. Outlawry, 26, 36, 59; Co. Litt. 128 b; Dyer, 213, 314; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 27. § 113, and several authorities there cited.

So process of outlawry lies in replevin, and is given by the 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. cap. 17, which gives the capias in this manner; when on the pluries replegiari facias the sheriff return averia elongata, then a capias in withernam issues, and on that being returned nulla bond, a capias issues, and so to outlawry; but it does not lie on the original writ of replevin, which is vicontiel and determined; therefore as no addition is required in such original writ, so neither ought there to be any in the second writ; for where a writ or process is founded on a former, it must pursue the former, and cannot vary from it. 6 Mod. 84; 1 Salk. 5.

By the common law, in all actions of trespass quare vi et armis, and in which there is a fine to the king, a capias was the process; and herein process of outlawry lay by the common law. 35 H. 6. 6 b; 22 H. 6. 13; Rast. Ent. 239; 10 Co. 72; 2 Rol. Abr. 805.

But in account, debt, detinue, annuity, covenant, and such actions as are grounded upon negligence or laches merely, no capias lay at common law, but only summons and distress infinite; therefore the capias and outlawry in these actions were introduced by acts of parliament. Co. Litt. 128 b; 3 Co. 12; 2 Bulst. 63; 2 Inst. 143; Cro. Jac. 222, 231; Yelv. 158; Raym. 128; 1 Keb. 890, 908; 1 Sid. 248, 258; of detinue of charters, Dyer, 223 a, dubitatur.

By the statute of Marlbridge, (52 H. 3.) cap. 23. the writ of monstravit de complo was given, where before the process in account was summons, attachment, and distress infinite; and by stat. West. 2. (13 Edw. 1. st. 1.) cap. 11, process of outlawry is given in account. 2 Inst. 145, 380; F. N. B. 259.

By 25 Edw. 3. stat. 5. c. 17. such process shall be made in a writ of debt and detinue of chattels, and taking of debts by writ of capias and by process of exigent, by the sheriff's return, as is used in a writ of account. 3 Co. 12; 2 Roll. Rep. 295; 2 Bulst. 63.

And by 19 H. 7. c. 9. it is enacted, that like process be had in actions upon the case, as in actions of trespass or debt.

The 25 Edw. 3. st. 5. c. 14. as to process of outlawry against persons indicted for felony, does not apply to a court ofoyer and terminer and gaol delivery. 4 T. R. 521.

Outlawry is either upon mesne process before, or upon final process after judgment. Formerly, upon mesne process the plaintiff could not proceed to outlawry, unless the action were commenced by original writ. 1 Sid. 159. Nor could the defendant be outlawed after judgment, unless the action were so commenced; for where the defendant was outlawed after judgment, in an action commenced by habeas corpus, it was holden that process of outlawry did not lie, as there was no capias in the original action. 1 Leon. 325. See tit. Original.

Now, by the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. the proceedings in personal actions by original are in effect abolished; and it is provided that in all courts all actions not bailable shall be commenced by a writ of summons, and actions bailable by a writ of capias; and where the writ of summons cannot be served on a defendant, his appearance may be enforced by a distringas against his goods. By § 5 it is enacted, that "upon the return of non est inventus as to any defendant against whom such writ of exigent shall have been issued, and also upon the return of non est inventus and nulla bond as to any defendant against whom such writ of distringas as hereinbefore shall have issued, whether such writ of capias or distringas shall have issued against such defendant only, or against such defendant and any other person or persons, it shall be lawful, with other wise provided, to proceed to outlaw or waive such defendant by writs of exigi facias and proclamation, and otherwise, in such and the same manner as may now be lawfully done upon the return of non est inventus to a plures writ of capias ad respondendum issued after an original writ provided always, that every such writ of exigent, proclamation, and other writ subsequent to the writ of capias or distringas, shall be made returnable on a day certain in term; and every such first writ of exigent and proclamation shall bear teste on the day of the return of the writ of capias or distringas, whether such writ be returned in term or vacation; and every subsequent writ of exigent and proclamation shall bear teste on the day of the return of the next preceding writ; and no such writ of capias or distringas shall be sufficient for the purpose of outlawry or waiver, if the same be returned within less than fifteen days after the delivery thereof to the sheriff or other officer to whom the same shall be directed." This act does not affect any real or mixed actions, but by the 3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 27. § 50. real and mixed actions, with two or three exceptions, are abolished.

After judgment the plaintiff may have an exigi facias, and proceed to outlawry, upon a capias ad satisfactionem without an alias or plures; because the defendant having been already in a court before judgment, and having cognizance of the debt, ought to pay it on the first strong out of the capias, and has not performing the judgment is a contumacy, for which he is put out of the king's protection. Idib. C. P. 17. And no writ of proclamation is required upon an exigent after judgment, but only upon mesne process. Cro. Jac. 577. See post, div. III.

By 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. § 6. after judgment given in any action commenced by writ of summons or capias under the act, proceedings to outlawry or waiver may be taken, and judgment of outlawry or waiver given, in such manner and in such cases as may now be done after judgment in an action commenced by original writ: provided that every outlawry or waiver had under the act, may be vacated or set aside by writ of error or motion, in like manner as outlawry or waiver founded on an original writ may now be vacated or set aside.

It is clear that the courts at Westminster may issue process of outlawry, and that the Court of King's Bench, either upon an indictment originally taken there, or removed thither by certiorari, may issue process of capias and exigent into any county of England, upon a non est inventus returned by the sheriff of the county where he is indicted, and a testatum that he is in some other county. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 198.

In the Exchequer the defendant could not formerly be outlawed, as the plaintiff could not proceed there by original writ, but this may now be done by 2 Wm. 4. c. 39. § 4; and for the purpose of proceeding to outlawry there, the lord chief baron is to appoint some fit person holding some other office in that court to execute the duties of filacer, exigenter, and clerk of outlawries in the same court.

Also justices of oyer and terminer may issue a capias or exigent, and so proceed to the outlawry of any person indicted before them, directed to the sheriff of the same county where they held their sessions at common law; and by the 15 Edm. 3. c. 11. they may issue process of capias and exigent to all the counties of England, against persons indicted or outlawed of felony before them. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 31, 198.

But justices of gaol delivery regularly cannot issue a capias or exigent; because their commission is to deliver the gaol de prisonibus in custodia, so that those whom they have to do with, are always intended in custody already. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 199.

Justices of the peace may make out process of outlawry upon indictments taken before themselves, or upon indictments taken before the sheriff, and returned to the justices of the peace, by the 1 Edm. 4. c. 2; but the power of the sheriff, to make any process upon indictments, taken before him, is taken away by that statute. 2 Hale's Hist. 199.

It is made a quære by Hale, whether a coroner can by law make out process of outlawry against a man indicted by inquisition before him. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 199. See 4 T. R. 521.

It hath been held, that though the process in inferior courts be a capias, yet they cannot proceed to outlaw the party. Yelv. 158; Cro. Jac. 222, 261; Raym. 128; 1 Sid. 248, 259; 1 Keb. 890, 908.

The process to the outlawry, viz. the capias and exigent, must be in the king's name, and under the judicial seal of the king, appointed to that court, which issues that process, and with the teste of the chief justice or chief judge of that court or sessions. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 199.

II. If a peer of the realm be indicted, and cannot be found, process of outlawry shall be awarded against him, and he shall be outlawed per judicium coronatorum. 2 Inst. 49; 3 Inst. 31; Staundf. 180; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 44. § 16.

But in civil actions, between party and party, regularly a capias or exigent lies not against a peer; yet in case of an indictment for treason or felony, or for trespass vi et armis, as an assault or riot, process of outlawry shall issue against a peer; for the suit is for the king, and the offence a contempt against him; therefore, if a rescue be returned against a peer; or if a peer be convict of a disseisin with force, or denies his deed, and it be found against him, a capias pro fine and exigent shall issue, for the king is to have a fine; and the same reason holds upon an indictment of trespass or riot, much more in the case of felony. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 199, 200; Cro. Eliz. 170, 508; 5 Co. 54; 1 Rol. Abr. 220.

An infant above the age of fourteen may be outlawed, and the outlawry is not erroneous; but an infant under the age of fourteen cannot be outlawed; if he be, it is erroneous. 3 Hen. 5. Utlagat.; Fitz. tit. Outlawry, 11; 2 Rol. Abr. 805; Dyer, 104; 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 207, 208. Lord Coke says, within the age of twelve years. 1 Inst. 128 a.

But the outlawry of such infant is not void, it being of record, but is voidable only by writ of error. Dyer, 239 a; 2 Rol. Abr. 805.

A woman, it has been already remarked, is said to be waived and not outlawed; therefore where a capias and exigent were awarded against three men and two women, and the return was utlagat. existunt, where, as to the women, it ought to have been navitata existunt, this was held to be error. Cro. Jac. 358; 1 Rol. Rep. 407; 1 Rol. Abr. 804.

If in an action against husband and wife, the husband is outlawed, and the wife waived, and she is taken upon the capias utlagat., though she is to be discharged of the imprisonment, (because the plaintiff cannot proceed against her alone,) yet she still remains waived, and when her husband is taken he must bring her in. See Dyer, 271 b; Cro. Jac. 445; Cro. Eliz. 370; Hut. 86; 1 Sid. 21; Cro. Car. 58, 59; Hut. 86.

If two are sued in a joint action, and neither of them will appear, process of outlawry must be taken out against both. Cro. Eliz. 648.

If an exigent be awarded against two, and the return primo exacti fuerunt et non comparuerunt, without saying nec eorum aliquis comparuit, it is erroneous. 2 Rol. Abr. 802.

As to outlawry in action of account, see 41 Edm. 3. 3; 1 Rol. Abr. 127; 1 Brownl. 25; 41 Edm. 3. 13 b; Moor, 188; 2 Leon. 76; Dyer, 239. pl. 203; N. Bendl. 148. pl. 205; Moor, 74. pl. 203; 1 And. 10; 1 Sid. 173; 1 Keb. 642.

As to awarding outlawry against principal and accessory, by the stat. of Westm. 1. 3 Edm. 1. c. 14. which was passed to remedy an abuse then prevailing of outlawing accessories on appeals of felony, it is provided, that none be outlawed upon appeal of commandment, force, aid, or receipt, unless he who is appealed of the deed be attainted, so that one like law be used therein through this realm; nevertheless he that will so appeal, shall not, by reason of this, intermit or leave off to commence his appeal at the next county, against them, no more than against their principals which he appealed of the deed; but their exigent shall remain, until such as be appealed of the deed be attained of outlawry or otherwise.

For the construction of this statute, which has been held to extend to indictments as well as appeals, (the latter of which are now abolished,) see 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 27; 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 220.

If one exigent be awarded against the principal and accessory together, it is error only as to the latter. 4 T. R. 521.

With respect to accessories, it was formerly held, that as the guilt of the accessory was purely derivative, and no accessory could be convicted before the conviction of his principal, so, in no case could process of outlawry issue against any accessory either before or after the fact, previous to the outlawry of the principal. 1 Star. Cr. Pl. 260. But as the recent statutes of 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. § 9, and 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 54, 55, have enacted, that accessories before the fact and receivers of stolen goods may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted; it seems to follow that they may now also be outlawed, independently of any process of outlawry against the principal. Accessories after the fact however, except receivers of stolen goods, can still only be indicted either along with, or after the conviction of, the principal; and therefore in favour of these, the former practice of proceeding to outlawry against an accessory still prevails.

In treason all are principals; therefore process of outlawry may go against him who receives, at the same time, as against him that did the fact. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 238. See Process.

III. FORMERLY the exigent must have been sued in the county where the party really resided, for there all actions were originally laid; and because outlawries were at first only for treason, felony, or very enormous trespasses, the process was to be executed at the torn, which is the sheriff's criminal court; and this held not only before the sheriff, but before the coroners, who were ancient conservators of the peace, being the best men in each county, to preside with the sheriff in his court, and who pronounced the outlawry in the county court on the party's being quinto exactus; therefore anciently there was no occasion for any process to any other county than that in which the party actually resided. Fitz. Exigent, 26; Dyer, 295.

By the 6 Hen. 6. c. 1. "before any exigents be awarded against persons indicted in the King's Bench of treason or felony, writs of capias shall be directed as well to the sheriff of the county in which they are indicted, as to the sheriff of the county whereof they may be named in the indictments; the capias having at least six weeks before the return thereof."

And by the 8 Hen. 6. c. 10. "upon every indictment, before any exigent awarded, presently after the first writ of capias returned, another writ of capias shall be awarded, directed to the sheriff of the county, whereof he who is indicted is or was supposed to be conversant, by the same indictment, containing, according to the circumstances, three or four months from the date to the return; by which second writ of capias, the sheriff shall be commanded to take him, if he can be found within his bailiwick; and if he cannot, to make proclamation in two counties, before the return of the same writ; after which writ so served and returned, if he which is so indicted or appealed come not at the day of such writ returned, the exigent shall be awarded."

This statute not to extend to indictments taken within the county of Chester.

By the 10 Hen. 6. c. 6. "such second capias as is required by 8 Hen. 6. c. 10. shall be awarded upon indictments removed into the King's Bench, or elsewhere, by certiorari, or otherwise."

In the construction of these statutes, the following opinions have been holden:—

That though the words are express, that any outlawry pronounced contrary to the directions of the statute shall be void, yet it is not to be taken as if such outlawries were absolutely void, but only voidable by writ of error. Cro. Eliz. 179; 3 Co. 59; Plowd. 137; Hob. 166.

If a defendant be expressly named of the same county wherein he is indicted, or appealed, and be also named under an alias dictus of another, it hath been adjudged that there is no need of any capias, with a command for proclamation according to 8 Hen. 6. c. 10. because that which comes under the alias dictus is not traversable nor material; also if a defendant be named of B. and late of D. there is no need of any capias to the sheriff of the county wherein D. lies; because it appears, the defendant is at present conversant at B.; but if a defendant be named of no certain place at present, but only late of B. and late of D. and late of E., &c. being all in different counties from that in which the prosecution is commenced, a capias shall go to the sheriff of each county. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 27. § 126; 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 195, 196; Cro. Jac. 167.

Upon the issuing of the exigent before judgment or conviction, the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 22. § 4. directs, that there shall also issue a writ of proclamation (bearing the same teste and return with the exigent) to the sheriff of the county where the defendant is mentioned to inhabit, according to the form of the 31 Eliz. c. 3. (see this statute, which relates to proceedings in civil actions, post); which writ of proclamation must be delivered to the sheriff before the return.

The 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 22. does not apply to an outlaw after conviction. Burr. 2559; 3 T. R. 501.

The return of outlawry upon the exigent must be certain as to the time and place of exacting the defendant and other necessary particulars.

In the return to the writ of proclamation, it is not necessary that the sheriff should allege, that the person procured did not render himself, though this is essential in his return to the exigent: but he must specially show how the proclamations were made, to enable the court to judge whether they were properly made or not. 4 T. R. 521; and see 3 T. R. 499, post.

The course of proceeding to outlaw a person indicted for a misdemeanor differs from the process in cases of felony. In cases of misdemeanor, the first step after the finding of the indictment is, to issue a venire facias ad respondendum. There must be fifteen days between the teste and return of this writ, on indictments before justices of peace at the sessions, or before justices of oyer and terminer. But before justices of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, it may be made returnable immediately; and the like, where the indictment is before the Court of King's Bench for an offence done in Middlesex, that being the county in which the court sits: but not, where the offence is committed out of that county. 3 Salk. 371.

On the issuing of the venire facias, the defendant is summoned, and if he do not appear, and the sheriff return that he has land in the county whereby he may be restrained, a distringas is awarded, and is repeated from time to time, whereby he forfeits, on every default, the issues returned by the sheriff. But if upon the venire, the sheriff return, that the defendant has nothing whereby he can be distrained, a capias issues, and then an alias, and then a pluries, and afterwards the exigent; upon which the defendant may be outlawed. 2 Hawk. c. 27. § 10. But if the prosecutor proceed to outlawry after judgment, then only one capias is necessary. Id. § 11.

In civil cases, the writ of exigi facias (see Exigent) is a judicial writ made out by the filicer, as clerk of the exigents.

and directed to the sheriff of the county where the action is laid, commanding him to cause the defendant to be required or exacted from county court to county court, or from hustings to hustings, if in London; that is, at five successive county courts or hustings, until he be outlawed, if he do not appear; and if he appear, to take him, &c. This writ should be tested on the quarto de post of the return of the plures capias before, or of the capias after judgment; and if there be not five county courts between the teste and the return of it, there issues an exigent de novo, grounded upon the sheriff's return to the former writ with a clause (from whence it is called an allocatus exigent, directing the sheriff to allow the several county courts at which the defendant has already been required. 1 Plowd 371. In London the hustings are holden once every fortnight; on which account the action is generally laid there, when the plaintiff intends to proceed to outlawry. See Fidd's Pract.

It hath been holden, that in London, where the holding of the hustings is uncertain, an exigent facias shall issue with an allocatus hustings; because the court cannot take notice of the set times of holding it, as they may of the times of holding the county courts; but it is now agreed, that if an exigent issues in London, and they begin "husting de placito terre," (as they may,) they shall proceed along at that hustings to the outlawry, without mingling their husting de communibus placitis; but if an allocatus husting comes, they shall proceed without omitting any husting. Palm. 287; 2 Leon. 14; 2 Hab. & Hist. P. C. 202.

In addition to the exigent, a writ of proclamation was introduced by 6 Hen. 8. c. 4. which requires it to be directed to the sheriff of the county of which the defendant is called, or described in the original; for there he was supposed to dwell; and if he did not in fact dwell there, he might have avoided the outlawry, by the statute of additions. Dyer, 211. See Gilb. C. P. 19; Theat. Brev. 88.

But the writ of proclamation is at present governed by 31 Edw. c. 8. § 1. which enacts, that, "in every action personal, wherein any writ of exigent shall be awarded out of any court, a writ of proclamation shall be awarded and made out of the same court, having day of teste and return as the said writ of exigent shall have directed, and delivered of record to the sheriff of the county where the defendant at the time of the exigent shall contain the effect of the same action; and that the sheriff of the county unto whom any such writ of proclamation shall be delivered, shall make three proclamations, one in the open county court, another at the general quarter sessions of the peace, in those parts where the defendant at the time of the exigent awarded shall be dwelling, and the third, one month at the least before the quinto exactus by virtue of the said writ of exigent, at or near the most usual door of the church or chapel of that town or parish where the defendant shall be so dwelling; and if the defendant shall be dwelling out of any parish (i. e. in any extra-parochial place), then in such place as aforesaid of the next adjoining parish in the same county, and upon a Sunday immediately after divine service, and sermon, (if there be one,) and if there be no sermon, then forthwith after divine service; and that all outlawries had and pronounced, whereupon no writs of proclamations shall be awarded and returned according to the form of this statute, shall be utterly void and of none effect."

On outlawry in felony reversed because it appeared on the writ of proclamation and the return to it that the person indicted was outlawed after a day had been given him in court, and before such day arrived. 3 T. R. 499.

IV. Upon the defendant's being put in exigent, he is either taken, by the sheriff, appears voluntarily, or makes default. If he be taken, he either remains in custody of the sheriff, or gives bail, &c. as upon a common arrest. Formerly, if the defendant had appeared voluntarily, at any time before the return of the exigent, he might have obtained a writ of supersedeas from the filacer, as clerk of the supersedeas, on entering a common appearance of the term in which the exigent issued, and he may still do so where the action does not require special bail. But upon a question, whether in a case originally requiring special bail, if the defendant stand out to an exigent, he can come in and appear to the exigent without putting in special bail; it was ruled by the Court of K. B. that there ought to be special bail. It would be very unreasonable, they said, that the defendant should gain an advantage, by standing out till process of outlawry; he certainly ought not to be in a better condition then than if he had appeared at first. And accordingly the direction given was, that the filacer should not issue a supersedeas till the defendant should put in special bail. 3 Burr. 1920.

If the defendant be neither arrested nor appear, but make default at five successive county courts or hustings, he is outlawed if a man, or if a woman, she is waived, by the judgment of the coroners, or of the recorder in London; and the judgment of outlawry being returned by the sheriff upon the exigent, the filacer, as clerk of the outlawries, will make out a writ of capias utlagatum, which is either general or special, and may be issued into any county, without a testatum; nor is there any occasion upon an outlawry after judgment, to revive the judgment by scire facias, after a year and a day.

By the general writ of capias utlagatum, the sheriff is commanded "that he do not omit by reason of any liberty of his county, but that he take the defendant, if he be found in his bailiwick, and him safely keep, so that he may have his body in court on a general return day, &c. wheresoever, &c. to do and receive what the court shall consider of him." The defendant, being taken by the sheriff on this writ, either gives bail to appear and reverse the outlawry, or remains in custody until he actually reverse it, or obtain a charter of pardon, or be relieved under an insolvent act.

At common law the defendant could not have been bailed when taken by the sheriff on a capias utlagatum. 3 Burr. 1484; 4 Burr. 2540. And this case is particularly excepted out of the 23 H. 6. c. 9; 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 2. § 4; by the latter of which statutes it is expressly declared that "no sheriff, &c. shall discharge any person or persons taken upon any writ of capias utlagatum out of custody without a lawful supersedeas first had and received for the same." But now by the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 18. § 1. 5. if any person outlawed in the Court of King's Bench, other than for treason or felony, shall be arrested upon any capias utlagatum out of the said court, the sheriff making the arrest may, in all cases where special bail is not required by the said court, take an attorney's engagement under his hand to appear for the defendant, and reverse the outlawry, and discharge the defendant from such arrest; and in those cases where special bail is required by the said court, the said sheriff shall take security of the defendant by bond, with one or more sufficient surety or sureties in the penalty of double the sum for which special bail is required, and no more, for his appearance by attorney in court, at the return of the writ, and to perform such things as shall be required by the said court; and after such bond taken may discharge the defendant from the said arrest. Or if the defendant shall not be able to give security as aforesaid, before the return of the writ, he shall be discharged, whenever he shall find sufficient security to the sheriff for his appearance by attorney in the said court, at some return in the ensuing term, to reverse the outlawry, and to do such other things as shall be required by the said court.

This statute has been construed not to extend to criminal cases, at least not to misdemeanors after conviction. 4 Burr. 2539. And even in civil cases the defendant cannot be bailed where he was not bailable upon the process to outlawry. Id. 2540. For it was the design of the statute to put him in the same condition as if he had not been outlawed; and therefore he is not bailable when taken upon an outlawry after judgment; neither upon this statute will the court restore goods taken upon a special capias utlagatum, but they will of course be restored upon the reversal of the outlawry. Carth. 459; 1 Ld. Raym. 349.

When there is no affidavit of a bailable cause of action, the sheriff is authorized by the statute to discharge the defendant on an attorney's undertaking to appear and reverse the outlawry; but when an affidavit has been made, he ought not to be discharged without giving the security required by the statute; which is not a common bail bond, but a bond with one or more sufficient surety or sureties for appearance by attorney at the return of the writ, and to do and perform such things as shall be required by the court, that is, to put in bail to a new action, plead within a limited time, put the plaintiff in the same condition, and such like matters. 3 Burr. 1483; 4 Burr. 2540. And it is not necessary that the affidavit should be made before the outlawry; 2 Sira. 1178, 9; 1 Wils. 8; Fort. 89; or the sum sworn to be indorsed on the capias utlagatum. 2 Burr. 1482. But it is sufficient if there be an affidavit before the defendant is discharged; the court having determined that process of outlawry is not within the statute for preventing frivolous and vexatious arrests. See 3 Burr. 1483. And see as to Bail, post, V.

By the special writ of capias utlagatum, the sheriff is commanded not only to take the defendant, as by the general writ, but also "to inquire by the oath of honest and lawful men of his county, what goods and chattels, lands and tenements, he hath or had on the day of his outlawry, or at any time afterwards; and by their oath to extend and appraise the same according to the true value, and to take them into the king's hands, and safely keep them, so that he may answer to the king for the true value and issues of the same, making known what he shall do thereupon to the court, on the return day." Off. Brev. 35; Thess. Brev. 59. Upon this writ the sheriff is to empanel a jury, who are to make inquiry of the goods and chattels of the defendant, including his debts. Co. 95; Lane, 23; Eutw. 329, 1519; Gilb. C. P. 200. And also of his leasehold and freehold lands and tenements; to appraise the goods, and to extend or value the lands, &c. but they are not to inquire of his copyholds; Parker, 190; or trust property. Cro. Jac. 518; Sty. 41. But see the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 8. § 10.

Witnesses may be subpoenaed to attend the execution of the inquiry, and when made, the sheriff is to take possession of the goods and chattels of the defendant, and of the leasehold tenements in his own occupation. 9 Hen. 6. c. 20, 21. But he must not oust or disturb the possession of his tenants. Id. 21 H. 7. 7. And can only take the issues or profits of his freehold tenements. Id. Plowd. 541; Hardr. 106, 176; Bunb. 103, 105. The inquisition should set forth, with convenient certainty, the appraised value of the goods; the particulars of the debts; of what lands, &c. the defendant is seised or possessed; the different parcels; in whose tenure; and of what annual value beyond reprises. But the inquisition being merely an office of instruction or information, does not require so much certainty as an office of entitling. 2 Salk. 469; Bunb. 103. And if the lands, &c. be undervalued, there may be a melius inquirendum. Hard. 106. See that title, and Forfeiture.

When the special writ of capias utlagatum is returned, it should be delivered, with the inquisition annexed, to the filacor, as clerk of the exigents and outlawries, and afterwards filed in the office of the custos breviarum, 3 T. R. 578, 9; from whence a transcript is sent into the Exchequer. Gilb. C. P. 16. Out of this court there issues a venditioni exponas to sell the goods, a seire facias to recover the debts, and a levari facias to levy the issues and profits; under which latter writ the sheriff may not only take the rent and moveables of the party outlawed, but also the cattle of a stranger levant and couchant on the lands extended. 1 Ld. Raym. 305, and the cases there cited in the last edition. In aid of these writs a bill may be exhibited in the Exchequer against the outlaw to compel a discovery of his real and personal estate, &c. either by the plaintiff to enable him to take out execution, or by the attorney-general on behalf of the crown. Hardr. 22. And it is said to be the course of that court, upon an outlawry, to prefer an information in the nature of an action of trover and conversion against him who hath the goods of the party outlawed. 1 Mod. 90.

The money raised by the sheriff under these writs belongs to the crown, but the plaintiff may have it paid to him in satisfaction of his debt and costs by applying to the Court of Exchequer, or lords of the treasury; and he may also obtain a lease or grant of the custody of the lands, &c. under the Exchequer seal; Hardr. 106, 422; T. Raym. 17; 1 Lev. 38; or a grant of the king's right to levy the profits. 9 H. 6. 20; 2 Roll. Abr. 808; Gilb. C. P. 17; 4 Inst. c. 11; and see title Custodiam.

If the money raised by the sheriff do not exceed the sum of fifty pounds, the Court of Exchequer, on motion, will order it to be paid to the plaintiff; but if it exceed that sum, the plaintiff must petition for it to the lords of the treasury, stating the amount of his debt, a short abstract of the proceedings, with the expenses he has been put to, and praying in respect thereof, that the attorney-general may be authorized to consent, on behalf of the crown, that the money remaining in the sheriff's hands may be paid over to the petitioner. The petition is referred by the lords of the treasury to their solicitor, who should be furnished with an affidavit, sworn before a baron, of the amount of the debt and costs, and a certificate of the proceedings from the clerk in court, whereupon he will make his report, which should be filed with the clerk of the treasury. A warrant is then issued under the king's sign manual for the attorney-general to give his consent to an order pursuant to the prayer of the petition; upon which a motion is made in the Court of Exchequer, and the attorney-general consenting, an order is framed accordingly; this order must be engrossed, and put under seal, with a subpoena annexed to perform it: and the sheriff being served therewith, must pay over the money, or will be liable to an attachment. 2 Crompt. 47. See Tidd's Pract. c. 4. and the authorities there cited.

V. THERE are two ways of reversing an outlawry; first, by writ of error returnable coram nobis. Co. Litt. 296 b; Fort. 88. 2dly. By motion founded on a plea, averment, or suggestion of some matter apparent; as in respect of a superseas, omission of process, variance, or other matter apparent on the record; and yet in these cases some have held that in another term the defendant is driven to his writ of error. But for any matter of fact, as death, imprisonment beyond sea at the time of the exigent awarded (Carth. 25; 1 Ld. Raym. 349; 2 Sira. 1178; 1 Wils. 8), service of the king, &c. he is driven to his writ of error, unless it be in the case of felony, and there in favorem vite he may plead to it. It seems, however, to be discretionary in the court to relieve by motion, or put the parties to a writ of error; and of late years they have gone farther than heretofore upon motion, the more effectually to expedite justice, save expense, and preserve the credit and character of the defendant. Tidd's Pract. c. 4.

By 5 & 6 Ed. 6. c. 11. § 7. all process of outlawry against offenders in treason being resant or inhabitant out of the limits of the realm, or in any parts beyond the sea at the time of the outlawry pronounced against him, shall be good and effectual in law to all intents and purposes as if such offenders had been within the realm at the time of such process awarded and outlawry pronounced. But by § 8. if the party outlawed shall within one year next after outlawry pronounced or judgment given thereon, yield himself to the chief justice of England, and offer to traverse the indictment, or appeal whenever the said outlawry shall have been pronounced, he shall be received to such traverse, and being thereupon found not guilty by the verdict of twelve men, he shall be clearly acquitted and discharged of the said outlawry, and of all penalties and forfeitures by reason of the same, as fully as though no such outlawry had taken place.

A prisoner outlawed, and afterwards in custody thereon, shall be admitted to surrender and traverse at any time within the year. See the case of Sir Thomas Armstrong, where such traverse was denied, and he was executed, and the words thereon. Phillipp's State Trials reviewed, ii. 153, 161. But Armstrong's case was declared an unfit precedent to be followed, and his execution was, in 1689, resolved by the commons to be illegal, and a murder by pretence of justice. Sir Robert Sawyer, the attorney-general who prosecuted him, was expelled the house of commons. The survivors of the judges who decided against him, and the executors of Jefferies, who was dead, were summoned to the bar of the house, and it was resolved that 5000*l.* should be paid by the judges and prosecutors to Armstrong's lady and children for their losses by the attainder. The bill for reversing the attainder, however, did not pass, and it was only reversed on error. 6 W. & M. 4 Mod. 366; Sta. Tri. vol. x. 117, notes (oct. ed.); and see La. v. Shr. Treason, E. (edited by Gullim and Dodd.)

Reversing, in all outlawries, as well personal as criminal, the party, in order to reverse the same, was to appear in person, and could not appear by attorney. 2 Leon. 22; Cro. Jac. 462; 2 Salk. 496.

But by 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 18. already referred to, no person outlawed in the Court of B. R. for any cause whatsoever, (treason and felony only excepted,) shall be compelled to appear in person in the said court to reverse such outlawry; but may appear by attorney and reverse the same without bail in all cases, except where special bail shall be ordered by the said court.

By Westm. 1. (3 E. 1.) c. 3. it is expressly provided, that those who are outlawed, have abjured the realm, &c. shall be excluded the benefit of replevin, yet it has been always held that the Court of King's Bench may in their discretion, in special cases, bail a person upon an outlawry of felony: as where he pleads that he is not of the same name, and therefore not the same person with him that was outlawed, or alleges any other error in the proceedings. 2 Hunk. P. C. c. 25. § 40.

By the 1 Eliz. c. 3. § 3. before allowance of any writ of error, or reversing of any outlawry by plea or otherwise, the want of any proclamation made according to the statute, the defendants in the original action shall put in bail, not only to appear and answer to the plaintiff in the former suit, but also to answer to the plaintiff in the new action to be commenced by the said plaintiff for the cause mentioned in the first action, but also to satisfy the condemnation, if the plaintiff shall begin his suit before the end of the term next after the allowing the writ of error, or otherwise avoiding of the said outlawry.

On reversing the outlawry for any other error in law, besides the want of proclamations, it was long unsettled whether the defendant should be obliged to put in special bail. In the earliest cases upon the subject, it was determined that he should. Litt. Rep. 301; Carth. 459; 1 Ld. Raym. 349; Gith. v. P. 19. But there are cases to the contrary in the 12 Mod. 545; 1 Ld. Raym. 605; 2 Salk. 496. And in one of them (2 Salk. 496) it is said that if the party outlawed come in gratis, upon the return of the writ, &c. he may be admitted, by motion, to reverse the outlawry for any other cause but want of proclamations, without putting in bail; but if he come in by cepi corpus, he shall not be admitted to reverse it without appearing in person, as he was obliged to do at common law; or putting in bail with the sheriff for his appearance upon the return of cepi corpus, and for doing what the court shall order. In two subsequent cases, however, special bail was put in upon reversing the outlawry for errors in law, though it does not appear the party came in gratis. Wall v. Walton, E. 12 Geo. 1, cited 1 Wils. 4; 2 Str. 951; 2 Barn. K. B. 298. At length, in the case of Serecold v. Hampson, the court, upon considering the words of 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 18. § 3. which empowers the outlaw to appear by attorney, and says, "the outlawry shall be reversed without bail in all cases, except where special bail shall be ordered by the court," declared they were of opinion they had a discretionary power to require it or not; and that the want of an affidavit before the outlawry was no objection, because that is only requisite to warrant an arrest; and though the 31 Eliz. c. 3. § 3. be the only act that expressly requires bail, it is not to be inferred from thence that in other cases it ought not to be insisted on; for that act makes a new error, and the bail upon it is absolutely to pay the condemnation money. 2 Str. 1178, 9; 1 Wils. 3. And it is now settled, that on reversing an outlawry for any other error in law besides the want of proclamations, the bail is common or special, in like manner as upon the arrest. Where special bail is required, it need not be put in before the allowance of the writ of error, but it is well enough if put in at any time before the reversal. 1 Ld. Raym. 605; 2 Str. 951; 2 Barn. K. B. 928. The recognizance, in such case, is usually taken in the common form; but see 12 Mod. 545, per Holt, and 2 Salk. 496. And it is settled that the bail may render the defendant, and are not, at all events, answerable for the debt. Tidd's Pract. and the authorities there cited.

In general, an outlawry can only be reversed upon payment of costs; but if the process have been abused, and made subservient to purposes of oppression, as where a man has been outlawed, who was already in prison at the plaintiff's suit, or being at large did not abscond but appeared publicly, and might have been arrested or served with process, the court on motion will order the plaintiff to reverse the outlawry at his own expense. 2 Vent. 46; 2 Salk. 495; Barnes, 921; T. Jon. 221; Comb. 11; 12 Mod. 413.

Upon a writ of error prosecuted by the party in person, to reverse an outlawry in a civil action for a common-law error, the recognizance of bail is to be taken in the common alternative form, to pay the condemnation money, or to render the principal; and not absolutely to pay the condemnation money, as in case of reversal of outlawry upon 31 Eliz. c. 3. for want of proclamations; or upon 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 18. § 3. on appearance by attorney and by motion. Havelock v. Geddes, 12 East, 622.

A bankrupt, who has been waved (or outlawed) and her person arrested, and goods taken by the sheriff under a writ of capias utlagatum, is not entitled to be relieved on summary motion from such arrest and levy, except upon the terms of appearing to the action, and putting in and perfecting special bail, although the plaintiff had also proved her debt under the commission, and received a dividend, after which the action was commenced for the balance. 14 East, 530.

The court upon motion reversed the outlawry in a civil suit upon the defendant's putting in bail in the alternative to satisfy the condemnation money, or to render the principal, paying all costs, including those, if any, in the Court of Exchequer, without requiring the recognizance of bail to be for the payment of the condemnation money absolutely. 1 M. & S. 409.

The court of C. P. reversed an outlawry in a civil suit on motion, upon error in fact sworn to. 3 Taunt. 141.

It is clearly agreed, that an attainder of felony of a person who had any lands shall never be reversed by writ of error, without a scire facias against all the tenants and lords mediate and immediate; but it is settled, that such scire facias is not necessary in the case of high treason. Dyer, 31. pl. 20; Cro. Eliz. 235; 1 Keb. 141; 1 Sid. 316; 3 Keb. 39; 3 Mod. 42, 47; 4 Mod. 366; Ld. Raym. 154.

Also it is said, that it is not necessary in the case of felony, when it is suggested on the roll that the party had no lands, and the attorney-general confesses it. 2 Salk. 495.

It is agreed, that after an outlawry of treason or felony is reversed, the party shall be put to plead to the indictment, for that still remains good, and he may be tried at the King's Bench bar; or the record may be remitted into the country, if it were removed into the King's Bench by certiorari, with a command to the justices below to proceed by the 6 Hen. 6. c. 1; Cro. Jac. 648; Cro. Car. 365; 3 Mod. 42; 6 Mod. 115; 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 209.

So if a man be outlawed by process in an information, and comes in and reverses the outlawry, he must plead instantly to the information. 1 Salk. 371; 5 Mod. 141.

The law is the same in civil cases, and therefore, if an outlawry in a personal action be reversed, the original remains. March. 9; 3 Lev. 245.

Generally speaking, when the outlawry is reversed, or the defendant has obtained a charter of pardon, he may be discharged, if in custody, by writ of supersedeas. See 13 Car. st. 2. c. 2. § 4. And his property, if taken into the king's hands, shall be restored to him by writ of amoveas manus, or otherwise, according to the course of the exchequer. As to chattels real, see Cro. Eliz. 278; 2 Vern. 312; Bunt. 105. And as to chattels personal, see 5 Mod. 61, post.

Where he has obtained a charter of pardon, he must sue out a scire facias to give notice thereof to the plaintiff, in order that he may further prosecute his action, if he think proper. See Tidd's Prac. c. 4.

It hath been adjudged, that if the king grant over the lands of a person outlawed for treason or felony, and afterwards the outlawry be reversed, the party may enter on the patentee, and need neither sue a petition to the king, nor a scire facias against the patentee. 1 And. 188. A person shall, after outlawry reversed, be restored to his law, and be of ability to sue. Co. Litt. 288 b.

If the goods of a person outlawed are sold by the sheriff upon a capias utlagatum, and after the outlawry is reversed by writ of error, he shall be restored to the goods themselves; because the sheriff was not compellable to sell these goods, but only to keep them to the use of the king. 5 Co. 90; 1 Roll. Abr. 778.

If an advowson come to the king, by forfeiture upon an outlawry, and the church becoming void, the king presents, and then the outlawry is reversed; yet the king shall enjoy that presentment, because the presentment there came to the king as the profit of the advowson. Moor, 269.

But if the church be void at the time of the outlawry, and the presentation is thereby forfeited as a chattel principally and distinct of itself, there, upon reversal of the outlawry, the party shall be restored to the presentation. Cro. Eliz. 170.

If a termor being outlawed for felony, grants over his term, after the outlawry is reversed, the grantee may have trespass for the profits taken between the reversal of the outlawry and the assignment; for by the reversal it is as if no outlawry had been, and there is no record of it. Cro. Eliz. 170; 13 Co. 20, 22.

It is said, that if a man be outlawed in the King's Bench, and the party's goods are seized into the king's hands, and then the outlawry is reversed, there can be no restitution; the reason whereof is, for that the Court of King's Bench cannot send a writ to the treasurer; and the Court of Exchequer have no record before them to issue out a warrant for restitution. 5 Mod. 61. See 2 Vern. 2, 3; 2 Lev. 49.

OUTPARTERS, mentioned in 9 H. 5. st. 1. c. 7. A kind of thieves in Riddesdale, that stole cattle, or other things without that liberty. Some are of opinion, that those which in the fore-named statute are termed outparters, are now called outputers, being such as set matches for the robbing any man or house. Cowell. See Intakers.

OUTRIDERS. Bailiffs errant, employed by the sheriffs, or their deputies, to ride to the farthest place of their counties or hundreds, with the more speed to summon such as they thought good to their county or hundred courts. See 14 E. 3. st. 1. c. 9.

OUTSUCKEN MULTURES. Quantities of corn paid by persons voluntarily grinding corn at any mill, to which they are not thirled or bound by tenure. See Thirlage, Multurers.

OWEL. An old French word for equal. Law Fr. Dict. OWELTY, equality. Co. Litt. 169. When there is lord, mesne, and tenant, and the tenant holds of the mesne by the same service that the mesne hold over of the lord above him, this is called owelty of services. F. N. B. 136.

OWLERS. Persons that carried wool, &c. to the seaside by night, in order to be shipped off contrary to law. See Wool.

OWLING. Was the offence of exporting, &c. wool by night. See Wool.

OXEN. See Cattle.

OXFILD. A restitution anciently made by a hundred or county, for any wrong done by one that was within the same. Lamb. Archaion, 125.

OXGANG, from Ox. i. e. bos, and gang, or gate, iter.] Is commonly taken for fifteen acres of land, or as much as one ox can plough in a year. Skene says 18 acres. See Spelman.

Six oxgangs of land is so much as six oxen can plough. Crompt. Jurisd. 220. But an oxgang seemeth properly to be spoken of such land as lieth in gaynour. Old Nat. Br. fol. 117. See Co. Litt. 69. Cowell.

OYER. This word was anciently used for what we now call assizes. Anno 13 Ed. 1. See Assizes, Oyer & Terminer.

OYER, Fr.; Audire, Lat. To hear.] Previous and preparatory to pleading in bar, the defendant may crave ver of the writ, or bond, or other specialty upon which the action is brought, that is, to hear it read to him; the generality of defendants in the times of ancient simplicity being supposed incapable to read it themselves; where upon the whole is entered verbatim upon the record, and the defendant may take advantage of any condition or other part of it, not stated in the plaintiff's declaration. 3 Comm. c. 21. p. 299.

1. By whom, and how to be made, and of what demandable. Oyer of deeds, &c. is demandable by the plaintiff, or by the defendant. If the plaintiff in his declaration necessarily makes a profert in curid of any deed, writing, letters of administration, or the like, the defendant may pray oyer, and must have a copy thereof delivered to him, if demanded. 2 Salk. 497; R. T. 5 & 6 Geo. 2.

To demand oyer of an obligation, is not only to desire the plaintiff's attorney to read the same; but to have a copy thereof, that the defendant may consider what to plead to the action. Hob. 217.

So likewise if the defendant in his plea make a necessary profert in curid of any deed, &c. the plaintiff may pray oyer, and shall have a copy. Id. 6 Mod. 122. And the party of whom oyer is demanded, is bound to carry it to the adverse party. 2 T. R. 40.

Although oyer can be only demanded where profert is made, yet if it be unnecessarily made, this does not entitle to oyer. On the other hand, if profert be omitted when it ought to have been made, the opposite party cannot have oyer, but must demur. 1 Saund. 9 a. n. (d.)

But though oyer be not in strictness demandable, yet, if it be given, the party demanding has a right to make use of it. Dougl. 476, 477. If the defendant would insist upon the demand of oyer, he should move the court to have it entered upon record. 6 Mod. 28. If the plaintiff, on the other land, would contest the oyer, he may either counterplead it or strike out the rest of the pleading, and demur. 2 Lev. 142; 2 Salk. 497; and see 2 Ld. Raym. 970. Upon which the judgment of the court is, either that the defendant have oyer, or that he answer without it. 2 Lev. 142. On the latter judgment, the defendant may bring a writ of error, for to deny oyer where it ought to be granted is error, but not conversus. 2 Salk. 497; 6 Mod. 28; 2 Ld. Raym. 970; 2 Stra. 1186; 1 Wils. 16.

Though oyer is not, in strictness, demandable of a record, (1 Ld. Raym. 347, 4th edit. note (a); Dougl. 476, 477; 1 T. R. 11; 150), yet if a judgment or other matter of record in the same court be pleaded, the parties pleading it must give a note in writing of the term and number-roll whereon such judgment or matter of record is entered and filed; or in default thereof the plea is not to be received. Keitw. 96; Carth. 454; 1 Ld. Raym. 347; Carth. 517; 1 Ld. Raym. 347; 2 Stra. 823; R. T. 5 & 6 Geo. 2 (b). And probably on this account the party was not anciently permitted to plead nul tiel record, of a judgment or matter of record in the same court. 5 Hen. 7, 24, per Brian; 3 Keb. 76. But where a judgment or matter of record is pleaded in a different court, the party not being entitled to an account of the term and number-roll, must plead nul tiel record. And it seems that oyer is not demandable of an act of parliament. Dougl. 476; Godb. 186, contra.

Formerly the defendant was allowed oyer of the original writ, in order to demur or plead in abatement, for any apparent insufficiency or variance. Gilb. C. P. 52; 12 Mod. 25, 189; 2 Lutw. 1644; 6 Mod. 27; 2 Salk. 498; 2 Ld. Raym. 971; R. T. 5 & 6 Geo. 2 (b); 2 Wils. 97; Co. Ent. 20. But this indulgence having been abused and made an instrument of delay, the Courts of B. R. and C. P. established a rule that oyer should not be granted of the original writ, which had the effect of abolishing pleas in abatement founded on facts that could only be ascertained by examination of the writ itself. And it was afterwards held, that if the defendant demanded oyer of the original writ, the plaintiff might proceed as if no such demand had been made. Dougl. 227, 228; Barnes, 540; and see Bro. Abr. tit. Oyer, pl. 19.

Where the plaintiff is entitled to have oyer of a deed, it cannot be dispensed with by the court, nor can the defendant be compelled to plead without it, even though the deed be lost. 2 Lill. P. R. title Oyer, 266; 2 Keb. 274; 6 Mod. 28; 2 Str. 1186; 1 Wils. 16. But where the deed is in the hands of a third person, the court will oblige him to give oyer, and produce it. 2 Str. 1188.

A party having a right to demand oyer, is not obliged in all cases to exercise that right, neither is he compelled in all cases, after demanding it, to notice it in the pleading, that he afterwards files and delivers. Sometimes, however, he is obliged to do both, viz. where he has occasion to found his answer upon any matter contained in the deed, of which proof it is in fact, and not set forth by his adversary. In these cases the only admissible method of making such matter appear to the court is to demand oyer, and from the copy given set forth the whole deed in the pleading. Stephen on Pleading, 70, 3rd edit.

The plaintiff may either set forth the oyer in his plea or not, at his election. 2 Str. 1241; 1 Wils. 97. If he set it forth, the court must adjudge upon it as parcel of the record, though it was not strictly demandable at the time of granting it. 3 Salk. 119; Carth. 513; 6 Mod. 27; Dougl. 150. But the defendant is not bound to set it forth in his plea. 2 Str. 1241; 1 Wils. 97; Barnes, 127, contra; and if he do not, the plaintiff may pray an inrolment, and so make it part of his replication.

But if the defendant, after craving oyer of a deed, set forth only a part, and not the whole of it, the plaintiff may judgment as for want of a plea. 4 T. R. 370.

By the rules of Hilary Term, 2 Wm. 4, if a defendant, after craving oyer of a deed, omit to insert at the head of his plea, the plaintiff, on making up the issue or demurrer-book, may, if he think fit, insert it for him: but the costs of such insertion shall be in the discretion of the taxing officer.

Where there may be oyer, the party demanding it is not bound to plead without it, but defendant may plead without it if he will, on taking upon him to remember the bond or deed; though if he plead without oyer, he cannot after waive his plea, and demand oyer. Mod. Cas. 28; 3 Salk. 119. After a plea in abatement, oyer may not be had the same term to plead another dilatory plea. Mod. Cas. 27.

When on oyer of a deed it is entered, the whole case appears to the court as if the deed were in the plea, and the deed is become parcel of the record, though oyer of a deed can only be demanded during the time it is produced in court; and then it may be entered in hæc verba, and there may be a demurrer or issue upon it, &c. 5 Rep. 76; Lutw. 1644; 3 Salk. 119.

A defendant ought to crave oyer of the plaintiff's deed, on which he hath declared; and cannot set forth another to plead performance thereof. Mod. Cas. 154.

So where a deed is pleaded, the other party cannot allege that there is other matter contained in the deed, but must set it forth on oyer. Str. 227.

If there is misnomer in a bond, &c. the defendant is to plead the misnomer, and that he made no such deed without craving oyer; for if he doth, he admits his name to be right. 1 Salk. 7.

When oyer is demanded, and the deed set forth, the effect is as if it had been set forth in the first instance by the opposite party, and the tenor of the deed, as it appears upon oyer, is consequently considered as forming part of the preceding pleading. Therefore if the deed, when so set forth in the plea, be found to contain in itself matter of objection in answer to the plaintiff's case as stated in the declaration, the defendant's course is to demur; as for matter apparent on the face of the declaration; Dougl. 475; 4 B. & C. 741; and it would be improper to make the objection the subject of plea. Steph. on Pl. 72, 3rd ed.

Formerly, all demands of oyer were made in court, (as it is now in case of criminal appeals, where the deed is by indictment of law, when it is pleaded with a profert in curia. 12 Mod. 598; 3 Salk. 119. And therefore when oyer is craved, it is to be supposed to be of the court, and not of the party; and the words ei legitur in hæc verba, &c. are the act of the court. Id.; 1 Sid. 108. But see 2 Lutw. 1644, contra. In practice, however, oyer is now usually demanded, and granted by the attornies. 6 Mod. 28.

2. When it must be demanded and granted.—When a deed is shown in court, it remains there in contemplation of law, all the term in which it is shown; for all the term is considered in law but as one day; and at the end of the term, if the deed be not denied, the law doth adjudge it to be in the custody of the party to whom it belongs; but if it be denied, then it shall remain in court till the plea is determined, and if it eventually turn out not to be the plaintiff's deed, it shall be destroyed. Co. Litt. 231, b; 5 Co. 74, b; 2 Lutw. 1644. But letters testamentary, or of administration, are not supposed to remain in court all the term, for the plaintiff may have occasion to produce them elsewhere. 2 Salk. 497; 12 Mod. 598. Hence it is, that oyer of a deed cannot, in strictness, be demanded but during the same term it is pleaded. 5 Co. 74, b; 2 Lutw. 1644; 1 T. R. 149. And as a general imparlance is always to a subsequent term (but see now Imparlance), it follows that oyer of a deed cannot be demanded after such imparlance. 1 Keb. 32; 2 Lev. 142; Freem. 400; 3 Keb. 480, 491; 6 Mod. 28.

The demand of oyer is a kind of plea, and should regularly be made before the time of pleading is expired. If it be not made till after that time, the plaintiff may consider the demand as a nullity, and sign judgment. Tidd's Prac.

There is no settled time prescribed for the plaintiff to give oyer, though if not given when demanded, the defendant shall have the same time to plead after oyer given, as he had at the time of demanding it. 1 Str. 705; R. T. 5 & 6 Geo. 2 (b).

The time allowed for the defendant to give oyer of a deed, &c. to the plaintiff, is two days exclusive after it is demanded. Carth. 454; 2 T. R. 40. And if it be not given in that time, the plaintiff may sign judgment as for want of a plea. 6 Mod. 122. If given, the plaintiff shall have the same time to reply after oyer given him by the defendant, as he had at the time of demanding it. R. T. 5 & 6 Geo. 2 (b).

OYER DE RECORD, audire recordum.] A petition made in court that the judges, for better proof sake, will hear or look upon any record. See the preceding title Oyer.

OYER AND TERMINER, Fr. oïr et terminer; Latin, audiendo et terminando.] A commission directed to the judges and other gentlemen of the county to which it is issued, by virtue whereof they have power to hear and determine treasons, and all manner of felonies and trespasses. Crompt. Juris. 121; 2 Inst. 419; 4 Inst. 152. In our statutes the term is often printed oyer and determiner. 4 Inst. 162. See Justices of Oyer, &c. and the references there.

The usual commission of oyer and terminer to the judges of assize is general; but when any sudden insurrection takes place, or any public outrage is committed, which requires speedy reformation, then a special commission is immediately granted. F. N. B. 110; and see stat. West. 2. 13 Edw. 1. c. 29.

A man may have a special commission of oyer and terminer (but this has long been obsolete) to inquire of extortions and oppressions of under-sheriffs, bailiffs, clerks of the markets, and all other officers, &c., on the complaint and suit of any one who will sue it out; and the king may make a writ of association unto the justices of oyer and terminer, to admit those into their company whom he hath associated unto them; also another writ may be sent to the judges to proceed, although all the justices do not come at the day of the sessions; and this writ is called the writ of si non omnes, &c. New Nat. Brev. See Reg. Orig. 126; F. N. B. 112.

As to these commissions it is said, that if a commission of oyer and terminer, &c. be awarded to certain persons to inquire at such a place, they can neither open their commission at another, nor adjourn it thither, or give judgment there;

if they do, all their proceedings are as coram non judge. But it is held, that justices appointed pro hac vice may adjourn their commission from one day to another, though there be no words in their commission to such purpose; for a general commission authorizing persons to do a thing, implicitly allows them convenient time for the doing it. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 5. § 14.

Upon the general commission of oyer and terminer, there should issue a precept to the sheriff in the name of the commissioners, bearing date fifteen days before their sessions, that he return twenty-four persons for a grand jury ad inquirendum, &c. on such a day, and the sheriff is to return his panel annexed to the precept.

As the same justices at the same time may execute the commission of oyer and terminer, and also that of gaol delivery, they may proceed, by virtue of the one, in those cases where they have no jurisdiction by the other, and make up their records accordingly. 2 Hale, P. C. 20; and see 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 5.

On indictments found before the justices of oyer and terminer, they may proceed the same day against the parties indicted. See further, Assize, Circuits, Justices, &c.

O YES. A corruption of the French oyez, i. e. audite, hear ye. The term used by a public crier to enjoin silence.

OYSTER-FISHERY (in the river Medway), is regulated by 2 Geo. 2. c. 19; and a court is kept for that purpose at Rochester yearly, where, by a jury of free dredgemen of the oyster-fishery, the same is to be inquired into; and they may make rules and orders when oysters shall be taken, what quantities in a day, and to preserve the brood of oysters &c.; and may impose penalties not exceeding 5*l.*; also water-bailiffs shall be appointed to examine boats, &c.

By the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 36, stealing oysters or oyster-brood from any oyster-bed, laying, or fishery, being the property of any other person, and sufficiently marked out or known, is declared to be a larceny; and persons unlawfully and wilfully using any dredge, net, instrument, or engine for taking oysters or oyster-brood, although none be actually taken, or with any net, instrument, or engine dragging on the ground of such fishery, are guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be fined not exceeding 20*l.* and imprisoned not exceeding three calendar months.

OZE or OZY GROUND, solum uliginosum.] Moist, wet and marshy land. Lit. Dict.

P.

PAC

PACARE To pay; as tolutum pacare, is to pay toll. Mon. Angl. tom. 1. p. 384. Hence pacatio, payment. Mat. Paris, sub ann. 1258.

PACE, passus.] A step in going, containing two feet and a half, the distance from the heel of the hinder foot to the toe of the fore-foot; and there is a pace of five feet, which contains two steps, a thousand whereof make a mile; but this is called passus major.

PACEATUR. Et recipiet Agenfrida corium ejus, et car-nem, et paceatur de cetero; i. e. Let him be free, or discharged, for the time to come. Ll. Ine, c. 45.

PACIFICATION, pacificatio.] A peace-making, quiet-ing, or appeasing; relating to the wars between England and Scotland, anno 1638, mentioned in the statute 17 Car. 1. c. 17.

PACK OF WOOL. A horse-load, which consists of seventeen stone and two pounds, or 240 pounds weight. Merch. D. c. 1. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 12.

PACKAGE AND SCAVAGE. Package, scavage, bail-lage, and portorage, were duties charged in the port of Lon-don on the goods imported and exported by aliens or by denizens, being the sons of aliens.

In former times higher duties were imposed upon the goods imported or exported by aliens, whether in British or foreign ships, than were laid on similar goods when imported or ex-ported by natives. But when sounder and more enlarged principles began to prevail, this illiberal distinction was gra-dually modified, and was at length wholly abolished, in so far at least as it was of a public character, by the 24 Geo. 3. c. 10. This act, after reciting that "the several duties and restrictions imposed by various acts of parliament upon mer-chantize, are, by the alterations of the trade now carried on between this kingdom and foreign states, in some cases be-come an unnecessary burden upon commerce, without pro-viding any real advantage to the public revenue, and that it is expedient they should no longer continue," enacted that the duty commonly called "the petty customs," imposed by the 12 Car. 2. and all other additional duties imposed by any act upon the goods of aliens above those payable by natural-born subjects, should be no longer payable. The act provided that nothing contained in it should "alter the duties due and payable upon goods imported into or exported from this kingdom in any foreign ship, nor the duties of package and scavage, or any duties granted by charter to the city of London."

The duties of package, scavage, baillage, and portorage, preserved to the city of London by the above statute, con-tinued to exist down to a recent period, when they were pur-chased of the corporation, under the authority of an act passed for that purpose, (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 66.) by the commission-ers of the treasury, for about the sum of 140,000*l.* and wholly abolished. See Scavage.

PACKERS. Persons appointed and sworn duly to pack herring. See Herrings.

PAL

PACKETS. Packet vessels, prohibited from exporting or importing goods. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 11. § 22.

PACKING WHITES. A kind of cloth so called, men-tioned in 1 Rich. 3. c. 8.

PACT, Fr.] A contract or agreement. Law French Dictionary.

PAGUS. A county: Alfred Rex Anglo-Saxorum natus est in Villa Regia quae dicitur Wantage in illa pagi, quae nomi-natur Berksh. &c.

PAIN, or PEINE, FORT ET DURE, Fr.—Lat. poena fortis et dura.] A special punishment formerly inflicted on those who, being arraigned of felony, refused to put them-selves on the ordinary trial, but stubbornly stood mute: vulgarly called pressing to death. See Mute.

PAINS AND PENALTIES. Acts of parliament to attain particular persons of treason or felony, or to inflict pains and penalties, beyond or contrary to the common law, to serve a special purpose, are to all intents and purposes new laws, made pro re nata, and by no means an execution of such as are already in being. 4 Comm. c. 19. § 1. See Attainder.

PAIS. A county or region, pagus; g, in i vel y converso. Spelm.] Trial per pais, by the country, i. e. a jury.

PAISSO. Passage, or liberty for hogs to run in forests or woods to feed on mast. Mon. Angl. i. 682. See Passure.

PALACES. The limits of the palace of Westminster. 28 Hen. 8. c. 12. See Marshal, Murder, Striking.

PALAGIUM. A duty to lords of manors for exporting and importing vessels of wine in any of their ports.

PALATINE. County. See County.

PALE. Breaking or throwing down a pale, post, or rail of wood used as a fence, is by 7 & 8 Geo. 1. c. 2. § 40. punishable summarily by justices of the peace. See Fence.

PALFREY, palfredus, palafredus, palefredus, palfredus.] One of the better sorts of horses used by noblemen or others for state; and sometimes of old taken for a horse fit for a woman to ride. Camden says that William Fauconberg held the manor of Cukeny, in the county of Nottingham, in ser-jeanty, by the service of shoeing the king's palfrey when the king should come to Mansfield. See 1 Inst. 149.

PALINGMAN. A seller of eels. 22 Edw. 4. c. 2; Rot. Parl. 22 Edw. 2.

PALLA. A canopy; also often used for an altar-cloth. Matt. Paris, sub ann. 1236.

PALLIO COOPERIRE. It was anciently a custom where children were born out of wedlock, and their parents afterwards intermarried, that those children, together with the father and mother, stood under a cloth extended while the marriage was solemnizing, which was in the nature of adoption; and by such custom the children were taken to be legitimate. Epist. Rob. Grosthead, Episc. Lincoln.

Such children, however, were never legitimate in this country at common law, though the clergy wanted to have a law pass to render them legitimate. See Bastard.

PALL, PALLIUM. The pontifical vesture made of lambs' wool, in breadth not exceeding three fingers, cut round that it may cover the shoulders: it has two labels or strings on each side, before and behind, and likewise four purple crosses on the right and left, fastened with pins of gold, whose heads are sapphire: these vestments the pope gives or sends to archbishops and metropolitans, and upon extraordinary occasions to other bishops, who wear them about their necks at the altar, above their other ornaments. The pall was first given to the bishop of Ostia by pope Marcus the Second, anno 336.

Durandus, in his Rationale, tells us that it is made after the following manner; viz. The nuns of St. Agnes, every year, on the feast-day of their saint, offer two white lambs on the altar of their church, during the time they sing Agnus Dei in a solemn mass; which lambs are afterwards taken by two of the canons of the Lateran church, and by them given to the pope's subdeacons, who put them to pasture till shearing time, and then they are shorn, and the pall is made of their wool, mixed with other white wool: the pall being thus made is carried to the Lateran church, and there placed on the high altar by the deacons of that church on the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul; and after the usual watching, it is carried away in the night and delivered to the subdeacons, who lay it up safe. Seiden's Hist. Tithe, 227. See also Cressy's Church Hist. 972.

PALMISTRY. A kind of divination, practised by looking upon the lines and marks of the hands and fingers; being a deceitful art used by Egyptians, prohibited by the 1 & 2 Phil. & Mary, c. 4.

That statute has been repealed. Persons pretending to tell fortunes by palmistry, or otherwise, are now punishable as vagrants under the 5 Geo. 4. c. 83. § 2. See Egyptians.

PAMPHLETS. By the 10 Ann. c. 19. § 113. no person shall sell or expose for sale any pamphlet without the name and place of abode of some known person by or for whom it was printed or published thereon, under a penalty of 20*l.* and costs.

By the Stamp Act, 55 Geo. 3. c. 185. every book containing one whole sheet and not exceeding eight sheets in octavo, or any lesser size, or not exceeding twelve sheets in quarto, or twenty sheets in folio, shall be deemed a pamphlet.

This act imposed a duty on pamphlets, which however was repealed by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 23.

As to what pamphlets shall be deemed newspapers within the 60 Geo. 3. c. 9. and subjected to the same duties, see Newspapers. See also Printers.

PANDECTS. The books of the civil law, compiled by Justinian. See Civil Law.

PANDOXATRIX. An ale-wife, who both brews and sells ale or beer; from pandoxatorium, a brewhouse. Statut. et consuetud. burgi villæ de Montgom. temp. Hen. 2.

PANEL, panella, pannellum.] According to Sir Edward Coke denotes a little part; but Spelman says that it signifies schedula vel pagina, a schedule or page; as a panel of parchment, or a counterpane of an indenture; but it is used more particularly for a schedule or roll containing the names of such jurors as the sheriff returns to pass upon any trial. Kitch. 226; Reg. Orig. 223.

For the provisions of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 50. with respect to panels of jurors, see Jury.

As to stealing of panels, see Larceny.

PANES DE MANDATO. See Mandato.

PANETIA. A pantry or place to set up cold victuals. Cowell.

PANIS ARMIGERORUM. The bread distributed to servants. Mon. Angl. i. 240.

PANIS BISUS. Coarse bread. Mon. Angl. i. 240.

PANIS BLACKWHYTLOP. Bread of a middle sort, between white and brown, such as in Kent is called ravel-bread. In religious houses it was their coarser bread made for ordinary guests, and distinguished from their household loaf, or panis conventualis, which was pure manchet or white bread. Cowell.

PANIS MILITARIS. Hard biscuit, brown George, camp bread, coarse and black. The prior and convent of E., grant to John Grove a corody or allowance, - Ad suum victum. quilibet die unum panem monachalem, i. e. a white loaf; and to his servant unum panem nigrum militare, i. e. a little brown loaf or biscuit. Cartular. Ely. MS. f. 47.

PANNAGE or PAWNAGE, pannagium; [Fr. pasnage.] That food which the swine feed upon in the woods, as mast of beech, acorns, &c. Also it is the money taken by the agistors for the food of hogs in the king's forests. Crompt. Jurisd. 155; Stat. West. 2. 13 Edm. 1. st. 1. c. 25.

Pannage had this double acceptation in Domesday Book. it meant, first, the running and feeding of hogs in the woods; and, in a secondary sense, the price or rate of their running. Ellis's Introd. to Domesd.

Manwood says pannage signifies most properly the mast of the woods or hedge-rows. And see Linwood. It is mentioned in the 20 Car. 2. c. 3. In ancient charters this word is variously written; as pannagium, pasnagium, pathnug, pannagium, and passona. See 8 Rep. 17. And in one or two entries in Domesday Book it is termed pastio.

PANNUS. A garment made with skins. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 14.

PANTILES. Are among the articles liable to certain duties of excise.

PAPER. The manufacturers are subjected to a variety of minute and vexatious regulations in the making of paper the duties on which, varying from 30 to 200 per cent. according to the class or description of paper produced, form a productive branch of the public revenue, and are under the survey of the commissioners of excise.

To steal any paper or parchment, written or printed, being evidence of the title to any real estate, is, by 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. § 23. a misdemeanor, and the offender may be transported for seven years, &c.

PAPER BOOK. See Issue Book.

PAPER-OFFICE. An ancient office within the palace of Whitehall, wherein all the public papers, writings, matters of state and council, letters, intelligences, negotiations of the king's ministers abroad, and generally all the papers and despatches that pass through the offices of the two principal secretaries of state, are lodged and transmitted, and there remain disposed in the way of library. There is also an office belonging to the Court of King's Bench so called. Diet

PAPISTS. Persons professing the popish religion, otherwise distinguished by the denomination of ROMAN CATHOLICS. The word papist seems to be considered by the Roman Catholics themselves as a name of reproach, originating in their maintaining the supreme ecclesiastical (and heretofore temporal) power of the pope, papa. For this reason, probably, the word papist is not to be found in the index to a most valuable production by a gentleman of that persuasion; though in one of the notes on the work he gave perhaps a more clear and explicit summary of the then existing law on this subject than had any where else appeared. See 1 Inst. 391, a, in the notes, and the word Roman Catholics in the Index to the Notes. See also 4 Comm. c. 4. and Mr. Christian's Notes there.

For the act by which the disabilities of the Roman Catholics has been removed, see Roman Catholics.

PAR. A term in exchange, where a man to whom a bill is payable receives of the acceptor just so much in value, &c. as was paid to the drawer by the remitter. Merch. Diet And in exchange of money, par is defined to be a certain number of the pieces of coin of one country, containing them an equal quantity of silver to that of another number of pieces of the coin of some other country; as where 3*l.* of the money of Holland have just as much silver as 20*s.* English money; and bills of exchange drawn from England to Holland, at the rate of 3*l.* Dutch, for each 1*l.* sterling, is according to the par. Lock's Consid. of Money, 18.

The par of the currency of any two countries means, among merchants, the equivalency of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currencies of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. Thus, according to the mint regulations of Great Britain and France, 1*l.* sterling is equal to 25*fr.* 20 cent.; which is said to be the par between London and Paris. And the exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing; that is, for example, when a bill for 100*l.*, drawn in London, is worth 2,520*fr.* in Paris, and conversely. When 1*l.* in London buys a bill on Paris for more than 25*fr.* 20 cent., the exchange is said to be in favour of London, and against Paris; and when, on the other hand, 1*l.* in London will not buy a bill on Paris for 25*fr.* 20 cent., the exchange is against London, and in favour of Paris. McCulloch's Com. Dict.

PARACIUM The tenure between parceners, viz. that which the youngest oweth to the oldest. Domesday.

PARAGE, paragium. Equality of name, blood, or dignity; but more especially of land, in the partition of an inheritance between coheirs: hence comes to disparage and disparagement. Co. Litt. 166. Paragium was also commonly taken for the equal condition betwixt two parties, to be contracted in marriage; for the old laws did strictly provide, that young heirs should be disposed in matrimony, con paragio, with persons of equal birth and fortune, sine disparagione. See Tenure.

PARAMOUNT, from the French par, i. e. per, and monter, ascendere.] Signifies in our law the highest lord of the fee, of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. F. N. B. 27. As there may be a lord meane, where lands are held of an inferior lord, who holds them of a superior under certain service; so this superior lord is lord paramount; and all holders, which have minors under them, have lords paramount. The king is said to be chief lord, or lord paramount of all the lands in the kingdom. Co. Litt. 1. See Mean Tenure.

PARAPHARNALIA, or PARAPHERNALIA, from the Greek Παρερ, Patris, and Φερν, Don.] Those goods which a wife is entitled to, secum ferre, over and above her dowry or jointure, after her husband's death. See Baron and Feme, IV. 7.

PARASITUS. A domestic servant. Blount.

PARAVAH, par-wah. Tenant paravah is the lowest tenant of the fee, or he who is named the tenant to one who holds over of another, and he is called tenant paravah, because it is presumed he hath profit and advantage by the land. F. N. B. 7, 2 Inst. 230; 9 Rep. See Tenure.

PARCELLA TERRAE. A parcel of land: used in some ancient charters.

PARCELL MAKERS. Two officers in the Exchequer, who formerly made the parcels of the escheators' accounts, and they charged them with every thing they have levied for the king's use within the time of their being in office, and delivered the same to the auditors to make up their accounts therewith. Practice Excheq. 99.

PARCELS, BILL OF. An account of the items composing a parcel or package of goods, transmitted with them to the purchaser.

PARCENERS

Quasi parceners i. e. rem in parcellas dividentes.] Persons holding lands in co-partnership, and who may be compelled to make division. See Litt. § 241. These are of two sorts; viz. parceners according to the course of the common law, and parceners according to custom.

- I. Of the Nature of an Estate in Parcenary, or Coparcenary.
- II. How such Estate may be parted or dissolved, and the consequences thereof.

I. PARCENERS by the common law, are where a man or woman seised of lands or tenements in fee-simple or fee-tail hath no issue but daughters, and dieth, and the tenements descend to such daughters, who enter into the lands descended to them, then they are called parceners, and are but as one heir to their ancestor; and they are termed parceners, because by the writ de partitione faciendâ the law will constrain them to make partition; though they may do it by consent, &c. Litt. 213; 1 Inst. 161. And if a man seised of lands in fee-simple, or in tail, dieth without issue of his body begotten, and the lands descend to his sisters, they also are parceners; and in the same manner where he hath no sisters, but the lands descend to his aunts, or other females of kin, in equal degree, they are also parceners; but where a person hath but one daughter she shall not be called parcener, but daughter and heir, &c. Litt. § 242.

If a man hath issue two daughters, and the eldest hath issue divers sons and daughters, and the youngest hath issue divers daughters; the eldest son of the eldest daughter shall not inherit alone, but all the daughters of the youngest shall inherit, and the eldest son is coparcener with the daughters of the youngest sister, and shall have one moiety, viz. his mother's part; so that men descending of daughters may be parceners, as well as women, and shall jointly plead and be impleaded, &c. 1 Inst. 164. None are parceners by the common law, but either females, or the heirs of females, who come to lands or tenements by descent. Litt. 254.

Parceners by custom is, where a person seised in fee-simple, or in fee-tail, of lands or tenements of the tenure called gavelkind, hath issue divers sons, and dies; such lands shall descend to all the sons as parceners by the custom, who shall equally inherit, and make partition as females do, and writ of partition lies in this case, as between females, &c. Litt. § 265.

Women parceners make but one heir, and have but one freehold; but between themselves they have in judgment of law several freeholds to many purposes; for one of them may enfeof the other of her part; and the parcenary is not severed by the death of any of them; but if one dies, her part shall descend to her issue, &c. 1 Inst. 164, 165.

In the case of coparceners of a title of honour, the king may direct which one of them and her issue shall bear it; and if the issue of that one become extinct, it will again be in abeyance, if there are descendants of more than one sister remaining. But upon the failure of the issue of all, except one, the descendant of that one being the sole heir, will have a right to claim, and to assume the dignity.

There are instances of a title, on account of a descent to females, being dormant, or in abeyance, for many centuries. Harg. Co. Litt. 165.

Lord Coke says there is a difference in an office of honour, which shall be executed by the husband or deputy of the eldest. Ibid. Yet when the office of great chamberlain had descended to two sisters, coheirresses of the duke of Lancaster, one of whom was married to Peter Burrell, Esq., the judges gave it as their opinion in the House of Lords, "that the office belongs to both sisters; that the husband of the eldest is not of right entitled to execute it; and that both sisters may execute it by deputy, to be approved of by them; such deputy not being of a degree inferior to a knight, and to be approved of by the king." See Bro. P. C.

The properties of parceners are in some respects like those of joint-tenants; they having the same unities of interest, title, and possession. They may sue and be sued jointly for matters relating to their own lands. Co. Litt. 164. And the entry of one of them, until the passing of the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 12. in some cases enured as the entry of them all. Co. Litt. 188, 243; 6 East, 173. They cannot have an action of trespass against each other; but they differ from joint-tenants, in that they are also excluded from maintaining an action of waste, 2 Inst. 403; for coparceners could at all times put a stop to any waste by writ of partition; but till the statute of Hen. 8. joint-tenants had no such power. See Joint-Tenants.

Parceners also differ materially from joint-tenants in four other points:—1. They always claim by descent, whereas joint-tenants always claim by purchase. Therefore, if two sisters purchase lands, to hold to them and their heirs, they are not parceners, but joint-tenants. Litt. § 254. And hence it likewise follows, that no lands can be held in coparcenary but estates of inheritance, which are of a descendible nature; whereas not only estates in fee and in tail, but for life or years, may be held in joint-tenancy.

2. There is no unity of time necessary to an estate in coparcenary: for if a man hath two daughters, to whom his estate descends in coparcenary, and one dies before the other, the surviving daughter and the heir of the other, or when both are dead, their two heirs are still parceners; the estate vesting in them each at different times, though it be the same quantity of interest, and held by the same title. Co. Litt. 164, 174.

3. Parceners, though they have an unity, have not an entirety of interest. They are properly entitled each to the whole of a distinct moiety; Co. Litt. 163, 164; and of course there is no jus accrescendi, or survivorship, between them, for each part descends severally to their respective heirs, though the unity of possession continues; and as long as the lands continue in a course of descent, and united in possession, so long are the tenants therein, whether male or female, called parceners. But if the possession be once severed by partition, they are no longer parceners, but tenants in severalty; or if one parcener aliens her share, though no partition be made, then no longer are the lands held in coparcenary, but in common. Litt. § 309; and see 2 Comm. c. 12. p. 187, 188.

The possession of one parcener, &c. of land, without an actual ouster, until recently, gave possession to the other of them. Hob. 120; Dyer, 128. But this rule of law is altered by the 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 12. See Limitation of Actions, II.

One parcener may justify detaining the deeds, concerning the lands, against another, as they belong to one as well as the other. 2 Roll. Abr. 31.

II. If one parcener make a feoffment in fee of her part, this is a severance of the coparcenary. 1 Inst. 167. Though if two coparceners by deed alien both their parts to another in fee, rendering to them two, and their heirs, a rent out of the land, they shall have the rent in course of parcenary; because their right in the land out of which the rent is reserved was in parcenary. Ibid. 160.

If there be two parceners, and each of them taketh husband, and have issue, and the wives die, the parcenary is divided, and here is a partition in law. 1 Inst. 160. Partition of lands held in tail, by the death of one sister without issue is made void, and the other sister, as heir in tail, will be entitled to the whole land, and she might have had a writ of formedon, where the other parcener had aliened. New Nat. Br. 476. And a writ of nuper obiit formerly lay for one parcener deformed by another, &c. F. N. B. 197.

Parceners are to make partition of the lands descended; and estates of coparcenary at common law are applicable only to inheritances: partition may be made between parceners of inheritances which are entire and divisible, as of an advowson, rent-charge, or such like; but it is otherwise of inheritances which are not entire and indivisible, as of a piscary, common without number, or such uncertain profits out of lands; for in such case the eldest parcener shall have them, and the others have contribution from her out of some other inheritance left by the ancestor; but if there be no such inheritances, then the eldest shall have these uncertain profits for one time, and the youngest for another time. Dyer, 153.

Parceners cannot make partition so as for one to have the land for one time and another for another, &c., for each is to have her part absolutely; but if an advowson descend to them, they may present by turns; and if there be a common, &c. which may not be divided, one may have it for one year, and another for another year, &c. 1 Inst. 164.

An advowson is an entire thing, and yet, in effect, the same may be divided betwixt parceners, for they may present by turns; and if there be coparceners of an advowson appendant to a manor, and they make partition of the manor, without mentioning the advowson, the same is still appendant, and they may present by turns. 8 Rep. 79. If two parceners be of an advowson, and they agree to present by turns, this is a good partition as to the possession: but it is not a severance of the estate of inheritance. 1 Rep. 87.

If three coparceners of an advowson do not agree to present on a vacancy, the eldest, or her assigns, may present on the first turn; and the second and third, or their assigns, to the next turns, according to the order of the birth of the coparceners. 1 H. Bl. 412.

In pleading a right in coparcener to present to an advowson by turns, it is good to state that the right arose because they did not agree to present, which is synonymous to saying they could not agree. 1 H. Bl. 376.

If one parcener hath a rent granted to her upon a partition made to make her part equal with the other, she may distrain for the arrears of common right; and so shall the grantee of the rent, because it is not annexed to her person only, but to her estate. 3 Rep. 32.

Partition between parceners may be made four ways; viz. first, when they themselves divide the lands equally into as many parts as there are parceners, and each chooses one share or part, the eldest first, and so one after another, &c.

Secondly, When they agree to choose certain friends to make division for them.

Thirdly, Partition by drawing lots: where, having divided the lands into as many parts as there are parceners, and written every part in a distinct scroll, being wrapt up, they each draw one.

And fourthly, partition by writ de partitione faciendâ, which is by compulsion, where some agree to partition, and others do not; and when judgment is given on a writ of partition, it is that the sheriff shall go to the land, and by the oaths of twelve men make partition between the parties, to hold to them in severalty, without any mention of preference to the eldest sister, &c. Litt. 248; 1 Inst. 161. But if there be a capital messuage on the land to be divided, the sheriff may allot that wholly to the eldest of the parceners. 1 Inst. 165. The partition made and delivered by the sheriff and jurors ought to be returned into court under the seal of the sheriff and the seals of the twelve jurors; for the words of the judicial writ of partition, which command the sheriff to make partition, are assumpsis tecum duodecim, &c. et partitionem inde scire facias justiciariis, &c. sub sigillo tuo et sigillis eorum per quorum sacramentum partitionem illam feceris, &c. If partition be made by force of the king's writ, and judgment thereof given, it shall be binding to all parties, because it is made by the sheriff, by the oath of twelve men, by authority of law; and the judgment is, that the partition shall remain firm and stable for ever. 1 Inst. 171.

Blackstone says, there are many methods of making partition, four of which are by consent, and one by compulsion to which latter may now be added, or indeed for which may be substituted, the proceedings in a court of equity to obtain a decree for partition. See Joint-tenants, III. 2.

The four modes of partition by consent are thus stated by Blackstone: the first is, where they agree to divide the lands into equal parts in severalty, and that each shall have such a determinate part.

The second is, when they agree to choose some friend to make partition for them, and then the sisters shall choose each of them her part, according to seniority of age, or otherwise, as shall be agreed. The privilege of seniority is in this case personal, for if the eldest sister be dead, her issue shall not choose first, but the next sister. But if an advowson descend in coparcenary, and the sisters cannot agree in the presentation, the eldest and her issue, nay, her husband or her assigns, shall present alone, before the younger. Co. Litt. 166; 3 Rep. 22. And the reason given is that the former privilege of priority in choice upon a division, arises from an act of her own, the agreement to make partition, and therefore is merely personal; the latter, of presenting to the living, arises from the act of law, and is annexed not only to her person, but to her estate also. It has been doubted whether the grantee of the eldest sister shall have the first and sole presentation after her death. Harg. Co. Litt. 166. But it was expressly determined in favour of such a grantee in 1 Ves. 340; and see 1 H. Bla. 412.

A third method of partition is where the eldest divides, and then she shall choose last; for the rule of law is cujus est divisio alterius est electio.

The fourth method is, where the sisters agree to cast lots for their shares.

But there are some things which are in their nature unpartitionable. The mansion-house, common of estovers, common of piscary uncertain, or any other common without stint, shall not be divided; but the eldest sister, if she pleases, shall have them, and make the others a reasonable satisfaction in other parts of the inheritance; or if that cannot be, then they shall have the profit of the thing by turns, in the same manner as they take the advowson. Co. Litt. 164, 165.

There is yet another consideration attending the estate in coparcenary, that if one of the daughters has had an estate given with her in frankmarriage by her ancestor which is a species of estate-tail, freely given by a relation for advancement of his kinswomen in marriage, in this case, if lands descend from the same ancestor to her and her sisters, in fee-simple, she or her heirs shall have no share of them, unless they will agree to divide the lands so given in frankmarriage in equal proportion with the rest of the lands descending. Bract. 1. 2. c. 34; Litt. § 266-273. This is denominated bringing the lands into hotch-pot. Brutton, c. 74. Which term Lathton, § 267, 268, thus explains. "It seemeth that this word hotch-pot is, in English, a pudding; for in a pudding is not commonly put one thing alone, but one thing with over things together." By this housewifely metaphor our ancestors meant to inform us that the lands, both those given in frankmarriage and those descending in fee-simple, should be mixed and blended together, and then divided in equal proportions among all the daughters; but this was left to the choice of the donee in frankmarriage; and if she did not choose to put her lands into hotch-pot, she was presumed to be sufficiently provided for, and the rest of the inheritance was divided among her other sisters. The law of hotch-pot took place then only when the other lands descending from the ancestor were fee-simple; for if they descended in fee-simple, the donee in frankmarriage was entitled to her share, without bringing her lands so given into hotch-pot. Litt. § 271. And the reason is, because lands descending in fee-simple are distributed by the policy of law, for the maintenance of all the daughters, and if one has a sufficient portion out of the same inheritance equal to the rest, it is not required that she should have more; but lands descending in fee-simple are not distributed by the operation of the law, but by the designation of the giver, per formam doni; it matters not therefore how unequal this distribution may be. Also no lands but such as are given in frankmarriage shall be brought into hotch-pot, for no others are looked upon in law as given for the advancement of the woman, or by way of marriage portion. Litt. § 275. And therefore, as gifts in frankmarriage are fallen into disuse, the law of hotch-pot would not now deserve much notice, had not this method of division been revived and copied by the statute for distribution of personal estates. See Executor, V. 9.

The estate in coparcenary may be dissolved either by partition, which disunites the possession; by alienation of one parcener, which disunites the title, and may disunite the interest; or by the whole at last descending to and vesting in one single person, which brings it to an estate in severalty. See 2 Comm. c. 12. p. 189, &c.

In a writ of partition the judgment was quod partitio fiat, and before it was executed by the sheriff, a writ of error was brought; and it was adjudged that a writ of error doth not lie upon this first judgment, because this is not like other actions, where error lies before the habere facias seisinam is returned, and the judgment is final; but it is not so in this case, as there must be another judgment, i. e. quod partitio stabilis maneat, which cannot be till the partition is made and returned by the sheriff. Holley, 36; Dyer, 67.

If there are two parceners of a manor, and on partition made, each hath demesnes and services allotted, in this case each is said to have a manor. 1 Leon. 20; Davis, 61. A partition may not be made of franchises, as goods of felons, waifs, estrays, &c. which are casual. 5 Rep. 8.

Where two persons hold lands pro indiviso, and one would have his part in severalty, and the other refuseth to make partition by deed; there the writ de partitione faciendi lies against him who refuses, directed to the sheriff, and he must be present when the partition is made; and if it is objected before the return of the writ, that he was not present, he may be examined by the court; but after the writ is returned and filed, it is too late. Cro. Eliz. 9.

A writ of partition was taken forth, and the sheriff made partition, but was not upon the land; and on motion that the return might not be filed, but that a new writ might be awarded, because the sheriff was not on the land, the court staid the filing, and on examining the sheriff, ordered a new writ. Cro. Car. 9, 10.

On writ of partition to the sheriff to make partition of lands, part of the lands were allotted to one, and the jury would not assist the sheriff to make partition of the other part; which appearing on the return of the writ, the court was moved for an attachment against the jury, and a new writ to the sheriff. Godb. 265. The ancient proceedings on a writ of partition were in some degree varied by the 31 H. 8. c. 1; 32 H. 8. c. 32; and the 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 31.

Partition was brought by tenant in fee of one moiety, against tenant for life of the other moiety, on the 32 Hen. 8. c. 32. And though it has been resolved, if partition be made between one who hath an estate of inheritance, and another who hath a particular estate for life, that the writ ought to be framed upon the statute, and to be made special, setting forth the particular estate, yet it was held to be good where the writ was general. Goldsb. 84; 2 Lutw. 1015.

By 8 & 9 Wm. 3. c. 31, a partition may be made of any estate of freehold or for term of years, &c. of manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereof the partition is demanded; and if after process of pone returned upon a writ of partition and affidavit of notice given of the writ to the tenant to the action, and a copy left with the tenant in possession at least forty days before the return of the said pone, &c. there be no appearance entered in fifteen days, the demandant having entered his declaration, the court may give judgment by default, and award a writ to make partition, whereby the demandant's part or purpart will be set out severally; which writ being executed after eight days' notice, and returned, and thereupon final judgment entered, shall conclude all persons, &c. But the court may suspend or set aside the judgment, if the party concerned move the court in a year, and show good matter in bar. And by this statute, if the high sheriff, by reason of distance, &c. cannot be present at the execution of any judgment in partition, then the under-sheriff, in the presence of two justices of peace of the county, shall proceed to the execution of the writ by inquisition, and the high-sheriff is to make the return, &c. When the partition is made and returned, the persons who were tenants of the lands or any part thereof before divided, shall continue tenants of the lands they held to their respective owners, under such conditions and rents as before; and no plea in abatement shall be admitted or received in any suit of partition, nor shall the same be abated by the death of any tenant, &c.

Customary tenements in the north of England, being parcels of the respective manors in which they are situate, and descendible from ancestor to heir, by the hereditary right called tenant-right, and held of the lord, according to the custom, are not within this statute of partition. 3 B. & P. 378.

In a writ of partition the defendant pleaded that he formerly brought writ of partition against the plaintiff, and had judgment to have partition; and held a good plea; but it was a question whether it should be pleaded in bar or abatement, or by way of estoppel. Dyer, 92. No damages can be recovered on a writ of partition, though the writ and declaration conclude ad damnum. Hell, 35; Noy, 149.

Where judgment for debt is had against one parcener, the lands, &c. of both may be taken in execution; and the moiety undivided is to be sold, and then the vendee will be tenant in common with the other coparcener; if the sheriff seize only a moiety and sell it, the other parcener will have a right to a moiety of that money. 1 Salk, 392.

All partitions ought to be according to the quality and true value of the lands, and be equal in value; but if partition be made by parceners of full age, and unmarried, and sane memorie, it binds them for ever, although the value be unequal, if it be made of lands in fee; and if it be of lands intailed, it shall bind the parties themselves for their lives, but not their issue, unless it be equal; if it be unequal, the issue of her who hath the lesser part, may, after her decease, disagree, and enter and occupy in common with the aunt; also if any be covert, it shall bind the husband but not the wife or her heirs; or if any be within age, it shall not bind the infant, but she may at her full age disagree, &c. 1 Inst, 166, 170; 2 Lit. Abr. 283. Though if a wife, after coverture, or the infant at her age, accept of the unequal part, they are concluded for ever. 1 Inst, 170. And where there be two coparceners, and one hath seven daughters, and dieth, if the other parcener releaseth to any one of the daughters her whole part, here, although she to whom the release is made, have not an equal part, the release is good. Ibid, 193. It hath been adjudged, that notwithstanding a partition is unequal, if it be by writ it cannot be avoided; but if it be by deed, it may be avoided by entry. 1 Inst, 171.

If the estate of a parcener be in part evicted, that shall defeat the whole partition; partition implying a warranty and condition in law to enter upon the whole on eviction, as in case of exchange of lands. 1 Inst, 173; 1 Rep, 87. And if after partition one of the parts is recovered from a parcener by lawful title, she shall compel the others to make a new partition. Cro. Eliz. 902. But as to eviction of parceners, if one sell her part, and then the part which the other parcener hath, is evicted, in this case she who loseth her part, cannot enter on the alienee, for by alienation the privity is destroyed. 1 Inst, 173.

Previous to the Statute of Frauds, among parceners a partition upon the land was good without deed, but not among joint-tenants, &c. Dyer, 29, 194. See Joint-tenants.

The common law mode of making a partition is, in a great measure, superseded, by filing a bill in Chancery, praying a partition; in which case the court will issue a commission to persons, who proceed to make a partition without the aid of a jury, which may be prayed for as a matter of right, where the applicant has a clear title; Ambl, 286; but not otherwise. 1 Ves. & B. 536.

FORM OF A COMMON WRIT OF PARTITION.

William the Fourth, &c. to the sheriff of S. greeting: If A. B. make you secure, &c. then summon E. B. that she be before, &c. to show wherefore, whereas the said A. B. and E. B. together and undivided hold the manor of, &c. with the appurtenances, twenty messuages, one mill, one dove-house, twenty gardens, three hundred acres of land, two hundred acres of meadow, a hundred and fifty acres of pastures, one hundred acres of wood, two hundred acres of furze and heath, and twenty shillings rent, with the appurtenances, of the inheritance which was of N. B. father of the said A. B. and E. B. whose heirs they are, in, &c.; the said E. B. doth deny partition thereof to be made between them, according to the law and custom of England; and unjustly will not permit that to be done, as it is said. And have you there the summons and this writ. Witness, &c.

PARCENARY. The holding of lands jointly by parceners when the common inheritance is not divided. Litt 56.

PARCO FRACTO. A writ against him who violently breaks a pound, and takes out beasts from thence, which for some trespass done, &c. were lawfully impounded. Reg. Orig. 166. If a person hath authority to take beasts out of the pound, if he breaks the pound before he demands the cattle of the keeper thereof, and he refuseth or interrupts him in the taking of them, &c. the writ parco fracto lies. Doct. & Stud. 112. Damages are recoverable in this writ and the party may be punished as for a pound-breach in the court-leet. 1 Inst. 47; F. N. B. 100. The word parco was frequently used for a pound to confine trespassing or straying cattle; whence imparcare, to impound; imparcare, pouncing, and imparcamentum, right of pouncing, &c.

PARDON,

PARDONATIO; VENIA.] The remitting or forgiving of an offence committed against the king; and is either ex gratia Regis, or by course of law. Stamf. Pl. Cor. 17. Pardon ex gratia Regis is that which the king affords by virtue of his prerogative. See Judges.

Pardon by course of law is that which the law in effect affords for a light offence; as casual homicide, when one killeth a man, having no such meaning. West. Symbol. part 2. tit. Indictments, § 46. See Homicide, II. 2.

The power of pardoning offences is inseparably incident to, and is the most amiable prerogative of the crown, and this high prerogative the king is entrusted with upon a special confidence, that he will spare those only whose case could it have been foreseen, the law itself may be presumed willing to have excepted out of its general rules, which the wisdom of man cannot possibly make so perfect as to suit every particular case. 1 Show, 284.

Anciently the right of pardoning offences within certain districts was claimed by lords who had jura regalia by ancient grants from the crown, or by prescription. But by the 27 Hen. 8. c. 24. it was enacted, "That no person shall have power to pardon any treasons or felonies, nor any accessories, nor outlawries; but that the king shall have the authority thereof united to the crown of this realm, as of right it appertaineth." Co. Litt. 114; 3 Inst. 233. And this power belongs only to a king de facto, and not to a king de jure, during the term of usurpation. Bro. Abr. ut Chanc. ber de Pardon, 22.

The power of pardoning offences is stated by Blackstone to be one of the great advantages of monarchy in general above every other form of government, and which cannot subsist in democracies. Its utility and necessity are defended by him on all those principles which do honour to human nature. See 4 Comm. c. 31. p. 396, 397.

He then proceeds to consider pardons under the following heads, a distribution here adopted as most convenient :

- I. The object of Pardon; that is, in what cases and for what offences a Pardon may be granted, or not.
- II. The manner of Pardoning; wherein how far a Pardon is grantable of common right; and by what words offences may be pardoned.
- III. The method of allowing a Pardon.
- IV. The effect of such Pardon when allowed.

I. The king may pardon all offences merely against the crown or the public, excepting, 1. That, to preserve the liberty of the subject, the committing any man to prison out of the realm is by the habers corpus act, 31 Car. 2. c. 10, made a pardonable even by the king. Nor, 2. Can the king pardon where private justice is principally concerned in the prosecution of offenders: "non potest in gratiam facere cum injuria et damno alterius" 3 Inst. 200. The crown in criminal appeals of all kinds (which were the suit, not of the king, but of the party injured,) the prosecutor might have released, but the king could not pardon. Ibid. 237. Neither can he pardon a common nuisance, while it remains unredressed, or so as to prevent an abatement of it, though afterwards he may remit the fine; because, though the prosecution is vested in the king, to avoid multiplicity of suits, yet, on account of its continuance, this offence savours more of the nature of a private injury to each individual in the neighbourhood, than of a public wrong. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 33. Neither, lastly, can the king pardon an offence against a popular or penal statute, after information brought; for thereby the informer hath acquired a private property in his part of the penalty. 3 Inst. 338.

There is also a restriction of a peculiar nature that affects the prerogative of pardoning, in case of parliamentary impeachments; viz. that the king's pardon cannot be pleaded to any such impeachment, so as to wipe the injury, and stop the prosecution of great and notorious offenders. Therefore, when, in the reign of Charles II. the Earl of Danby was impeached by the House of Commons of high treason, and other misdemeanors, and pleaded the king's pardon in bar of the same, the Commons alleged, "that there was no precedent that ever any pardon was granted to any person impeached by the Commons of high treason, or other crimes against the impeachment;" and thereupon resolved, "that the pardon so pleaded was illegal and void; and ought not to be allowed in bar of the impeachment of the Commons of England," for which resolution they assigned this reason to the House of Lords: "that the setting up a pardon to be a bar of an impeachment, defeats the whole use and effect of impeachments; for should this point be admitted, or stand the future; it would totally discourage the exhibiting any for the government would be destroyed." Com. Journ. 28th Apr. 1679; 5th May, 1679; 26th May, 1679. Soon after the Revolution the Commons renewed the same claim, and voted "that a pardon is not pleadable in bar of an impeachment." And at length it was enacted by the Act of Settlement, 2 & 3 Will. 3. c. 2, "that no pardon under the great seal of England shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in parliament." But after the impeachment of England shall be solemnly heard and determined, it is not understood that the king's royal grace is further restrained or abridged; for after the impeachment and attainder of the six rebel lords in 1715, three of them were from time to time reprieved by the crown, and at length received the benefit of the king's most gracious pardon; and a remarkable record is cited by Mr. Christian, Rot. Parl. 50 Edm. 3. n. 188, in which it is asserted by the king, and acknowledged by the Commons, that the king's prerogative to pardon delinquents convicted on impeachment, is as ancient as the constitution itself. See Impeachment.

It is laid down in general that the king may pardon any offence, so far as the public is concerned in it, after it is over, consequently may prevent a popular action on a statute by pardoning the offence before the suit is commenced; but it seems that he cannot wholly pardon a public nuisance while it continues such, because such pardon would take away the only means of compelling a redress; yet it is said that such a pardon will save the party from any fine to the time of the pardon. Plowd. 487; Keilm. 134; 12 Co. 29, 30; 3 Inst. 237; Vaugh. 333.

The king cannot by any charter bar any right of entry or action, real or personal, on contract, or for wrong done, or any legal interest or benefit before vested in the subject; therefore it seems clear that he cannot bar any action on a statute by the party grieved, nor even a popular action commenced before his pardon, nor a recognizance of the peace before it is forfeited. Plowd. 487; 2 Roll. Abr. 178; Cro. Car. 199; Keilm. 134; Moor, 863.

The power of the crown to pardon a forfeiture, and to grant restitution, can only be exercised when things remain in statu quo, but not so as to affect legal rights vested in third persons. Rea v. Amery, 2 T. R. 569.

It seems agreed that the king can by no previous licence, pardon, or dispensation, make an offence dispunishable, which is malum in se; as being either against the law of nature, or so far against the public good as to be indictable at common law; and that a grant of this kind, tending to encourage the doing of evil, which it is the chief end of government to prevent, is against the common good, therefore void. Dar. 75; 5 Co. 35; 12 Co. 29; see 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37; 3 Hen. 7. 16. pl. 30.

Where a thing, in its own nature lawful, was made unlawful by parliament, it was formerly taken as a general rule, that the king might dispense with it, as to a particular time or place, or person, so far as the public was concerned in it; unless such dispensation could not but be attended with an inconvenience, as the introducing a monopoly; or frustrating the end for which the law was made; as the licensing a particular person to import foreign cards or wines, &c. in which case it was commonly taken to be void; also, where a statute gave a particular interest or right of action to the party grieved, it was always agreed that no charter from the king could bar the right of the party, grounded on such statute; also where a statute was express, that the king's charter against the purport of it, though with the clause of non obstante, should be void; it seems to have been always generally agreed that regularly no such clause could dispense with it. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 28.

It seems to have been agreed that no dispensation of any statute, except the statutes of mortmain, was of any force without a clause of non obstante; neither is such clause now of any effect, for it is declared and enacted by 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2, that no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute, or any part thereof, be allowed; but that the same shall be held void, except a dispensation be allowed in such statute; but it is provided that no charter, grant, or pardon, granted before the 23d of October, 1689, shall be any ways invalidated by that act, but that the same shall be and remain of the same force, and no other, as if the said act had never been made. See King, V. 3.

But there is no need of any scire facias against the lord by escheat; because the pardon no way tends to reverse the attainder whereon the title of escheat is founded. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 37.

II. FORMERLY a pardon must have been under the great seal; and, if pleaded, must have been averred to be under the great seal, except a statute pardon, or what amounted thereto. 1 B. & P. 199.

A warrant under the privy seal, or sign manual, though a sufficient authority to admit the party to bail, in order to plead the king's pardon, when obtained in proper form, yet was not of itself a complete irrevocable pardon. 5 St. Tr. 166, 173.

Under two modern statutes the king may grant a free or conditional pardon by sign manual. See post, IV.

It is a general rule that wherever it may reasonably be presumed that the king is deceived, the pardon is void. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 8. Therefore any suppression of truth, or suggestion of falsehood, in a charter of pardon, will vitiate the whole, for the king was misinformed. 3 Inst. 238.

And this is in conformity with the 27 Edw. 3. c. 2. which directs that in every charter of the pardon of felony, the suggestion, and the name of him that maketh the suggestion, shall be comprised; and if it be found untrue, the charter shall be disallowed.

General words have also a very imperfect effect in pardons. A pardon of all felonies will not pardon a conviction or attainder of felony; for it is presumed the king knew not of those proceedings; but the conviction or attainder must be particularly mentioned. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 8. And a pardon of felonies will not include piracies; for that is no felony punishable at the common law. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 6, &c.

It has been also held, that the king's grant of a protection, or of a place of trust to a traitor or a felon, does not carry with it an implied pardon of his crime. See Cro. Jac. 494; 1 St. Tr. 187, 877; 2 Hawk. c. 37. § 25.

By the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 9. it was enacted, "That if it be found by the country that a person tried for the death of a man, did it in his defence, or by misfortune, then, by the report of the justices to the king, the king shall take him to his grace, if it please him." 2 Inst. 316.

And it was settled, agreeably to the ancient common law, in affirmance whereof this statute was made, that in such a case, or where one indicted of homicide se defendendo confesses the indictment, if the party caused the record to come into Chancery, the chancellor would of course make him a pardon, without speaking to the king, and that by such pardon the forfeiture of goods would be saved; for these words, "if it shall please the king," should be taken as spoken only by way of reverence to him, and not intended to make such a pardon discretionary.

Now, by the 9 Geo. 4. c. 31. whereby the 6 Edw. 1. c. 9. was repealed, it is enacted (§ 10.) that no punishment or forfeiture shall be incurred by any person killing another by misfortune, or in his own defence, or in any other manner without felony.

By the 13 Rich. 2. st. 2. c. 1. no pardon for treason, murder, or rape, shall be allowed, unless the offence be particularly specified therein; and particularly in murder it shall be expressed whether it was committed by laying in wait, assault, or malice prepense. Upon which Coke observes, that it was not the intention of parliament that the king should ever pardon murder under these aggravations; and therefore they prudently laid the pardon under these restrictions; because they did not conceive it possible that the king would ever excuse an offence by name, which was attended with such high aggravations. 3 Inst. 236. And it is remarkable enough that there is no precedent of a pardon in the register for any other homicide than that which happens se defendendo or per infortunium; to which two species the king's pardon was expressly confined by the 2 Edw. 3. c. 2. and 14 Edw. 3. c. 15. which declare that no pardon of homicide shall be granted but only where the king may do it by the oath of his crown; that is to say, where a man slayeth another in his own defence, or by misfortune. But the 13 Rich. 2. st. 2. c. 1. before mentioned, enlarges by implication the royal power, provided the king is not deceived in the intended object of his mercy. And therefore pardons of murder were always granted with a non obstante of the statute of King Richard till the time of the Revolution, when the doctrine of non obstantes ceasing, it was doubted whether murder could be pardoned generally; but it was determined by the Court of King's Bench that the king may pardon on an indictment of murder, as well as a subject may discharge an appeal. Salt. 499. Under these and a few other restrictions it is a general rule that a pardon shall be taken most beneficially for the subject, and most strongly against the king.

It has been already mentioned as a general rule, that wherever it appears by the recital of the pardon that the king was misinformed, or not rightly apprised, both of the heinousness of the crime, and also how far the party stands convicted upon record, the pardon is void, upon a presumption that it was gained from the king by imposition. See also 1 L. 43, 47; Cro. Jac. 18, 34, 548; 2 Roll. Abr. 188. Dyer, 352, pl. 26; Raym. 13; 1 Sid. 41; 3 Inst. 438. And on this ground it hath been holden, that the pardon of a person convicted by verdict of felony, is void unless it recite the indictment and conviction; also it hath been questioned if the pardon of a person barely indicted of felony be good, without mentioning the indictment; but it hath been adjudged that such a defect is saved by the words ave indictum sine non. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 8.

Anciently a pardon of all felonies included all treasons as well as felonies; and it seems to be taken for granted in many books that such a general pardon is, even at this day, pleadable to any felony, except murder, rape, and piracy; and that the only reason why it may not also be pleaded to murder and rape is, because the 13 Rich. 2. st. 2. c. 1. requires an express mention of them; and that the only reason why it is not pleadable to piracy is because it is a felony by the civil law. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 466; 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 45; see ante; and 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 9.

No pardon of felony shall be carried beyond the express purport of it; therefore if the king, reciting an attainder of robbery, pardon the execution, he thereby neither pardons the felony itself, nor any other consequence of it, besides the execution. 6 Co. 13; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 12.

It was formerly adjudged that murder might be pardoned under the general description of a felonious killing, with a clause of non obstante. 1 Sid. 266; 1 Show. 283; Kelng. 24. 3 Mod. 37. And pardons of manslaughter still remain as they were at common law before the doctrine of non obstante was exploded; therefore the pardon of the felonious killing of J. S. may be pleaded to an indictment of manslaughter killing him; but where such a pardon is pleaded to a coroner's inquest of manslaughter, the court may refuse to allow it till the fact be found manslaughter by a jury directed by a higher court. 2 Keb. 363, 415; Kelng. 24; 2 Jon. 56.

The exception of murder, in a general act of pardon of all felonies, does not extend to felo de se; for though this offence be in strictness murder, yet in common speech, according to which statutes are commonly expounded, it is generally understood as a distinct offence, the word murder seeming prima facie to import the murder of another. 1 Lev. 8, 12. 1 Sid. 150; 1 Keb. 66, 548.

It is said that a general act of pardon of all felonies, misdemeanors, and other things done before such a day, pardons a homicide from a wound before the day, whereof the party died not till after; because the stroke being pardoned the effects of it are consequently pardoned. Plowd. 401, Coke's case; 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 426; Dyer, 99, pl. 65.

It is said that a pardon of all misprisions, trespasses, offences, and contempts, will pardon a contempt in making a false return, and a striking in Westminster Hall, and barratry.

PARDON, III.

try, and even a præmunire; also it is laid down in general that it will pardon any crime not capital. 1 Lev. 106; 1 Sid. 211; 2 Mod. 52; see 2 Hule's Hist. P. C. 252; Dyer, 308 a.

A pardon may also be conditional; that is, the king may extend his mercy upon what terms he pleases, and may annex to his bounty a condition either precedent or subsequent, on the performance whereof the validity of the pardon will depend; and this by the common law. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 45. And the power of the king to grant a conditional pardon is recognized in two recent statutes. See post, IV. This royal prerogative is daily exerted in the pardon of felons, on condition of being confined to hard labour for a stated time; or of transportation to some foreign country for life, or for a term of years; such transportation or banishment being allowed and warranted by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. 2. c. 2. § 14. See Transportation.

As to persons entitled to pardons on discovering their accomplices, see 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 8; 6 & 7 W. & M. c. 17; and tit. Accessories, Receivers.

III. A PARDON by act of parliament is more beneficial than by the king's charter; for a man is not bound to plead it, but the court must, ex officio, take notice of it. Post. 48. Neither can a man lose the benefit of it by his own laches or negligence, as he may of the king's charter of pardon. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 64. The king's charter of pardon must be specially pleaded, and that at a proper time; for if a man is indicted, and has a pardon in his pocket, and afterwards puts himself upon his trial by pleading the general issue, he has waived the benefit of such pardon. Ibid. § 59. But if a man avails himself thereof, as soon as by course of law he may, a pardon may either be pleaded upon arraignment, or in arrest of judgment, or, in the present stage of the proceedings, in bar of execution.

By the 10 Edw. 3. c. 2. no pardon of felony could be allowed, unless the parties found six sureties for the good behaviour, before the sheriff and coroners of the county. Sate. 499. But that statute was repealed by the 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 1. which, instead thereof, gives the judges of the court a discretionary power to bind the criminal pleading such pardon to his good behaviour, with two sureties, for any term not exceeding seven years.

But these sureties, it would appear, are only required where the party is a person of ill fame. 2 Str. 1203.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 25. § 3. in case of free or conditional pardon granted to an offender convicted of a capital felony, the discharge of the offender in the one case, and the performance of the condition in the other, shall have the effect of a pardon under the great seal. And by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 27. § 13. this enactment is extended to all cases of felony.

By the 1 Geo. 4. c. 31. § 3. where offenders convicted of a felony, not being capital, have endured the punishment adjudged for that offence, the endurance thereof shall have the effect of a pardon under the great seal; but this shall not prevent or mitigate the punishment consequent upon a subsequent conviction for any other felony.

Where a man was convicted of grand larceny, sentenced to transportation for seven years, and confined in the hulks for that time, and then discharged, it was held, that his suffering seven years aboard the hulks in execution of the sentence of seven years' transportation, operated as a statute pardon; and that his having escaped twice during the confinement, for a few hours each time, did not destroy the effect of it. Russ. & Ry. Cro. Cas. 248.

Where a copyholder was convicted of a capital felony, and pardoned upon condition of remaining two years in prison, and the lord did not do any act towards seizing the copyhold, it was held, that at the expiration of the two years the copyholder might maintain ejectment against one who had ousted him, inasmuch as the pardon restored his competency, and the estate did not vest in the lord without some act done by him. 5 B. & C. 584.

By the 8 Geo. 3. c. 15. (one of the statutes providing for the transportation of offenders,) it was provided that "such transportation" should have the effect of a pardon under the great seal. To an action on a bill of exchange of the defendant, pleaded in bar that the plaintiff, before the date of the bill, had been convicted of felony, and sentenced to death; that his majesty had extended his mercy to the plaintiff, on condition of his being transported for life; whereupon the court gave judgment according to the form of the statute. Replication,—that before the cause of action accrued the plaintiff was in due manner transported. Rejoinder,—that after the plaintiff was so transported, he was unlawfully at large in England. Sur-rejoinder,—that before the cause of action accrued, the governor of New South Wales (being duly authorized) had remitted the remainder of the plaintiff's term of transportation, whereby the plaintiff was lawfully at large, and traversing that he was unlawfully at large. The defendant demurred to the sur-rejoinder, and on argument the case turned principally on the meaning of the word "transportation" in the clause of the statute which gives it the effect of a pardon. And the court held, that the word meant, not merely the conveying the party to the place of transportation, but also the remaining there during the period mentioned in the sentence; and therefore the plaintiff, not having fulfilled this condition, was still in the situation of an attainted felon, and had not regained his civil rights either by merely being transported, or by the remission of the governor, which had not the effect of a general pardon: and judgment was given for the defendant. 2 B. & A. 258.

By the 58 Geo. 3. c. 29. no fee, &c., payable in respect of any pardon, or for any letters-patent, charter, warrant, bill, docket, or other instrument appertaining thereto, or the transcript of any such instrument, shall be paid by the party pardoned; but all fees on such pardons shall be paid by the treasury. And the letters-patent and other instruments of pardon are exempted from stamp-duty.

IV. THE effect of such pardon by the king is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporeal penalties and forfeitures annexed to that offence for which he obtains his pardon; and not so much to restore his former, as to give him a new credit and capacity. But nothing can restore or purify the blood when once corrupted, if the pardon be not allowed till after attainder, except the high and transcendent power of parliament. Yet if a person attainted receives the king's pardon, and afterwards hath a son, that son may be heir to his father, because the father, being made a new man, might transmit new inheritable blood; though had he been born before the pardon, he could never have inherited at all. See Attainder, Escheat.

A pardon will not only discharge any suit in the spiritual court ex officio, but also any suit in such court ad instantiam partis pro reformatione morum, or salute animæ; as for defamation, or laying violent hands on a clerk, &c. See 5 Co. 51; Litch. 190; Cro. Eliz. 684; Hob. 81; Cro. Jac. 335; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 37. § 41, &c.

If a person be imprisoned on an excommunicato capiendo for non-payment of costs, and the king pardons all contempts, it is said, that he shall be discharged without any seire facias against the party, and that the party must begin anew to compel payment of costs; because the imprisonment was grounded on the contempt, which is wholly pardoned. 1 Jon. 227; 2 Roll. Abr. 178; Cro. Jac. 159; 8 Co. 68, 69.

But no pardon will discharge a suit in the spiritual court any more than in a temporal, for a matter of interest or property in the plaintiff; as for tithes, legacies, matrimonial contracts, and such like; also it is agreed, that after costs are taxed in a suit, in such court, at the prosecution of the party, whether for a matter of private interest, or pro reformatione morum, or pro salute anime, or for defamation, &c. they shall not be discharged by a subsequent pardon. 5 Co. 51; Latch. 190; Cro. Car. 46, 47. And with respect to costs, see 2 Roll. Abr. 304; Noy, 85; Latch. 155.

With regard to the effect of a pardon in restoring the party's competency as a witness, see Evidence, II.

For more learning on this subject, see 3 New Abr. tit. Pardon.

PARDONERS. Persons who carried about the pope's indulgences, and sold them to any who would buy them. An. 22 Hen. 8.

PARENT, parens.] A father or mother, but generally applied to the father; parents have power over their children by the law of nature, and the divine law; and by those laws they must educate, maintain, and defend their children. Wood's Inst. 63. The parent or father hath an interest in the profits of the children's labour while they are under age, if they live with and are maintained by him; but the father hath no interest in the estate of a child, otherwise than as his guardian. Ibid. The eldest son is heir to his father's estate at common law; and if there are no sons, but daughters, the daughters shall be heirs, &c. And there being a reciprocal interest in each other, parents and children may maintain the suits of each other, and justify the defence of each other's person. 2 Inst. 564.

A parent may lawfully correct his child being under age in a reasonable manner; for this is for the benefit of his education. So he may justify an assault and battery in its defence.

A parent may be indicted for not providing sufficient food and necessities for his child while unable to provide for, and take care of, itself. R. & R. 20. And by the vagrant act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, § 4. a man deserting his wife and children, and leaving them chargeable to the parish, is declared a rogue and vagabond, and punishable with three months' imprisonment to hard labour.

The consent or concurrence of the parent to the marriage of a child under age is necessary by the marriage act; but these and all other powers of a parent cease in law, when a child arrives at the age of twenty-one. See 1 Comm. c. 16; this Dictionary, Age, Bastard, Guardian, Infant, Marriage, Poor, and other apposite titles.

PARENTELA, or DE PARENTELA SE TOLLERE. To renounce his kindred, which was done in open court before the judge and in the presence of twelve men, who made oath, that they believed it was done lawfully, and for a just cause. We read it in the laws of Hen. 1. c. 88. See Vill.

PARISH, parochia.] Did anciently signify what we now call the diocese of a bishop; but at this day it is the circuit of ground in which the people who belong to one church do inhabit, and the particular charge of a secular priest. It is derived from the Saxon Preost-scýre, Preost scyre; which signifies the precinct of which the priest had the care, in English priest-shire.

How ancient the division of parishes is, may at present be difficult to ascertain; for it seems to be agreed on all hands, that in the early ages of Christianity in this island, parishes were unknown, or at least signified the same that a diocese does now. There was then no appropriation of ecclesiastical dues to any particular church; but every man was at liberty to contribute his tithes to whatever priest or church he pleased, provided only that he did it to some; or, if he made no special appointment or appropriation thereof, they were paid into the hands of the bishop, whose duty it was to distribute them among the clergy, and for other pious purposes, according to his own discretion. 1 Comm. Introd. § 4.

Camden (in his Britannia) says, England was divided into parishes by Archbishop Honorius about the year 630. Sir Henry Hobart lays it down, that parishes were first erected by the council of Lateran, which was held anno Domini 1179.

Each widely differing from the other, and both of them perhaps from the truth; which will probably be found in the medium between the two extremes. For Mr. Selden has clearly shown, (of Tithes, c. 9.) that the clergy lived in common without any division of parishes, long after the time mentioned by Camden. And it appears from the Saxon laws that parishes were in being long before the date of that council of Lateran, to which they are ascribed by Hobart. 1 Comm. ubi sup.

We find the distinction of parishes, nay, even of mother churches, so early as in the laws of King Edgar, about the year 970. Before that time the consecration of titles was in general arbitrary; that is, every man paid his own as before observed to what church or parish he pleased. But this being liable to be attended with either fraud, or at least caprice, in the persons paying, and with either jealousies or mean compliances in such as were competitors for receiving them; it was ordered by the law of King Edgar, (c. 1.) that "dentur omnes decimæ primariæ ecclesiæ ad quam parochia pertinet." However, if anythane, or great lord, had a church within his own demesnes, distinct from the mother church, in the nature of a private chapel; then, provided such church had a cemetery or consecrated place of burial belonging to it, he might allot one-third of his tithes for the maintenance of the officiating minister; but, if it had no cemetery, the same must himself have maintained his chaplain by some other means; for in such case all his tithes were ordained to be paid to the primariæ ecclesiæ, or mother church. 1 Comm. ubi sup.

This proves that the kingdom was then universally divided into parishes; which division happened probably not all at once, but by degrees. For it seems pretty clear and certain, that the boundaries of parishes were originally ascertained by those of a manor or manors; since it very seldom happens that a manor extends itself over more parishes than one, though there are often many manors in one parish. But it present the boundaries of the one afford no inference or evidence whatever of the boundaries of the other. The lords, as Christianity spread itself, began to build churches upon their own demesnes or wastes, to accommodate their tenants in one or two adjoining lordships; and, in order to have divine service regularly performed therein, obliged all their tenants to appropriate their tithes to the maintenance of the one officiating minister, instead of leaving them at liberty to distribute them among the clergy of the diocese in general; and this tract of land, the tithes whereof were so appropriated, formed a distinct parish; which will account well enough for the frequent intermixture of parishes one with another. For if a lord had a parcel of land detached from the main of his estate, but not sufficient to form a parish of itself with the natural for him to endow his newly-erected church with the tithes of those disjointed lands; especially if no church was then built in any lordship adjoining to those outlying parcels. Thus parishes were gradually formed, and parish churches endowed with the tithes that arose within the circuit assigned.

But some lands, either because they were in the hands of irreligious and careless owners, or were situate in forests and desert places, or for other now unsearchable reasons, were never united to any parish, and therefore continue to this day extra-parochial; and their tithes are now by immemorial custom payable to the king instead of the bishop, in trust and confidence that he will distribute them for the general good of the church. 2 Inst. 647. 2 Rep. 44; Cro. Eliz. 512. Yet extra parochial wastes and marsh lands, when improved and drained, are by the 17 Geo. 2, c. 37, to be assessed to all parochial rates in the parish next adjoining. 1 Comm. ubi sup. and see 1 Wils. 182.

Lord Holt held, that parishes were instituted for the ease and benefit of the people, not of the parson; and the reason why parishioners must come to their parish church is, because having charged himself with the cure of their souls, he might be enabled to take care of that charge. 3 Salk. 88, 89. A parish may comprise many vills; but generally it shall not be accounted to contain more than one, except the contrary be shown, because most parishes have but one vill within them. 11th, 23 Car. 1. B. R. And it shall not be intended that there is more than one parish in a city, if it be not made to appear; for some cities have but one parish. Ibid. Where there are several vills in a parish, they may have peace-officers, and overseers of the poor, for every particular vill; and an ancient vill in a parish, that time out of mind hath had a church of its own, and churchwardens and parochial rights, being reputed a parish, is a parish within the 1. Eliz. c. 2. to provide for its own poor; and shall not pay to the poor of the parish wherein it lies. 11th, 23 Car. 1. B. R. But to make a vill a reputed parish within 43 Eliz. c. 2. it must have a parochial chapel, chapelwardens, and sacraments, at the time that statute was made. 2 Salk. 501. Parishes in reputation are within that statute, especially when it has been the constant usage of such parishes to choose their own overseers; who may distrain for a poor-tax, &c. 2 Roll. Rep. 160; 2 Nels. Abr. 1255. See further Poor, Overseers, Vill.

The settling the bounds of parishes depends upon ancient and immemorial custom. For they have not been limited by any act of parliament, or set forth by special commissioners, but have been established as the circumstances of times, and places, and persons did happen to make them greater or lesser. 1 Still. 243.

Formerly the boundaries of parishes were preserved by annual perambulations, which, being performed in rogation week, the rogation days were on that account anciently called gange-days, from the Saxon gan or gangan to go.

These perambulations (though of great use in order to preserve the bounds of parishes,) were, in the times of popery, accompanied with great abuses; viz. with forstings and with superstition, being performed in the nature of processions, with banners, hand-bells, lights, staying at crosses, and the like; and, therefore, when processions were forbidden, the useful and innocent part of perambulations was retained, in the conjunctions of Queen Elizabeth, wherein it was required, that, for the retaining of the perambulation of the circuits of parishes, the people should once in the year, at the time accustomed, with the curate and the substantial men of the parish, walk about the parishes, as they were accustomed, and at their return to the church make their common prayers. And the curate in their said common perambulations, was at certain convenient places to admonish the people, to give thanks to God (in the beholding of his benefits), and for the increase and abundance of his fruits upon the face of the earth, with the saying of the 103d psalm: at which time also the said minister was required to recite these or such like sentences, Cursed be he which translateth the bounds and dolles of his neighbour, or such other order of prayers as should be lawfully appointed. Giba. 213.

The bounds of parishes though coming in question in a spiritual matter, shall be tried in the temporal court. This is a maxim, in which all the books of common law are unanimous; although our provincial institutions do mention the bounds of parishes amongst the matters which merely belong to the ecclesiastical court, and cannot belong to any other. Giba. 212.

The bounds of a parish may be tried in an action at law, if it a bill will not lie for an issue or commission to ascertain the boundaries of two parishes. See 1 Bro. C. C. 40; 2 Anstr. 80. 395.

By the general inclosure act, 41 Geo. 3. c. 109. the commissioners are empowered to examine witnesses on oath as to the boundaries of parishes, &c.; and where not sufficiently ascertained, they are to ascertain and fix such boundaries. Persons dissatisfied with their decisions may appeal to the sessions.

By the 3 Geo. 4. c. 72. § 26. land purchased by parishes, under that act, for additional burial grounds, is to be deemed part of such parishes.

By the last act for the building of additional churches, 1 & 2 Wm. 4. c. 38. § 23. if any person is willing to endow any existing chapels of ease having a chapelry or district belonging thereto, the bishop of the diocese may, with the consent of the patron and incumbent of the parish, declare such chapelry a distinct parish for all spiritual purposes. And by § 25. two churchwardens are to be chosen for such new parish.

The districts assigned to the new churches or chapels built in pursuance of the above act, and former statutes, are to be under the immediate care of the minister of such churches or chapels, so far as regards the visitation of the sick, and other pastoral offices, and are to be under churchwardens, but they are not to be deemed districts for any other purposes.

With respect to the liability of parishes to repair all roads lying within them, see Way.

PARISH CLERK. In every parish the parson, vicar, &c. hath a parish clerk under him, who is the lowest officer of the church. They were formerly clerks in orders, and their business was at first to officiate at the altar, for which they had a competent maintenance by offerings; but now they are laymen, and have certain fees with the parson, on christenings, marriages, burials, &c. besides wages, for their maintenance. Count. Pars. Compan. 83, 84. They are to be twenty years of age at least, and known to be of honest conversation, sufficient for their reading, singing, &c. And their business consists chiefly in responses to the minister, reading lessons, singing psalms, &c. And in the large parishes of London some of them have deputies, to despatch the business of their places, which are more gainful than common rectories. The law looks upon them as officers for life; they are regarded by the common law as persons who have freeholds in their offices; and, therefore, though they may be punished, yet they cannot be deprived, by ecclesiastical censures. 1 Comm. 395.

A mandamus lies to restore a parish clerk who has been improperly deprived of his office. In a case in Comp. 370, Lord Mansfield said, it was settled, that a parish clerk was a temporal officer, and the minister must show ground for turning him out.

Parish clerks are generally appointed by the minister, unless there is a custom for the parishioners or churchwardens to choose them; in which case the canon cannot abrogate such custom; and when chosen it is to be signified to, and they are to be sworn into their office by, the archdeacon. Cro. Cur. 589; Can. 91. And if such custom appears, the Court of B. R. will grant a mandamus to the archdeacon to swear him in, for the establishment of the custom turns it into a temporal or civil right. 1 Comm. 395. A parish clerk may make a deputy without licence of the ordinary; Strange, 942; but he cannot sue in the spiritual court for fees as being a temporal officer. 2 Strange, 1108.

By the 59 Geo. 3. c. 134. § 29. the parish clerks of churches or chapels built under that statute or the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. are to be annually appointed by the ministers, but the subsequent acts for the building of additional churches do not contain any provision on the subject.

PARISHIONER, parochianus.] An inhabitant of or belonging to any parish, lawfully settled therein. Parishioners are compellable to put things in decent order; but the judgment of the majority is the only rule for the degrees of that decency; and the court inclined that a rate for that purpose is binding; as for moving the communion-table out of the body of the church into the chancel, or raising it higher, &c. 7 Mod. 70.

Parishioners have a right to view parish books. 11 Mod. 134. Parishioners are a body politic to many purposes; as to
